ther to do, to bring their purpoſe to good ende. And from thence they remoued to Saint Albons, and came thether on Chriſtmas Euen, and there tarried that day and the next, and on Saint Stephens day they tooke their way to London, & there muſtered themſelues beſydes Clerkenwell, with a goodly army, which they diuided into three battayles, and their harneſſe was ſo cleane and bright, that it was a goodly ſight to beholde: And they ſent two Knightes, and two Eſquiers vnto the Maior of London, and Aldermen, and chiefe Citizens of the ſame, that they ſhould come and declare vnto the ſayde Lords, whether they were minded to take their partes, and the partes of the Commons, or elſe with the Duke of Irelande, and his Adherentes, Traytors vnto the King and the Realme. So came the Maior of London, whoſe name was Nicholas Exton, and certeine of the chiefe of the City with him, and brought the Keyes of the Citie with them, and ſubmitted themſelues to the Lordes, and offered them entrie into the Citie at their pleaſures with all their people. And then the Lordes ſent certeine perſonnes before, to ſearche if there were any buſhmentes, or perſonnes lye in wayte, for to trap or deſtroy them. And when they were well aſſured that all was cleere, they entred into the Citie, and there abode quietly. Sone after their commyng, meanes was made that there might be a meetyng betwixt the King and the Lords, & that they might come to common with him in the tower of London, which was agreed vpon. And the Fryday folowyng came vnto the King ſitting in a Pauilion ſtately apparelled, the Duke of Glouceſter, the Erle of Nottyngham, and the Erle of Darby. But before theyr commyng into the Tower, they had the keyes of the Gates ſent vnto them, and of all the ſtrong holdes within the Tower. And ſo ſoone as they came into the kinges preſence, after their humble ſalutations done, they requeſted the King, that all thoſe of his Court which were knowne or ſuſpected of treaſon to his perſon or realme, might be taken and committed to ſeueral holdes, the which the King graunted. And duryng the tyme of this communication, the Erle of Darby deſyred the king vpon the Wall of the Tower to beholde the people that were there aſſembled for the preſeruation of him and his realme, which he did, and marueyled much to ſee ſuch a goodly armie and ſtrength. Then ſayde the Duke of Glouceſter vnto him, ſir this is not the tenth part of your willyng ſubiectes that would haue riſen to haue deſtroyed theſe falſe Traytors. And after they had ſuch cõmunication with the King, they would haue taken their leaue of him: But the king deſyred them to tary all night there with the Quene. The Duke thinkyng to make all ſure, made his excuſe that he durſt not be abſent from all thoſe folkes which they had brought with them, for feare that ſome buſineſſe might ariſe, eyther in the armie, or in the Citie. But at the kinges inſtance, the Erles of Nottyngham, and Darby taryed there all night.

And the nexte daye king Richard, at the inſtaunce of the Lordes, cauſed to be taken all ſuſpect folkes of his courte, and to be ſent into dyuers priſons to be kept againſt the parliament, and then to come to their aunſwere. The perſons that were apprehended, were theſe. Sir Symond Burley, Sir Wyllyam Elman, Sir Nicholas Dagwoorth, ſyr John Golofor, Clifford and Slake prieſts, Sir John Beawchamp, ſyr Thomas Treuet, ſyr John Salſburie, and one called Lyncoln, and James Barners a prieſt. should also haue bene apprehended Alexander Neuell Archbishop of Yorke, Mighell de la Poole Erle of Suffolk, and Robert Tresilien chiefe Justice of England, but these would not be found. And there was also taken Syr Robert Brember of London knight, but he found suretie for his foorth comming. Other Lords and Ladies there were that were put out of the Court, as John Fortham Bishop of Deuelyn, Lord Bewmond, Lorde Sowche, Lorde Louell, Lorde Thomas Canweyes, the Lord Cliffords sonne, Lord Bawdewyn, the Bishop of Chichester the kings Confessor, the Lady Monoy, the Lady Poynings, the Lady Molyners and dyuers other.

Certein persons put out of the Court.

Shortly after, that is to say the morow after Candlemas daye the parliament began, the which was named the parliament that wrought wonders. And the first daye of the parliament were arested sytting in their places all the Justices except Sir Wylliam Skipwoorth, that is to saye, Sir Roger Fulthorpe, syr Robert Belknap, Sir John Carey, syr John Holt, syr William Brooke, and John Alocton the kings Sergeaunt at lawe, all which were committed to the Towre, and there kept in seuerall places. The cause of their apprehension was, for that at the last parliament the Lordes and Nobles were made gouernors of the realme, by the assent of the sayde parliament, and also by the assent and counsayle of all the Justices then beyng, and therefore Indentures tripartited were made, wherof the one part remayned with the king, and the second parte with the Lords that were chosen to gouerne the realme, and the thirde parte with the Justices. And for as much as the sayde Justices at a counsayle holden at Nottyngham, as aforesayde, did afterward contrary to the sayde agreement, it was determyned that they should make aunswer therynto.

A parliamẽt.

The Judges arested and committed to the Tower.

In the beginning of the parliament was called Robert Veer Duke of Irelande, Alexander Neuell Archebishop of Yorke, Mighell de la Poole Erle of Suffolk, Sir Robert Tresilian chiefe Justice of Englande, to answere Thomas of Woodstock Duke of Glouceſter, Richard Erle of Arondell, Thomas Erle of Darby, and Thomas Erle of Nottyngham vpon certaine articles of high treason, which these Lordes did charge them with. And for as much as none of these appered, it was ordeyned by the whole assent of the parliament that they shoulde be bamished for euer: And their landes and goodes, moueable and vnmouable, to be forfeit and seased into the kinges hand, the landes entayled onely except.

Judgement geuen against the exill coũsaylours.

Shortly after this, was founde Robert Tresilian chiefe Justice lurkyng in a Potticaries house at Westmynster, and there founde the meanes to haue spyes daylie vpon the Lordes what was done in the parliament: For all the dayes of his lyfe he was craftie, but at the last his craft turned to hys destruction: for he was discouered by his awne seruant, and so taken and brought to the Duke of Glouceſter, and the same daye had to the Towre, and from thence drawen to Tyborne, and there hanged.

Robert Tresilian chiefe Justice of England executed.

The morow after, Syr Nicholas Brembre which afore had bene Maior of of the Citie of London against the Citezens will, was brought foorth. This man had done in the Citie many great oppressions, and in his Mairaltie had made great and monstreous stockes to empryson men in, and also he caused to be made a common Are, to stryke of the heades of them which did resist his will and pleasure, for so highly was he in fauour with the king, that that he might do what he would. And the repoꝛt went that he had cauſed.viij thouſand and mo to be endited, which befoꝛe had taken part with ꝧ Lordes, which he entended to haue put to execution, if God had not ſhoꝛtened hys dayes. And in the ende, being called to his anſwer, he was found giltie, and had iudgement neyther to be hanged noꝛ dꝛawen, but to be hedded with his awne Axe, which befoꝛe he had deuiſed.

Dyuers condemned and executed.

The next day after, there were condempned theſe folowyng, Thomas Uſke, John Blagg, Sir Symon Burly, ſyꝛ John Beauchamp, Sir John Barners, John Erle of Salſburie, and euerie of them were executed.

Juſtices condemned to perpetuall exile.

As touching the Juſtices, they were alſo condempned to death by the Parliament: But ſuche meanes was made foꝛ them vnto the Quene, that ſhe obteyned of the king pardon foꝛ their liues, but they foꝛfeyted their lands and goodes, and were iudged to perpetuall exile, and places appointed vnto them where they ſhould remayne.

And in the.xij. yere of the kings reigne, he kept a Marciall Juſtes in Smithfield in London, in the month of Nouember, where all ſuch perſons as came in on the kings partie, their Armour and apparell was garniſhed with whyte hartes, and cꝛownes of Golde about their neckes.

The Badge of king Richard the ſecond were whyte hartes with chaynes of Golde about their neckes.

And of that ſoꝛte were.xxiiij. knightes, with.xxiiij. Ladyes alſo appareled, as aboueſayde, and their hoꝛſes were led with.xxiiij. To this diſpoꝛte came many ſtraungers, among the which the Erle of Saint Paule, the Loꝛde Oſtreuaunt, ſonne and heyꝛe vnto the Duke of Holland, and a yong ſonne of the Erle of Oſtrich, were greatly commended.

And when theſe Juſtes had cõtinued by ſundꝛy times the ſpace of.xxiiij. dayes, to the great ioye and comfoꝛte of the young luſtie Bachelers, and to the kings great honoꝛ, who all that tyme kept open houſhold foꝛ all honeſt cõmers: I ſay, when the ſame was finiſhed, the ſtraungers returned to their Countries with many riche giftes. In the.xiiij. yere of this king, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, with a goodly company of men of armes, ſayled into Spayne, to clayme there ſuche ſuche landes as he ought to haue, in the right of Dame Conſtance his wife, when the ſayde Duke was vpon the other ſide of the Sea, there came vnto him the king of Portingale with a ſtrong armie, and ſo entred the Territorie of Spaine. And there chaunced much harme to be done to the Spaniardes in robbing and pylling their countrie, but whether by the Engliſhmen or the Portingales, it was not well knowen, but it cauſed grudge betwene the king of Portingale and the Duke, and alſo made many Spanyards that ought them good will to drawe back, and departe from them. And for reformation of that euill, certaine perſons, as well Engliſh as Portingales that were founde giltie of ſuche robberie, were put to death: By meane wherof, the other feared ſo, that where by the former lewdeneſſe the Duke and the king were put to after deale, by the reformation of that euill, they gate againe daylie vpon their enimies: So that in proceſſe of time the king of Spayne was driuen of neceſſitie to treat with the Duke of a peace and concord.

John Duke of Lancaſter ſayleth into Spaine.

Of the which peace, as ſayth Reynulph in his laſt boke, and.vij. Chapter, the conditions were theſe.

Conditions of peace made betweene the king of Spaine, and the Duke of Lancaſter.

Firſt, for a finall concord, the king of Spaine ſhould mary the Dukes eldeſt daughter, named Conſtance.

Alſo, that he ſhould geue vnto the Duke in recompenſe of coſtes ſo many wedges of Golde as ſhoulde lade eyght Charets. And that yerely during the lyues of the ſayde Duke and his wyfe, he ſhould at his proper coſte and charge, delyuer to the Dukes aſſignes ten thouſand Marke of Gold, within the towne of Bayon.

And after this peace was ſtabliſhed, and ſureties taken for the performaunce of the ſame: The Duke departed with the king of Portingale, to whome ſhortly after he maried his ſecond daughter, named Anne.

And in this yere the Turks made cruell warre againſt the Genowayes or men of Geane, & they ſought ayde of the king of England, and of the king of Fraunce. And for their helpe there was ſent out of England a noble warryour called the Erle of Alby, with two thouſande Archers. And out of Fraunce went the Duke of Burbon, and the Erle of Ewe, with.xv.hundred ſpeares. The which kept their iourney vntill they came vnto a City in Barbary, named Thunys, ſometime belonging to the ſayde Genowayes, where the ſayde Engliſh and Frenchmen bare themſelues ſo manfully, with the ayde of the Genowayes, that in proceſſe they wanne the ſayde Citie from the Turkes, and put the Genowayes agayne in poſſeſſion thereof, and toke of them many priſoners, the which were exchaunged for chriſten priſoners before taken. And more, they forced they ſayde Sarazens to paye vnto the Genowayes ten thouſande Ducates of Golde, for confirmation of a peace for a certaine time. But ſome other write, that this towne was not recouered, but only a truce taken for a time. And Froiſſart ſayth, that the Chriſtians departed ſodainely from the Citie of Thunes, without any league or truce making, fearing dyuers perilles and incidents that might elſe haue chaunced vnto them.

An ayde ſent out of Englande and Fraunce againſt the Turkes.

And here Cooper (in his Chronicle) ſayth: That in this time in Englande it was decreed that the auctoritie of the Biſhop of Rome ſhould be ended with the Occean Sea, and it ſhould be lawfull thenceforth to no man to appeale to the Biſhop of Rome, nor make ſute that any Engliſhmā ſhould be

The death of king Robert of Scotland.

And in this yere dyed king Robert of Scotland, and Iohn Erle of Carreck his eldeſt ſonne ſucceded and reigned after him, whome the Scottes called Robert after his father, becauſe they thought Iohn an vnluckie name in a king. He was maymed with the ſtroke of an ho̱rſe in his youth, and ſo made vnhable fo̱ the gouernaunce of the Realme, and Duke Robert of Albanye continued as gouernoure all the tyme of hys reigne, and he reigned xvj. yeres.

The Erle of Pembꝛooke in running at the tylt, was wounded to death.

King Richard liyng at his Manoꝛ of Woodſtock, and keepyng there his Chriſtmaſſe: The Erle of Pembꝛooke beyng yong of age, was deſyꝛous to learne to iuſt, and requyꝛed a Knight named Sir Iohn Saint Iohn to run with him certeine courſes. At whoſe requeſt the ſayd Knight ranne with him in Woodſtocke Parke certeine Courſes. In the which, were it with ſtroke o̱ other miſhap, the ſayde Erle receyued there his deathes wound, and dyed ſho̱tly after.

I ſond Fray whereby the liberties of Lõdon were ſeazed into the Kinges hande.

And at this tyme chaunced in London a Bakers ſeruant to carie a Baſket full of ho̱rſebꝛead: And as he came beto̱re the biſhop of Sariſburies place in Fleteſtreet, one of the Biſhops ſeruauntes tooke out one of the Loues, and the Baker was earneſt to haue it againe, and the Biſhops ſeruaunt with his Dagger bꝛake the Bakers heade: then came the Citizens and woulde haue had the Yoman to Warde fo̱ bꝛeaking of the peace, and he reſiſted and fled into the Biſhoppes houſe. Then roaſe the ſtreete, namely the youth, and they woulde haue had him out of the Biſhoppes houſe, and there was great heauing and ſhouyng, and many people vp. And at the laſt came the Maio̱ of London, and the Shirifes, and they pacified this buſineſſe as ſoone and as well as they could, and ſho̱tly after all was in quiet.

Arundel Biſhop of Cañto̱rburie was Chaunceloꝛ of England.

In this meane tyme, the Biſhop of Sariſbury beyng at the Court with the king, and himſelfe alſo being then high treaſurer of England, ſuch wo̱rde was bꝛought him of this ryot, and the tale ſo euill tolde agaynſt the Citizens and rulers of the Citie, that the ſayd Biſhop info̱rmed maiſter Arondell then Archebiſhop of Cauntoꝛbury, and Chauncelo̱ of Englande thereof, and in fine they two made ſo gꝛieuous a tale and complaint to the king agaynſt the Rulers of the Citie, and Citizens, that the Maio̱ and Shirifes were ſent fo̱ in all haſt: And when they came, they were ſhaken vp to gꝛieuouſly, and their honeſt and reaſonable excuſes could not be heard: But fo̱thwith the liberties of the Citie were ſeazed into the kinges handes, and the Maio̱ and Shirifes diſcharged of their offices, and a knight named ſir Edwarde Dalingrige made Gouernour of the Citie.

And the king beyng thus in diſpleaſure with the Citie, cauſed Myghelmaſſe Terme to be kept at Yo̱rke, and ſo continued vntill Chriſtmaſſe nert folowyng.

Doctoꝛ Grauelende Biſhop of London reſtoꝛed the liberties of London.

The Citizens percey̱uyng the king to continue in diſpleaſure with them, made daily labour vnto ſuch friendes as they could make, to pacify the kings wꝛath agaynſt them, and to obteyne his moſt gracious pardon. The which at length, ſpecially by the meane of the Queene, and Doctoꝛ Grauelende then Biſhop of London, they obteyned. But firſt the Citizens were tolde that the

the king entended to come from his Maioz of Shene, to the Citie of London, and then it was lyke they ſhould obtain fauour: Wherefoze in all goodly haſt the Citizens trymmed and bewtefyed their Citie moſt ſumptuouſly with Pageauntes and riche hangynges, and at the day appoynted, foure hundzeth of them in one Lyuery road and met the king on the Hethe on this ſide Shene, and in their moſt humble maner ſubmitting themſelues, and pzaiyng his grace to pardon their follyes paſt, beſought hun to take his way to hys Palayce of Weſtminſter thzough the Citie of London. The which the king tooke in good part, and graunted them ſo to do: And when he came at London Bzidge, they pzeſented vnto him two fayze ſteedes, trapped in riche cloth of Golde, parted of red and white. The which pzeſent he thankfully receiued. And ſo the king kept on his way vntill he came to the Standard in Cheepe, the Citizens of London in their Liuereys ſtandyng vpon eyther ſyde of the ſtreet as the king went, cryyng, King Richard, King Richard. And at the ſayde Standard in Cheepe was ozdeyned a ſumptuous ſtage, in the whiche were ſet dyuers perſonages in rich apparell. Among the which, one Angell was ozdeyned, which with a vice came dowone, and ſet a riche crowne of gold garniſhed with ſtone and pearle vpon the kinges heade as he paſſed by, and another on the Queenes, and ſo they roade foozth vntill they came at Weſtminſter, where the Maioz and his companie, takyng theyz leaue of him, returned to London.

King Richard paſſeth thzough London.

The nezt day folowyng, the Maioz and his bzethzen went to Weſtminſter, and pzeſented there vnto the king two Baſons of Siluer and gylt, and in them two thouſand nobles of Golde, beſechyng him in moſt humbly wiſe, to be good and gracious Lozd vnto the Citie. The which he accepted thankfully, and gaue vnto them very comfoztable wozdes. And the thirde day folowyng they receyued a newe confirmation of all their olde franchiſes and liberties: Wherefoze by counſayle of their friendes, they ozdeyned a Superaltare of Siluer, and guilt, and therein the ſtozye of Saint Edwarde was grauen moſt curiouſly, the which was valued at a thouſand marke, and that they alſo pzeſented as theyz gift vnto the king, which was verye well accepted and taken.

The liberties of London newly confirmed and reſtozed.

And here Fabian ſayth, that foz the great zeale and loue that the afozeſayde Biſhop of London bare vnto the Citie and Citizens in this their ſute to the king foz their liberties, they of theyz awne good willes to this day, yerely vpon the feaſtful dayes, as the day ỳ the Maioz taketh his othe, which is the mozowe after Simon and Jude, and Alhalowen day, Chziſtmaſſe day, the Twelfe day, and Candlemaſſe day, when they go to Paules in theyz Liuereys, they viſite the place of his buryall, beyng in the middle Jſle in the weſt ende of the Church, where the ſayde Biſhop is pictured and dzawen foozth in Bzaſſe, holdyng the Charter of the Citie of London, and the great ſeale of England in his hand. But it ſeemeth to me that this is not true, foz the place of buriall in Paules, to the which the Maioz doth reſozte, is the graue where William, ſometyme Biſhop of London is buryed, of whom we haue made mention in the firſt yere of William the Conqueroz, who firſt obteyned the pziuileges foz the Citie, and ſo it appereth by the inſcription vpon the ſame Grauеſtone.

A chalenge made betweene ſ gentlemen of England and Scotland.

And in this time, ſaith Fabian, dyuerſe Gentlemen of Scotland chalenged ſundrie poyntes of Armes with certeine Gentlemen of England. As firſt the Lorde Mordife, chalenged the Erle of Nottyngham Marſhall of England. Sir William Darell knight, and Cockborne Eſquier, chalenged Sir Nicholas Haulbert knight. And the ſame feates of Armes were holden in Smithfielde in London. And Mars was ſo friendly to the Engliſhe men, that the honour of that iourney went with them: Inſomuche that the Erle Marſhall ouerthrew the Lorde Mordife his Appellant, and ſo bruſed him, that in his returne towarde Scotland, he dyed at Yorke. And Sir William Darell refuſed his Appellant before they had runne theyr full courſes. And the thirde of them, that is to wit Cockborne, was throwen at the ſeconde coppyng, to the ground, horſe and man.

Anne Quene of England, and wife to king Richard dead.

This yere and the. viij. day of June, dyed that gracious woman Quene Anne, and lyeth nowe buryed at Weſtminſter by her Lord king Richard, vpon the Southſyde of Saint Edwardes ſhrine.

And this yere was a Truce concluded betweene Fraunce and England for foure yeres.

1394 18

This yere king Richard made a voyage into Ireland, which was nothing profitable, nor honourable vnto him, and therefore the Writers ſeeme to thinke it ſcant worth the notyng.

A ſore and great tempeſt.

Alſo in this yere was a wonderfull tempeſt of wynde, which did muche hurte throughout the Realme of England. And in this yere alſo dyed Conſtance, the ſecond wife of John of Gaunt, and is buried at Leyceſter.

1395 19

This yere king Richard (as ſayth Reynulph) went ouer to Calice, and there met with the French king about the concluſion of a maryage, which was with the Ladie Iſabell daughter vnto the French king, whome the ſayd French king did offer to the king of England to take in mariage as his wife. At the meting of theſe two Princes, was great prouiſion made of both ſides, and many ſumptuous ſhewes and ſightes were there ſhewed and ſeene, and many riche and moſt coſtly bankets & feaſtes made by the one prince to the other, the reherſall wherof ſhould be tedious, wherfore I will be ſhort. At the laſt this mariage was agreed vpon, and the day of the ſolempnitie therof appoynted. And the. xviij. day of Nouember, the ſayde king Richard maryed the ſayd Lady Iſabell in Calice, beyng within the age of. viij. yeres, as ſaith Fabian. And Polidore alſo ſayth that ſhe was not of ripe and mete yeres to accompany with a man: But the Auctour of the Booke which is called the Chronicles of England, ſayth that ſhe was. xix. yeres of age.

Giftes geuen by the kinges of England and Fraunce.

And here a little to note the giftes geuen of the kinges one to another, whereof Froiſſart maketh a great & long diſcourſe. But to be ſhort, firſt king Richard gaue vnto the French king, a Baſon of Golde, with an Ewer. Then the French King gaue him three ſtanding Cups of Gold with Couers garniſhed with pearle and ſtone, and a ſhip of Gold richely garniſhed with perle and ſtone. At another metyng king Richard gaue him an Owche, ſet with ſo fine ſtones, that it was valued at fiue hundreth Marke. Then the Frenche king gaue him two Flagons of Golde, a Tablet of Golde, and therein an Image of Saint Michell richely garniſhed. Alſo a Tablet of Golde wyth a Crucifix, richely appoynted. And a Tablet of Golde with the Image of the Trinitie, Trinitie set with pearle and stone, and a Tablet of Golde with an Image of Saint George, richely set with pearle and stone, which all were valued at xv. hundreth Marke. Then king Richard seeyng the bountie of the French king, gaue to him a Bawderick or Coller of Gold, set with great Diamods, Rubyes, and Balelles, beyng valued at fiue thousand Marke, the which for the richenesse thereof, and for the excellency and fineneſſe of the workemanship, the Frenche king ware it aboute his necke, as often as the king and he met together. Then the Frenche king gaue to him an Owche and a spice plate of Golde of a great weight, valued at two thousand Marke. Also many were the riche giftes that were geuen and receyued of Lordes and Ladies of both Princes. Among the which are specially noted foure giftes, which king Richard gaue vnto the Duke of Orleaunce, for the which he receyued againe of the Duke treble the value. For where his were valued at a thousand Marke: The Dukes were valued at three thousand Marke.

Now after that these two kinges had thus solaced themselues, the one with the other, and all matters concerning the mariage fully concluded and ended. The French king, taking his leaue of King Richard, delyuered hys young daughter vnto him, and sayde as followeth.

Right louyng sonne, I delyuer here to you the creature that I most loue in this worlde next my wife and my sonne, beseeching the father of heauen, that it may be to his pleasure, & to the weale of your realme, and that the amitie betweene these two realmes, in aduoydyng of the effusion of christian bloud, may be kept inuiolably for the terme betweene vs concluded, which terme was .xxx. yere, as sayth Froissart. And shortly after these two princes tooke their leaue eche of other, and the French king went into Fraunce, and king Richard came into England. Where he and the Queene were by the Citezens of London most honorably conueyed thorough the sayde Citie vnto the Palice of Westmynster.

The latter ende of thys yere the king by sinister counsaile delyuered vp by appoynment the towne of Brest in Britteyne to the Duke, which was occasion of displeasure betweene the king and the Duke of Gloucester his Uncle, as after ye shall here.

In Februarij next folowyng, the king holding a sumptuous feast in Westminster Hall, manye of the Souldious which were newly come from the towne of Brest aforesayde, preassed into the hall, and kept a rome together. Which companie the Duke of Gloucester did earnestly beholde, and asked what men they were: and when he knew they came from Brest, which towne was geuen vp without his knowledge, he was vered in his minde. In somuch as when the king was entred into his Chamber, and fewe nere vnto him, he sayde to the king: Sir, sawe ye not the felowes that sate in so great a number to daye in your hall at suche a table? And the king answered yes, and asked the Duke what companie it was? To whome the Duke answered and sayde, syr these are the Souldiours come from Brest, and as nowe haue nothing to take to, nor know not how to shift for their liuing, and the rather for that I am informed, they haue bene before time euil paid. Then sayd the king, it is not my will, but that they should be well payd: And if any haue cause to complayne, let them shewe it vnto oure Treasorer, and they shall be reasonably answered.

In reaſonyng of this matter further, the Duke ſayde to the king, ſyr you ought to put your bodye to paine for to wynne a ſtrong holde or towne by feate of warre, before ye take vpon you to ſell or delyuer any towne or ſtrong holde that is gotten with great difficulty, and by the manhood of your noble progenitors. To this the king with chaunged countenaunce anſwered and ſayde: Uncle, how ſaye you thoſe wordes? Then the Duke boldly recited the aforeſayde wordes. Wherevnto the king being then more diſcontented, ſayde: wene you that I am a Marchaunt, or a foole, to ſell my land? by ſaint John Baptiſt nay: But truth it is, that our Coſyn the Duke of Briteyne hath rendred vnto vs all ſuche ſommes of money as our progenitors lent vnto him or his auncеſtours, vpon the ſayde towne of Breſt: for the which, reaſon & good conſcience will, þ he haue his towne reſtored vnto him agayne. By meane of which words thus vttered by the Duke, ſuch rancour and malice kindled betweene the king and him, that it ceaſſed not vntill the ſayde Duke was put to death by murder vnlawfully, as ſhall appere in the next yere followyng.

This preſent yere the king bearing ſtill malice in his minde agaynſt the Duke of Glouceſter, as aforeſayde, and chiefly for that he and the Erles of Arondell, and of Warwike and other had forced him to renounce his moſt truſtie friends and counſaylors, as he thought, as is before at large declared in the. xj. yere of this kings reigne, and nowe partly to be reuenged on their outrage, as he ſayde: And partly alſo for that all princes ſubiects ſhould take example, not to preſſe their ſouereigne Lorde after that maner, he ſommoned a parliament to be holden at Weſtminſter. And there, not regarding the othe that he had made before to the Lordes in open parliament, he called out of exile certaine of the Juſtices, which by the former ſentence giuen, ſhould neuer haue returned. And for that the Deuill is alway readie to haſten euill purpoſes: This yere came out of Almayne to the king the Prouoſt of Coleyn with other: And they perceauing that the king was light and ambicious, thinking alſo to wynne largely thereby, informed him that eyther he was or ſhould be choſen Emperour, which pleaſed him highly, and he gaue good credite vnto them, and very liberally rewarded them for their good tydings. And becauſe he would be certainely certefied, he ſent ouer his Ambaſſadors, which at their returne againe into Englande made reporte vnto the king, that the moſt parte of the Electors had conſented to his election, onely two or three withſtood it, for this cauſe, as they ſayd, that he that could not keepe in due obeyſaunce his awne ſubiectes, in his awne realme, it was not lyke that he ſhould gouerne well other lyeng farre of and wide a ſunder: Wherefore his Ambaſſadors aduiſed him to wynne the fauour of them that ſo did ſtick. Nowe whether the meſſengers did fayne this, to renewe the kings diſpleaſure againſt the Duke of Glouceſter and the Erle of Arundell and other, for that perraſe they bare them no good will, or that they brought true reporte agayne, it is not knowen: But now when it was thought that this realme of England was moſt quiet, and that proſperitie was lyke daylie to encreaſe, what for that the king had maried the French kings daughter, and had by her great riches: And alſo for that truce was taken betwene both the princes for. xxx. yeres: And alſo conſidering the goodly garniſhment of this realme by the great and wiſe number of noble Lordes, and valiaunt knightes, knightes, which were ſuche, as no chriſtian realme for the number of them coulde then ſhewe the lyke. All theſe things conſidered, euen contrary to all mens expectation, ſodainely the kinges maieſtie bearing in his heart great wrath and diſpleaſure againſt the true Lords of his counſayle as afore ſayd, whome he nowe purpoſed to be reuenged of, practiſed their deſtructions, which put the realme to great trouble, and in the ende it turned to the ouerthrowe and confuſion of the king himſelfe, as ye ſhall here. For the .vj. daye of Julij next after, the king appointed to keepe a great feaſt in London, where he purpoſed to haue had the Duke of Glouceſter, the Erle of Arondell, the Erle of Warwike and dyuers other, which he hated deadly, purpoſing there to haue trapped and taken all thoſe noble men together without buſineſſe, or further reſiſtance. But the Duke of Glouceſter excuſed him by ſickneſſe: The Erle of Arondell fearing the kinges diſpleaſure kept him at home in his Caſtell, and ſo there came to this feaſt none but onely the Erle of Warwike. And at the comming of the Erle, the king receaued him with maruellous gentle and louing countenaunce, and gaue him very comfortable wordes ſayeng vnto him, be of good cheere and take no thought, for loſing of Goers lande, ſwearing vnto him that he woulde prouyde other for him, that ſhould amount to as good a valure. But neuertheleſſe, after that dynner was done, the king cauſed him to be arreſted of treaſon, and deliuered him to be kept in ſafe cuſtody vntill the next parliament, which he had ordeyned to be kept for the deſtruction of him and manye other. The ſame night alſo the king ſpake vnto the Archbiſhop of Caunterbury, that he ſhould perſwade his brother the Erle of Arondell frankly to ſubmit himſelfe, ſwearing his olde othe by Saint Jhon Baptiſt, that hurte ſhould he haue none thereby, if he would ſo do. The Archbiſhop truſting the kings faire promiſe, moued this matter to the Erle his brother: But he knowing the kings great malice, and that he purpoſed nothing more then to apprehend and deſtroye him, would in no wiſe agree to his brothers counſaile: howbeit the Archebiſhop would not ſo leaue him, but daylie was importune on him to ſubmit himſelfe: Saiyng vnto him that all which he miſtruſted ſhould paſſe awaye lyke a clowde. And if he would not ſubmit himſelfe when he might, it might fortune to turne to the diſheneritynge both of him and his: For it was ſayde than, and the ſame was the opinion of manye, that for none other purpoſe would he keepe theſe Lordes vnder a reſt, but for to ſhewe the Lordes of Almayne that he coulde rule the greateſt of them. And after that he had ſo holden his Lordes a ſeaſon, that it was knowne in Almayne and in outward parties, that then his purpoſe was to reſtore them againe to their liberties and dignities. So at the laſt, by theſe perſwaſions & other vſed by the Archbiſhop of Caunterburie, hys brother the Erle in an vnhappy houre ſubmytted himſelfe to the king. And forthwith he was taken and ſent to be kept in the Ile of Wyght. And the ſame night that he was taken, the king ſent ſecretly to the Maiour of London, commaundyng him that he ſhould make ready as many harneſſed men as he could, and that they ſhould be in a readineſſe within two or three houres to attend vpon the king, whether his pleaſure was to go. The king alſo commaunded the Erles of Rutland, Kent, Huntyngdon and Nottyngham to arme themſelues, and to conduct the Londoners. And ſo they tooke waye to Blaſhy in Eſſex, where then was the Duke of Glouceſter in his Caſtell. Notwithſtandyng fewe there were that knew, when the king ſet fooꝛth, whether he would go. And when they came nye the place, the king vewed his people folowyng him, which were numbꝛed by the Heraultes to be. xv. thouſand. Then the king ſayde vnto them, whatſoeuer ye ſee me doe, lykewiſe ſtudie you to doe the ſame. If I pꝛepare me to fight, doe ye lykewiſe. If ye ſee me in peace, reſt you alſo in quyet, doyng hurte to no man. The king ſent afoꝛe the Erle of Rutlande to the Dukes Caſtel, that they ſhould ſee what number of defenſible men the Duke had within the Caſtell: Foꝛ he was afeard both of the valiauntneſſe and wiſedome of the Duke. But it happened at that time that the moſt parte of the Dukes houſhold ſeruaunts, by licence were departed to their friendes and wyfes. When the king was certefied that the Duke had ſo ſmall a numbꝛer aboute him, he maruelled muche, foꝛ it had bene tolde him befoꝛe by ſuch as bare the Duke no good will, that he had foꝛtified and manned his Caſtell. So then the king appꝛoched therevnto, his men of armes goyng befoꝛe him and behinde him: And albeit that the Duke was ſomewhat accuſed, yet he met him with a ſolempne pꝛoceſſion of the Colledge, and receaued him with all the reuerence and humilitie that he could doe, as it became him beſt to do, being his ſouereigne Loꝛde. And the king as he ſawe the Duke comming vnto him, and that he made him lowe curteſie: The king clapped his hande vpon his ſhoulder, and areſted him. To whom the Duke aunſwered, that he not onely was content to obey his areſt, but the areſt of the leaſt of his court. And the king ſayde vnto him, and will you ſo, good Uncle? And the Duke aunſwered, ye ſurely ſyꝛ: then the king folowed the pꝛoceſſion, and the Duke folowed the king a farre of. And when the king was ſomewhat ſet fooꝛth, he looked back, and called the Duke vnto him, and ſayde, By Saint Johꝛ Baptiſt, good Uncle, this that is done, ſhall be foꝛ the beſt both foꝛ you and vs, and ſo entered into the Chapell, where were a great number of reliques and Jewels of great valure: which when the king ſawe, he ſayde vnto his Uncle, I ſee you are a good huſbande: But nowe go your waye, and take ſome ſuſtenaunce, and after you haue dyned, ye ſhall go to the place that I haue appointed, foꝛ here you may not tary. Then the Duke pꝛayed the king to ſhewe him howe may ſeruauntes he ſhould haue to wayte vpon him: The king aunſwered that he ſhould be aduertiſed thereof befoꝛe he roſe from dyner. The Duke then went to his lodging, which was nigh vnto the Chapell. And the king went to his lodging, where was pꝛepared foꝛ him and thoſe that came with him, great and honoꝛable fare, both of Fiſhe and Fleſh, and it was no great maruaile, foꝛ the Duke was aduertiſed pꝛiuily of the kinges comming. After that the king was ſet at dyner, he ſent to the Duke his minde, what number of perſons ſhould wayte vpon him, and wylled him to make ſhoꝛte woꝛke and come away.

The king arreſteth the Duke of Glouceſter.

After dyner the king departed, and left to conuey the Duke the Erle of Kent, and the Loꝛde Thomas Perꝛye Steward of his houſe. And when the Duke had dyned, he cauſed ſuche ſtuffe to be truſſed vp, and caryed wyth him, as was neceſſarie foꝛ him. And then bade his wyfe farewell, who was a Lady both honoꝛable, wiſe and vertuous: and at his departing he deſyꝛed her to make humble ſute to the king, to haue him his good and gracious Loꝛde, and that ſhe ſhould boldly offer to ſweare that he was neuer Traytoꝛ

I or one of you? They anſwered with reuerence. Nay ſyr, it becommeth you to leade, and we to folow. Then ſayde he, let vs ſet forth a Gods name, whereſoeuer your pleaſure is that I ſhall go, and ſo was he conueyed to Calice, and thus taken and arreſted at that time, when he thought that he was moſt in the kings fauour. For not long before the king had geuen him ſo great giftes, honours and Lordſhips, that euery man thought there was no man more acceptable in the kings fauour then he.

The Duke of Glouceſter is conueyed to Calice.

Now after the taking of theſe Lordes was blowen abroade, there was made great moane for them throughout all England, as though the Realme had bene deliuered into the enemies handes: ſo great hope had the Commõs vniuerſally in them, but moſt ſpecially in the Duke of Glouceſter, whome the Realme beleued, that by his proſperitie the ſame was ſafe from all inward and outward enemies.

The king perceiuing the great affection that the people bare to the duke and the ſayd Lordes, and fearyng inſurrection of the Commons, which were not all clere of their Melancholy, cauſed to be proclaymed, that this takyng of the Lordes was not done for their offenſes committed of olde, but for new matters, wherin they had offended ſithens the obteynyng of their pardons, as they ſhould vnderſtand plainly at the next Parliament.

A falſe Proclaymation.

During the tyme (ſayth mine Aucthour) that theſe Lordes were in priſon, ſo ſory was the people for them, that prayers and Proceſſions were vſed throughout all the realme, that it might pleaſe God of his goodnes to inſpire into the kinges minde, to be good and mercifull vnto theſe Lordes, and to conuert his heart from hatred vnto loue. The king heeryng of theſe prayers, forbad ſtreyghtly all Biſhoppes and Prelates that ſuch Proceſſions ſhoulde be no more vſed.

And ſhortly after, the king helde a great counſaile at Nottyngham, and there he hauyng his Judges, and other of his learned Counſaile, cauſed indilementes to be drawen of the Duke of Glouceſter, and of the Erles afore ſayde. And he framed there alſo an Appellation, and there it was ordeyned that certeine Appellers ſhould lay vnto them highe treaſon in open Parliament, whoſe names were Edward Erle of Rutland, Thomas Lord Mowbrey Erle Marſhall, Thomas Holland Erle of Kent, John Holland Erle of Huntyngdon, Lorde Beneforde Erle of Somerſet, Lorde John Mountagew Erle of Sariſburie, Thomas Lorde Spencer, William Lorde Strope, Chamberleyn to the king. The which matters beyng deuiſed, the king cauſed proclamation openly to be made, declaring vnto the people that theſe Lordes were arreſted and impriſoned for high treaſon. And ſoone after he ſommoned a Parliament to be holden at London the .xv. day of September next folowyng. And thether were commaunded to come all ſuch as the king had beſt confidence in. And againſt the tyme of the ſayd Parliament, the king reteyned vnto him a gard of Archers of Cheſſhire, like as he ſhould haue gone in battaile againſt his enempes. And thoſe Cheſſhire men were very rude and beaſtly people, and fell into ſuch great pryde of the kinges fauour, that they accompted the king to be as their felowe, and they ſet the Lordes at naught, yet few or none of them were Gentlemen, but taken from the plough and cart, and other craftes. And after theſe ruſticall people had a while Courted, they entered into ſo great a boldeneſſe, that they would not let, neyther within the Court, nor without, to beate and ſlay the kinges good Subiectes, and to take from them their victuals, and to pay for them little or nothing at their pleaſure, and to raviſh their wiues and daughters. And if any man fortuned to complaine vnto the king of them, he was ſoone ryd out of the way, no man knewe howe, nor by whome, ſo that in effect they dyd what them luſted.

A new houſe made for the Parliament.

Againſt this Parliament, the king had commaunded a great houſe to be made in the Palace at Weſtminſter, which was ſo great, that ſcarcely the roome of the Palace ſufficed to ſet it in. In this houſe was made a highe trone for the king, and a large place for all eſtates beſydes, to ſyt in. And alſo there were places made for certeine Appealers, which are mencioned before, and they to be on the one ſyde, and the aunſwerours on the other, and a lyke roome was made behynde for the knightes and Burgeſſes of the Parliament. And a place alſo made for the ſpeaker of the Parliament, who at that time was one named ſir John Buſhe, which was called a cruel, ambicious, and couetous man without all meaſure. And immediately after, all men in their degrees were placed, and the cauſe of the callyng of that Parliament beyng declared, which was that the king had ordeyned it for reformation of dyuerſe tranſgreſſions and oppreſſions, done againſt the peace of our ſouereigne Lorde the kinges Maieſtie, by the Duke of Gloucester, the Erles of Arondell, and of Warwike, and other. Then forthwith came Sir John Buſhe, and made requeſt on the behalfe of the Commonaltie, that it might pleaſe the kinges highneſſe and excellencie, that for the enormе actes done againſt hys lawes and Maieſtie, they might haue condigne puniſhement accordyng to theyr deſertes, and chiefely the Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, which then ſate next vnto the king, whom he called the higheſt traytor, for where for many cauſes he ſhould haue bene to the king a moſt faythfull Counſaylor, he by his euill counſaile and prodigious ſuggeſtions, craftily circumuented the king, inducyng him to graunt his letters of pardon to a great traytour the Erle of Arondell his brother. To this when the Archebiſhop aroſe and would haue aunſwered, the king would geue him none audience, but commaunded him to ſytte downe againe in his place, and not to make any further aunſwere, for it ſhould be well inough if he helde his peace for that tyme. Then Sir John Buſhe required that the Archbiſhop ſhould not be taken to his aunſwere, for he ſayde that his wit was ſo great, and did ſo farre excell all other, and his craft ſo great, that I feare he ſhall circumuent vs: So at that tyme the Archebiſhop had no further heeryng. The ſaid Sir John Buſhe in all his propoſitions to the king, did not onely attribute to him worldly honours, but diuyne names, inuentyng flatteryng wordes, and vnuſed termes, and to a mortall man not conuenient, for as oft as he ſpake vnto the king in his Throne, he caſt his handes abrode, as he had adoured and worſhipped God, beſechyng his exceelſe, high, and adorant Maieſtie, that he woulde witſafe to graunt him this or that. And the Prince beyng ambicious of honours, did not repreſſe this inſolencie, but tooke great pleaſure in his wordes, whereof came more inconuenience, as ſhall appere.

The Archebiſhop of Cãterbury is accuſed of high treaſon.

Sir John Buſhe a flatterer.

Thus

Thus after, as ye haue heard, that the king had excluded the Archebishop from his aunswere: Sir John Bushe, keping his olde flattering way, requyred on the behalfe of the Commons, that the Charters of pardon graunted vnto the traytors, as to the Duke of Gloucester, the Erles of Irondell, and of Warwike, shoulde by the assent and consent of all the whole Parliament be reuoked. The king also in his awne person protested, that those pardons were extorted from him, and that he did not willyngly graunt them, and therefore he requyred that euery man would say his opinion, aswell spirituall as temporall, what they thought therein. The spirituall men began first, being afrayde to displease the king, and sayd that such pardons were reuocable, and at the kinges pleasure, and ought not to be allowed: And lykewyse sayde euery of the spiritualtie, man by man, vntill it came to the Archebishop of Cauntorbury: For the custome is, when suche questions be asked, the yongest both of the spiritualtie and temporaltie say their opinions first, and so passe foorth in order vntill it come to the highest. And when this question was asked of the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, he aunswered that the kinges person is so high from whom the pardon came, that he durst not say, that any suche Charters were reuocable: Howbeit, in the ende it was determined that such pardons were to be reuoked, for they did empeche the honor of the kinges person.

The kinges pardon made voyde by parliament.

After that Sir John Bushe had obteyned this reuocation, he declared further, that the Erle of Irondell had yet another speciall Charter of pardon for his awne person, which he obteyned after the first, and in that also the said Sir John Bushe requyred importunately ayde, in the name of the Commonaltie, that the same also might be reuoked. Then this question was also asked of the Prelates, which were of lyke opinion as they were of the first, that is to say, that it was reuocable. At this tyme the Archebishop of Cauntorbury absented himselfe from the Parliament, trustyng in the kinges promise, and lyke also as he had sworne vnto him, that nothyng should be attempted agaynst him in his absence, but the contrary folowed. For still this sir John Bushe pursued him, and at his instant sute, which seemed to be the kinges will, he was condempned to perpetuall exile, and that he should not make any further abydyng within this realme then fiue dayes. And after this Bishop was thus condemned, he sent to Rome, that Richard Walden his Treasurer might haue the Archebishoprick, whereunto at the kinges instaunce the Pope accorded, & within two yere after was by the same Pope deposed.

The Archbishop of Cauntorbury condempned to perpetuall exile.

Shortly after this, was brought forth Richard Erle of Irondel, on the day of Saint Mathewe the Euangelist, to aunswere before the king, and the whole Parliament, to such thinges as should be obiected and deposed agaynst him. And as he stood at the Barre, the Lorde Neuel was commaunded by the Duke of Lancaster, which sate that day as high steward of England, to take the Whoode from his necke, and to vngyrde him. Then the Duke of Lancaster, to whom by his office it apperteyned, notefyed vnto him, that for his manifolde rebellions and treasons agaynst the kinges Maiestie, he was arested, and hetherto kept in Warde, and nowe at the petition of the Lordes and Commonaltie, he was called to aunswere to suche crymes as should be there obiected agaynst him, and there eyther to purge him of them, or else to abyde condigne punishment. And first he did charge him that he rorde roade trayterouſly in harneſſe agaynſt the king with the Duke of Gloceſter, and the Erle of Warwike, perturbyng of the peace and Realme.

To the which he aunſwered, that he neuer did that as a traytor, nor for any hurt meant or intended againſt the kinges perſon, but for the kinges profite, and the realme, if that act might be well interpreted as it ought.

Alſo it was demaunded of him, why that he procured letters of pardon of the king for himſelfe, if he knewe that he was not faultie therein? To this he aunſwered, that he did it not for any feare of any thyng that he had miſdone, but for ſtoppyng of euyll tongues, which neyther bare the king, nor him good wyll.

Alſo he was demaunded, whether he would denie that he made any ſuch roade with the perſonnes aforenamed, and that he entred not armed into the kinges preſence, agaynſt hys pleaſure and will? To this he aunſwered that he could not ſay nay.

Then Sir John Buſhe cryed importunately, and called for iudgement to be geuen againſt the traytor, & ſayd: your faythfull commons aſke, and requyre that it may ſo be. The Erle ſoberly turned his head, and ſayd mildely vnto him: Not the kinges faythfull Commons require this, but thou, and what thou art I knowe well inough. Then the. viij. Appealantes before named, ſtandyng on the other ſyde, caſt their gloues vnto him, and folowed their appeale which before was read, and offered to fight with him man for man, in iuſtefiyng of their appeale. Then ſaid the Erle, if I were at my libertie, & that it might pleaſe my ſouereigne Lord the king, I would not refuſe to proue you lyers in your appeale. And then ſpake the Duke of Lancaſter high Steward, and ſayde vnto him, what haue you further to ſay to the poynts before alleaged agaynſt you? He aunſwered that of the kinges grace he had his letters of generall pardon, which he requyred might be allowed. Then the Duke aunſwered that the Pardon was reuoked by the Prelates and Noble men in the Parliament, and therefore willed him to make ſome other aunſwere. The Erle ſayde againe, that he had another pardon vnder the kinges great ſeale, which was graunted him long after of the kinges awne motion, which alſo he requyred to be allowed. The Duke ſayde againe, that that pardon was in likewyſe reuoked. And after this, when the Erle had nothing to ſaye for him ſelfe: Then the king with his Scepter made countenaunce to the Duke to geue iudgement. Then the Duke vſed theſe wordes vnto him: Foraſmuch as thou art conicted of high treaſon. &c. Thou ſhalt be drawen to the Galowes, and there hanged, and after taken downe, and thy Bowelles to be taken out of thy body, and burned, and after to be behedded, and quartered. And this iudgement geuen in this maner, the Duke paſed a while, and then ſayd: The king our ſouereigne Lord of his grace, becauſe thou art of his blood, and one of the Peeres of the realme, hath remitted all the other paines vnto the laſt, ſo that onely thou ſhalt loſe thy head.

The Erle of Irondell condempned and iudged.

And anone he was taken from the place, and without delaye had to the Tower hill, and there went before him, and behinde him the aforeſayde furious Cheſſhire men, which onely in this Parliament had lycence to beare weapon. There went with him alſo to his death the Erle of Nottyngham, that had maried his daughter: The Erle of Kent his Nephewe, the Erle of Huntyngdon, John Holland, which were all vpon great horſſes, and had

with them a great company of harneſſed men. And when he ſhould departe the Palaice, he deſyred his hands might be let looſe, and that he might geue ſuche money as he had in his Purſſe with his awne hands, betwixt that and Charing croſſe. And ſo he gaue his almoſe, but his armes were bound behinde him. The Londoners ſeyng him thus paſſe thorough the City, bewayled ſore his fortune, who not long before, among all the noble men was moſt famous, for he was ſo noble and valyaunt, that all the worlde ſpake honor of him. And when he came to the Towre hill, the noble men that were about him, moued him verie earneſtly to acknowledge and confeſſe that he had offended the king in high treaſon: But he in no wiſe would agree ſo to do, but ſayd that he was neuer Traytor in worde nor deede. Then he turned to him that was the executioner and kyſſed him, and ſaid: do thy duetie, and as thou art commaunded, but torment me not, but with one ſtroke ſtrike of my head, and he aſſayed himſelfe with his fingers, whether the ſworde was sharpe enough, and ſayde it is very well. Then ſayde he to his kinſmen that ſtood there, it had bene more meeter for you to haue bene awaye then at this acte. I haue bene he that hath brought you vp, and haue enriched you, & brought you to honor, and ye lyke vnkinde perſons reward me with this, to bring me to ſhame: But the time will come and that ſhortly, when there ſhall as many marualle at your miſfortune, as doth now of my fall. And then kneeled he downe, and the Executioner with one ſtroke ſtrake off his head, and his bodye was honorably buried in the Auguſtine Fryers. The Erle of Arondell is executed.

Then returned they that were at the execution, and ſhewed the king merily of the death of the Erle: But though the king was then mery and glad that the dede was done, yet after, as mine Aucthor ſayth, he was exceedingly vexed in his dreames, imagening that the Erle appered vnto him. &c.

After the iudgement and death of the Erle of Arundell, as afore ſayde, then was Thomas Becham Erle of Warwik brought forth to abyde the iudgement of the Parliament. And when his accuſers charged hym, as a Traytor, with diuers articles of treaſon, ſuch as were before alleged againſt the Erle of Arundell, he aunſwered that his minde was neuer to be Traytor vnto the king, nor he thought neuer that thoſe rydinges and aſſemblyes that he made, could be accompted as treaſon. And when the Iudges had ſhewed vnto him that it was treaſon, he humbly aſked of the king mercy and grace. The king then aſked him, whether that he had ſo rydden with the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Erle of Arundell: he aunſwered that he could not denie it, and wiſhed that he had neuer ſene them: then ſayde the king, doe you not knowe that ye are giltie of treaſon? he aunſwered againe I knowledge it, and with great weeping and ſobbyng required al thoſe that were preſent, to make interceſſion to the kinges Maieſtie for pardon for him. Then the king and the Duke of Lancaſter commoned, & after the king had pawſed awhile, he ſayde to the Erle, by ſaint John Baptiſt Thomas of Warwike, this confeſſion that thou haſt made, is vnto me more acceptable then all the landes of the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Erle of Arundell. Then the Erle making ſtill interceſſion for pardon, the Lordes humbly beſought the king to graunt it him. The king then was contented to graunt hym his lyfe, but he baniſhed him into the Iſle of Man, which then was the Lorde Scropes, and he promiſed the Erle, that he and his wyfe and children ſhould haue honorable The Erle of Warwike is arreigned of Treaſon.

notable entertaynment: But that promiſe was ſlenderly kept, for both the Erle and the Counteſſe led their lyues in great penurie.

The king not yet quieted, ſent one of his Juſtices called Wylliam Rykyll, borne in Ireland, to Calice, which was commaunded to enquire of the Duke of Glouceſter, whether he had committed any ſuch treaſons as before were alleged againſt the Erle of Arundell, and the Erle of Warwike, and that he ſhould write what he ſayde, and what the Duke did confeſſe: which after the ſayde Juſtice had ſpeedely done, he returned vnto the king, and ſhewed him ſuch things of his awne deuiſe, as he thought would beſt pleaſe the king, affirming that thoſe things the Duke had franckly confeſſed. The king after the ſight therof, purpoſed the death of the Duke, and yet not willing to haue him brought vnto open iudgement, for he feared the people, who bare him great loue and fauour, and therefore he ſent the Erle of Nottyngham vnto Thomas Mowbrey Erle Marſhall, which then had the keeping of the Duke in Calice, and commaunded him that priuily the Duke ſhould be killed. But he fearing to commit ſuch an enorme deede, deferred the matter, though the king would haue had it done with all ſpeede. For the which the king was ſore mooued againſt the Erle, and ſware that it ſhoulde coſte him his lyfe, if he obeyed not quickly his commaundement. And beyng thus conſtreyned, he called out the Duke at midnight, as though he ſhould haue taken ſhypping to go into Englande, and there in his lodgyng with his ſeruaunts, caſting on Fetherbeds vpon him, he was ſmowthered. And ſo was this honorable and good man miſerable put to death, which for the honor of the king and wealth of the realme had taken great trauayles.

The Duke of Glouceſter ſhamefully murtherd.

After that the king in thys vnhappye Parliament had brought all theſe matters to paſſe: yet woulde he not diſſolue the ſame, but prorroged it, becauſe it was nigh the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe, and ordeyned that it ſhould begin againe immediatly after the feaſt at Shrewesbury. And after that the king & Lords were come together, the king obteyned that the whole power of both the houſes was graunted vnto fiue or eyght perſons which had auctoritie to determine ſuche cauſes as yet hanged in the parliament. By vertue of which graunt, the number aforeſayde did proceede in derogation of the ſtate of the houſe, and to the great diſaduauntage of the king, and perillous example in time to come. And for that the king had ſpent much money at theſe Parliaments, he required to haue one diſme and a halfe of the Clergie, and a fiftene of the temporaltie, and then he tooke vpon him the name of the Prince of Cheſter, for loue that he bare to the Cheſſhire men.

King Richard nameth himſelf prince of Cheſter.

Then was the Erle of Darbie made Duke of Hertforde: The Erle Marſhall Duke of Norffolk, the Erle of Rutland Duke of Aubemarle: the Erle of Kent Duke of Surrey, and the Erle of Huntyngdon Duke of Exceſter: The Counteſſe of Norffolk Duches of Norffolk, the Erle of Somerſet Marques of Dorſet: The Lorde Spencer Erle of Glouceſter, the Lorde Neuyll Erle of Weſtmerland, the Lorde Scrope the kings Chamberleyn, the Erle of Wiltſhire, the Lord Percy Steward of the kings houſe Erle of Worceſter.

Creation of Dukes and Erles.

The king after this triumphed not a little, as one that had conquered and ouerthrowne his enimies, and he ware ſo hawtie, that he had all eſtates in contempt, and thought himſelfe more noble then any prince lyuing. And then he

he chaunged his armes that his Graundfather had giuen, and ioyned Saint Edwardes armes and his together. And to rewarde the persons aboue named, whome he had aduaunced to honor, he gaue vnto them a great parte of the Duke of Gloucester, the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Arondels lands. And whatsoeuer the king did, no man durst speake a worde, or aduise hym in any thing, but must sothe him in whatsoeuer he sayd, or did. And such as were then chiefe of hys Counsayle, the commons iudged to be the woorst of all other, the which were these. The Duke of Aumarle, the Duke of Norffolk, the Duke of Exceter, the Duke of Wiltshire, Sir John Bushe, Sir William Bagot, syr Thomas Grene knight, to whom as is aforesayd, the Commons bare great and priuie hatred.

King Richard altereth his armes.

Sone after this, the king caused to be arreigned and atteinted the Lord Cobham, vpon those articles that the Duke of Gloucester, the Erle of Arondell, and the Erle of Warwike were condempned for: But the Lorde Cobham was pardoned of his lyfe, and put to exile into the Isle of Gerneseye, and there was assigned vnto him a small and poore lyuing. And for an ende of thys parliament the king graunted a generall pardon to all persons, and for all maner of offenses, except onely fiftie persons, whose names he would not declare, nor no man so priuy about hym that could vnderstand them. And it was sayde, that he kept that secret, that when any great man offended, he would then declare that he was one of the fiftie that was excepted, and by that meanes he had alwayes his subiectes in his daunger.

The Lorde Cobham is arreigned and atteinted.

A generall pardon.

Thys yere being the. xxij. yere of hys reigne, it chaunced Henry Erle of Darby a little before created Duke of Herford, a prudent and wyse man, and welbeloued of all, calling to his minde, and well conslderyng with himselfe howe king Richarde his Cossyn Germane was nowe come to that trade, that he little or nothyng regarded the counsayle of hys Uncles nor other graue and sad persons, but did all thing at his pleasure, vsyng his wyll in steede of lawe and reason. Wherefore on a daye beyng in the company of Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norffolk, and Erle Marchall, he beganne to breake his minde vnto him, rather for sorrow and griefe, then for malice or displeasure, rehersing how king Richard little esteemed the Nobles of hys Realme, and as muche as laye in him, sought daylie occasions to destroy the more part of them, dispatching some by death, and other by banishment. And this his cruell and seuere gouernement (sayde he) is not onely greeuous to the Nobilitie, but to the Commons also, who greatly murmured thereat, therefore for as much as I knowe he loueth you, and, I am sure, so do you him, when time opportune will serue, ye shall doe well to aduertise him therof, and to beseche his grace to turne the lefe, and vse a better way. When the Duke of Norffolk had heard fully his deuice, he tooke it not in good parte, but reconed that he had gotten a pray, by the which he should obteyn greater fauour of the king then euer he had, and for that time dissembled the matter and so departed. And after, when he had opportunitie and sawe his tyme, he declared to the king what he had heard: and to aggrauate, and to make the offense the greater, he added much therevnto, but left out nothing.

When the king had heard him, and had pawsed a little with himselfe, he beganne to be in a great chafe, but after a whyle he tempered his melancholy, and was content to here both parties together, and therefore called vnto him the Duke of Lancaſter, who was chiefe of his counſayle, and both the Dukes of Herffoꝛd & Noꝛffolke, and cauſed the accuſer openly to declare what he had heard the Duke of Herffoꝛd ſpeake. The Duke of Noꝛffolke rehearſed agayne the tale that he had tolde to the king, but not in ſuch oꝛder as the Duke of Herffoꝛd had tolde it to him, but had added therevnto, and altered very much thereof. When the Duke of Herffoꝛd heard the tale ſo tolde, he was ſomewhat troubled therewith and pawſed awhyle, and after turning him to the Duke of Noꝛffolk, he declared woꝛde by woꝛde what he had ſayde, and ſhewed the cauſe why he ſo ſpake, denyeng all the other matters that the Duke of Noꝛffolk had added therevnto, and ſayde further vnto the king, that if it would pleaſe hys grace to ſuffer hym, he would pꝛoue his accuſer vntrue, and a falſe foꝛger of lyes by the ſtroke of a ſpeare and dent of a ſwoꝛde. The Duke of Noꝛffolk affirmed conſtantly hys tale to be true, and refuſed not the Combate. The king demaunded of them if they woulde not agree among themſelues? which they both denyed, and thꝛewe downe their gages. By ſaint John Baptiſt, quod the king, if you of your ſelues will not agree, I will not ſtudie how to agree you, and then he graunted them the battayle, and aſſigned the place to be at Couentrie, in the moneth of Auguſt next enſuyng.

A Combate betweene the duke of Herꝛfoꝛd and the duke of Noꝛfolke.

Then was great pꝛeparation made, as to ſuch a matter apperteyned, and when all things were in readyneſſe, and the daye come, thether came the king being accompanied with all his nobles. And thether came alſo the two Dukes afoꝛeſayde, that is to ſay, the Duke of Herffoꝛd Appellant, & the duke of Noꝛffolk Defendãt, & they beyng armed, entred on hoꝛſback the one after the other into the Liſtes, & the people cryed vpon God to ſaue and pꝛoſper the Duke of Herffoꝛd, foꝛ they loued not the Duke of Noꝛffolke, becauſe it was ſaid that he murdered the Duke of Gloceſter at Calice, as afoꝛeſayd. Now the time beyng come, theſe two noble men, eche hauyng his Speare in reſt, and readie to ioyne the battaile, the king caſt downe his warder, and commaunded them to ſtay, and then the king and the Loꝛdes went to counſaile, and they toke vp the matter: And after great deliberation, the king by the mouth of the king of Herault pꝛonounced ſentence in this ſoꝛt, firſt that Henry of Lancaſter Duke of Herffoꝛd Appellant, and Thomas Mowbray Duke of Noꝛffolke Defendant, haue honoꝛably and valiantly appered here within the liſtes this day, and haue bene redy to darreyne the battaile, lyke two valiant knightes, and hardie Champions: But becauſe the matter is great and weightie betweene theſe two great Pꝛinces, this is the oꝛder of the king and his counſaile. That Henry Duke of Herffoꝛd foꝛ dyuerſe conſiderations, and becauſe it hath pleaſed the king, ſhall within. xv. dayes depart out of the realme, foꝛ the terme of ten yeres, without returnyng, except by the king he be repealed againe, and that vpon paine of death.

The Duke of Herꝛfoꝛde baniſhed foꝛ ten yeres.

The Herault cryed againe and ſayde, that Thomas Mowbray Duke of Noꝛthfolke, by the oꝛdenaunce of the king and his Counſaile, becauſe that he had ſowen ſedicion in the realme by his woꝛdes, whereof he can make no pꝛoofe, ſhall auoyde the realme of England, and dwell where he liſt out of the Kinges dominions, and neuer to returne againe into the ſame vpon paine of death, and that the king woulde ſtay the pꝛofites and reuenewes of hys landes vntill he had receyued ſuch ſommes of money as the Duke had taken vp by of the kinges treasurer, for the wages of the Garrison of Calice, which were still vnpayd. And then they called before him the two banished persons, and made them swere, that ỹ one should neuer come into the place where the other was (willyngly) nor kepe compaine together in any other forein region.

The Duke of Northfolke, which supposed to haue bene borne out by the king, was sore repentant of his enterprise, and departed sorowfully out of the realme into Almain, & at the last came to Uenice, where for thought he died.

The Duke of Herford tooke his leaue of the king at Eltham, and there the king released vnto him foure yeres of his banishment. And so he toke his iourney, and came to Calice, and so into Fraunce, where he cõtinued a while.

When he was arriued in Fraunce, king Charles heeryng the cause of his banishment, which he esteemed very small and light, receyued him gently and honorably entertayned him: Insomuch, ỹ he had by fauour obteined the mariage of the only daughter of John Duke of Berry, Uncle to the French king, if king Richard had not cast a stop in his way: For he well considered how the Commonaltie loued the Duke, and howe desyrous they were of his returne into England: and then foreseeyng that if he should be ioyned wyth so great an affinitie as the blood of the house of Berry was in Fraunce, and afterward sodeinly to returne into Englande, it might fortune to turne to hys more displeasure then pleasure, wherefore he letted that mariage.

Duryng the first yere of the exile of this Duke, his father John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster dyed, and is buryed on the North syde of the Quier of the Church of Saint Paules in London. The death of this Duke shortened the life of king Rychard, for he notwithstandyng, that the Duchie of Lancaster was to this Duke Henrye lawfully discended, not onely seased without right or title all the goodes of the sayde Duke John his parent, but also defrauded his heyre of his laufull inheritaunce, receyuyng the rentes and reuenues of all his patrimonie, and geuyng to other that which was not his, and distributed the Dukes landes to his Parasites, and flatteryng followers. This act was iudged of all the nobilitie to be vnlawfull, vniust, and vngodly, to depriue a man beyng banished out of the realme without desart, of his inheritaunce. But Edmond Duke of Yorke, Uncle to Henrie nowe lawfully Duke of Lancaster, was sore moued with this chaunce, to see the king breake and violate all lawes: And after the murther of hys brother the Duke of Gloucester, to spoyle and robbe the sonne of his other brother. For he before this tyme, as much as his patience could beare, dyd tolerate and suffer the death of his brother, the banishment of his Nephew, and many mo iniuryes, which for the lightnesse and youth of the king he passed ouer: But nowe that he sawe there was no hope of amendment of the kinges gouernement, and that he had no man nere him that durst boldely admonishe him of his office, and dutie, he therefore as a wise man, thought it meete in tyme to get him to a restyng place, and to leaue the folowyng of so doubtfull and wilfull a Captaine: Wherefore he with the Duke of Aumerle his sonne, departed from the Court, and went to his house at Langley.

Then Duke of Lancaster dyeth.

In this meane tyme, king Richard had made great preparation to go into Ireland, and gathered together great summes of money by sundrie deuises and practises: as first, he caused an inquirie to be made in euery shyre, of those that had beene in armes with the Duke of Gloucester, the Erle of

New exactions.

Arondell, and the Erle of Warwike, and cauſed dyuerſe Biſhoppes and men of honour in euery ſhyre, to aduiſe ſuch as had offended, to confeſſe their treaſons by writyng, and put them in the kinges mercie, promiſyng that they ſhould haue no hurt thereby. Wherefore many were conſtreyned, as well of the Clergie, as of the Commonaltie, to make great fynes. And alſo manye Noble men were compelled to pay vnto the king great ſommes of money, which was called Pleaſaunce, to pleaſe the king withall. Alſo at thys tyme the king cauſed many blacke Chartres to be made, and forced men to ſigne and ſeale the ſame, by the which he might whē he would vndo any of his ſubiectes. But ſome write that it was for that he purpoſed to deliuer Calice, and all his landes beyonde the Sea, to the French king, and to ſhewe that al his ſubiectes had aſſented therevnto.

Blanck Chartres.

When all theſe thinges were done, as is mencioned before, the king ſet forward with a great nauie & power of men towards Ireland, in the moneth of Aprill, to ſuppreſſe and tame the wilde heddes of the Iriſhe men, and he had with him his garde of Cheſſhire men, in whome hee put his ſpeciall truſt. Alſo he caried with him the greateſt of the noble mens ſonnes of England, as the Duke of Gloucеſters ſonne and heyre, the Erle of Herford ſon and heire to Henry Duke of Herford and of Lancaſter. Alſo he was accompanied with the Duke of Aumerle, and the Duke of Exeter, and many other: And at his departure he left for his Lieutenant in England, Sir Edmond of Langley his Uncle, Duke of Yorke. And ſo the king entered into Ireland, and ſet fiercely vpon the Iriſhe men, and compelled them ſhortly to ſubmit them ſelues. The ſaiyng alſo was, that before his goyng into Ireland, he had let the realme to ferme to Sir William Scrope Erle of Wiltſhire, and then Treaſurer of England, to Sir John Buſhe, Sir John Bagot, and Syr Henry Grene, knightes, for the terme of. xiiij. yeres: By reaſon whereof they procured many men to be accuſed, and ſuch as were accuſed, there was no remedye to deliuer him, or them, but were he poore or riche, he muſt compounde and make his fine with thoſe Tyrannes, at their will and pleaſure. Nowe the king beyng in Irelande, as afore ſayde, he ſo ſubdued the Iriſhemen, and that in ſhort ſpace, that he brought the greateſt part of that realme into very good order, and ſet them very quiet.

The king ſetteth forth to Ireland.

The King had let the Realme to Ferme.

But while the king was thus occupyed in Irelande, the Duke of Herford by the prouocation of Thomas Arondell, Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, who, as you before haue heard, was baniſhed by king Richard, and was in Fraunce with the ſaid Duke of Herford, returned nowe both into England, and landed at Rauenſpurre in the North Countrie, in the moneth of Auguſt, and by reaſon of his title to the Duchie of Lancaſter, he rayſed and aſſembled the people euer as he went, ſo that he had gathered together a great number of people. And, as ſayth Hall, there reſorted vnto him, the Erles of Northumberland, and Weſtmerland, and the Lordes Percey, Roſe, Willoughby, and other, and taking an othe of him, that he ſhould not do to king Richard any bodily harme, they made to him homage, & became his liege men, and ſo tooke theyr iourney towardes London, where they were receyued with all ioy and gladneſſe. Then the Duke conſulted there dyuerſe dayes with his friendes. And thether came vnto him, Thomas Arondell, ſonne to Richard Erle of Arondell, by king Richard a little before put to death, which had had late escaped out of prison. When the Duke had well perceyued and considered the great loue and fauor that was borne him, as well of the nobilitie, as also of the commonaltie, and how they came dayly vnto his relefe, he not onely yelded thankes vnto God therefore, but shewed himselfe most thankefull vnto them for the same, and then set forwarde into the West Countrie, and still as he passed, his people encreased without number, and beyng nowe so well and strongly accompanied, he then proclaymed open warre agaynst king Richard, and all his partakers and friendes.

Kyng Richard beyng in Ireland, and nowe heeryng of the Dukes arryuall in England, hastened not a little to set all thinges there in order, and returned into England, and landed at Mylforde Hauen, in the beginnyng of September, and from thence passed vnto the Castell of Flynt in Wales ten Myles distant from Chester, and there rested him and his people, entendyng there to haue gathered a great power, and to haue set vpon the Duke. But in this meane time, the aforesaid Duke, who had proclaymed himselfe Duke of Lancaster, in the right of his father John of Gaunt, was come to Bristow and there without resistance tooke Sir William Scrope Erle of Wiltshyre, and high Treasurer of England, Sir John Bushe, and Sir Henry Grene, who foorthwith were adiudged, and were beheaded. There was also taken Sir John Bagot, but he escaped, and fled into Ireland.

William Scrope Sir John Bushe and Grene put to death.

Now king Richard was not so diligent to gather his power together, but they were as hastie to flie from him, and to ayde the Duke, which amased the king much, and in the ende the king determined to kepe that Castell, and to abyde fortune. And this (sayth Hall) is to be noted of all Princes, rulers, and persons set in Iuethoritie, that this Duke Henry of Lancaster should be thus called to the kingdome, and haue the helpe and assistaunce almost of all the whole realme (which perchaunce neuer thereof once thought or dreamed) and that king Richard should thus be left desolate, voyde, and desperate of all hope and comfort, in whome if there were any offence, it ought rather to haue bene imputed to the frayltie of his youth, then to the malice of his hart.

A speciall note.

When the Duke of Lancaster knew that king Richard was come to the Castell of Flint, he came forward with speede with a great armie, and drewe nere Chester: When Thomas Percey Erle of Worcester, and Lord steward of the kinges houshold, and brother to the Erle of Northumberland, heard tell of the Dukes approchyng, and bearyng displeasure to the king, because a little before he had proclaimed his brother a Traytor, he calling together the kinges houshold, did before them all breake his white staffe, and bid euery man go where he would, and shift for himselfe. And when the kinges seruauntes sawe this, they dispersed themselues, some one way, and some another, and left the king alone, sauyng two or three Lordes, and a fewe men.

The Duke approchyng very nere to the Castell of Flint, whereof king Richard beyng aduertised by John Ballet, and Richard Seymer (his assured seruauntes) departed out of the Castell, and fled to Conway, and there he sent for the Duke of Exeter his brother, the Erle of Northumberland, and Thomas Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and desyred them to come to the Castell vnto him, to whome he shewed his purpose, and that he was well content to geue vp the Crowne, and to be discharged of that great Burthen, and shortly after, he yelded himselfe vnto the Duke, who secretly sente him to the

When the Duke had thus poſſeſſed his pray, he returned to London, and ſhortly after called a Parliament the. xiij. of September, in the kinges name, at the which many of the kinges friendes, but more of his, appeared. There was declared how vnprofitable king Richard had bene to the realme duryng his reigne, howe he ſubuerted the lawes, polled the people, miniſtred iuſtice to no man, but to ſuch as pleaſed him. And to the entent that the Commons might be perſwaded that he was an vniuſt and vnprofitable Prince, and a tyraunt ouer his ſubiectes, and therefore worthie to be depoſed, there were ſet foorth certeine articles very heynous to the eares of many, and to ſome incredible, the effect of which articles hereafter folowe.

1 Firſt that king Richard waſtefully ſpent the treaſure of the realme, and had geuen the poſſeſſions of the Crowne to men vnworthie, by reaſon wherof dayly newe charges more and more were layde in the neckes of the poore Commonaltie. And where diuers Lordes, aſwell ſpirituall as temporall, were appoynted by the high Court of Parliament, to common and treate of dyuerſe matters concernyng the common wealth of the ſame, which beyng buſy about thoſe commiſſions, he with other of his affinity went about to empeche them of treaſon, and by force and threatnyng, compelled the Juſtices of the realme at Shrewesbury to condiſcend to his opinion, for the deſtruction of the ſayd Lords: inſomuch that he began to rayſe warre againſt John Duke of Lancaſter, Thomas Erle of Arondell, Richard Erle of Warwike, and other Lordes, contrary to his honour and promiſe.

2 Item, that he cauſed his Uncle the Duke of Glouceſter to be arreſted without law, & ſent him to Calice, and there wout iudgement murdered him. And although the Erle of Arundell vpon his arreignment pleaded his Charter of pardon, he could not be heard, but was in moſt vile and ſhamefull maner ſodeinly put to death.

3 Item, he aſſembled certeine Lancaſhire and Cheſſhyre men, to the entent to make warre on the foreſayde Lordes, and ſuffered them to robbe and pill, without correction or reproſe.

4 Item, although the king flatterynglye, and with great diſſimulation made Proclamation throughout the realme, that the Lordes before named were not attached for any cryme of treaſon, but onely for extorcions and oppreſſions done in this realme, yet he layde to them in the Parliament, rebellion and manifeſt treaſon.

5 Item, he hath compelled diuerſe of the ſayde Lordes ſeruauntes and friendes, by menace and extreme paymentes, to make great fines to their byter vndoyng. And notwithſtandyng his pardon to them graunted, yet hee made them fine of newe.

6 Item, where diuers were appointed to cõmon of the eſtate of the realme, and the common welth of the ſame. The ſame king cauſed all the rolles and recordes to be kept from them, contrary to his promiſe made in the Parliament, to his open diſhonour.

7 Item, that he vncharitably commaunded, that no man vpon paine of loſſe of lyfe and goodes, ſhould once entreate him for the returne of Henry, nowe Duke of Lancaſter.

8 Item, where this realme is holden of God, and not of the Pope or other ther Prince, the sayde king Richard, after he had obteyned diuerse actes of Parliament for his awne peculiar profite and pleasure, then he obteyned Bulles and extreme censures from Rome, to cõpel all men streightly to kepe the same, contrary to the honor and auncient priuileges of this realme.

9 Item, although the Duke of Lancaster had done his deuoyre agaynst Thomas Duke of Norffolke, in proofe of his quarell, yet the sayde kyng without reason or ground, banished him the Realme for ten yeres, contrary to all equitie.

10 Item, before the Dukes departure, he vnder his broade seale licenced him to make attourney to prosecute and defende his causes: The sayde king after his departure would suffer none attourney to appere for him, but dyd with his at his pleasure.

11 Item, the same king put out diuerse Shirifes lawfully elected, and put in their rowmes, diuerse other of his awne minions, subuertyng the lawe, contrary to his othe and honour.

12 Item, he borowed great sommes of money, and bound him vnder hys letters patents for the repayment of the same, and yet not one penny payde.

13 Item, he tared men at the will of him and his vnhappy counsail, and the same treasure spent in folie, not payng poore men for their vitail and viande.

14 Item, he sayd that the lawes of the realme were in his head, and sometyme in his brest, by reason of which fantasticall opinion, he destroyed Noble men, and impouerished the poore Commons.

15 Item, the Parliament sittyng and enactyng diuerse notable statutes for the profite and aduaunsement of the common wealth, he by his priuye friendes and soliciters, caused to be enacted, that no acte then enacted should be more preiudiciall to him, then it was to any of his predecessors, through which prouiso he did often as he list, and not as the lawe ment.

16 Item, for to serue his purpose, he would suffer the Shirifes of the shire to remaine aboue one yere or two.

17 Item, at the sommons of the Parliament, when Knightes and Burgesses should be elected, and that the election had full proceded, he put out diuers persons elected, & put in other in their places, to serue his wil & appetite.

18 Item, he had priuie Espials in euery shyre, to here who had of him any communication, and if he commoned of his lasciuious liuyng, or outragious doyng, he streight wayes was apprehended, and made a grieuous fine.

19 Item, the Spiritualtie alleaged against him, that he at his goyng into Ireland exacted many notable summes of money, besyde plate, and iewels, without lawe or custome, contrary to his othe taken at his coronation.

20 Item, when diuerse Lordes and Justices were sworne to say the truth of diuerse thinges to them committed in charge, both for the honour of the Realme, and profite of the king, the sayde king so menaced them with sore threatnynges, that no man would or durst say the right.

21 Item, that without the assent of the Nobilitie, he caryed the Jewelles, and Plate, and Treasure ouer the sea into Ireland, to the great empouerishyng of the realme. And all the good recordes for the common welth, and against his extortions, he caused priuely to be embesiled, and conueyed away.

22 Item, in al leages & letters to be concluded or sent to the See of Rome or other Regions: His writting was so subtill and so darke, that no other

prince durſt once beleue him, nor yet his owne ſubiectes.

23 Item, he moſt tiranouſly and vnprincely ſayde, that the lyues and goodes of all hys ſubiectes were in the princes hands, and at his diſpoſitiō.

24 Item, that he contrarie to the great Charter of England cauſed diuers luſtie men to appeale diuers olde men, vpon matters determinable at the common lawe, in the Court martiall, becauſe that in that court is no triall but onely by battayle: Wherevpon the ſayde aged perſons fearing the ſequele of the matter, ſubmitted themſelues to his mercy, whome he fined and raunſomed vnreaſonably at his pleaſure.

25 Item, he craftily deuiſed certaine priuie othes, contrarye to the lawe, and cauſed diuers of his ſubiectes, firſt to be ſworne to obſerue the ſame, and after bounde them in bondes for the former keping of the ſame, to the great vndoyng of many honeſt men.

26 Item, where the Chauncellour according to the lawe, woulde in no wiſe graunt a prohibicion to a certaine perſon: the king graunted it vnto the ſame perſon vnder his priuie ſeale, with great threatnings, if it ſhould be diſobeyed.

27 Item, he baniſhed the biſhop of Cauntorbury wythout cauſe or iudgement, and kept him in the parliament Chamber with men of Armes. Item, the Byſhoppes goodes he graunted to his ſucceſſour, vpon condition that he ſhould maintayne all his ſtatutes made at Shrewesburie. Anno. xxj. and the ſtatutes made. Anno. xxij. at Couentrie.

28 Item, vpon the accuſation of the Archbiſhop, the king craftily perſwaded the ſayde Biſhop to make no aunſwere, for he would be his warrant, and adviſed him not to come to the parliament. And ſo without anſwere he was condemned and exiled, and his goodes ſeaſed.

After that king Richarde was charged with the aforeſayde articles, there was an inſtrument made, declaryng his aunſwers, & how he conſented wyllingly to be depoſed, the tenor of which inſtrument was as followeth.

The copy of an Inſtrumente.

THis preſent inſtrument made the Monday the. xxix. daye of September 1389. and in the. xxiij. yere of king Richard the ſecond, witneſſeth: that where by the auctoritie of the Lordes ſpirituall and temporall of this preſent parliament, and commons of the ſame, the right honourable and diſcreete perſons, here vnder named, were by the ſayde auctoritie aſſigned to go vnto the tower of London, there to here and teſtifie ſuch queſtions and aunſwers as then and there ſhould be by the ſayde honourable and diſcreete perſons heard: know all men to whome theſe preſent letters ſhall come, that we Sir Richard Scrope Archebiſhop of Yorke, John biſhop of Hertford, Henry Erle of Northumberland, Raufe Erle of Weſtmerland, Thomas Lorde of Barkeley, William Abbot of Weſtmynſter, John Priour of Cauntorburie, Wylliam Thirnyng, and Hugh Burnell knights, and John Markam Juſtice, Thomas Stowe, and John Burbage Doctours of the lawe Ciuile: Thomas Fereby, and Dionyſe Lopham Notaries publique, the daye and yere aboueſayd, betwene the houres of eyght and nine of the clock in the fore noone, were preſent in the chiefe chamber of the kings lodging within the ſayde place of the towre, where was reherſed vnto the king, by the mouth of the foreſayde Erle of Northumberlande, that before tyme at Conwaye in Northwales, the king being there at his pleaſure and libertie promiſed promised vnto the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, then Thomas Arundell, and vnto the sayde Erle of Northumberlande, that he for the insufficiency which he knewe himselfe to be of, to occupy so great a charge as to gouerne this Realme of Englande, would gladly leaue of, and renounce the right and title, as well of that, as of the title of the crowne of Fraunce and his maiestie, vnto Henry Duke of Herforde, and that to doe in such conuenient wise as by the learned men of this lande it should most sufficiently be by them deuised and ordeyned.

To the which rehersall, the king in our presence aunswered beningly and sayde, that such promise he made, and so to the same he was at that houre in full purpose to perfourme and fulfill, sauyng that he desyred first to haue personall speeche with the sayde Duke, and with the Archebishop of Cauntorbury his Collyns. And furthermore, he desyred to haue a bill drawen of the sayde Resignation, that he might be perfite in the rehersall thereof. After which Copie by me the sayde Erle of Northumberlande delyuered, we the sayde Lordes and other departed. And vpon the same after noone, the king desyring much of the comming of the Duke of Lancaster, at the last the sayd Duke with the Archebishop of Cauntorbury entered the aforesayde Chamber, bringing with them the Lorde Roos, the Lorde Burgeyny, and Lorde Willoughby with dyuerse other.

Where after due obeysaunce done by them vnto the king, he familierly and with a glad countenance (to vs apperyng) talked with the saide Archbishop & Duke a good season. And that communication finished, the king with a glad countenaunce, in presence of vs and the other aboue rehersed, sayde openly, that he was readie to renounce and resigne all his kingly maiestie in maner and forme as he before had promised. And although he had and might sufficiently haue declared his renouncement by the reading of another meane person, yet he for the more suretie of the matter, and for that the sayde resignation should haue his full force and strength, he therefore red the scrole of resignation himselfe, in maner, and forme as followeth.

¶ In the name of God, amen. I Richard by the grace of God, king of Englande and of Fraunce, and Lorde of Irelande, acquyte and allovle all Archebishops, Bishops, and other prelates secular & religious, of what dignitie, state or condition that they be of: And also all Dukes, Erles, Barons, Lords, and all mine other liege men, both spirituall and secular, of what maner of name or degree they be, from their othe of fealtie and homage, and all other deedes and priuileges made vnto me, and from all maner of bandes of allegeaunce and regalty and Lordship, in the which they were or be bound vnto me, or in any otherwise constreyned: And them their heyres and successors for euermore from the sayde bandes and othes I release, delyuer, acquyte and set them for free, dissolued and acquited, and to be harmelesse, for so much as longeth to my person by any maner of waye, title or right, that to me might follow of the aforesayde things, or of any of them. And also I resigne all my kingly dignitie, maiestie and crowne, with all the Lordships, power and priuileges to the aforesayd kingly dignity and crowne belonging, and all other Lordships and possessions to me in any maner of wise appertayning, what name and condition soeuer they be of, except those lands and possessions for me & mine Obite purchased and bought. And I renounce all right right and all colour of right, and all maner of title of poſſeſſion, and Lord-ſhip, which I euer had or haue in the ſame Lordſhippes, and poſſeſſions, or any of them, or to them, with any maner of rights belonging or appertayning vnto any parte of them.

And alſo the rule and gouernaunce of the ſame kingdome and Lord-ſhips, with all miniſtrations of the ſame, and all things and euerye of them that to the whole Empire and iuriſdictions of the ſame belongeth of right, or in any wiſe may belong.

And alſo I renounce the name of worſhip & regaly and kingly highneſſe, cleerely, freely, ſingularly and wholy, in the moſt beſt maner and forme that I may, and with deede and word I leaue of and reſigne them, and go from them for euermore, ſauyng alwayes to my ſucceſſors kings of Englande, all the rightes, priuileges and appurtenaunces to the ſayde kingdome & Lord-ſhips aboue ſayd belonging and apperteyning: For well I wote and know-lege, and deme my ſelfe to be, and haue bene, inſufficient and vnhable and alſo vnprofitable, and for mine open deſertes not vnworthy to be put downe. And I ſweare vpon the holy Euangeliſtes, here preſently with my handes touched, that I ſhall neuer repugne to thys reſignation, dimiſſion, or yeelding vp, nor neuer impugne them in any maner, by worde or by deede, by my ſelfe nor by none other: Nor I ſhall not ſuffer it to be impugned, in as much as in me is, priuily or aparte. But I ſhall haue holde and kepe thys pronouncyng, dimiſſion and leauyng vp for fyrme and ſtable for euermore, in all and in euery part thereof, ſo God help me and all Saints, and by thys holye Euangeliſt by me bodely touched and kyſſed. And for more record of the ſame, here openly I ſubſcribe and ſigne thys preſent reſignation with myne awne hande. And forthwith in oure preſences and other he ſubſcribed the ſame, and after delyuered it vnto the Archebyſhop of Cauntorbury, ſaiyng that if it were in his power or at his aſſignement, he would that the Duke of Lancaſter, there preſent, ſhould be his ſucceſſor and king after him. And in token thereof, he toke a ryng of Golde from his finger, being his ſignet, and put it vpon the ſaid dukes finger, deſyring & requiring the Archbiſhop of Yorke, to ſhewe and make reporte to the Lordes of the Parliament of his voluntarie reſignation, and alſo of his entent and good minde that he bare towarde his Coſſyn the Duke of Lancaſter, to haue hun hys ſucceſſor & king after hym. And thys done, euery man toke their leaue and returned to their home.

On the morowe followyng, beyng on the Tewesday, and the laſt day of September, all the Lordes ſpirituall and temporall, with alſo the commons of the ſayde parliament, aſſembled at Weſtmynſter: where in the preſence of them, the Archbiſhop of Yorke, accordyng to the kings deſyre ſhewed vnto them ſeriouſly the voluntary renouncing of the king, with alſo the fauour that he ought vnto his Coſſyn the Duke of Lancaſter, for to haue him his ſucceſſor. And moreouer he ſhewed vnto them the Schedule or bill of renouncement, ſigned with king Richardes hand.

And when the things aforeſayde were by the ſayde Biſhop fynyſhed, the queſtion was aſked firſt of the Lordes, if they would admit and allow that renouncement: The which when it was of the Lordes graunted and confirmed, the lyke queſtion was aſked of the Commons, and of them in lyke maner affirmed.

After

After which admission, it was then declared, that notwithstanding the forsayde renouncing so by the Lords and commons admitted, it were needfull vnto the realme, in the auoyding of all suspicions and surmises of euill disposed persons to haue in wryting and regestred the manifolde crymes and defautes before done by the sayd Richard, late king of England, to the ende that they might first be openly shewed vnto the people, and after to remaine of record among the kings records. The which articles are before expressed.

Now when the Lordes of the parliament had consydered this voluntarie renouncement of king Richarde, and that it was behouefull and necessary for the weale of the realme to proceede vnto the sentence of his deposall, they there appoynted by the authoritie of the states of the sayde parliament, that is to saye the Bysshop of Saint Asse, the Abbot of Glascenbury, the Erle of Glouceſter, the Lorde Barkeley, Wylliam Thyrning iustice, and Thomas Erpyngham, and Thomas Gray knightes, that they should geue open sentence to the kings deposition. Wherevpon the sayde commissioners layeng their heades together, by good counsayle and aduisement and of one assent agreed among them, that the Bishop of Saint Asse should publisshe the sentence for them and in their names, as followeth.

The depoſition of king Richard the seconde.

¶ In the name of God, amen. We John Bishop of Saint Asse or Assenence, John Abbot of Glascenbury, Richard Erle of Glouceſter (and so the names of the other as they are aboue rehersed) chosen and deputed speciall commissioners by the three estates of this present parliament, representing the whole body of the realme, for all such matters by the said estates to vs committed: we well vnderstandyng & consydering the manifolde crymes, hurtes and harmes done by Richarde king of Englande, and the misgouernaunce of the same by a long time, to the great decay of the sayd land, and vtter ruine of the same shortly to haue bene, ne had the speciall grace of our Lorde God therunto put the soner remedy: And also furthermore consydering ꝑ the sayd king knowyng his awne insufficiency, hath of his awne meere mocion and free will renounced and geuen vp the rule and gouernaunce of this lande, with all rightes and honours to the same belongyng, and vtterly for his merites hath iudged himselfe not vnworthely to be deposed of all kingly maiesty and estate royall. We the premisses well consydering, by good and diligent deliberation, by the power, name and authoritie to vs, as abouesayde, committed pronounce, decerne and declare the same king Richard, before thys to haue bene and to be vnprofitable, vnhable, vnsufficient, and vnworthy to the rule and gouernaunce of the aforesayde realmes and Lordships, and all other the appurtenaunces to the same belongyng. And for the same causes we depriue him of all kingly dignitie and worshipp, and of any kingly worshipp in himselfe. And we depose him by our sentence definitiue, forbydding expresly to all Archebishops, Bishops, and all other Prelates, Dukes, Marquesses, Erles, Barons and Knightes, and to all other men of the aforesayd kingdome and Lordships, or of other places belonging to the same realmes and Lordships, subiectes and lieges whatsoeuer they be, that none of them from this time forward, to the aforesayde Richard as king and Lorde of the aforesayde Realmes and Lordships, be neyther obedient nor atttendaunt.

And immediately after this sentence, the duke of Lancaster rysyng from the place where he then sate, and standing where all might behold him, spake these wordes. I Henrie of Lancaster clayme the realme of England, and

Henry Duke of Lancaſter maketh clayme to the crowne and kingdome of Englande.

the crowne, with all the appurtenaunces, as I that am diſcended by ryght lyne of the blood comming from that good Lorde king Henry the thirde, and through the right that God of his grace hath ſent vnto me, with the helpe of my kinne, and of my friendes to recouer the ſame, which was in poynt to be vndone for default of good gouernaunce and due iuſtice.

After which wordes, thus by him vttered, he returned & ſate him downe in the place where he before had ſitten. Then the Lordes hering this clayme, commoned ſecretly among themſelues, and then was it demaunded of them what they thought: and they all agreed to the ſayde clayme, and that he was worthie to reigne as king ouer them. Then the Archbiſhop of Caunterbury hauyng knowledge of the Lordes mindes, ſtoode vp, and aſked the Cõmons if they would aſſent to the Lordes, to the which alſo they aſſented. After which aunſwere the Archbiſhop went to the Duke, and after low & ſolemne obeyſaunce, kneelyng vpon his knee, did afterwarde ariſe, and tooke the Duke by the right hande, and led him vnto the kinges ſeate, and there wyth great reuerence placed him.

Duke Henry placed in the regall ſeate.

After the Duke was thus placed as king, then he ſtood vp and ſayde to the Lordes and Commons preſent: I thanke you my Lordes ſpirituall and temporall, and all the ſtates of this lande, and I geue you to vnderſtand, that it is not my wil that any man thinke that by the way of Cõqueſt I would diſenherite any man of his heritage, franchiſe or other rightes, that of right to him belongeth, nor to put him out of that which he now enioyeth, & hath had before tyme by cuſtome of good lawe of this realme, except ſuch priuate perſons as haue bene againſt the good purpoſe & the cõmõ profit of the realme.

When the king had thus ſpoken, he ſate downe, and then it was agreed that the Procuratour aforenamed ſhould go vnto the Tower, and reſigne vnto the late king Richard all their homages and fealties in the name of the whole realme, and to ſhewe vnto him, not onely the maner of his depoſition, but alſo howe Henry Duke of Lancaſter was placed in the kingdome, which was done accordyngly, and the next day after, the Duke was openly proclaymed kyng by the name of king Henry the fourth.

NOw after King Richard was deposed, as you haue heard, then Henry Plantagenet, borne at Bolyngbrooke in the Cõtie of Lincolne, Duke of Lancaster and Herford, Erle of Darbie, Leycester, and Lyncolne, sonne to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, tooke vpon him the gouernment of this realme, and was by sounde of Trompet proclaymed king of Englande, and of Fraunce, and Lorde of Irelande, the.xxix. day of September, in the yere of our Lorde 1399. by the name of king Henry the fourth, and was crowned at Westminster the.xj. day of October then next folowing, which was the day of the Translation of Edward the Confessor, with all tryumph and solemnitie. 1399 1

The Coronatiõ of king Henrie the fourth.

And at the day of his coronation (as sayth Hall) because he would not haue it thought that he tooke vpon him the Crowne without good title and right therevnto had, therefore he caused it to be proclaymed and published, that he chalenged the realme not only by cõquest, but also for that he was by king Richard adopted as heyre, and declared successor of hym, and by resignation, had accepted the Crowne and Scepter, & also that he was next heire Male of the blood royall to king Rycharde.

Henry prince of Wales.

Shortly after his coronation, he created his eldest sonne Henry, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornewall, and Erle of Chester beyng then of the age of.xij. yeres, and caused him to be proclaymed heyre apparant to the Crowne of this realme. And soone after he called his high Court of Parliament, in the which was demaunded by king Henryes friendes, what should be done with king Richard. And as the aforesayde Hall sayth, whome I chiefely folowe in this history, for that he hath diligently traueyled therein. The Bishop of Carlisle which was a man well learned, and of a good courage, stood vp and sayde: My Lordes, I require you to take hede what aunswere you make vnto this question: For I thinke there is none of you worthie or mete to geue iudgement on so noble a Prince as King Richard is, whom we haue taken and honoured for our souereigne and liege Lorde, by the space of. xxij. yeres, & I assure you, there is not so ranke a traytor, nor so arrant a theefe, nor yet so cruel a murderer, apprehended or deteyned in prison for his offence, but he shall be brought before the Justice to heere his iudgement: And yet ye will proceede to the iudgement of an annoynted king, and here neyther hys aunswere nor excuse. And I say, that the Duke of Lancaster, whom you call king, hath more offended and more trespalled to king Richard & this realme, then the king hath eyther done to him or to vs. For it is manifest and well knowen, that the Duke was banished the Realme by king Richard and hys counsaile, and by the iudgement of his awne father (for the space of .x. yeres) for what cause all you knowe, and yet without licence of king Richarde he is returned againe into the realme, yea and that is worse, hath taken vpon him the name, title, & preheminence of a king: And therfore I say, that you haue done manifest wrong, to proceede in any thing against king Richard, without callyng him openly to his aunswere and defence. Assoone as the Bishop had ended his tale, he was attached by the Erle Marshall, and committed to ward in the Abbey of Saint Albones.

A bishop cõmitted to ward for talking to broad in the parliament house.

And in the sayde Parliament it was concluded, that king Richarde should continue in a large prison, and should haue all thinges honourably ministred vnto him, aswell for his dyet as also apparell. And that if any person or persons would presume to styre and rere warre on the behalfe of king Richard for his delyueraunce out of prison, that then king Richard himselfe should be the first that should die for that commotion.

In order take how king Richarde should be intreated.

A fore sentence.

In this Parliament, the Lorde Fitzwater appealed the Duke of Aumarle of high treason, and offered to fight with him in Listes royall: Likewyse the Lorde Morley appealed the Erle of Sarisbury, and there were mo then.xx. Appealants which waged battail in this Parliament: But the king pardoned all their offences, sauyng the faultes of the Lorde Morley, and the Erle of Sarisbury, whom he committed to ward, and after at the request of their friendes, they were againe set at libertie. The king also punished extremely all suche as were priuie and doers of the murder of Thomas hys Uncle, late Duke of Gloucester, which was shamefully murthered, as is before, in the Towne of Calice. Also he greatly aduaunced sundrie of hys friendes, and called out of banishment Richard Erle of Warwike, and restored the Erle of Arondelles sonne to his awne possession and dignitie, and manie other. He tooke into his speciall fauour John Holland Duke of Exeter, and Erle of Huntyngton, halfe brother vnto king Richard which had espoused the Ladie Elizabeth his awne sister: And he beyng before Captaine of Calice, was greatly moued and inwardly grieued, that king Richard his brother was remoued out of the seate royall, and therefore began to styre vp newe mocions and factions within the Realme: the which the king much feared, and therefore he reconciled him to his fauour, and made him as he supposed, his perfect friende, where in deede he was his deadly enemye.

Also in the ende of this Parliament were repealed all the statutes that were made in the.xxi. yere of the reigne of king Richard. And then king Henry supposyng that he had wonne the heartes and fauoures, aswell of the Nobilitie both spirituall and temporall, as of the Commons of his realme, prayed that for the aduoydyng of all claymes, tytles and doubtes that might be made vnto the Crowne, that he might haue his dignitie, lyne and succession enacted, confirmed, and entayled, by the assent of the high Court of Parliament, the which was done in maner and forme folowyng.

AT the request and peticion, aswell of the nobilitie, as of the Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, it is ordeyned and established, that the inheritaunce of the Crowne and Realmes of Englande, and of Fraunce, and of all other Lordships to ỹ king our souereigne Lord, aswell on this side the seas, as beyond, apperteining, with their appurtenaunces, shall be vnited and remain in the person of our souereigne Lord the King, and in the heyres of his bodie lawfully begotten. And especially at the request and assent aforesayde it is ordeyned, established, pronounced, enacted, written and declared, clared, that my Lorde Prince, Henry, eldest sonne to our souereigne Lorde the king, shall be heyre apparant, and successor to our souereigne Lorde in the sayde Crowne, Realmes, and Seigniories, to haue and enioy them with all their appurtenaunces, after the decease of our sayd souereigne, to him and the heyres of his bodie begotten. And if he die without heyres of his bodie begotten, that then the sayde Crownes, Realmes, and Seigniories, with their appurtenaunces shal remaine to the Lord Thomas, second sonne to our sayd souereigne Lorde, and to the heyres of his bodie begotten. And if he depart without issue of his body begotten, all the premisses to remain to Lord John his thirde sonne and to the heyres of his bodie begotten. And if he die without issue, then the Crownes, Realmes, and Seigniories aforesayd with their appurtenaunces shall remaine to the Lord Homfrey, the fourth sonne to our sayd souereigne Lord, and to the heyres of his bodie lawfully begotten.

Now when king Henry had thus mortised himselfe and his issue so sure and fast, as he thought, that the same was not possible to be remooued, then was he neerer an vtter ouerthrow and destruction then euer he was, for suche is the nature of dissimulation, that when fortune with her flattering seemeth most to ioy and laugh, then (so fickle is she of condition) is most perill and daunger at hand: For now diuers of those Lords which were king Richardes friendes, outwardly dissimuled that which they inwardly conspired, which was the finall confusion and destruction of king Henry, and to restore agayne their olde Lorde and mayster king Richarde. And the better to bring thys matter about, they practised with the Abbot of Westminster that then was, who had no good opinion of king Henry, for that he heard him once saye, when he was Duke of Lancaster, that Princes had to little, and the religious had to much, and therefore he supposed that he would not be a friend vnto the Church, if he contynued long in that dignitie. Vnto the house of thys Abbot resorted one day as bidden gestes of the sayde Abbot, John Holland Duke of Exceter and Erle of Huntyngdon, Thomas Holland Duke of Surrey, and Erle of Kent, Edward Duke of Aumarle and Erle of Rutlande, sonne to the Duke of Yorke, John Mountagew Erle of Salsbury, Hugh Spencer Erle of Gloucester, John the Bishop of Carleill, Sir Thomas Blunt, and one Magdalen, one of king Richards Chapell, a man as lyke vnto him in stature and proporcion, as vnlike in birth and dignitie. This Abbot highly feasted these great Lordes, and when dyner was done, they withdrew themselues into a secret Chamber, and when they were set, John Holland Duke of Exceter, who bare great grudge agaynst king Henry, declared to them their allegeaunce promised, and by othe confirmed to king Richarde his brother, forgetting not the highe promocions and dignities, which he and all they present had receyued of the liberalitie of his sayde brother, by the which they were not onely bound to take part with him and his friendes, but also to be reuenged for him and his cause on hys mortall enemies and deadly foes: In the doyng whereof he thought pollicy more meeter to be vsed then force. And the better to bring this matter about, he deuised a Justes to be kept betwene him and .xx. on his part, & the Erle of Salsbury & .xx. of his part, at Orforde: To the which Justes king Henry should be desyred to be present, and when he were most earnestly beholdyng he passyme, he should sodainely haue beene slayne and destroyed, and by this meanes king Richard, which was then alyue should be restored to his libertie and to his crowne and kingdome.

This deuise seemed to please well all that were present, wherfore they made an Indenture sertipartite sealed with their seales, & signed with their handes, in the which eche bounde himselfe to other to endeuour themselues for the destruction of king Henry, and the erection and restoring of king Richard, and sware on the Euangelistes the one to be true to the other, euen to the houre and poynt of death.

The king is requested by the Lords to come to the Justes.

Nowe all things beyng thus appoynted and concluded, the Duke of Exceter came to the king to Wynsore, humbly beseeching him for the loue that he bare to the noble actes of Chiualrie, that he would vouchsafe not only to repaire to Oxford, to see and beholde their enterpzises and attemptes, but also to be the discouerer and indifferent Judge (if any ambiguitie should arise) of their courageous actes and royall triumph. The king seing himselfe so earnestly desyred, and that of his brother in lawe, and suspecting nothing lesse then that which was purposed, did gently graunt vnto his request. And so sone as the Duke had his aunswere, he returned home to his house and prepared all things necessarie for the exployt of his pretensed purpose. And when the time drue neere, he came to Oxforde with a great compayne of Archers and horsemen, and when he came thether, he found there all his confederates well appointed for the purpose, except the Duke of Aumarle Erle of Rutlande, for whome they sent messengers in great haste, This Duke of Aumarle went before from Westminster to see his father the Duke of Yorke, and sittyng at dynner, he had his Counterpane of the indenture of confederacie (whereof is mention made afore) in his bosome. The father espyed it, and demaunded what it was. His sonne lowely aunswered, that it touched not him: By Saint George, quod the father, but I will see it, and by force tooke it out of his bosome, and when he perceyued the content thereof, and the fire seales set and fired to the same, whereof the seale of his sonne was one, he sodeynely roase from the Table, commaundyng his horses to be saddeled, and in a great fury sayd to his sonne: thou Traytor theefe, thou hast bene a Traytor to king Richard, and wilt thou nowe be false to thy Cosyn king Henry? Thou knowest well inough, that I am thy pledge, Borow, and Maine perne bodie for bodie, and for lande and goodes in open Parliament: and goest thou about to seeke my death and destruction? By the holy Roode I had rather see thee strangled on a Gybbet. And so the Duke of Yorke mounted on horsebacke, to ride to Windsore to the king, and to declare the whole matter vnto him. The Duke of Aumerle considerying in what case he stoode in, tooke his horse and roade another way to Windsore, ridyng all the way in post (which his father beyng an olde man, could not do) and when he was alighted at the Castell gate, he caused the gates to be shut, saiyng that he must nedes deliuer the keyes to the king. And when he came before the kinges presence, he kneeled on his knees, beseechyng him of mercie and forgeuenesse. The king demaunded the cause, and he declared vnto him plainly the whole confederacie. Well sayd the king, if this be true, we pardon you: if it be feyned, at your extreme perill be it.

Treason will breake out.

While the king and the Duke talked together, the Duke of Yorke knocked at the Castell Gate, whom the king caused to be let in, and there he deliuered uered the Indenture which before he had taken from his sonne. Which wyttyng when the king had redand seene, perceiuyng the signes and seales of the Confederates, he chaunged his former purpose: For the day before he heard that the Chaloners and defenders were all in a redinesse, and thought the same day to haue gone thether, but now he stayed, and wrote his letters forthwith vnto the Erle of Northumberland his high Constable, and to the Erle of Westmerland, his high Marshall, and to dyuers other his friendes, of his doubtfull daunger and perelous ieopardie.

The Confederators perceiuyng the lacke of the Duke of Aumerle, and also seyng no preparation made there for the kinges commyng, imagyned that their purpose was disclosed to the king, wherefore, that thing which they purposed preuily to haue done, they determined now openly with speare and shielde to set forth and aduaunce. And so they adourned Magdalene a man resemblyng much king Richard, in royall and Princely vesture, calling him king Richard, and affyrmyng that he by fauour of his kepers was delyuered out of Prison and set at libertie. Nowe while the Confederates with theyr newe deuised king, accompanied wyth a puyssaunt armie of men, toke the direct way to Windsore: king Henry beyng admonished of their commyng, with a fewe horse in the night went from Windsore, and came to the Tower of London aboute midnight, where he in the Mornyng caused the Maior of the Citie to bring vnto him three thousand Archers, and three thousand Billmen well armed and appoynted.

Magdalene a man that much resembleth king Richard the seconde.

The Lordes of the Confederacie came to Windsore, and entered the Castell, where they fyndyng not theyr pray, determined with all speede to passe forth towardes London: But when they were well onwarde of theyr iourney, they then chaunged theyr purpose, and returned backe to Colbroke, and there stayed. These Lordes had many people folowyng them, what for feare, and what for entreaty, and specially for that they beleued certeinly king Richard was there present with them. When king Henrie heard of theyr commyng toward London, he issued out of the sayd Citie with twentie thousand men, and came to Houmslow hethe, and there pitched his campe, myn-dyng there to abyde the commyng of his enemyes. But when the Lordes were aduertised of the kinges commyng, and of hys great puyssaunce, beyng eyther amased with feare, or else repentyng their enterprice, or mistrustyng theyr atone companie, they departed from Colbroke to Barkhamsted, and so to Aucester, and there the Lordes tooke theyr lodgyng: The Duke of Surrey, Erle of Kent, and the Erle of Sarisbury in one Inne, and the Duke of Exeter, and the Erle of Glouceſter in another, and all the armie lay in the fieldes. In the night tyme the Baylife of the Towne with. lxxx. Archers set on the house where the Duke of Surrey and the other lay: The house was manfully assaulted, and strongly defended a great space. The Duke of Exeter beyng in another Inne, with the Erle of Glouceſter, set fyre on dyuerse houses in the towne, thynkyng that the assaylantes would leaue the assault and rescue theyr goodes, which they nothyng regarded. The army lyyng without, heryng noyse, and seeyng fyre in the towne, thinkyng that the king was come thether with his puyssaunce, fled without measure to saue themselues. The Duke of Exceter & his companie seeyng the force of the townes payre to the armie, which they found dispersed and retyred. Then the Duke seeyng no hope of comfort, fled into Esser: And the Erle of Glouceſter goyng towarde Wales, was taken and behedded at Bristowe: Magdalene fliyng into Scotland, was apprehended and brought to the Tower of London. And the Lordes which were still fighting in the towne of Ciceſter, were wounded to death and taken, and their heades stricken off and sent to London: And there were taken Sir Bennet Shelly, and Sir Barnard Brokas, and.xxix. other Lordes, Knightes, and Esquiers, and sent to Oxforde, where the king then soiourned, and where Sir Thomas Blunt and all the other prisoners were executed.

When the Duke of Exceter heard that his complices were taken, and his counsaylors apprehended, and his friendes put in execution, he lamented his owne chaunce, and bewayled the misfortune of his friends: But most of all he was troubled to thinke vpon the wretched ende that should happen to king Richarde hys brother, whose death he sawe as in a Glasse, to be at hand by reason of this his vnhappie enterprise, and thus beyng succourlesse, and wandering vp & downe, at the last he was taken in a towne called Plaschey in Esser, and there made shorter by the head, and in that place specially (sayth Hall) for that he in the same Lordship, betrayed Thomas Duke of Glouceſter, and was the very cause of hys death and destruction, and so the common prouerbe was verified, as you haue done, so shall you feele.

After this, Magdalene that represented the person of king Richarde amongest the rebels, and dyuers other were put to execution, and all the heads of the chiefe conspirators were set on poles ouer London bridge, to the feare of other which were disposed to commit lyke offense. The Abbot of Westmynster in whose house this confederacy was conspired, heeryng that the Chiefetaynes of his Felowship were taken and executed, he goyng betwene the monasterie and his mansion house, for thought fell into a sodaine palsey, and shortly after without any speeche ended his lyfe: After whom the Bishop of Carliſle, more for feare then sickneſſe yeelded his spirite to God, as one desyring to die by deathes darte, rather then by the temporall sworde.

But now drewe on the time, the Innocent must perishe with the Nocent, and the vngiltie with the giltie: For king Richard being ignorannt of this conspiracie and kept in miserable captiuitie, was by king Henry adiudged to die, for ỹ he would delyuer himself of al inward feare of his enemies, wherfore some write that he commaunded him to be slaine, & others say that he was agreeable therevnto, and some others affirme that he knewe not of it, vntill it was done: But howsoeuer it was, kyng Richard dyed of a violent death: And one writer sayth that king Henry sitting at hys table, and sore sighing sayde, haue I no faythfull friende that will delyuer me from him whose lyfe will be my death, and whose death will be the preseruation of my life? Thys saiyng was noted of them that were present, and specially of one called Sir Piers of Exton. This knight incontinently departed the Court wyth eyght talle persons with him, and came to Pomfret, commaundyng that the Esquire which was accustomed to serue, and take the assaye before king Richard, should no more vse that maner of seruice, saiyng: let him eate well nowe, for he shall not long eate. King Richard sate downe to dyner, and was serued without curtesie or assaye, he much marueylyng of the ſodaine mutation of the thing, demaunded of the Eſquyre why he did not his duetie? Sir ſayde he, I am otherwiſe commaunded by ſir Piers of Exton, which is newly come from King Henry. When he heard that word, he toke the carueyng knyfe in his hande, and ſtrake the Eſquire on the head, ſaiyng, the Deuill take Henry of Lancaſter and thee together: and with that word Sir Piers entered into the Chamber well armed, with eyght talle men in harneys, euery man hauing a byll in his hande. King Richarde perceyuing them armed, knew well that they came to his confuſion, and putting the table from him, valiauntly tooke the byll out of the firſt mans hande, and manfully defended himſelfe, and ſlewe foure of them in a ſhort ſpace. Sir Piers beyng ſomewhat diſmayed with his reſiſtyng, lept into the Chayre where king Richard was wont to ſit, while the other foure perſons chaſed him about the Chamber, which being vnarmed defended himſelfe againſt his enemies that were armed (which was a valiaunt acte) but in concluſion he came by the Chayre where Sir Piers ſtoode, who with a ſtroke of his Pollax felled him to the ground, and ſoone after was rid out of his lyfe in this worlde. When this knight perceyued that he was dead, he lamented and ſayde: O Lorde, what haue we done? we haue murdered him whome by the ſpace of xxij. yeres we obeyed and honoured as our ſouereigne Lorde, nowe will all Noble men abhorre vs, and all good men hate vs, and poynt at vs as the murderers of a noble Prince. Thus haue you heard the death and ende of king Richard the ſecond as the beſt auethours report of it.

When King Richard had thus ended his lyfe, he was then enbaulmed, and ſeared, and couered with lead, all ſaue his face (to the entent that all men might perceyue that he was departed out of this lyfe) and was conueyed to London, and ſo to the Tower, and from thence through London to the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule, and there remayned three dayes, that all the people might ſee him, and from thence he was conueyed to Langley in Buckyngham ſhire, where he was buryed: And afterwarde by king Henry the fift, was remoued to Weſtminſter, and there honourably entombed wyth Queene Anne his wyfe.

Now newes were firſt brought to the French King, how King Richard was depoſed of his kingdome, at the which the ſayde French king wondered not a little, and cryed out of the ſhamefull doyng thereof, that an annointed king, and crowned Prince ſhould be ſo vilye vſed: But the French king was not ſo much agreeued, but Walleram Erle of Saint Paule, which had maryed king Richardes halfe ſiſter, was muche more grieued, who beyng moued with highe diſdeine agaynſt king Henrie, ceaſed not to prouoke the Frenche king and his counſaile, to make ſharpe warre vpon England, to reuenge the iniury and diſhonour committed and done to his ſonne in law king Richard, and he himſelfe ſent letters of defiance into England: Which thing was ſoone agreed vnto, and an armie royall appoynted with all ſpeede to inuade England. This armie was come downe into Picardie, readie to bee tranſported into Englande: But when it was certeinly certefyed that king Richard was dead, and that theyr enterprice for his deliuerance was vaine, the armie was diſcharged, and euery man returned to his home. But ſhortly after, the French king gathered another great power, & entred the Duchy of Acquitaine and Gaſcoyn, and thought there to haue greatly preuayled. But king Henry beyng aduertised of all the Frenche attemptes, sent the Lorde Thomas Percey Erle of Worcester with a goodly crewe of Souldiours into Acquitaine to ayde and assist Sir Thomas Knolles his Lieutenant there, and to perswade and exhort the people to continue in their auncient libertie, and due obeysance. When the Erle was there arryued, he so wisely entreated the noble men, and perswaded the Magistrates of Cities and Townes, and so gently and familiarly vsed himselfe to the common people, that he not onely appeased theyr furie and malice, which they had conceyued against king Henry, for the death & destruction of king Richard, but also he brought them to an vniforme obeysance, receiuyng of them othes of obedience, which done, he returned againe into England with great thankes.

When king Charles of Fraunce perceyued that his purpose and attempt came to no good conclusion in Acquitain, and that king Richard beyng dead, his enterprice into England would be to no purpose, he determined with him selfe howe to haue the Ladie Isabell his daughter, which was espoused to king Richard, to be restored home to him againe: And for that purpose he sent a solempne Ambassade into England to king Henry, which gently receyued them, and gaue aunswere that he would shortly send his Commissioners to Calice, which should further common and conclude with them, not onelye vpon that request, but also of dyuerse other matters of great importance.

And shortly after their departyng, he sent Edward Duke of Yorke before called Duke of Aumerle, which succeded in the sayde Duchie his father Edmond Duke of Yorke, a little before deceassed, and Henry Erle of Northumberlande into the Countie of Guysnes, and there they mette with the Frenche Commissioners, who assembled together dyuerse tymes and in dyuerse places.

The Duke of Burbon aboue all thinges, requyred in the name of the French king his maister, to haue Queene Isabell to him deliuered: But the English men denyed that, and required to haue her to be maryed to Henrie Prince of Wales, a man both in blood and age to her in all thinges equall: But the French king vtterly refused that maryage, saiyng that he would neuer ioyne affinitie againe with the Englishe Nation, because that the allyaunce had such infortunate successe.

Then they beganne to entreate a continuall peace, which request the French men refused, and in conclusion they agreed that the truce which was taken betweene them and king Richard for the terme of .xxx. yeres, was renued and confirmed: But some write that a new league was then concluded to continue the liues of both the Princes, which should appere to be true. For the king of England sent shortly after the aforesayd Ladie Isabell (vnder the conduct of the Lorde Thomas Percey Erle of Worcester, beyng associate with many noble and honourable personages, aswell women, as men, hauyng wyth her all the Jewelles, Ornamentes, and Plate, with a great surplusage geuen to her by the king, which she brought into Englād) in solemne estate vnto Calice, and there shee was deliuered to Waleran Erle of saint Paule Lieutenant for the French king in Picardie, and so conueied to her father, which gaue her in maryage to Charles, sonne to Lewes Duke of Orliaunce. The French men often tymes requyred king Henry to assigne vnto her a dower, but all was in vaine, for the Englishemen aunswered, that the the matrimony was neuer consummate, by reason wherof, she was not dowable by the very treaty of the mariage concluded, and so this matter cessed and was no more moued.

Owen Glendor rebelleth.

Nowe as the olde prouerbe sayth, after winde commeth raine, and after one euill commonly ensueth another: So during this tyme that king Henry was vexed and vnquieted, both within the Realme and without, Owen Glendor a squier of Wales, perceyuyng the realme to be vnquieted, and the king not very well setled in his kingdome, purposed to take vpon him the principalitie of Wales, and the name & preheminence of the same: and what with faire flatteryng wordes, and large promises, he inuegled and allured an vndiscrete number of Welshe men, who tooke him for theyr Prince, and made to him an othe of allegeance and subiection. And beyng thus aduaunced and supported, he made sharpe and cruell warre vpon Reignold Lorde Gray of Ruthen, and tooke him prisoner, promisyng him libertie, and that he would discharge his raunsome if he would take his daughter in mariage, thinkyng by that affinitie to haue great ayde, and to be of a great power in Wales. The Lord Gray beyng not very riche, neyther of substaunce nor of friendes, considering this offer to be the onely way of his relefe and deliueraunce, assented to his pleasure, and maryed the Damosell: But this false father in lawe kept him with his wife still in prison vntill he dyed: And not content with this heynous offence, he also made warre vpon the Lorde Edmond Mortimer, Erle of Marche, and in his awne Lordship of Wigmore, where in a conflict he slue many of the Erles men, and toke him prisoner, and fettered him in Cheynes, and cast him in a deepe and miserable Dungeon. The king was requyred to purchase his deliueraunce, by dyuerse of the Nobilitie, but he would not here on that syde, but rather desyred and wished all his linage in heauen, for then his title had beene out of all doubt & question.

Edmond Mortimer taken and imprisoned.

Owen Glendor glorifiyng in himself for these two victories, inuaded the Marches of Wales on the west syde of Seuerne, robbed Villages, brent townes, and slue the people, and beyng laden with praye and bloody hands returned againe into Wales, neuer ceassyng to doe mischiefe vntill the next yere that the king raysed a great armie and puyssaunce, to resist and defende his malicious attemptes, as after shall be declared.

Ciuile sedicion.

And in this first yere also this realme was not only troubled with Ciuile sedition, and the craftie practises of the Frenchmen, and great trouble of the Welshmen, but also of the Scottes with all their power armed themselues agaynst thys king Henry, the occasion whereof was, that George of Dunbare Erle of the Marches of the realme, made meanes vnto king Robert of Scotland that Dauid hys eldest sonne might marie the Erles daughter called Elizabeth, and delyuered for the same mariage into the kings handes a great some of money. When Archibald Erle Douglas heard of thys conclusion, he disdeyning the Erle of Marches blood to be aduaunced before hys stock, did eyther by fayre wordes or else by disbursing a greater some of money, so enuegle king Robert of Scotlande, that Dauid his heyre refusyng the first damosel, maried the Erle Douglas daughter: The Erle of March desyred restitution of his money, to whome the king gaue many trifelyng answers, the which he tooke in so euill parte, that he with his wyfe fled into Englande vnto Henry Erle of Northumberlande, entending to be reuenged ged vpon the king of Scotlande, and with the helpe of the borderers, brent dyuers townes, and slue many persons within the realme of Scotland.

King Robert beyng hereof aduertised, first depriued the Erle George of all his dignities and possessions, and caused his goodes to be confiscate, and then wrote to the king of England earnestly beseeching him, if he would haue the truce any lenger to continue, eyther to delyuer into his possession the Erle of March, and other Traytors and rebels to his person and realme or else to banish and exile them out of his realme and dominions. King Henry aunswered discretely the Herault of Scotland, that the worde of a prince ought to be kept, and hys writyng and seale ought to be inuiolate: And consydering that he had graunted a saufe conduyt vnto the Erle and hys company, he would neyther without cause reasonable breake his promise, nor yet deface his honour, which aunswere beyng declared to the king of Scottes, he incontinent did proclayme open warre against the king of England, with bloud, fyre and sworde.

War proclaymed by the Scottes agaynst England.

King Henry forthwith gathering together a great puyssance & army, entered into Scotland brennyng and spoyling townes, Villages and Castels, sparyng nothing but Religious houses and Churches, and brent a great parte of the townes of Edenborough and Lyth, and besieged the Castell of Maydens in Endenborough in the ende of September, whereof was Captain Dauid Duke of Rothsay, and Prince of the realme, and Archibald Erle Douglas wyth many hardy men. Robert Duke of Albany beyng appoynted Gouernour of the Realme, because the king was sick and vnapt to rule, sent vnto king Henry an Herauld, assuryng hym on hys honour that if he would abyde and tary hys commyng, which should be wythin fiue dayes at the most, he would geue hym battayle, and remoue the siege, or else die for it.

The king being glad of these newes, rewarded the Herault with a Gowne of silke, and a chayne of Golde, promising him in the worde of a Prince, not to depart thence, but to abide there the comming of the Gouernour. The first daye passed, ye fiue and fiftene to, the Gouernour neyther appered nor sent worde, the Wynter waxed colde, victuall fayled, men dyed of the Flure, and it rayned euery day so abundauntly, that hunger and colde caused the king to breake vp hys siege, and to depart out of Scotland without battayle or skirmishe offered: duryng which time both the Wardeynes of the Marches beyng with the king, the Scottes made a roade into Northumberland, and burned diuerse townes in Bamborough shyre, and shortly returned againe, or else they had bene trapped and come to late home.

When the king of Englande had dismyssed his souldyours and discharged his armie, the Scottes entendyng to be reuenged of their great dammages to them by the English nation done & committed by the Erle Douglas, appoynted two Armies to inuade Englande. Of the first was Chiefetaine syr Thomas Halibarton of Dirlton, and Patrike Hebborne of Hales, which made a road into England, and returned with little losse and no great gayne. After this the aforesayde Sir Patrike Hebborne, encouraged with the prosperous successe of his first iourney, with a great armie of the people of Lowdian, inuaded Northumberland, robbyng and spoyling of the countrie, and departed homeward, not without great gayne of beastes and captiues: But by the waye he was encountered with the Erle of Northumberlands Vice Wardeyn, and other gentlemen of the borders, at a towne in Northumberlande called Nesbit, and there the Englishmen sore assayled, and the Scottes valiauntly resisted, but after a long fight the victorie fell on the Englishe part, and as John Maior the Scot writeth, there were slaine the flowre of all Lowdian, and specially syr Patrike Hebburne with many of hys lynage. There were apprehended Syr John, and Wylliam Corkborne, syr Robert of Bas, John and Thomas Hablincton Esquiers, and a great number of the common people. The Erle Douglas beyng sore greued with the losse of his Nation and friendes, and entending to requite the same if it were possible, did by the consent of the gouernour of Scotland gather together an armie of twentie thousand talle men and mo. In the which armie the Lorde Mordack Erle of Fiffe, sonne to the Gouernour of Scotlande, the Erle of Angus, and many other Erles and Barons of the Nobitie of Scotland. These valyaunt Captaines and courageous Souldyours entered into Northumberland, with baners displayed lyke men that thought themselues hable to spoyle the whole Countrie of Northumberland. Now when they were entred into Englande, thinking no puyssaunce hable to encounter with their force, sodainely there issued out of a Valey beside a towne called Homelden, the Lorde Henry Percy, whom the Scottes for his haut and valyaunt courage, called Sir Henry Hotspurre, and in his companie the Lorde George of Dunbarre Erle of Marche before banished Scotlande, as you haue heard, with all the Gentlemen of Northumberlande, and eyght thousand men on horsback and on foote: The encounter was sharpe, the fight was daungerous and doubtfull, but in the ende the victorie chaunced to the Englishe nation, and there were slaine of the Scottes of men of great renoune and estimation, Sir John Swynton, Sir Adam Gordon, Sir John Lewyston, Sir Alexander Ramsey of Dalehouse, and. xxiij. knightes mo, beside ten thousand of the common people. And there were taken prisoners, Mordack Erle of Fiffe, Archibald Erle Douglas, Thomas Erle of Murrey, Robert Erle of Angus, and as some writers affirme, the Erle of Athell, and Menteth with fiue hundreth other.

The Scots are discomfited.

Sir Henry Hotspurre.

The Scots agayne ouerthrowne.

When the Lorde Percy had obteyned this great victorie, he sent his prisoners into dyuers Fortresses, and determyned to subdue or destroy all the Countries of Lowdian and Marche, whose heades and Gouernours eyther he had slaine, or by force taken Captiues. And so with a great power entered into Tiuedale, wastyng and destroyeng the whole Countrie, and there besieged the Castell of Corlaues, whereof was Captaine Sir John Grenelow, who seyng that his Castell was not long hable to be defended, fell to composition with the Englishmen, that if the Castell were not succored within three Moneths, that then he would delyuer it into the Englishmens handes.

Tiuedale.

The Captaine thereof wrote vnto the Gouernour, which callyng a great counsayle, the most parte aduised hym rather frankly and freely to yeelde the Castell, then to put in ieopardie the remnaunt of the Nobilitie of Scotlande: So muche was their courages abated and cooled wyth the remembraunce of the last conflict and battayle: But the Gouernour rebuking their feynt and cowardly hearts, sware that if no man would follow of the Nobilitie, he would doe his deuoyre to reskew the Castell at that daye.

But

But this othe was neyther kept nor broken, for he little preparing and leſſe entendyng the othe which he ſolemply made, neuer ſet foote forward duryng the firſt two Moneths, for the reyſing of the ſiege, or reſcuyng of the Caſtell. But the Engliſhmen being ſent for to go with the king into Wales, rayſed their ſiege and departed, leauyng the noble men priſoners ſtill with the Erle of Northumberland, and the Lorde Percy his ſonne, which by the king were commaunded to keepe them to his vſe, and not to delyuer them without his aſſent.

The king maketh proviſion to enter into Wales.

The king now purpoſing his iourney and enterpriſe into Wales, made great prouiſion both for men, munition and artillery meete for ſuche a buſineſſe, whereof the Frenche king beyng aduertiſed, ſent priuily the Lorde James of Burbone Erle of Marche, & his two brethen, John and Lewes with .xij. hundred knightes and Eſquiers, to ayde Owen Glendor againſt king Henry, and the ſayde James of Burbone with his companye tooke ſhipping wyth .xxx. ſayle at the mouth of Seyn, and the winde not beyng fauourable to his purpoſe, could not approche to the coaſt of Wales, but came before the towne of Plymmouth in Deuonſhire, and there leauing his great ſhippes lyeng at Anker, in the night tooke lande, and brent, ſpoyled and deſtroyed dyuers ſmall Villages and poore cottages, and robbed fiue or ſixe little Crayers and fiſher boates laden with Fiſhe and corne. But while he and his companye lyke greedy Wolues were ſeeking after their praye, the winde aroſe high, and a great tempeſtuous rage and furious ſtorme ſodainly fluſhed and drowned .xij. of his great ſhippes, which laye in the mouth of the hauen for his ſafegarde and defenſe. Whereof when the Erle was aduertiſed, and perceauing by the fyring of the Beacons that the people beganne to aſſemble in plumpes to encounter with him, and alſo ſeyng his power ſore diminiſhed, as well by the ſlaughter of ſuche as raunged abroade in hope of ſpoyle and praye, as by the furious rage of the vnmercifull ſea, and hydeous tempeſt, with much paine and great labour tooke his ſhippes againe, and was not without great ieopardie of his lyfe driuen on the Coaſt of Britayn, and landed at Saint Malos. The French king perceauyng that this iourney had euill ſucceſſe, appointed one of his Marſhalles called Memorancy, and the Maſter of his Croſbowes, with .xij. thouſande men to ſayle into Wales, which tooke ſhipping at Breſt, and had the winde to them ſo proſperous that they landed at Milford Hauen, and leauing the Caſtell of Pembrooke vnaſſaulted, becauſe it was well fortefyed, manned and victualled, beſieged the towne of Herford Weſt, which was ſo well defended by the Erle of Arondell and his power that they much more loſt then gayned. And from thence they departed towarde Owen Glendor, whome they named Prince of Wales, and founde him at the towne of Denbigh abyding their comming with ten thouſand men. They were of him louingly receaued and gently enterteyned: And when all thinges were prepared, they paſſed by Glamorgan ſhire toward Worceſter, and there brent the Suburbes: But hering of the kings approchyng, they ſodainely returned into Wales. The king with a great puyſſaunce folowed and found them enbattailed on a high Mountayne, and a great valey betweene both the armies, ſo that eche army playnely perceaued other, and euery hoſte looked to be aſſaulted of hys aduerſary, and of the grounde to take the moſt aduauntage: Thus they contynued nued eyght dayes together from morning to night readie to abide, but not to geue battayle. There were many fierce ſkirmiſhes, and many proper feates of armes daylie done, which the French Chronicles more then the Engliſhe can reporte. For there were ſlayne the Lorde Patrioles of Tries, brother to the Marſhall of Fraunce, the Lorde Mattelone, and the Lorde Vale, and the Baſtard of Burbone with fiue hundreth gentlemen.

Skirmiſhes with the French.

The Frenchmen and Welſhmen were ſore troubled and afflicted with famine, that their hartes and courages were ſore abated, for the king had ſo ſtopped the paſſages, that neyther victuall nor ſuccour could by any waye be conueyed vnto them: wherefore of very neceſſitie they were compelled eyther to fight or flee, and ſo by the aduiſement and counſayle of the Marſhall of Fraunce, which put not to much confidence in the wauering Welſhmen, the whole hoſt departed the eyght day, in the ſecreteſt maner that they could deuyſe. The Frenchmen with little rewardes and ſmall gayne returned into Britayn, making ſmall boaſt of their painefull iourney.

When the king perceaued them thus departed, he followed them and chaced them from hill to dale, and from one place to another, but all in vaine, and perceyuing then the time of the yere to be paſſed, and ſeyng that as then he could doe no good, he returned agayne to Worceſter, and there diſperſed his armie, and returned agayne to London.

While the king was occupyed in Wales, as afore ſayde, certeine lewde and ſedicious perſons had blaſed abroade & noyſed that king Richard (which openly was ſeene deade) was yet liuyng, and deſyred ayde of the common people, to repoſſeſſe his realme and royal dignitie: And for the better blaſing of this falſe rumor abroade, they ſet vp vpon poſtes, and caſt about the ſtretes, ſundrie moſt ſlaunderous and ſedicious billes and rymes, againſt king Henrie, and his proceedyngs. The king beyng not a little offended with theſe malicious doynges, cauſed diligent ſearche to be made for the authors thereof, and amongeſt other, there was found out, Sir Roger Claringdon knight, and. viij. gray Friers, which accordyng to their deſertes were put to execution at Tyborne.

While theſe thinges were thus in doyng in England, Waleram Erle of Saint Paule, which had maryed the halfe ſiſter of king Richard, hauyng a deadly hatred to king Henrie, aſſembled a great armie, wherein (as ſayth maiſter Hall) were. xvj. thouſand men, and a great number of the ſame were Noble men, and after he toke ſhippyng at Harflet, and landed in the Iſle of

This yere appered a Comete or blasing starre of a great and huge quantitie, which some expounded to signifye great effusion of mans blood, and the same proued true, as after ye shal here. For Henry Erle of Northumberland, and Thomas Erle of Worcester his brother, and his sonne Lorde Henrye Percye, called Hottespurre, which were to king Henrie in the beginning of his reigne both friendes and ayders, perceyuing now that the king had pacifyed all ciuile sedition, and repressed his enemies, & had brought his realme to a conuenient quietnesse, they began nowe somewhat to enuy his glorye, and grudged at his wealth and felicitie: And specially grieued, because the king demaunded of the Erle and his sonne, such Scottishe prisoners as they had taken at the Conflictes fought at Homeldon and Nesbit, as you before haue heard. For of all the Captiues which were then taken, there was deliuered to the kinges possession, onely Mordake Erle of Fiffe, sonne to the Duke of Albany, Gouernour of Scotland: For the king diuerse and sundry tymes requyred them of the Erle and his sonne, but the Percyes affyrming them to be theyr awne proper prysoners, and theyr peculiar prayes, did vtterly denie to deliuer them, insomuch, that the king openly sayd, that if they would not deliuer them, he would take them without deliueraunce. Wherewith they beyng sore discontent, by the counsaile of Lorde Thomas Percy Erle of Worcester, whose studie was euer to procure malice, and to set all thinges in broyle and vncerteintie, fayning a cause to proue and tempt the king, came to him to Windsore, requyring him by raunsome or otherwise, to cause to be deliuered out of prison, Edmond Mortimer Erle of March their Cossyn Germaine, whome (as they reported) Owen Glendor kept in fylthie prison, chaked with Irons, onely for that he tooke the kinges part, and was to him faythfull and true. The king began not a little to muse on this request, and not without cause, for in dede it touched him as nere as his shirt, for that he was so neere of the blood of king Richard, and had good cause to make clayme to the Crowne. For this Edmond was sonne to Erle Roger, which was sonne to Ladie Philip, daughter to Lionell Duke of Clarence, the

the third ſonne to king Edward the third, which Edmond at king Richardes goyng into Ireland was proclaymed heyre apparant to the Crowne of the realme, whoſe Aunt called Elianor this Lord Percey had maryed. And therfore the king little forced although that lynage were clerely ſubuerted, and vtterly extinct.

When the king had well aduiſed vpon and conſidered thys matter, hee made aunſwere and ſayde, that the Erle of Marche was not taken priſoner neyther for his cauſe, nor in his ſeruice, but willyngly ſuffered himſelfe to be taken, the which fraude the king cauſed to be openly publiſhed, and thys anſwere pleaſed nothing the Erle of Worceſter, but put him in a great Choler and chafe, and departed in a great rage and fume, inſomuch ꝑ ſyr Henry Hotſpurre ſayde afterwardes openly: Beholde the heyre of the realme is robbed of his right, and the robber with hys awne will not redeeme him. And nowe the Percies diſpoſed and bent themſelues in all that they myght vtterly to depoſe king Henry, and to reſtore theyr Coſſyn Edmond Erle of Marche vnto the Crowne and Diademe of the realme, whome they ſhortly after not onely deliuered out of the Captiuitie of Owen Glendor, but alſo entred into a league and amitie with the ſayde Owen agaynſt king Henrie and all his friendes, to the great diſpleaſure and long vnquietyng of kyng Henry and his partakers.

And here ſayth Hall, that the aforeſayd Owen Glendor, and the Erle of Marche, and the Percyes were greatly abuſed and deceyued by a Welſhe Prophecier, who made them to beleue, that king Henrye was the Moldewarpe curſſed of Gods awne mouth, and that they three were the Dragon, the Lyon, and the Wolfe, which ſhould deuide this realme betwene them by the prophecie of Mawmet Marlyn: But in the ende all turned to their confuſion and deſtruction, and ſpecially of Owen Glendor, and the Lord Percey: For the Erle of March was euer kept in the Court, vnder ſuch a keper, that he could neyther do, nor attempt any thing agaynſt the king, without his knowledge, and dyed without iſſue, leauyng his right title and intereſt to Anne his ſiſter and heyre, maryed to Richard Erle of Cambridge father to the Duke of Yorke, whoſe offſpring in continuance of tyme obteyned the game, and gat the garland.

Edmonde Mortimer Erle of March dyed without iſſue

King Henrye nowe knowyng of this Confederacie, and nothing leſſe mindyng then that which hapned after, gathered a great armie to go againe into Wales, whereof the Erle of Northumberland and his ſonne were aduertiſed by Lord Thomas Erle of Worceſter, and with all the diligence that they could, rayſed all the power that they could make, and ſent to the Scots which before were taken priſoners for ayde of men, and promiſyng the Erle Douglas the towne of Barwike, and a parte of Northumberland, and to other Scottiſhe Lordes great Lordſhips and Seigniories, if they obteyned the vpper hand and ſuperioritie. The Scottes allured with deſyre of gaine, and for no malice that they bare to king Henry, but yet ſomewhat deſirous to be reuenged of theyr olde griefes, came to the Erle with a great companie: And to make their cauſe to ſeeme good and iuſt, they deuyſed certeyne Articles by the aduyſe of Richarde Scrope Archebiſhoppe of Yorke, brother to the Lord Scrope, whome king Henry cauſed to be behedded at Briſtow, as you haue heard before: which Articles they ſhewed to dyuerſe noble men and Prelates of the realme, which fauouring and consentyng to the purpose, promised them ayde, not onely by wordes, but also by writyng. Howbeit, whether it were for feare, eyther for that they would be lookers on, and no deede doers, neyther promise by worde nor by writyng was performed: For at the day of conflict, all the confederates absented them selues, and left the Erle of Stafford alone, which beyng of a haute courage and hie stomacke kept his promise, and ioyned with the Percies to his destruction.

The Lord Percey, with the Erle Douglas, & other the Erles of Scotland, with a great armie departed out of the North partes, leauyng hys father sicke (which promised vpon his amendment and recouerie, without delay to followe) and came to Stafford, where his Uncle the Erle of Worcester and he met, and there began to consult vpon their great affayres, and there also they exhorted theyr Souldiours to spare no trauaile for the libertie of theyr Countrie, protestyng openly that they made warre onely to restore the noble realme of England to his accustomed glory and freedome, which was gouerned by a tyraunt, and not by his lawful and right king. The Capteynes sware, and the Souldiours promised to fight, yea and to dye for the libertie of their Countrie.

When all thinges were prepared, they set forward towarde Wales, lokyng euery houre for new ayde and succours. The king heryng of the Erles approchyng, thought it pollecy to encounter with them before that the Welsh men should ioyne with their armie, and therefore returned sodeinlye to the towne of Shrewesburie. He was scantly entred into the towne, but he was by hys Postes aduertised that the Erles with Baners displayed, and battails raunged, were comming towarde him, and were so hote and courageous, that they with light horses began to skirmish with his hoste. The king perceiuyng theyr doynges, issued out and encamped himselfe without the East gate of the towne. The Erles nothing abashed, although their succors them decepued, embattayled themselues not farre from the kinges armie. And the same night they sent the Articles, whereof is mencion made before, by Thomas Rayton, and Thomas Saluayn Esquiers, to the king, the true Copye whereof, as sayth Hall, doth followe.

Articles propaned by the Percies agaynst king Henry.

1 We Henry Percie Erle of Northumberlande, high Constable of England, and Warden of the west Marches of the same toward Scotland, Henry Percie oure eldest sonne Wardeyn of the East Marches of Englande towarde Scotland, and Thomas Percie Erle of Worcester beyng Proctours and protectours of the common weale, before our Lorde Jesus Christ oure supreme iudge, doe allege, say, and entend to proue with our handes personally this daye, agaynst thee Henry Duke of Lancaster, thy complices and fauourers, vniustly presuming, and named king of Englande, without title of right, but onely of thy guyle and by force of thy helpers: That when thou after thine exile diddest enter into Englande, thou madest an othe to vs vpon the holy Gospelles, bodely touched and kyssed by thee at Dankaster, that thou wouldest neuer claime the crowne, kingdome, nor state royall, but only thine owne proper inheritaunce, and the inheritaunce of thy wyfe in Englande, and that Richarde our souereigne Lorde and king and thine, should reigne during the time of his lyfe, gouerned by the good counsayle of the Lordes Spirituall and Temporall. Thou hast imprisoned the same thy souereigne uereigne Lorde, and our king within the tower of London, vntill he had for feare of death resigned his kingdomes of Englande and Fraunce, and had renounced all his right, in the aforesayde kingdomes, and other his dominions and landes of beyond the sea. Under colour of which resignation and renunciation by the counsayle of thy friends and complices, and by the open noysing of the raskall people, by thee and thine adherents assembled at Westminster, thou hast crowned thy selfe of the realmes aforesayde, and hast seazed and entered into all the Castels and Lordships perteyning to the kings crowne, contrarie to thine othe, wherfore thou art forsworne & false.

2 Also we doe allege, saye and entend to proove, that where thou sworest vpon the same Gospels in the same place and time to vs, that thou wouldest not suffer any dismes to be leuyed of the clergie, nor fiftenes on the people, nor any other tallages nor tares to be leuyed in the realme of Englande, to the behofe of the realme during thy lyfe, but by the consideration of the three estates of the realme, except for great neede in causes of importaunce or for the resistaunce of our enemies, onely, and none otherwise. Thou contrary to thine othe so made, hast done to be leuied right many dismes and fiftenes and other impositions and tallages, as well of the Clergie, as of the commonaltie of the realme of England, and of the Marchaunts, for feare of thy Maiestie royall, wherefore thou art periured and false.

3 Also we doe allege, saye and entend to proue, that where thou sworest to vs vpon the same Gospels in the aforesayde place and time, that oure souereigne Lorde and thine, king Richard should reigne during the terme of his lyfe in his royall prerogatiue and dignitie: Thou hast caused the same oure sourereigne Lorde and thine, traytorously wythin the Castell of Pomffret, without the consent or iudgement of the Lordes of the Realme, by the space of.xv.dayes, and so many nightes (which is horrible among christian people to be heard) with hunger, thirst and colde to perishe, to be murdered, wherfore thou art periured and false.

4 Also we doe allege, saye and entende to proove, that thou at that tyme when our souereigne Lord and thine, king Richard was so by that horrible murder dead as abouesayde, thou by extorte power diddest vsurpe, and take the kingdome of Englande, and the name, and the honour of the kingdome of Fraunce vniustly and wrongfully, contrary to thine othe from Edmonde Mortymer Erle of Marche, and of Vlster, then nerte and direct heyre of Englande and of Fraunce, immediately by due course of inheritaunce after the decealle of the aforesayde Richarde, wherefore thou art periured & falle.

5 Also we doe allege, saye and entend to proue, as aforesayde, that where thou madest an othe in the same place and time to support and maintayne the lawes and good customes of the realme of Englande: And also afterward at the time of thy coronation, thou madest an othe, the sayd lawes and good customes to keepe, and conserue inuiolate. Thou fraudulently and contrarie to the lawe of England and thy fautours, haue written almost thorough euery shyre in Englande to chose such knightes for to holde a parliament, as shall be for thy pleasure and purpose, so that in thy parliamentes no iustice should be ministred against thy minde in these our complaynts now moued & shewed by vs, whereby at any time we might haue perfite redresse: Notwithstanding that we according to our conscience (as we trust ruled by God)

haue oftentimes thereof complayned, as well can teſtifie and beare witneſſe the right reuerend fathers in God, Thomas Arondell Archbiſhop of Cauntorbury, and Richard Scrope Archebiſhop of Yorke: wherefore nowe by force and ſtrength of hand before our Lorde Jeſu Chriſt, we muſt aſke our remedy and helpe.

6 Alſo we doe allege, ſaye and entende to prooue, that where Edmonde Mortimer Erle of Marche & Ulſter, was taken priſoner by Owen Glendor, in a pitched and foughten fielde, and caſt into priſon, and laden with yron fetters for thy matter and cauſe, whom falſely thou haſt proclayned willingly to yeelde himſelfe priſoner to the ſayd Owen Glendor, and neyther wouldeſt delyuer him thy ſelfe, nor yet ſuffer vs his kinſmen to raunſome and delyuer him: yet notwithſtanding, we haue not onely concluded and agreed with the ſame Owen for his raunſome at our proper charges and expenſes, but alſo for a peace betweene thee, and the ſayde Owen. Why haſt thou then not onely publiſhed and declared vs as traytors, but alſo craftely and deceitfullye imagined, purpoſed and conſpired the vtter deſtruction and confuſion of our perſons? For the which cauſe we defie thee, thy ayders and helpers as common Traitors and deſtroyers of the realme, and the Inuadours, oppreſſours and confounders of the very true and right heyres to the crowne of Englande, which thing we entende with our handes to proue thys daye, almightie God helping vs.

The kinges aunſwere to the Lordes articles.

When king Henry had read their articles and defiaunce, he aunſwered the Eſquiers, that he was readie with dent of ſworde and fierce battayle, to proue their quarell falſe and feyned, and not with worpting and ſlaunderous bylles, and ſo in his righteous cauſe and iuſt quarel, he doubted not but God would both ayde and aſſiſt him agaynſt vntrue perſons, and falſe forſworne traytors, with which aunſwere the meſſengers departed.

The next daye in the morning early, which was the Euen of Marye Magdalen, the king perceaued that the battayle was neerer then he eyther thought or loked for, therefore leaſt long taryeng might miniſh or hinder his ſtrength, he did with all ſpeede ſet his battayles in good order: and lykewiſe did his enimies, which both in puiſſaunce and courage was nothing to hym inferior. Then ſodainely the Trumpets blewe, and forthwith the battayles ioyned. The Scottes which had the forward on the Lordes ſyde, entending to be reuenged of their olde diſpleaſures, done to them by the Engliſhe nation, ſet fiercely on the kings forewarde, that they made them draw back, and had almoſt put them out of their araye. The Welſhmen alſo, which ſith the kings departure out of Wales, had lurcked and lyen in woodes and Mountaynes, hearyng of thys battayle toward, came to the ayde of the Erles, and refreſhed the werie people with newe ſuccours. When a fearefull meſſenger had declared to the king that his people were beaten downe on euerye ſyde, it was no need to bidde him ſturre, for ſodainely he approched with his freſhe battayle, and comforted, hartened and encouraged his parte ſo, that they toke their hartes to them, and manfully fought with their enimies. The Prince that daye holpe much his father, for although he were that daye ſore woumded in the face with an arrow, yet he neuer ceaſſed either to fight wher the battayle was moſt ſtrongeſt, or to encourage them who ſeemed to him to faynt. Thys ſore and fierce battayle continued three long houres with indifferent fortune on both parts: but at the last the king cryeng victory, brake the array, and entered into the battayle of his enemies, and fought fiercely, and entered so farre into the battayle, that the Lorde Douglas strake hun downe, and slue Syr Walter Blunt, and three other apparelled in the kings sute and clothing, sayeng: I marueil to see so many kings to arise so sodainely agayne, but sone after the king was reysed agayne, and that daye he did many a Noble feate of armes. For the Scottes write, and Frenche men also, though the Englishmen keepe sylence, that he himselfe slue with his awne handes that daye. xxxvj. of his enimies, and the other of his parte encouraged by his doings fought valyauntly, and slue the Lorde Percy called Sir Henry Hotspurre, the best Captaine on the parte aduerse, and when his death was knowne, they fled and happie was he that was formost. And in that flight the Erle Douglas fallyng from the cragge of a Mountayne brake one of his stones, and so was taken, and for his valyauntnesse was of the king freely and frankely deliuered. There was taken also Sir Thomas Percy Erle of Worcester and dyuers other. On the kings parte were slaine Sir Walter Blont, and.xvj. hundreth other persons: But on the parte of the rebels were slayne the Erle of Stafford, the Lorde Percy, and aboue. v. thousand other, and as for the Scottes fewe or none escaped alyue.

Sir Henry Hotspurre is slaine.

After this great victory by the king obteined, he first rendred his humble and harty thanks to God almightie, & caused the Erle of Worcester the next morow after to be drawne hanged and quartered in the towne of Shrewsbury, and his head to be sent to London, and there set vpon a pole vpon London bridge, and the same time also were many moe Captaynes executed in the sayde place. And this being done, the king lyke a valyaunt Conquerour returned to London with great pompe, where he was by the Magistrates of the Citie most solemply receaued, and ioyfully welcommed. But here a little to returne, before his departure from Shrewesburie he not forgetting his enterprise agaynst Owen Glendor, sent into Wales with a great armie Prince Henry his eldest sonne agaynst the sayde Owen, and hys sedicious complices, which being dismayed and in a manner desperate of all comfort, by the reason of the kings late victorie, fled into desert places and solitarie Caues, where he receyued a small rewarde, meete and prepared by Gods prouydence for such a rebell and sedicious seducer. For being destitute of all comfort, and dreading to shewe his face to any creature, lacking meate to sustaine nature, for pure hunger and lack of foode, miserably ended his wretched lyfe. Nowe after that the death of Owen was knowne to the Prince, and that the Prince with little labour, and lesse losse had tamed and brideled the furious rage of the wylde Welshmen, and had left Gouernours to rule and gouerne the countrie, he returned to his father with great honor and no small prayse.

Owen Glendor being forsaken of all people, dyed by hunger and famine.

The Erle of Northumberland heeryng of the ouerthrowe of hys brother and sonne, came of his awne free will to the kyng, excusyng himselfe as one neyther partie nor knowyng of theyr doyng nor enterprise: The king neyther accused him, nor helde him excused, but dissembled the matter for two causes, one was, he had Warwike in his possession, which the king rather desyred to haue by pollicy, then by force: The other was, that the Erle had his Castelles of Alnewyke, Warkworth, and other, fortefyed with Scottes, so that if the Erle were apprehended, all Northumberlande were in ieopardye to become Scottishe: For these causes the king gaue him fayre wordes, and let him depart home, where he continued in peace a while, but after rebelled as ye shall here.

The buylding of the Conduit in Cornehill.

And in this tyme, at the charges of the Citie of London, where before there was a certeine prison in Cornehill called the Tome, they nowe buylded in the same place a fayre Conduyt, which at this day is called the Conduyt in Cornehyll.

Walerain Erle of saint Paule once againe assayleth king Henry the fourth.

This yere Walleram Erle of Saint Paule, considering that he had defyed king Henrye, and also that he had made dyuerse voyages, and done little dammage to the Englishe Nation, but had susteyned much losse, and yet continuyng in hys olde malice agaynst the king of England, by the assent of the French king, assembled a great number of men of warre, as fiue hundred men of armes, fiue hundred Genowayes with Crosbowes, and a thousande Flemynges on foote, and layde siege to the Castell of Marke, three Leagues from Calice, within the territorie of the king of England, the. xxj. day of July, whereof was Capteine Sir Philip Hall, with. lxxx. Archers, and. xxiiij. other Souldiours. The Erle raysed agaynst the Castell dyuers engynes, but they preuayled not, for they within shotte so fiercely, and cast stones so incessantly, and defended the same so manfullye, that they preuayled not at that tyme. And the Erle perceiuyng that his enterprise had not such successe as he looked for, retyred with his men lodged in the towne, fortefiyng the same for feare of rescues that might issue from Calice. The next day he gaue a sore assault again, & with great force entered the vtter Court, of the Castell & toke therein a great number of horse, kyne and Cattaile, at the which assault sir Robert Barynguile, cosyn to the Erle, was slain. The same day an hundreth Archers on horsebacke came out of Calice, and perceiued the doynges and demeanour of the Erle and his companie, and toward night they sent an Herauld vnto him, certefiyng that they would dyne with him the nexte daye: To whome he proudly answered, that he would gladly receyue them, and theyr dinner agaynst theyr comming shoulde bee ready prepared.

The next day ensuyng issued out of Calice two hundreth men of armes, two hundreth Archers, three hundreth men on foote, with. x. or. xij. Chariots laden with victuall and Artillery, conducted by Sir Richard Alston knight, Lieutenant of the Englishe pale for the Erle of Somerset, Captaine generall of those Marches, which in good order of battaile marched toward their enemies, which before by their espialles were aduertised of their comming: But that notwithstandyng, they issued not out of their lodgynges to encounter with them, but kept themselues within their Closure.

The Englishe men shot so closely and so sharpely together, that the Flemynges and footemen began to flie: The men of Armes fearyng the slaughter of theyr horses, ran away with a light galoip: The Genowayes which had spent the most part of their shot at the assault, made little defence, and small resistance, and so were all slaine and put to flight. The hastie and rashe Erle of Saint Paule, and dyuerse other without stroke geuen to their enemies, fled to Saint Omers: And there were taken of the best of the armie, as sayth the Frenche and Duche Chronicles, .lx. or. lxxx. persons, amongest whome whome the Capteyn of Bulleyn was one, and many Lordes and knightes slaine. After that the Englishe men had taken all the Cartes, Munitions, and victualles that their enemyes had brought thether, they returned to Calice in great triumph: And within fiue dayes after, there issued out of the English pale about the number of fiue hundreth men, toward Arde by night tyme, thinkyng to haue found the towne vnprouided: But Sir Mansard de Boys, and the Lord Rygnie defended it, and disappointed the Englishe men, who with the losse of fortie men, returned to Calice: Which dead persons were brent in an olde house, because their enemies should be ignorant of the dammage that the Englishe men had by them susteyned.

The Erle of Saint Paule beyng at Turwyn, and yet imaginyng in some part, or by some way to be reuenged of the Englishe men, and to recouer some part of his losse, but more of his honour, sent for a great companie of Noble men, and valiaunt personages, and concluded to inuade the Marches of his enemyes. But the French king consideryng the Erles euill fortune, commaunded him to leaue off his enterprice, with the which he was sore displeased. Yet to aduoyde perilles, the French king layde in Garrison at Bulleyn and other places, the Marques of Pount, sonne to the Duke of Barre, and the Erle of Dampney, and Sir John Harpadane, a knight of great renowne and high estimation.

The king of England circumspectly fore seeyng thinges to come, and imaginyng that the Frenche men attempted some newe enterprice agaynst him, or his Dominions beyond the Sea, sent foure thousand men to Calice, and to the Sea, whereof three thousand landed at Scluse, which besieged a Castell standyng in the mouth of the Hauen, and made dyuerse assaultes, and lost diuerse of their companie: But newes were brought to them, that the Duke of Burgoyne had desyred lycence of the Frenche king to besiege the Towne of Calice, for which cause they raysed their siege, and went to the defence of Calice.

And this yere also sayth Reynulph, the Emperour of Constantinople, whose name, as some writers call him, was Robert, came into Englande, onely to see the Countrie, and maners of the people thereof.

Plimmoth is spoiled by the French men.

And this yere the Lorde of Castell in Britein landed within a myle of Plymmoth, with a great companie, and lodged in the towne all that day and night, and the next day spoyled and robbed the sayde towne, and carred away all that was therein, and returned againe into their Shippes.

Sone after this, Lewes Duke of Orleance, brother to the French king, a man of no lesse pride then of great courage, wrote his letters to king Hēry, aduertising him that he for the perfect loue which he bare to the noble feates of Chiualrie and Martiall actes, could inuent nothing more honourable nor laudable to them both, then to meete in the fielde, eche part with an hundred knightes and Esquiers, all beyng Gentlemen, both of name and armes, armed and weaponed at all poyntes, to fight and combate to the yeldyng, and euery person to whome God should send victorye, to haue his prisoner, and him to raunsome at his pleasure, offering himselfe & his companie to come to his City of Angulesme, so that the king of England would come to the lands and borders of Burdeaux, and there defende his chalenge.

was hautie and courageous, wrote to him againe, that he not a little mused and more maruayled, that the Duke beyng sworne aswell to him, as to king Richard, to mainteyn the peace betweene his brother the Frenche king, and them concluded, and to that had set his signe and great seale, would rowe for vaineglorie, and vnder the colour of doyng of deedes of Armes, not onely violate the peace, and breake the amitie betweene them before concluded, but also geue an occasiõ of displeasure and ingratitude, by the which in conclusion might rise mortall warre, and deadly enemitie: affirmyng farther, that no king annoynted, of very dutie was euer bound to answere any chalenge, but to his pere of egall estate, & equipolent dignitie. And that no Christian prince ought or should consent to warre or effusion of Christian blood, but onely for the defence of his realme, or for conquest of his right, or for the amplifying of Christes fayth, and Christian religion, and not for pride, worldly fame, and vaineglorie: And saiyng further, that when opportunitie of tyme, and conuenient leysure serued, he would transtrete and passe the sea himselfe, with such companie as he thought most conuenient, into his Countrie of Gascoyne, at which tyme the Duke might set forward with his band, for the atteynyng of honour, and accomplishyng of his couragious desyre, promisyng in the word of a Prince, that he would not thence depart, vntill the Duke eyther by fulfillyng his owne desyre, or by singuler Combate betwene them two, onely for the auoidyng of the effusion of Christian blood, should thinke himselfe satisfied and fully answered. Howbeit, at that time he beyng busied with weightie affayres, concernyng the publike weale of his realme, could neyther appoynt tyme nor place, protestyng that the deferryng of tyme was neither for disdeyne, nor yet for cowardnesse, but onely to abate the pride of him, which knowyng not himselfe, nor fearyng reproche, regarded not his othe, writyng, nor seale.

To this answere the Duke of Orliaunce replyed, and king Henry reioyned, the which doynges for the vnprincely tauntes conteyned in them, I thought meete to omit and passe them ouer.

The Duke of Orleaunce besiegeth Vergie in Guyan.

The Duke of Orleaunce not content with the king of England, assembled an army of fiue thousand men, and entered into Guyan, and besieged the Towne of Vergie, whereof was Capteyne Sir Robert Antelfielde a valyant knight, and an hardie Capteyne, hauyng with him onely three hundreth Englishe men. The Duke almost euery day assaulted the towne very fiercely, but they within the Towne couragiously defended the same. Insomuche that when they had lien there three monethes, and had lost many of his men, and gotten nothing, without honour or spoyle returned into Fraunce.

After this, the Admirall of Briteyn, which was greatly enflamed and encouraged, because the last yere he had entered the Hauen of Plymmoth, and robbed and spoyled the towne, and afterward had taken certayne ships with Wine. And he being now accompanied with the Lorde Castell a valyaunt Baron of Briteyn, and hauing .xxx. sayle of shippes well furnished with artillerie, munition, and victualles, and .xij. hundreth men of armes, sayled from Saint Malos, and came before the towne of Dartmouth, and would haue landed, but by the force of the townes men, and men of the countrie, they were repulsed and put back: In which conflict the Lord of Castell with his two brethren, with foure hundreth other were slayne, and aboue two hundreth prisoners taken and raunsomed, whereof the Lord of Baquenile high Marshall of Bretayn was one, which was brought to the king, and was afterward redeemed.

The Admirall being sory of thys infortunate enterprise, with much losse and no gayne returned hastely into his Countrey. King Henry being aduertised of this attempt, sent the Lorde Thomas his sonne, which after was Duke of Clarence, to the sea, with a great nauie of Shippes, to the entent that eyther with battayle or spoyling or destroyeng of the Sea costes, both of Bretayn and of Fraunce, he might reuenge this iniurie and inuasion. And he sayling by the sea costes landed diuers times, and brent townes and destroyed people without any pittie or mercie: And when he thought his quarell well reuenged, he sayled toward England, and in his returning he encountred with two great Caricks of Geane, laden with riche merchaundise, betwene whome was a great conflict, and a bloudy battayle: But after long fighting the Englishmen preuayled, and brought both the Carickes into Camber before Rye, where one of them by misaduenture of fyre perished, to the losse and no gayne of both the parties.

The Lorde Thomas Duke of Clarence.

About this time, John Duke of Burgoyn, which had long laboured, and nowe obteyned lycence to besiege the towne of Calice, preparyng Engynes, and all other Instruments necessarie for that purpose, assembled at Saint Omers fyre thousand men of armes, xv. hundred Crossowes, and xij. thousande footemen. And now when all things were in a readinesse, and the whole armie assembled, he was by the Frenche king and his counsayle (who had some mistrust in hym) countermaunded and forbidden any further to proceede in that enterprise: For the which cause he conceaued such an hatred and deadly malice against the Duke of Orleaunce (whome he thought was the onely let and stop of his glorie and renowne) that he euer after, not onely stomaked and grudged agaynst him, but in the ende (as you shall here) brought him to death and finall destruction.

John Duke of Burgoyn would haue besieged Calice, but he was forbidde by the french King.

And it so happened, that this yere one Wylliam Serle, whome some call John Serle, beyng one of the murderers at Calice of the Duke of Gloceſter, was taken lurking in the Marches of Scotlande, and drawen on an Herdle from that place vp to London, and committed to the Tower, and then brought to Westmynster, and there he was also charged that he had bruted abroad that king Richard was alyue, and for these thyngs was there arreigned, condemned, iudged, hanged, drawen, and quartered at Tyborne.

Wylliam Serle one of the murderers of the Duke of Gloceſter, taken and executed.

The Erle of Northumberland, of whome before is spoken, bearing no little hatred vnto King Henrie, for the death of his sonne Sir Henrie Hotspurre, and his brother the Erle of Worcester, as afore sayde, did daylie practise some meane to be reuenged therof, and now secretly he began to breake his minde to Richard Scrope Archebishop of Yorke, brother to Wylliam Lorde Scrope, high Treasorer of Englande, whome king Henry (as you haue heard) behedded at Bristow, & with Thomas Mowbray Erle Marshall, sonne to Thomas Duke of Norffolke, for king Henryes cause before banished the realme of England, and with the Lordes, Hastynges, Faucon-bridge, Bardolfe and dyuers other, which he knew to beare deadly hatred vnto king Henry. And after many meetings, and long consultations had, they finally did conclude and determine: that all they, their friends and Allies, wyth wyth all their power ſhould meete at Yorkeſwolde at a daye appointed, and that the Erle of Northumberland ſhould be Chiefetayne of the armie, who promiſed to bring with him a great number of Scottes.

The king hath knowledge of the conſpiracie.

Thys conſpiracie was not ſo ſecretly kept, nor ſo cloſely couered, but that the king had knowledge thereof, and was fully informed of the ſame: wherefore to preuent the time of their aſſembly, he with ſuche power as he could ſodainely call together, marched with all ſpeede into the North partes, and was there with all his hoſte and power, before the Confederats heard any thing of his comming forward, and ſodaynely he cauſed to be apprehended the Archebiſhoppe, the Erle Marſhall, Syr John Lampley, and Sir Robert Plumpton. Theſe perſons were arreigned and atteinted of highe treaſon, and adiudged to die, and ſo on the Monday in the Whitſon weke, all they without the Citie of Yorke were beheaded.

The Archebiſhop of Cãterburye intreateth for the Archbiſhop of Yorke.

And here I finde written in an auncyent hiſtorie, that after the taking of the Archebiſhop of Yorke, that the Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, called Thomas Arondell came vnto the king and ſayd, Sir if the Biſhop of Yorke haue ſo greatly offended you as it is ſayd, yet I pray you conſider that I am your ghoſtly father, and the ſecond perſon in your realme, & that you ought not to hearken to anye mans woyce before me: wherefore I counſayle you reſerue the payne and puniſhment of the ſayde Biſhop to the Popes iudgement, and he will take ſuche order as ye ſhall be pleaſed. And if you will not ſo doe, yet let him be referred to the parliament, and keepe your handes vndefiled from his bloud. The king anſwered: I may not ſtaye him for the rumour of the people. Then the Archebiſhop called for a Notarie, to make an Inſtrument of the kings anſwere, that if neede were, it might be preſented to the Pope: But the king would not ſtay but cauſed execution, as aforeſaid.

Execution.

Beſide the perſons aforenamed, dyuers other of the ſayde conſpiracie, as the Lorde Haſtyngs, the Lorde Fauconbridge, Sir John Colule of the Dale, and Sir John Griffith were behedded at Durham.

The Erle of Northſiberland flieth into Scotland.

The Erle of Northumberland perceauing his counſayle to be reueled, and his confederates put to ſhamefull execution, fled into Scotland to hys olde friend George of Dunbarre Erle of Marche, which the yere before was reuoked out of exile, and reſtored to his poſſeſſions, name, and dignitie, where he taried vntill the nert Sommer, and then ſayled into Fraunce, and after into Flaunders, deſyring ayde and aſſiſtaunce agaynſt king Henry: But when he ſawe little hope of comfort, and that fewe hearkened to his requeſt, he accompanied with the Lorde Bardolph much diſmayed, and more deſperate, returned againe to his true friends into Scotland, and there made his abode the whole yere, abyding the fauour of fortune: During which tyme, the king without any difficultie tooke into his poſſeſſion the towne of Berwike, the Caſtels of Alnewike, and all other Fortreſſes apperteyning to the Erle. And lyeng at Berwike, he cauſed to be put to death the Barons ſonne of Greyſtock, Sir Henry Beynton, and John Blenkenſop, and fyue other, as offenders in this conſpiracie.

The Prince of Wales entreth with a power into Scotland.

Nowe when king Henry had thus appeaſed this late conſpiracy, he ſent his ſonne the prince of Wales, accompanied with Edward Duke of Yorke, and a great armie with him, to encounter with the Scottes, which by promiſe were bounde to ayde and aſſiſt the aforeſayde Conſpirators: But they hearyng hearyng that the founders of the warre were apprehended and put to death, made no haste forward, but taried peaceably at home. So that the Prince entring into Scotlande, and fynding no resistence, brent Townes, spoyled Villages, and wasted the Countrey euery where as he passed: which thing so much amased the king of Scots and his counsaile, ỹ notwithstanding that he had gathered & appoynted a great host vnder the Conductes of the Erles of Douglas, and Bowhan to resist the prince and his inuasions: yet they sent Ambassadors vnto him, requyring him of peace and finall concord: which request he vtterly denayed, but at their humble petition a truce for certaine Moneths was taken, of the which they were both glad and ioyous, and so the prince laden with pray & spoyle, returned with great gaine to his father.

Whyle the prince persecuted thus the country of Scotland on the land, Sir Robert Umfreuyle Vice Admirall of England vexed the Countries of Fife, and Loghdian on the Sea coast, for he lyeng in the Scottishe Sea .viij. dayes, and euery day landed on the one side or other and tooke prayes, spoyles and prisoners maugre the great powers of the Duke of Albany, and the Erle of Douglas: in so much that he brent and tooke the towne of Peples on their fayre day: and with great gaine returning to his shippes, brent the Galiot of Scotlande with many other Vessels, and sent cloth, victuall and dyuers marchaundizes to euery towne in Northumberlande, setting thereon no great price, wherfore the Scots called him Robin Mendmarket.

Robyn Mendmarket.

The king about this time was newly vexed and vnquieted, for notwithstanding the fortunate successe that he had obteyned in all his outwarde warres and inward affayres, yet some of his people bare vnto him such cancard heartes, that still they practised his destruction: For nowe was a newe rumour spread abroade that king Richard was alyue once agayne, and that he was in Scotland: To the which fable, suche credite was geuen, that if prudent pollicie had not foreseene the daunger thereof, it had kindled a greater flame then would haue bene eyther easely or quickly quenched.

This Sommer the plague of pestilence reigned so sore in the Citie of London, and in the countrie also rounde about the Citie, that the king durst not repayre thether. Wherefore he departing from the Castell of Ledes in Kent, determined to take shipping at Mynbordough, and to saile ouer to Lye in Esser, and so to Playsshy, there to passe hys time vntill the plague were ceased: And because certayne Pirates of Fraunce were lurcking at the Thames mouth wayting for their praye: Thomas Lorde Camoys with certaine shippes of warre was appoynted to waft ouer the kyng. When the kyng was on the Sea, and in the middest of his iourney, whether the winde turned, or that the Lorde Camoys kept not a direct courrse, or that his Ship was but a slugge. The French men, which by all similitude had knowledge of the kings passage, entered amongest the kings Naule, and tooke foure Vessels nere vnto the kings ship, and in one of them, Sir Thomas Rampston knight the kings Vice Chamberleyn, with all his Chamber stuffe and apparell, and followed the king so neere, that if his Ship had not beene swift, he had landed sooner in Fraunce, then in Esser. The king being sore moued with the Lorde Camoys, caused him to be attached and endited, that he condiscended and agreed with the French men, that the king in his iourney should be intercepted and taken. On this point he was arreigned the

In this yere king Henrye, not onely deſiryng newe affinitie with foreyn Princes, but alſo the preferment of his lyne and progenie, ſente the Ladie Philip his yonger daughter to Erick king of Denmarke, Norway, & Swethen, which was conueyed thether with great pompe, and there with muche tryumph was ſolemply maryed to the ſayde king, where ſhee taſted both of welth and wo, ioy and paine.

This yere Rocheſter Bridge was begon to be buylded of ſtone, and the ſame together with the Chapell ſtandyng at the ende of the ſame, was finiſhed by Sir Robert Knolles knight, who alſo newly reedefyed the bodie of the Church of the white Friers in Fleteſtrete in Lõdõn, & there was buried.

You heard before howe king Robert of Scotland, beyng very aged and impotent, was not able to gouerne and rule his realme, and howe Walter his brother, beyng by him created Duke of Albanie (which was the firſt Duke that euer was in Scotlande) was made Gouernour of his brothers Countrie and Dominion. After which office and preheminence by him obteyned, he ſo ſore thirſted after the Crowne and Scepter royall, that he rared little though the king his brother & his two ſonnes had beene at Chriſtes fote in heauen. And ſomewhat to further his purpoſe, it vnfortunately chaunced, that Dauy of Rothſay Prince of the realme, and eldeſt ſonne to the king was accuſed to his father of diuerſe and ſundry crimes, and eſpecially of wanton and diſſolute liuyng, as rauiſhyng of wyues, deflowryng of Virgines, and defilyng of maydens: Wherefore the king deliuered him to his brother the gouernour, truſtyng that by his good counſaile, and diſcrete aduertiſement, he would not onely amend his lyfe, but alſo ware graue, prudent, and wiſe. Nowe when the Duke had poſſeſſed part of his deſyred pray, he ſent his Nephewe from Caſtell to Caſtell, from priſon to priſon, from place to place, and in concluſion lodged him in a Towre within the Caſtell of Frankelande, where with famine he cauſed him miſerably to ende his lyfe, puttyng a poore woman to painefull death, which gaue to the Prince the milke of her breſtes by a Rede into the priſon. His death was long hidden from the king his father: But in concluſion the Gouernour ſhewed vnto the king, how diuerſe perſons trayterouſly had murdered him, which were apprehended and iudged to die, and yet in their lyues they neuer knewe nor ſawe him. The king notwithſtandyng his brothers excuſe, doubted much of the ende of his other ſonne named James, wherfore he priuily prouided a ſhip, in the which he put the childe, beyng then of the age of.xv. yeres, vnder the tuition of the Lord Henry Sainctclere, Erle of Orkeney, willyng him to conuey the prince into Fraunce, if by any poſſibilitie he could thether atteyne. And if fortune ſhould driue him vpon the coaſt of England, he wrote his moſt gentle and louyng letters vnto king Henry, the effect whereof were, that foraſmuch as a truce was taken betwene them, and that in the ſame was conteyned, that all men conueighyng letters from the one of the kinges to the other ſhoulde ſurely and ſafely paſſe and repaſſe without any contradiction, and that therefore it would pleaſe him not to breake nor denie the ſayde libertie to the bearer of his letter which was his only ſonne, and to ſuffer him not onely to liue ſafely safely and surely vnder his protection and defence; but also to vouchesafe to preserue and defende him, beyng now the onelye heyre of the Kingdome of Scotland, from the malicious attemptes of his ambicious & cruell kindred.

Now all thinges beyng in a redynesse, the Mariners set forwarde and departed from Bas Castle with this yong Prince, and Henry Percey, sonne to the Lord Percey, called Hottespurre before slaine at Shrewsbury, and by force of tempest were driuen vpon the coast of England in Holdernesse, at a place called Flamborough hed, the.xxx.day of March, where the yong prince for to refreshe himselfe tooke land, and soone after he and all his companie were taken, and brought to the king at Windsore, where he with all due reuerence deliuered his fathers letter. When the letter was read and vnderstand, the king assembled his counsaile, to knowe what should be done with this noble infant. Some to whome the continuall warres was odious and hatefull, affirmed that there could not happen a more surer or better occasion of peace betwene both the realmes, which beyng so offered, they would in no wise should be reiected but taken, considerynge that this Prince was sent thether in trust of safegarde, in hope of refuge, and in request of ayde and comfort agaynst his enemyes and euill willers: But other (whose opinion tooke place) affirmed him to be a prisoner, and so to be ordered, forasmuche as he was taken, the warre beyng open, and that his father did not onely maintein the Erle of Northumberland and other rebelles within his Countrie, and gaue them great honoures, but also sent a great number of his Nobilitie agaynst the king at the battail of Shrewsbury: Wherfore it was agreed that he should be deteyned as a prisoner lawfully taken, and duely apprehended.

James prince of Scotland is taken as a prisoner.

When newes of this definitiue sentence was shewed to his father, he tooke suche an inward conceipt, that it cost him his lyfe within a fewe Monethes after. And although the takyng of this Prince was at the first tyme displeasant vnto the realme of Scotland: yet surely, after, he and all his region had great cause to reioyce, and thanke God of that fortunate chaunce. For where before that tyme, the people of Scotland were rude and without good maners, and hauyng little learnyng, and lesse good qualities, thys Prince beyng.xviij. yeres prisoner within this realme, was so trayned and taught by his Schoolemaisters, which were appoynted to him onely by the kinges clemencie, that he not onely flourished in good learnyng and knowe-ledge, but also excelled in Martiall feates, Musicall instrumentes, Poeticall Artes, and liberall sciences. Insomuch that at his returne from Captiuitie, he furnished his realme both with good learnyng, and Ciuile pollicie, which before was barbarous, rude, and without all good maner.

This yere a worthie Citizen of London named Rychard Whittyngton Mercer and Alderman, was elected Maior of the sayde Citie, and bare that office three tymes: This worshipfull man so bestowed his goodes and substaunce to the honor of God, to the releefe of the poore, and to the benefite of the cõmon weale, that he hath right well deserued to be regestred in the boke of fame. First he erected one house or Church in London, to be a house of prayer, and he named the same after his awne name Whittyngtons Colledge, and so it remayneth to this day. And in the same Church, beside certeine Priestes and Clerkes, he placed a number of poore aged men and women, and buylded for them houses and lodgynges, and allowed vnto them

He alſo buylded for the eaſe of the Maior of London and his brethren, & of the worſhipfull Citizens, at the ſolempne dayes of their aſſemblie, a Chapell adioinyng to the Guyldhall, to the entent they ſhould euer before they entered into any of theyr affayres, firſt to go into the Chapell, and by prayer to call vpon God for his aſſiſtaunce. And in the ende ioynyng on the South part of the ſayde Chapell, he buylded for the Citie a Librarie of ſtone, for the cuſtodie of their recordes and other bookes. He alſo buylded a great part of the Eaſt ende of the Guyldhall, beſyde many other good worckes that I knowe not. But among all other, I will ſhewe vnto you one very notable, which I receyued credibly, by a writyng of his awne hande, which alſo he willed to be fixed as a Scedule to his laſt will and teſtament, the contentes whereof was, that he willed and commaunded his Executors as they would aunſwere before God at the day of the Reſurrection of all fleſhe, that if they found any debtor of his, that ought to him any money, that if he were not in their conſciences well worth three tymes aſmuch, and alſo out of the debt of other men, and well able to pay, that then they ſhoulde neuer demaund it, for he cleerely forgaue it, and that they ſhould put no man in ſute for any debt due to hym. But nowe to returne to the ſtory where we left. The Erle of Northumberland, which had bene in Fraunce and other Countries, to haue gotten ayde againſt king Henry, and miſſed of his purpoſe, did nowe put his whole confidence in the Scottes, and in eſpecially in his olde friend George Erle of Marche, and ſo aſſembled a great power of the Scottiſhe Nation to inuade Northumberland, and recouered diuerſe of his awne Caſtelles and Seigniories, to whome people without number dayly reſorted. And he entending to be reuenged of his olde griefes, accompanied with the Lord Bardolfe, and dyuerſe other Scottes, and Engliſhe men, entred into Yorkeſhire, and there began to deſtroy and ſpoyle the Countrie.

Whereof the king beyng aduertiſed, cauſed foorthwith a great army to be aſſembled, and marched toward his enemyes, but before the king came to Nottyngham, Raufe Rokeſby Shirife of Yorkeſhire, in the middeſt of February, with the power of the Country, ſodeinly ſet on the Erle and his companie, at a place called Bramham Moore, where after long fight, the Erle, and the Lorde Bardolfe, and many other were taken and brought to Yorke, and there executed, and their heddes ſent to London.

Pirates.

After this, the king hauyng knowledge that dyuerſe Pirates were about the coaſt of England, prepared certeine Shippes well furniſhed with men, victuall, and munition, and in the beginnyng of March ſent to the ſea, Lord Edmond Holland Erle of Kent, as Chefetaine of that Crewe. And when the Erle had ſearched all the coaſt of Fraunce, and had not founde one pirate or Sea robber, he was aduertised by his espialles, that they heryng of his army were gone back into the partes of Bziteyne. Wherfore the sayd Erle entendyng to be reuenged on them, made his course thether, and before his arrinall they had conueyed theyr shippes into the Hauens, so that he could not fight with them on the sea, wherfore he launched out his Boates, & with his lustie & hardie Souldiours toke land, and fiercely assaulted the towne of Bziake standyng vpon the Sea syde. The Citizens threwe out Dartes, cast stones, shot quarelles, and manfully defended their Walles. In the which conflict, the Erle receyued such a wounde in his head, that he departed out of this worlde the fift day after. The assaylantes nothyng dismayde, but rather kindeled and set on fire with the death of their Capteyn, like men desperate, still continued and folowed the assault of the towne, and by fine force entered into the same, and set it on fyre, and slue all that made any resistance: And for lacke of a Capteyne, the men of warre laden with prayes and prisoners, returned againe into England.

Bziake taken and burnt.

This Edmond Erle of Kent was in such fauour with king Henry, that he not alonely aduaunced and promoted him to highe offices and dignities: But also by his meane, and no small cost, obteyned for him Lucie the eldest daughter, and one of the heyres of the Lorde Barnaby of Milleyn (brother to Lorde Galeace, whose sonne also called Galeace, murdering his Uncle Barnaby made himselfe first Duke of Milleyn:) For which mariage the Lorde Barnaby payde to the sayde Erle of Kent, an hundred thousand Ducates in the Church of saint Mary Ouereyes in Southwarke, at the day of the solempnitie of the sayde mariage, by Done Alphons of Caniola.

Edmond Erle of Kent was well beloued of king Henry.

This Lucye, after the death of her husbande, by whome she had none issue, was moued by the king to mary hys bastard brother the Erle of Dorcet, a man very aged and euill visaged, whose person neyther satisfied her phantasie, nor whose face pleased her appetite, wherfore she preferring her owne minde more then the kinges desyre, delyghting in him which should more satisfie her wanton desire, then gayne her any profite, for verye loue tooke to husbande Henry Mortimer a goodly yong Esquire, and bewtifull Bacheler. For which cause the king was not onely with her displeased, but also for maryeng without his licence, he sealed and fined her at a great some of mony, which fine king Henry the fift, both released and pardoned, and also made him knight and promoted him to great offices, both in England and in Normandy, which Sir Henry had issue by this Ladye, Anne maryed to Sir John Awbemond, mother to Elizabeth Candos, mother to Phillis maried to Sir Dauy Hall Captayne of Cane: She had also issue, Mary maried to John Cheddur, and Lucy espoused to syr John Cressy.

This yere happened a long and great frost, which continued .xv. wekes, and by reason thereof dyed great numbers of sheepe and birdes.

A great frost.

About this time John Duke of Burgoyn, a man of a quick wit, and of a haute courage, and desyrous of rule, beyng of great authoritie among the French nation, to whome ciuile discorde was more pleasant, then brotherly loue and friendship, beganne sore to murmour and grudge against Lewes Duke of Orleaunce, because that he was chiefe of the kings counsayle, and ordred all things by his discretion for that the king his brother was (as you haue heard) fallen into a Frensie, and therefore meddled in nothing. The Variaunce betweene John Duke of Burgoyn and Lewes Duke of Orleaunce.

Duke of Orleaunce on the other side, being highly set vp in pride, beganne to disdeyne and froune at the Duke of Burgoyn, because he perceaued that he aspired and gaped to haue the supreme regiment in the publique affaires and weighty causes, thus the one would haue no superiour, and the other would haue no peere. This cankard disdeyne in short space grewe to suche a hate, that all the Realme of Fraunce was deuyded into factions, the one parte fauouring the Duke of Orleaunce, & the other enclyning to the Duke of Burgoyn, which diuision had almost brought the realme of Fraunce to vtter ruine and confusion.

The French king being somewhat amended of his disease, heryng of the controuersie betweene these two princes, sent for them both to Paris, where he openly and largely rebuked their pride and malice, in so much that the Nobilitie there present iudged the displeasure betwene them was clerely forgeuen and forgotten. But high courages are not so sone abated, nor rooted malice will not so sone be plucked vp. For the Duke of Burgoyn still compassing the destruction of the Duke of Orleaunce, appointed a secrete friend called Raufe Actouille to bring his purpose to passe. This Raufe forgetting not his enterprise, assembled together a companye of suche persons as he most trusted, and as as a Wolfe greedy of his praye, when the Duke of Orleaunce was comming from the courte, in the night season, he fiercely set vpon him, and shamefully slue him.

Lewes duke of Orleance is murdered.

When this murder was published, all people cryed vnto God for vengeaunce. The Duke of Burgoyn iustified this acte, by the mouth of John Petit Doctor in diuinitie, who wrested Scriptures and Doctors so farre out of course, that his iustification within fewe yeres after was by the whole Vniuersitie of Paris adiudged Heresie.

The French king least greater mischiefe might ensue, was inforced to cloake his inward affection, and to dissemble the matter, doubtyng least the Duke of Burgoyn, whose heart and haute courage he had good experience of before (if he should proceede agaynst him for his euill acte) would ioyne and take part with the English nation against the realme of Fraunce. Wherefore after long consultation had by the entreatie of the king, and other Princes of the blood Royall, Charles Duke of Orleaunce, sonne to Duke Lewes lately murdered, and John Duke of Burgoyn were reconciled, and brought to a feyned concorde and a faynt agreement, eche of them taking a corporall othe vpon the holy Euangelists, neuer after to disagree or renewe any displeasure for any thing before passed, but all this preuayled nothing.

For nowe the Duke of Orleaunce perceauing the king his Uncle to beare with the Duke of Burgoyn, and to let the detestable murther of hys father so lightly passe ouer without payne or punishment, allyed and confederated himselfe with the Duke of Berry and Burbon, and the Erles of Alaunson and Arminack, who reysed a great puyssaunce of people, & defyed the Duke of Burgoyn & his complices, as their mortal foe, & deadly enemy.

The Duke of Burgoyne sendeth to the king of England for ayde.

The Duke of Burgoyn fearing the ende hereof (because there was a motion of a mariage to be had betwene the prince of Wales and his daughter) was somewhat the bolder to sende to the king of England for ayde and succours against his enimies. King Henry no lesse forseyng then that which after ensued, which was that the discorde of these two great princes might

turne his realme to great profite and honour, sent to the Duke of Burgoyn Thomas Erle of Arundell, Sir Gilbert Umfreuyle Lorde of Kyne, Sir Robert Umfreuyle, and syr John Grey, with fiue hundreth Archers, which toke shipping at Douer, and landed at Sluce. When the Englishmen were arryued in Flaundres, the Duke of Burgoyn with the Englishmen and all his power roade daye and night vntill he came neere to Paris, and there the next daye after with harde fightyng, and courageous shooting, the Englishe men gate the bridge of Saint Clow, and so passed ouer the ryuer of Sayne, and tooke and slue all the Souldyours, which the Duke of Orleaunce had there left in garrison to defend the bridge. Amongest whome Sir Waulard de Boyes a valyaunt Captayne was taken prisoner by the Englishmen, and highly raunsomed. But the Duke of Orleaunce and his companie, which were lyke to haue bene compassed with their enimies, so that almost all their wayes of refuge were stopped and enclosed, in the night time made a bridge ouer the ryuer on the parte of saint Denyce streete, and so escaped and fled into the high Countries. And after this conflict the Duke of Burgoyn being nowe in his ruffe, and thinking no man eyther in auctoritie or bloud equyualent to himselfe, and blynded with a kall before his eyes, tooke vpon him the whole rule and gouernaunce of the realme, and ordered the king as pleased him, and not to the kings wyll, and thinking also that in so troublous a time he had vnknyt the knot of all ambiguities and doubtes, and therefore dismyssed the Englishmen geuyng to them both heartie thanks and great rewardes, which doing king Henry much disalowed, consydering that he had sent awaye his defence before the great brunt of the warre were ouer passed and should haue taken heede before what pollicie his enimies practised.

The Englishmen returne agayne into England.

Thys yere sayth Reynulph, the king kept, and helde a great Justes in Smithfielde in London, which contynued eyght dayes, and vnto the same came certayne Henowayes Gentlemen, and ranne with the Gentlemen of Englande, but the honor of that passtyme was geuen to the Englishmen, although some of the straungers did very well.

King Henrie being nowe at quiet, and not troubled with ciuile dissension, nor warres in his realme, called his high Courte of Parliament, in the which after he had concluded dyuers actes meete and expedient for the publique wealth of his realme and people, he exalted and promoted his three younger sonnes to high honors, as Lorde Thomas to the Duchye of Clarence, Lorde John to the Duchy of Bedforde, and Lorde Homffrey to the Duchy of Glouceſter, and Lorde Thomas his halfe brother Erle of Dorcet, he made Duke of Exceter: Howbeit some writers saye that he was erected to that estate and dignitie by king Henry the fift, in the first yere of his reigne, which thing is not greatly materiall, considering he had none issue.

In this meane while John Duke of Burgoyn, which ruled the roste, and and gouerned both king Charles the French king, and the whole realme, so much stomacked and enuyed the Duke of Orleaunce and his helpers, that he caused the Frenche king in person to arme himselfe against them and their adherentes, as traytors to him, and apparant enemies to the common weale, and sente dyuerse Capteynes to inuade theyr landes and territories in the Countryes of Poyters, and Angulesme, and other Seigniories appertey-nyng and belongyng to the homage and obeysaunce of the Duchie of Acquiteyn and Guyan: Wherefore the Dukes of Orliaunce, and Berry, & Bur-bon, with theyr friendes and alyes, seyng that now theyr hope consisted in the king of Englande, sent to him Albert Awbemond, a man of no lesse learnyng than audacitie, who in the name of the Confederates offered certeyne condi-tions, as ye shall heere.

The Duke of Orleaunce seeketh ayde of the king of England.

1 First, the sayd Lordes offered that from thencefoorth they should expose and set forth their awne persons, finaunces and landes, to serue the king of England, his heyres and successors, whensoeuer they were requyred or cal-led, in all iust quarelles: which iust quarelles, the king of England shal take to apperteyne to the Duchie of Guyan with the appurtenaunces, affyrmyng howe the sayd Duchie perteyneth, and ought to apperteyne, to him of right by lyneall heritage, and lawfull succession, manifestyng from thencefoorth, that they should not blemish nor spot their truth nor fidelitie to assist and ayde him, in the recoueryng the same Duchie.

2 Also the sayd Lordes offered theyr sonnes, daughters, nephewes, and ne-ces, parentes and all their subiectes, to contract mariage accordyng to the discretion of the king of England.

3 And they offered townes, Castelles, treasures, and generally all theyr goodes to ayde the king, his heyres and successours for the defence of theyr rightes and quarelles, so that the bond of their allegiance might be saued, the which in an other secret appoyntment, they before had declared.

4 Also they offered to the king of England generally, all theyr friends, al-lyes, and well willers, to serue him in his quarell for the recouery of hys whole Duchie of Guyan.

5 Also to cease all fraude, the sayde Lordes recognised that they were re-die to affirme the sayd Duchie of Guyan to belong to the king of England, in like and semblable wise, in libertie, and fraunchises, as euer any of the sayde kings predecessors helde or possessed the same.

6 Also the sayde Lordes knowledged, that all the townes, Castelles, and fortresses, that they had within the Duchie of Guyan, to holde them of the king of England, as of the very true Duke of Guyan, promisyng all seruice and homages after the best maner, that in such case might be.

7 Also they promised to deliuer vnto the king as muche as lay in them, all townes and Castelles apperteinyng to the royaltie and Seigniorie of Eng-land, which are in number. xx. townes and Castelles, and as to the regarde of other townes and fortresses which were not in their puyssaunce and seig-niorie, they would helpe the king of England, his heyres and deputies to win them, with men in sufficient number at their proper expences and charges.

8 Also the king of England was agreed, that the Duke of Berry his true Uncle and Uassall, and the Duke of Orliaunce his subiect and Uassall, and the Erle of Arminacke should holde of him by homage and fealtie, the landes

and Seigniozies hereafter folowyng: that is to say, the Duke of Berry to holde onely the Countie of Pontiew, duryng his lyfe, and the Duke of Dzliaunce to holde the Countie of Angulesme, duryng his life, and the Countie of Perigot foz euer, and the Erle of Arminake to holde foure Castelles vpon certeine sureties and conditions, as by Indenture should be appoynted.

9 Foz the which offers, couenauntes, and agreementes, they affirmed that the king of England as Duke of Guyan, ought to defende and succour them agaynst all men, as their very Lozde and souereigne, and not to conclude any treatie of league with the Duke of Burgoyn, his bzethzen, childzen, friendes oz allyes.

10 Furthermoze, the king of England ought to ayde the Lozdes, as his true Vassals in all theyz iust quarelles foz recoueryng of dammages, foz iniurpes to them wzongfully done.

11 Also they required the king of England to send vnto them. viij. thousand men to ayde them agaynst the Duke of Burgoyn, which dayly pzouoked the French king to make open warre on them, theyz landes and seigniozies, pzomisyng further to disbursse and pay all the costes and charges which the sayde armie of Englishe men should erpend duryng their warre, which letter was wzitten the. viij. day of May, in the yere of our Lozde afoze mencioned.

¶ King Henrie louingly receyued, and gently entertayned this Messenger Albert, and when he had well debated and considered the case, he first detesting the abhominable murder of the late Duke of Dzleaunce, and seing no iustice ministered, noz no punishment done foz so shamefull an act, hauyng also an appzoued experience ỳ the Duke of Burgoyn would kepe no lenger pzomise then he himselfe lusted. And secondarily, consideryng what large pzomises and offers these Pzinces had made vnto him, both greatly to his honour, and to the high pzofite and commoditie of his realme and subiectes, thought that he was bound by the office of a king to ayde and succour them, which cryed foz iustice and could haue none, and in especiall because they in that poynt beyng his subiectes and vassalles, ought to be defended in maintenaunce of his superiozitie and seigniozie: Wherefoze he louyngly pzomised them ayde and relefe. The king graunteth to ayde ỳ Duke of Dzleaunce

The returne of the Messenger with this message was to them as pleasant, as is the deliueraunce of a Captiue from his soze imprisonment, oz of a Marchant passing by the way, & beset with theues, when he is rescued by his friendes oz companions. And not without cause, foz the french king, not of his awne courage animated, but maliciously incensed by the Duke of Burgoyn, persecuted the faction of the Dzliaunces from Citie to Citie, and from towne to towne, with such power and extremitie, that they were both of foze and necessitie compelled to repayze to the Citie of Bourges in Berry, and there to appoynt themselues eyther to render oz defend.

Pe must vnderstand that Pzinces haue sometyme Argus eyes, and Midas eares, foz this feate was not so secretly wzought in Englande, but it was as apparantly spyed in Fraunce: Wherefoze the Frenche kinges Counsaile sent the Erle of saint Paule, the olde cankard enemy to the English men, into the partes of Picardie, with. xb. hundzeth hozsemen, and a great number of footemen, and he ozdeyned certeyne of his men to geue assault to the towne of Guynes, while he lay in stale to waite foz the relefe that might come from Calice. The French men assault Guines.

Calice. The furious Frenche men brake a fewe olde Pales aboute poore mens Gardeynes of Guisnes: But the men of warre in the Castell shotte so fiercely, and cast out wilde fyre in such aboundaunce, that the assaylants were faine to retyre. And so the Erle of Saint Paule which neuer wonne gaine, but lost honour at the Englishe mens handes, returned, not onely with the losse of his people, but defrauded of his desyred pray, and went to the towne of Saint Quintines.

Guyld hall buylded.

Thys yere, of an euill fauoured olde house or cotage was the Guyld-hall in London buylded and finished at the charges of the Citizens, but chiefly at the charges of Richard Whytington Alderman.

But to returne to the former history, the French king in this meane while besieged the Citie of Bourges in Berry, wherein the Duke of Orleaunce and his company had fortefyed themselues. When the king of Englande was thereof aduertised, he sent forth his sonne Thomas Duke of Clarence, and Edward Duke of Yorke, with eyght hundred horsemen, and nine thousand footemen, which landed in the Bay of Hogges in Normandy by saint Wast, in the territorie of Constantyne. The Englishmen swarmed lyke Bees rounde about the countrie, robbyng Marchaunts, spoyling husbandmen, and brennyng townes, and were ioyously receyued of the Erles of Alaunson and Richemond ayders of the Orlienciall parte.

The Counsayle of Fraunce not wylling that the Englishmen shoulde ioyne with the Dukes of Orleaunce and Berry, or their complices, caused a common fame (although it were not true) to be spreade abroade, that there was a final peace concluded betweene the French king and his Lords, which late were to him aduersaries. When this fable was noted to the Englishmen, which were by hastie iourneyes passed the ryuer of Leyre, they spoyled the towne and Monasterie of Beauliew, and wasted with fyre & sword the Countries of Tourayn and Mayne. Agaynst whom the Duke of Burgoyn sent the Lorde Rambures, with a great armie, which in shorte tyme was vanquished. The Dolphyn of Fraunce fearyng the doings of the Englishmen, concluded a feyned peace betweene the Duke of Orleaunce and Burgoyn, and their adherents, so that the Duke of Orleaunce should without delaye dispatche out of the dominions of Fraunce all the Englishe armie. The Duke was not riche to pay, and the Englishmen were greedy to haue, insomuch as they marching toward Guyan in good order, what by sacking of townes, and what with raunsomming of riche persons gate great treasure and many good prayes. Besides this, to the ayde of the Duke of Orleaunce king Henry sent to Calice the Erles of Kent and Warwike with two thousand fighting men, which spoyled and defaced the Countie of Bullenoys, and brent the towne of Samer de boys, and tooke with assault the Fortresse of Russalt with dyuers other.

A Frenth practise.

A feyned peace concluded.

The Duke of Orleaunce, which was daylie called vpon to dispatche the Englishmen out of Fraunce, came to the Duke of Clarence and his armie, rendring to them a thousande Gramercyes, and disbursed to them as much money as eyther he or his friendes might easely spare, and for nine thousand Frankes, which remayned vnpayde, he delyuered in gage his second brother John Erle of Angulesme, which was Graundfather to Fraūces, afterward Frenche king, and Sir Marcell of Bourgh, Sir John of Samours, Sir Archibald

Archibald of Villiers and dyuers other, which Erle long contynued in Englande as after ye shall here.

When this agreement was taken, the Dukes of Clarence and Yorke with great praye (riche prisoners and welthy hostages) came to Burdeaux, making warre on the Frontiers of Fraunce to their great gaine and profit. So by the onely commyng in of the Englishmen into Fraunce, the Duke of Orleaunce was restored, not onely vnto peace and quietnesse with all persons, sauyng the Duke of Burgoyn: But also fell into suche fauour with the king and the realme, that he was of all men welbeloued, much honored and highly esteemed, and so continued, vntill wauering fortune turned her variable wheele. For after this, he being enemie to the Englishe nation, was vanquished and taken prisoner, and so remayned in Englande aboue xxiiij. yeres, vntill the flowre of his age was passed or sore blemished.

And thys yere the king abaced the coynes of Golde and Syluer, and caused the same to be curraunt in his realme at such value as before they had gone, where in deede the Noble was worse by foure pence, then the other was, and lykewise was the coynes of Siluer curraunt after the same rate.

The coyne abated.

And here I finde noted by certaine writers, that thys yere the Thamys did flowe three times in one daye, as though the same were matter worthye of a note, for the straungenesse thereof: But if you consider the causes thereof, then is it worthy of no note at all, for the causes thereof are naturall, as great windes and tempestes that rise on the sea costes, which by violence driue the sea into the freshe Ryuers, more aboundauntly then the common course would, or else by lyke violence keepeth out the sea from the freshe ryuers, that it can not flowe at one houre so high and abundantly as the common course thereof is accustomed to doe, and it happeneth also many times by reason of abundaunce of rayne, which falleth of the lande, and filleth the ryuers, and so encreaseth the freshe waters, that the same meeting with the sea water entering into the ryuer, causeth the same to swell, and rise farre aboue the common course, and altereth the houres both of flowyng and ebbyng. In lyke maner the tydes alter by reason of great and long frostes and Snowe that freeseth the ryuers and dyches in the land, which causeth shorte and mo tydes in fewer houres then hath bene accustomed, by reason the water is turned to Yse. And in lyke maner vpon a sodaine thawe, the floodes agayne encrease farre aboue the accustomed course, & of these naturall causes commeth the alteration of the houres of ebbyng and flowyng.

Ebbyng and flowyng why they alter at sometimes.

Now after that these great and fortunate chaunces had happened to king Henry, he thinking that there could not a greater prayse be geuen to a king, then for the execution of his office, and the administration of iustice, and entendyng to lyue in quietnesse, being nowe delyuered of all ciuile diuision, with the which almost all christendome was troubled, not onely to the decaye of Christes religion, and christian creatures, but to the greater aduauncement of Paynym princes, by the publishing and setting forth of that counterfeat and false prophet Mahomet. And that the king would shew himselfe mindefull hereof, he called a great counsayle of the three estates of his Realme, in the which he deliberately consulted and concluded, as well for the politique gouernaunce of his realme, as also for the warre to be made agaynst the Infidels, and specially for the recouery of the Citie of Jerusalem, lem, in the which warres he entended to ende his transitory life, and for that cause he prepared a great armie, and gathered much treasure, entending to set forwarde in the same spring time. But see the chaunce, whatsoeuer man intendeth, God sodainely reuerseth, what princes will, God will not, what we thinke stable, God maketh mutable, whereby Salomons saying is found true: That the wysedome of men is but foolishnesse before God. When this prince was thus furnished with treasure sufficient, with valiaunt Captaines and hardie Souldiours, with tall shippes furnished with victualles, munitions and all things necessary for such a iourney royall, he was taken with a sore and sodaine disease called an Apoplexie, of the which he languished vntill his appoynted houre. During which sickenesse, as some authors write, he caused the crowne to be set on the pillowe at his beddes head, and sodaynly his pangue so sore troubled hym, that he lay as though his breth and soule were departed from him, wherefore hys Chamberleynes couered his face with a lynnen cloth.

The king is taken with a grieuous sickenesse.

The Prince his sonne being thereof aduertised, entered into the chamber, and tooke away the crowne and departed: The father being sodainely reuyued out of his traunce, quickly perceaued the lacke of his crowne, and hauing knowledge that the prince his sonne had possessed it, caused him to repayre to his presence, requyring of him to shew for what cause he had so misused himselfe. The prince with a good audacitie aunswered: syr, to mine and all mens iudgements you seemed dead in this worlde, wherefore I as your next and apparaunt heyre tooke that as mine awne, and not as yours: Well fayre sonne sayde the king (with a great sigh) what right I had to it, & how I enioyed it God knoweth. Well quod the prince, if you die king, I wil haue the Garlande, and trust to keepe it with the sworde against all mine enimies as you haue done, well sayde the king, I commit all to God, and remember you to doe well, and with that turned himselfe in his bed, and shortly after departed vnto God in a Chamber of the Abbotes of Westminster called Ierusalem, the twentie daye of Marche. 1413. and in the yere of his age. xlvj. when he had reigned. xiij. yeres. v. moneths and odde dayes, in much trouble and little pleasure, whose body with all funerall pompe was conueyed to Cauntorbury and there solemply buryed, leauing behinde him by the Lady Mary daughter to Lorde Homfrey Erle of Hereford and Northampton, Henry prince of Wales, Thomas Duke of Clarence, John Duke of Bedford, Homfrey Duke of Gloucester, Blanche Duchesse of Barre, and Phylip Queene of Denmarke, for by hys last wyfe, Queene Jane, he had no children.

The king was of a meane stature, well proporcioned and formally compact, quick and delyuer, and of a stoute courage. After that he had appeased all ciuill dissentions, he shewed himselfe so gently to all men that he gat him more loue of the nobles in his later dayes, then he had euill will of them in the beginning.

When tydings of hys death was brought vnto the Duke of Clarence, being then in Aquitayne, he then with all diligence toke ship with the Erle of Angulesme, and other his hostages and returned into England, to the great comfort of hys brethren.

Henry

Enry Prince of Wales, sonne and heyre vnto king Henrie the fourth, borne at Monmouth on the Riuer of Wye, after the death and buriall of his Noble father king Henry aforesayde, tooke vpon him the highe power and regiment of this realme of England the. xx. day of Marche. 1412. and was proclaymed king, by the name of king Henry the fift, and crowned at Westminster the. xi. day of Aprill next ensuyng. And before the possession of the Crowne, diuerse honorable and noble personages did to him homage, & fealtie (which before that time had not beene vsed) as vnto him of whom they had conceyued great hope and worthynesse of Gouernment. 1412 1

This king, this man was he (which accordyng to the olde prouerbe) declared and shewed that honoures ought to chaunge maners, for incontinent after that he was placed in the siege royall, and had receyued the crowne and Scepter of this Noble Realme, he determined with himselfe to put on the shape of a newe man, and to vse a nother sort of liuyng, turnyng insolencie and wildenesse into grauitie and sobernesse. And because he would so continue, and not be allured to the contrary by his olde familiars, who in the lyfe of his father, by their wantonnesse and entisyng caused him at one tyme to strike the Lorde chiefe Justice in the face, for the which he was imprisoned, and also had the displeasure of his father, who remoued him from being president of his counsaile, & placed therein his brother Thomas, Duke of Clarence, to his great griefe: he therefore, I say, detestyng a wanton and disorderly life, first banished from him all his olde wanton familiars & flatterers, (not vnrewarded, nor yet vnpreferred) forbiddyng them vpon a great paine, not once to approch nor come neere his speche or presence, by the space of ten myles. And in their places he elected and chose men of grauitie, of wisedom, and of high pollicie, by whose wisedome, and prudent counsaile he might at all tymes rule to his honour, and gouerne to the profite both of himselfe and of his common weale. This prince among all other, did very well remember and consider, that a king ought to be a ruler with wisedome and grauity, and to be both diligent and constant: Wherefore callyng his counsaylors together, first of all (as Hall sayth) he commaunded the Clergie sincerely and truely to preach the worde of God, and to liue after the same. The laye men he willed to serue God, and obey their Prince, forbiddyng them aboue all thinges the brech of Matrimonie, the vse of swearyng and wilfull periurie. Beside this he elected the best learned men in the lawes of the Realme, to the offices of iustice, and men of good liuyng he preferred to high degrees and auctoritie. And callyng to remembraunce the madnesse of the Welshe men, and the falsehood and inconstancie of the Scottes (whose often incursions and robberyes he well had in his fathers dayes experimented and assayed)

sayed) he studied to asswage and represse, to the entent that he beyng quyet in his awne regions, might eyther make outwarde warre without doubt or daunger, or else for the common weale of his realme studie howe to encrease the glorie of his seigniorie, and so to kepe and conserue it.

King Rychard is remoued from Langley to Westminster.

When all thinges were thus setled and framed to his purpose, he caused the bodie of king Richard the seconde to be remoued, with all funerall pompes conuenient for his estate, from Langley to Westminster, where he was honourably enterred with Queene Anne his first wife, in a solempne Tombe, erected and set vp at the costes and charges of this Noble Prince king Henrie.

The counsayle of Constance.

And although this noble prince had set and established all thinges beyng in difference and variaunce within his awne peculiar realmes and dominions: Yet the same tyme, beyng called to the counsaile of Constance, which is a Citie situate vpon the goodly ryuer of Rhyne, he sent thether Richard Erle of Warwike, and three Bishoppes, with other famous Prelates and Doctors besydes Knightes and Esquiers to the number of. viij. hundreth horse. At this Synode were assembled (as Hall saith) three hundreth. xlvj. Bishops, Abbottes, and Doctors. And of noble men fiue hundreth. lxiij. And of knightes and Esquiers. xvj. thousand, besydes seruauntes, which (not accomptyng the townes men) were accompted. lxv. thousand persons.

Pope Johan is deposed.

These persons were highly receyued of the Emperour Sigismond, and of the Bishop of Rome called John the. xxiij. which in the same counsaile as the sayde author affirmeth, for great and abhominable crymes, and detestable offences by hym committed (of the which he could not pourge himselfe, nor make any defence) was by the same Synode deposed, and of his estate depriued. Gregorie the. xij. beyng one of the Schismatical number, fearyng shame more than regardyng his worldly affection, deposed himselfe both from his name and Papall dignitie. But Benedict the. xiij. still and stifly affirmyng himselfe to be the Vicar of God, so much desyred honour, and semuche was wrapped in his awne lewde opinion, that neyther friend nor good counsaile could do any good with him, wherefore at the last, he was also deposed, and lost both his name and honestie. And within three yere after, Otho Columbe a noble Romaine borne, was elected Bishop of Rome, and named Martyn the fifth. And in this counsaile, John Wicliffe English man, and John Husse, and Jherom of Prage Bohemians, were condempned of heresie, of whome ye may read more in the booke of Monuments of the Church.

Sir John Oldecastell.

And in this first yere, Sir John Oldecastell, which by his wife was called Lorde Cobham, a valiaunt Captaine and an hardie Gentelman, was accused vnto the Archebishop of Cauntorbury of certeine poyntes of heresie: But for that I haue not purposed in this Historie to write of any matter that specially concerneth religion, I will therefore referre you to the booke of Monumentes of the Church, where the whole Historie of this Gentelman and many others is at large described and setforth. And in lyke maner foloweth in the sayde booke, the whole historie of Sir Robert Actone, Browne, Beuerley, and dyuerse other.

The King, for the honour of himselfe, and the aduauncement of hys people, called this yere and the last day of Aprill, in the towne of Leycester his high Court of Parliament, in the which many good and profitable lawes were were concluded, and many peticions moued, were for that tyme deferred. Among which petitions one was, that a bill exhibited in the. xj. yere of king Henry (as is mencioned before) which by reaſon that the king was then troubled with Ciuill diſſention, came to none effect, might nowe be conſidered and regarded: the effect of which petition was, that the temporall lands deuoutly geuen, & diſordinately ſpent by the religious, and other of the clergie, might ſuffice to mainteyne to the honour of the king, and defence of the realme, xv. Erles, xv. C. knightes. vj. thouſande, two hundreth Eſquiers, and one hundreth almoſe houſes, for the reliefe of the impotent and nedy perſons, and the king to haue cleerely into his Coffers, xx. thouſand poundes, with many other prouiſions and values of ſundrie religious houſes.

A bill moued in the Parliamēt houſe againſt the Clergie.

This before remembred bill (ſayth Hall) much feared the religious, inſomuch that fat Abbottes ſwet, the proude Priors frowned, the poore Friers curſed, the ſiely Nonnes wept, and all together were nothyng pleaſed nor yet content. But to finde a remedie for a miſchiefe, and a tent to ſtop a wounde, the Clergie practiſed to put into the kinges heade, the title that he had to the Crowne and kingdome of Fraunce, and howe honourable it ſhould be for him to trauaile for the recouerie thereof, and howe willyng all the good people of the realme woulde be to ayde him in that honourable enterprice. And the next day after in moſt ſolempne and learned maner, the Archebiſhop of Cantorbury, whoſe name then was Henry Chichley, made ſuch an excellent Oration to moue, encourage, and perſwade the king to take that voyage in hand, that nothing could be eyther more or better ſpoken. And when the Biſhop had done, then the Nobilitie in like maner ſayd to and fro their mindes, ſo that nowe there was vſed none other talke in euery mannes mouth in the Parliament houſe, but for the conqueryng of Fraunce, and the bill againſt the Clergie was lulled a ſleepe, and nothing came thereof. And ſo ſoone as this voyage was agreed vpon, the parliament brake vp.

The aforeſayde parliament being nowe ended, the king ſendeth a ſolempe Imbaſſade vnto the French king, to make his clayme vnto the crowne and kingdome of Fraunce, as his right and inheritaunce, or elſe to bid hym battayle, and to declare vnto him, that if he would not deliuer the ſame vnto him, that then he would trie his right by dent of ſworde: The Imbaſſadors were theſe, the Duke of Exceſter and Erle of Dorcet the kings Uncle. The Lorde Grey Admirall of England, the Archebiſhop of Deuelyn, the Biſhop of Norwiche, and they had attending vpon them aboue fiue hundreth horſſe.

An Imbaſſade ſent frō the king of Englande to the french king.

The French king receaued them very honorably, and ſumpteouſly banqueted them, ſhewing to them goodly iuſtes, and martiall paſtimes, by the ſpace of three dayes together, in the which Juſtes the king himſelfe to ſhew his courage and actiuitie to the Engliſhe men, brake Speares, and luſtely turneyed.

After this great triumph, the Engliſhe Imbaſſadours had acceſſe vnto the Frenche king and declared their commiſſion, which was to require of him to deliuer vnto the king of England the realme and crowne of Fraunce with the entier Duchies of Aquitaine, Normandy and Aniowe, with the Countries of Poyteu and Mayne, and dyuerſe other requeſtes, and offering alſo that if the French king would without warre or effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, render to the king their master his verye right and lawfull inheritaunce, that then he would be content to take in mariage the Lady Katheryn daughter vnto the French king, and to endue her with all the Duchye and countryes before reherſed. And if he entended not ſo to doe, then the king of Englande did expreſſe and ſignifie vnto him, that with the ayde of God, and helpe of his people he would recouer his right and inheritaunce wrongfully witholden with mortall warre and dent of ſworde.

The French king and his counſayle much amaſed at theſe demaundes, thinking them very vnreaſonable, and yet not wylling to make any haſtye aunſwere in ſo great and weightie a matter, prayed the Engliſhe Ambaſſadours to ſay to the king their Maſter, ỹ they hauing nowe no opportunitie to conclude in ſo highe a matter, would ſhortly ſende Ambaſſadors into England, which ſhould certifie and declare to the king their whole minde, purpoſe and anſwere.

The Engliſhe Ambaſſadours receyuing this for aunſwere, tooke their leaue of the French king, and returned into Englande, declaryng vnto the king in order all that had bene done.

And at this time, as ſome writers reporte, the Dolphyn, who heering this meſſage ſent to the French king his father, and diſdeyning the youth of king Henry, and thinking it was an enterpriſe farre vnmete for him to take in hande, did therefore in mockage ſende to him a Tonne of Tennys balles to play with all, meaning that he had better ſkill in a Tennys courte, and handling of a Ball, then in the martiall affayres of warre. But the king after he had receyued from the Dolphyn his former preſent, aunſwered: that before he had ended with him and his father, he purpoſed by Gods ayde to toſſe as many Balles of Yron with him, which ỹ beſt racket he had ſhould not be hable to reſiſt nor returne. And forthwith, for that many French men were promoted within this realme to Eccleſiaſticall dignities, and by reaſon thereof conueighed dyuers ſommes of money ouer into Fraunce, for the reliefe of their friends and Countrie men, the king therefore for the common weale of his realme and ſubiectes, ordeyned that no ſtraunger hereafter ſhould be promoted to any ſpirituall degree or dignitie within this realme, without his ſpeciall lycence and royall conſent, and that all they that ſhould ſo be admitted, ſhould finde ſufficient ſuretie not to diſcloſe the ſecretes of this realme to any foreyn or ſtraunge perſon, nor alſo to miniſter vnto them any ayde or ſuccour with money, or by any other meane.

The pride and diſdainefulneſſe of the Dolphyn of Fraunce.

And nowe with all ſpeede he aſſembled a great puyſſaunce and armie thorough all his dominions: And for the better furniture of his Nauie, he ſent into Holand, Zelande, and Friſelande to procure and hire Shippes for the conductyng and tranſportyng ouer of his men and munitions of warre: And finally, prouyded for armour, victuall, money, Artillery, cariages, Tentes, and other things neceſſarie for ſo high an enterpriſe, the which proniſions were ſoone blowen ouer and knowne in Fraunce. Wherefore the Dolphin, who had taken on him the gouernaunce of the realme, becauſe his father was fallen again into his olde infirmitie, ſent for the Dukes of Berry and Alaunſon, and all the counſayle of Fraunce, to determine what ſhould be done in ſo weightie a cauſe. And after long conſultation it was agreed to aſſemble people thorough the whole realme of Fraunce to reſiſt and repulſe the king of England and his power whenſouer he would arryue or ſet foote in Fraunce.

But to the entent to haue ſteyed the king of Englande at home, they ſent vnto him a ſolempne Ambaſſade, to make vnto him ſome offers accordyng to the demaunds afore reherſed. The charge of this Ambaſſade was committed vnto the Erle of Vandoſme, to Mayſter Mylliam Bouratier Archbyſhop of Bourgues, and to the Biſhop of Lyſeux, to the Lorde of Yury and Bzaquemount, and to Maſter Gualtier Cole the kings Secretary and dyuers other. Theſe Ambaſſadors accompanied with. CCCl. horſe paſſed the ſea at Calice, and landed at Douer, before whoſe arryuall the king was departed from Wyndſore to Wincheſter, entending to haue gone to Southhampton, and there to haue vewed his Nauie, but heering of the Ambaſſadors comming, taryed ſtill at Wyncheſter, where the ſayde Frenche Lordes ſhewed themſelues very honorably before the king and the Nobilitie. And the king ſitting vnder his cloth of eſtate in the Biſhops hall, the ſayde Ambaſſadours had acceſſe vnto him, where the Archebiſhop of Bourges made vnto him an eloquent Oration diſſuading warre and prayſing peace, offeryng to the king of Englande a great ſome of money, with dyuers baſe and pore Coũtries with the Lady Katheryn in mariage, ſo that he would diſſolue his army, & diſmiſſe his Souldiours which he had gathered and made ready.

An Ambaſſade ſent out of Fraunce to the king of England.

The oration being ended, the king cauſed the Ambaſſadors to be highly feaſted, and ſet them at his owne table. And at a daye appoynted in the aforeſayde hall, the Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury made to their oration a notable and learned aunſwere: the effect wherof was, that if the French king would not geue with his daughter in mariage, the Duchies of Aquiteyn, Normandy, Aniowe and all other ſeigniories and dominions, ſometime apperteynyng to the Noble progenitors of the king of England, he would in no wiſe retire his armie nor breake his iourney, but would with all diligence enter into the realme of Fraunce, with ſworde and fyre, and not leaue vntill he had recouered his auncient right and lawfull patrimony. The king auowed the Archebyſhops ſaiyng, and in the worde of a prince promiſed to performe it to the vttermoſt.

The Byſhop of Bourges beyng in a chafe that his purpoſe tooke no better effect, prayed lycence and pardon of the king that he might ſpeake, which being graunted vnto him, he very rudely and vnreuerently ſayde vnto the king as followeth. Thinkeſt thou to put downe and deſtroy wrongfully the moſt chriſtian king our moſt redoubted ſouereigne Lorde, and the moſt excellenteſt prince of all Chriſtianitie, of bloud and preheminence? O king, ſaiyng thine honor, thinkeſt thou that he hath offered or cauſed to be offered to thee lands, goodes, or other poſſeſſions with his owne daughter for feare of thee or thy Engliſh Nation, or of thy friendes or well willers? No, no, but of truth, he moued with pitie, as a louer of peace, to the intent that innocent bloud ſhould not be diſperſed abroade, hath made to thee theſe reaſonable offers, putting his whole affiaunce in God moſt puyſſaunt, according to right and reaſon, truſtyng in hys quarell to be ayded and ſupported by his faythfull and good ſubiects and his well wyllers. And ſyth we be ſubiectes and ſeruaunts, we require thee to cauſe vs ſafely and ſurely without dammage to paſſe out of thy realme and dominions, and that thou wilte write thine aunſwere wholy as thou haſt geuen it, and to ſeale the ſame wyth thy Seale.

The kinges diſcrete aunſwere made to the biſhop.

The king of England nothing vered nor vnquieted with the ſayengs and proude bragges of the vnnurtered Archebiſhop, but well remembring the prouerbe of Salomon, that warres are to be taken in hande with diſcretion, and where many can geue counſayle there is victorie, therefore coldely and ſoberly he aunſwered the Byſhop, ſayeng: My Lorde, I little eſteeme your French bragges, and leſſe ſet by your power and ſtrength, I knowe perfitely my right to your region, and except you will denie the apparaunt truth, ſo doe you, and if you neyther doe nor will knowe, yet God and the worlde knoweth it. The power of your Maſter, you ſee daylie, but of my power ye haue not yet taſted, if your Maſter haue louing friends and faythfull ſubiectes, God I thanke him I am not vnprouyded of the ſame: But this I ſaye vnto you, that before one yere paſſe, I truſt to make the higheſt crowne in your Country to ſtoope, and the proudeſt Myter to knele downe: And ſaye this to the vſurper your Maſter, that within three Moneths I will enter into Fraunce, not as into his lande, but as into mine awne true and lawfull patrimonie, entendyng to conquer it, not with bragging words, nor flattering Orations, but by power and dent of ſword by the ayde of God in whome is my whole confidence, and I aſſure you I will not ſpeake that worde, the which I would not both write and ſubſcribe, neyther would I ſubſcribe to that which I would not wyllingly ſet to my ſeale, therefore your ſafe conduyt ſhall be to you delyuered with mine anſwere, and then you may departe ſurely and ſafely into your Countrie, where I truſt ſooner to viſite you then that you ſhall haue cauſe to bid me welcome. With this aunſwere the Imbaſſadors not a little greeued did ſhortly after departe, but not vnrewarded, and that very bountifully and liberally.

Now after the Frenche Imbaſſadors were departed, the king, as I ſayde before, hauyng a great foreſight and diſpoſing all thinges in order, did not forget the olde condicions of the variable and inconſtant Scottiſhe Nation, and therefore appoynted the Erle of Weſtmerland, the Lorde Scrope, the Baron of Greyſtroke, and Sir Robert Umfreuile, with dyuerſe other valiant Capteynes, to kepe the Marches ioynyng to Scotland. The which ſir Robert Umfreuile, on the day of Saint Mary Magdalene, entered vpon the Scottes at the towne of Gederyng, hauyng in his companie onely foure hundreth Engliſhe men, where after a long conflict and ſkirmiſhe, he ſlue of his enemies.lx. and odde, and tooke priſoners. CCClx. and diſcomfited and put to flight a thouſand and mo, whome he folowed in chaſe.xij.myles, and ſo laden with prayes and priſoners, returned to the Caſtel of Rokeſborough vnhurt, of the which Caſtell he was then Capteyne.

When the king had prepared all thinges mete for his iourney, he then for the ſafegarde of the realme, leauyng behinde him the Queene his mother as Gouernour of the realme, departed to the towne of Southampton, and there purpoſed to take his ſhippyng. And becauſe he would not ſteale on the French king, but that he ſhould haue knowledge of his commyng, he therefore diſpatched with ſpeede Antelop his purſuyuant at armes, with letters of defyance: The which letters, when the French king and his counſaile had read, and well conſidered, he made aunſwere to the officer of armes, that he woulde prouide for his defence, and so licenced the Messenger to departe at his pleasure.

Shortly after, the king beyng in a readinesse to aduaunce forwarde, sodeinly, he was credibly informed, that Richard Erle of Cambridge, brother to Edward Duke of Yorke, and Henry Lorde Scrope, and Sir Thomas Gray had conspired his death and vtter destruction, wherfore he caused them forthwith to be apprehended. And after these prisoners were examined, they not onely confessed the conspiracie, but also declared that for a great somme of money which they had receyued of the French king, they entended eyther to deliuer the king aliue into the handes of his enemyes, or else to murther him before that he should arriue in Normandie. When king Henry had all the truth opened vnto him, of the which he was not onely very desyrous, but also was most hartely sorie, and inwardly grieued that he should lose such valiaunt Capteynes, by whose ayde he might haue bene made the more dreadfull to his enemies: but nowe the matter beyng thus fallen out, the king assembled together all his nobilitie, and before them caused to be brought forth the aforesayd three great offenders, and vnto them sayde as followeth. I can not a little meruayle what should moue you to deuise or conspire my death, who hath loued you most derely, and to say truly vnto you, ye could not conspyre my death which am your heade and gouernour, but ye must also purpose the destruction of al that be here, and of all the people in this realme. And although some priuate Scorpion possessed your heartes, and heades to this great wickednesse, yet ye should nowe haue forborne to haue practised the same, so long as I was with mine armie, whome ye knowe can not continue without a Captein. But forasmuch as ye haue purposed so great a mischiefe, and so abhominable a fact, and confessed the same, and also to the entent that your ayders beyng in the armie may abhorre so horrible an offence, ye shall receyue the punishement and paine that the lawe hath appoynted for your demerites.

And the nert day folowyng, when these noble men were executed, the king sayde to his Lordes, se you not the mad imagination of men, which persecute me that dayly studie & vse my great trauayle to do good to them and to all men, and hurt to none, which I knowe is my duetie, and therevnto was I borne. I pray God that there remaine none among you that is infected with so much vntruth, as had liefer to see mee destroyed and brought to confusion, then to see his native Countrie flourish and encreased with honour, and Empire. But I assure you, I haue conceyued a right good opinion of you, and therefore by Goddes sufferaunce we will set forward, and for my selfe I will forget all paine & perill, and be your Lodesman and guyde. Now when the king had thus sayde, all the Noble men kneled downe, and promised faythfully to serue, and duly to obey him, and rather to die then suffer him to fall into the handes of his enemies.

This done, the king thought surely that all conspiracie and sedition had bene quenched: But he was deceyued, for he sawe not a fyre that was newly kindeled, which afterward drue to so great a flame, that it burned and consumed the walles of his awne house and family, which fyre at that tyme if he had espyed, he might peraduenture easilie haue quenched and put out: For certeine write that Richarde Erle of Cambridge did not conspyre with the

Lorde

Lorde Scrope, and Sir Thomas Gray, to murther king Henry, to please the Frenche king withall, but onely to the entent to exalt to the Crowne his brother in lawe Edmond Erle of Marche, as heyre to Duke Lyonell the thirde begotten sonne of king Edward the third. After whose death, considering that the Erle of Marche for diuerse secrete impedimentes, was not able to haue generation, he was sure that the Crowne should come to hym, or to his children. And therefore it is to be thought, that he rather confessed himselfe for neede of money to bee corrupted by the Frenche king, then hee would declare his inwarde minde, and open his very entent: For surely he sawe that if his purpose were espyed, the Erle of Marche should haue dronken of the same Cuppe that he did, and what should haue come to his owne children he much doubted, therfore beyng destitute of comfort, and in dispaire of lyfe, to saue his children he feyned that tale, despyzing rather to saue his succession, then himselfe, which he did in deede. For Richard Duke of Yorke his sonne, not priuily, but openly claymed the Crowne, and Edward his son both claymed it, and gayned it, as hereafter ye shall here, which thing at this time if king Henry had foreseene, I doubt (sayth Hall) whether euer that lyne should haue claymed the garland, or gotten the game.

The king setteth forward into Fraunce.

Nowe assoone as the winde came about, the king set forward with his Nauie, beyng in number an. Cxl. shippes, and shortly after landed at Caur in Normandie without resistance. And the next day after, the king marched toward the towne of Harflew, standyng vpon the Riuer of Seyne, betwene two hilles, and besieged it on euery part. The Capteyne of the towne was the Lord Escouteuyle, accompanyed with the Lorde Blaymuyle of Hacqueuile, the Lordes of Harmanuyle, of Galard Boyes, of Clere de Barton, of Adsanches, of Bzian, of Gaucort, of Lisleadam, and many other.

Harflewe besieged.

The Frenche king beyng aduertised of the Kinges arryuall, sent in all the haste the Lord Delabreth Constable of Fraūce, and the Lord Bonciqualt Marshall of Fraunce, the Seneschall of Henawde, the Lorde Ligny, and diuerse other Capteynes, which fortefyed townes with men, victuall and artillery, vpon all the Sea coast. And heeryng that the king of England had besieged Harflew at his first landyng, came to the Castell of Cawdebeck beyng not farre from Harflewe, to the entent to succour their friendes whiche were besieged, if they might by any pollicie: And if not, then they imagined howe to slay and hurt the Englishe men, when they went into the Countrie of foragyng for beastes and victual, and so to trap and destroy them. But they were decepued, for notwithstandyng the prouision and pollicie of the French men, the Englishe men forrayed the Countrie and spoyled the Villages and returned againe to the Campe with many a riche pray. The Englishe men dayly assaulted the towne, and the Duke of Gloucester to whome the order of the assault was committed, made three mynes vnder the ground, and approched the walles with ordinaunce and engines, and would not suffer them within to rest at any time. The king lyyng on the hill side with his battail, did not onely keepe the Frenche men from succoryng of the towne, but also toke away from the townes men all the hope and trust of their succour, ayde, and reliefe, and also all the Goonpowder that was sent by the Frenche king vnto them that were besieged, was taken by the English men. The Captaines of the French men within the towne, perceyued that they were not able to endure endure the fierce assaultes of the Englishe men, and fearyng to be ouercome and taken by force, desired of the king of England only truce for three dayes, promisyng that if they were not rescued within ỳ tyme, that then they would yeelde themselues and the towne, theyr liues beyng saued. And for performance hereof, they deliuered vnto the king. xxx. of the best Marchauntes and Capteynes that were within the towne.

The king of England accepted this offer. And so soone as this composition was agreed vpon, foorthwith the Lorde Hacqueuyle was sent vnto the French king to declare the necessitie of the towne, and the short tyme of the truce. To whome the Dolphyn aunswered, that the kinges power was not yet assembled in such a nũber, as was conuenient to raise so great a siege. When this aunswere was reported to the Capteynes, they seyng no hope of comfort or relefe, after the thirde day rendered to the king of England the towne, beyng the. xxviij. day after it was besieged, and the. xxij. day of the moneth of September, to the great abashement of all Normandie, for it was the chiefest port of all that Countrie. The Souldiours were raunsomed, and the towne was sacked, to the great gaine of the Englishe men. The king of Englande made Capteyne of that towne his Uncle Thomas Duke of Exceter, which established his Lieutenant there John Fastolffe, with. xv. hundreth men, and. xxv. good knightes, whereof the Baron of Carew, and Sir Hugh Lutterell were two counsaylors. And because dyuerse of his Nobles lyyng before Harflew were sicke of the Flure, and many were dead, amongest whome the Erle of Staffordе, the Bishop of Norwiche, the Lordes, Molyns, and Burnell, were foure beside other. The king licenced the Duke of Clarence, his brother, John Erle Marshall, and John Erle of Irondell beyng infected with that disease, to returne into England.

Harflew is yelded to the king of England.

King Henry not a little reioysing of this victory at his beginning determined with all diligence to set forward, and to performe his entended purpose and warlye enterprise, but by reason that the sharpnesse of Winter weather approched more sooner at that time, then before it had beene accustomed he was therewithall sore troubled and vexed. Wherfore he callyng together all his Cheuetaynes, and conferryng with them what was best to be done: After long consultation, in the ende it was agreed on all sides, that it was a thing both necessarie and conuenient to set forward with all diligence before the dead time of Wynter approched, toward the towne of Calyce. And because their going forward might be called of slaunderous tongs a running or flyeng awaye, it was therefore agreed, that the whole armie should passe the next way by lande thorough the middest of their enimies: And yet that iourney was iudged perillous, by reason that the number was much minished by the Flure and other Feuers which sore vexed, and brought to death aboue fiftene hundred persons, which was the very cause that the returne was the soner concluded and agreed vpon: But yet before his departing he entred into the towne of Harflew. And all the men of warre that had not paide their raunsome, he sware them on the holy Euangelistes to yeeld them selues prisoners at Calice, by the feast of saint Martyn in November next folowyng: Dyuers of the Burgesses he highly raunsomed, and a great part of the women and children he put out of the towne, geuing to euery poore creature. v. Sowse. The priestes had lycence to departe, leauing behinde them them their ſubſtaunce. The goodes in the towne were innumerable, which were all praye to the Engliſhmen, which ſent the beſt into England as a token of good luck. There were two ſtrong Towers ſtanding on the Hauen ſyde, which looking for ayde did not yeelde tenne dayes after the towne was rendered.

When the king had repayred the towne, and fortefied and furniſhed the ſame with men, munition, and victuall, he remoued from Harflew to Pountheyſe, entending to paſſe the ryuer of Some with his army, before the bridges were eyther withdrawen or broken.

The French king heering that the towne of Harflew was taken by the king of Englande, and that he was marchyng forward into the Bowelles of the realme, ſent out his proclamations, and aſſembled his people in euery quarter, committing the whole charge of his armie to his ſonne the Dolphin and the Duke of Aquiteyn, which incontinent cauſed the Bridges to be broken, and all the paſſages to be defended: beſyde that, they cauſed all corne and other victuall to be deſtroyed in all places, where they coniectured that the Engliſhmen would repayre or paſſe thorough, to the intent that they might eyther keepe them in a place certayne without any paſſage or departure, and ſo to deſtroye them at their pleaſures, or elſe to keepe them in a ſtrayte without victuailes or comfort, and ſo by famine eyther cauſe them to dye or yeelde.

Blanchetaque a paſſage ouer the ryuer of Some.

The king of Englande afflicted with all theſe incommodities at one tyme was neyther diſmayed nor diſcouraged, but keeping forth his iourney approched to the ryuer of Some, where he perceaued that all the Bridges were by his enimies broken and vnframed: wherefore he came to the paſſage called Blanchetaque, where king Edwards great graūdfather paſſed the ryuer of Some before the battayle of Creſſy: But the paſſage was ſo kept that he could not paſſe without great daunger, conſydering that his enimies were both before his face, and hard behinde his backe: But yet he paſſed forward, burnyng Villages and taking great booties, and euery day he ſent his light horſemen abroad to ſpie and ſeke what perilles there were at hande, and what embuſhments were layde on the one ſyde or the other, and where he might moſt ſafely paſſe the riuer. The eſpialles returned and declared for a truth that the countrie ſwarmed with men of warre, whereof he being aduertiſed, ſet forth in good order, keeping ſtill his way forward, and ſo ordered his armie and placed his cariage, that hauing his enimies on both ſides of him, he paſſed ſo terribly that his enimies were afrayde once to offer him battayle: And yet the Lorde Delabreth Conſtable of Fraunce, the Marſhall Boncequalt, the Erle of Vandoſme great Maſter of Fraunce and the Lorde Dampier Admirall of Fraunce, the Duke of Alanſon, and the Erle of Richmond with all the puyſſaunce of the Dolphyn lay at Abuyle, and durſt not once touche his battayles, but euer kept the paſſages, and coaſted aloofe lyke a Hawke that lyketh not her praye.

The king of Englande ſtill kept on his iourney vntill he came to the Bridge of ſaint Marence, where he found aboue .xxx. thouſand Frenchmen, and there pitched his fielde, looking ſurely to be ſet on and foughten with all: wherefore to encourage his Captaynes the more, he dubbed certaine of his valyaunt and hardy gentlemen knightes, as:

But after the king sawe that the Frenchmen made no semblaunce to fight, he departed in good order of battayle by the towne of Imyence, to a towne neere to a Castell called Bowes, and there laye two dayes, looking euery houre for battayle. And from thence he came neere to Corby, where he was steyed that night by reason that the common people and Pesaunts of the country assembled in great number, and the men of armes of the Garrison of Corby skirmished with his armie in the morning, which taryeng was to him both ioyous and profitable, for there he discomfited the crewe of horsemen, and draue the rusticall people euen to their gates, and found there the same day a shalow foorde betwene Corby and Peron, which neuer was espied before. At the which he, his armie and cariages the night ensuyng passed the ryuer of Some without let or daũger, and then determined with all diligence to passe the ryuer of Some, without let or daunger, and then determined with all diligence to passe forward to Calice, and not to seeke for battayle, except he were therevnto constreyned, for his armie by sickenesse was sore minished, for he had onely two thousand horsemen, and.xuj.thousand Archers, bill men and of all sortes: The Englishmen were afflicted in this iourney with an hundred discommodities, for their victuall was in maner all spent, and newe they coulde get none, for the enemies had destroyed all before their comming: Rest they could take none, for their enemies were euer at hand: daylie it rayned, and nightly it freesed, of Fuell was scarcenesse, and of Fluxes was plenty, money they had ynough, but comfort they had none.

The Englishmen were sore afflicted.

The French king being at Roan, and hering that the king of Englande was passed the water of Some, was not a little discontent (and as Hall sayth) assembled his counsayle to the number of.xxxv. to consult what should be done, the chiefe wherof, were the Dolphyn his sonne, whose name was Lewes, callyng himselfe king of Cicile, the Dukes of Berry and Britayn, the Erle of Pontieu the kings youngest sonne, and dyuers other, whereof xxx. agreed that the Englishmen should not departe vnfoughten withall, and fyue were of the contrary opinio, but the greater number ruled the matter. And so Mountioy king at Armes was sent to the king of Englande to defye him as the enemie of Fraunce, and to tell him that he should shortly haue battayle. King Henry soberly answered: Sir my entent and desyre is none other, but to do as pleaseth almightie God, and as it becommeth me, for surely I will not seeke your mayster at this time: But if he or his seeke me, I will willingly fight with hym. And if any of your nation attempt once to stop me in my iourney toward Caleys, at their ieopardie be it, and yet my desyre is that none of you be so vnaduised or harebreyned, as to be the occasion that I in mine awne defence should be the effusion of Christian bloud, and thus he rewarded the Herault, and lycenced him to depart.

When the Lordes of Fraunce heard the king of Englandes answere,

it was incontinent proclaymed, that all men of warre should resorte to the Conestable of Fraunce, to fight with the king of Englande, and his puyssaunce: wherevpon all men accustomed to beare armour, and desyrous to wynne honour thorough the realme of Fraunce, drewe toward the field. The Dolphyn sore desyred to be at that battayle, but he was prohibited by the king his father: Lykewise Philip Erle of Charolous sonne to the Duke of Burgoyn would gladly haue beene at that noble assembly, if the Duke his father would haue suffred him, but many of his men stale awaye, and went to the Frenchmen.

The king of England being informed by his Espialles that the daye of battayle was neerer then he looked for, dislodged from Bompers, and went in good aray thorough the fayre playne, beside the towne of Blangy, where to the intent that his armie should not be included in a streight, or driuen to a corner, he chose a place meete and conuenient for two armies to darrayne battayle betweene the townes of Blangy and Agincourte, where he pight hys fielde.

The Conestable of Fraunce, the Admirall, the Lorde Rambures master of the Crosbowes, and dyuers Lordes and knightes pitched their Banners neere to the Banner royall of the Constable, in the Countie of Saint Paule within the territorie of Agincourt, by the which waye the Englishe men must needes passe towarde Caleys. The frenchmen made great fyres about their Banners, and they were in number.lx. thousand horsemen as their awne historians and writers affirme, beside footemen, pages and Wagoners, and all that night they made great cheere and were mery. The Englishmen also that night sounded their trumpets, and dyuers Instruments musicall with great melodie, and yet they were both hungrie, werie, sore trauayled and muche vered with colde diseases: Howbeit they made peace with God and their consciences, euery man encouraging other rather manfully to dye, then eyther to yeelde or flie.

The courage of the Englishmen.

The battayle of Agincourt

Nowe approched the fortunate and fayre day to the English men, and a blacke and vnluckie day to the French men, which was the.xxv.day of October.1415. beyng then Friday. On the which day in the morning, the French men made three battayles. In the Vaward were.viij. thousande healmes of knightes & Esquiers, and foure thousand Archers, and.xv. C. Crosbowes, which were guyded by the Lorde Delabreth Constable of Fraunce, hauyng with him the Dukes of Orleaunce, and Burbon, the Erles of Ewe, & Richemond, the Marshal Bonciqualt, and the maister of the Crosbowes, the Lord Dampier Admirall of Fraunce, and other Capteynes, and the Erle of Vandosme, and other the kinges officers, with.xvj.hundreth men of Armes, and they were ordered for a wing to that battaile. And the other wing was guyded by Sir Guyshard Dolphin, and sir Clugnet of Brabant, and sir Lewes of Burbon, with.viij. hundreth men of Armes of chosen persons. And to breake the shot of the Englishe men, were appoynted sir Guylliam de Sauensens, with Hector and Philip his brethren, Ferrey of Maylley, and Alein of Gaspanes, with other.viij.C men of Armes. In the middle ward were assigned as many persons and mo as were assigned in the Vaward, and therof was the charge committed to the Dukes of Barre, and Alenson, the Erles of Neuers, Vawdemount Blamount, Salings, Graunt pree, & of Rusly. And in in the rereward were all the other men of armes, guyded by the Erles of Marle, Dampmartyne, Fauconberge, and the Lorde Lurrey, Capteyne of Arde, who had with him men of the Frontiers of Bolonoys.

When these Battayles were thus ordered, it was a glorious sight to beholde them, and surely they were esteemed to be in number six tymes as many or more then was the whole companie of Englishe men with Wagones, Pages and all. And now both the Armies beyng in a redinesse, the Constable of Fraunce with an eloquent and earnest Oration, encouraged hys souldiours manfully that day to stande to it for the honour of Fraunce: The king of England did no lesse prudently and valiauntly stirre vp the heartes of his people. And these exhortations ended, the king of England had placed priuely two hundreth Archers in a lowe medowe nere to the forwarde of his enemies, but yet separate with a great diche, and they were commaunded to kepe themselues close vntill they had a token geuen them to shote. Beside this he appoynted a Vawarde, of the which he made Capteyne Edwarde Duke of Yorke, which of a haute courage obteyned of the king by petition that office, and with him were the Lordes Beamond, Willoughby, and Fanhope, and this battaile was all Archers. The middle ward was guyded by the king himselfe, with his brother the Duke of Gloucester, and the Erles Marshall, Orford, and Suffolke, in the which were all the strong bill men. The Duke of Exceter, Uncle vnto the king, had the rereward which was myxed both with Archares and Bill men. The horsemen like winges went on euery side of the battaile. When the king had thus ordered his battaile, yet fearyng least the French men would compasse and beset him about, lyke a wise and a politike prince, he caused stakes bound with yron sharpe at both the endes, of the length of.v.or.vj. foote, to be pitched before the Archers, to the entent that if the barde horses ranne rashely vpon them, they might shortly be gored and destroyed, and appoynted certeine personnes to remoue the stakes when the Archers moued, as tyme requyred: so that the footemen were hedged about with the stakes, & the horsemen stoode lyke a Bulwarke betwene them and their enemyes, without the stakes. This deuice of fortefiyng of an armie with stakes, was at this tyme first deuised and practised, but since that tyme they haue deuysed, Caltroppes, Harrowes, and other newe trickes. All thinges beyng thus set in order, nowe approched the battaile. But here Hall sheweth at large, howe that the French men the night before had made themselues assured of the victorie, and had diuided the prisoners and spoyles among them, and had cast lottes for them, but it is an olde prouerbe that he that maketh his reconyng without his hoste, must be faine to recon twise, and also it is a true saiyng, that man purposeth, but God disposeth, for victory is the gift of God, as may appere by the sequele of this battaile, which happened to the Englishe men rather miraculously then otherwise. Therefore to God the king very well gaue the praise thereof, as in the ende of the same ye shall heere.

A good intention.

Nowe the armies approchyng somewhat nere, an olde knight called Sir Thomas Harpyngton, a man of great experience in warre, with a Warder in his hande. And when he cast vp the Warder, all the armie showted, at the which the Frenchmen much marueyled: But that was a signe to the Archers in the Medowe, which knowyng the token shot wholy altogether at the Vaward of the French men. When they perceyued the Archers in the Medowe, whome they sawe not before, and sawe they could not come to them for a ditche, they with al hast set on king Henries Forward: But ere they ioyned, the Archers in the forefront, and the Archers on the syde, which stoode in the Medowe, so wounded the fotemen, so galled the horsses, and so combred the men of Armes, that the footemen durst not go forward, the horsemen ranne in plompes without order, some ouerthrewe his felowe, and horses ouerthrewe their maisters: So at the first ioynyng, as the Frenche men were clerely discouraged, so the Englishe men were muche chered and comforted. When the French Vaward was thus discomfited, the Englishe Archers cast away theyr Bowes, and toke into their handes, Axes, Malles, Swordes and Billes, and therewith slue the French men, vntill they came to the middle warde. Then the king approched, and so encouraged his souldiours, that shortly the seconde battaile was ouerthrowne, and dispersed, but not without great slaughter of men, for the French men strongly withstood the fiercenesse of the English men, when they came to handie strokes, so that the fight was very doubtfull and perillous. And when one part of the french horsemen thought to haue entered into the kinges battaile, they were wyth the stakes ouerthrowne and slaine, or taken.

A valyaunt Prince.

Thus the battaile continued three long houres. The king ỳ day shewed himself a valiaunt Prince, for notwithstandyng that he was almost felled by the Duke of Alanson, yet with plain strength he slue two of the Dukes companie, and felled the Duke: But when the Duke woulde haue yelded vnto him, the kinges garde, contrary to the kinges minde, outragiously slue him. And in conclusion, minding to make an ende of that dayes iourney, caused his horsemen to fetch a compasse about, and to ioyne with him against the rereward of Fraunce, in the which battaile were the greatest number of people. When the French men perceyued his entent, they were sodeinly amased, and ranne away lyke sheepe, without array or order. When the king perceyued the Banners cast downe, and the array clerely broken, he encouraged hys Souldiors, and folowed so quickly, that the French men turnyng to flight, ran hether and thether, not knowyng which way to take, castyng away their armour, and on their knees desyred to haue their liues saued.

In this meane tyme, while the battaile continued, and that the Englishe men had taken a great number of prisoners, certeine Frenche men on horseback, whereof were Capteynes, Robinet of Bozneuile, Rifflarde of Clamas, and Iſambert of Agincourt, and other men of armes, to the number of vj. hundreth horsemen, which fled first from the field at their first commyng, and beeryng that the Englishe Tentes and Pauillions were farre from the armie, and without any great number of keepers or persons mete and conuenient for defence, partly moued with couetousnesse of spoyle and pray, and partly entendyng by some notable act to reuenge the dammage and displeasure done to them and theirs in the battaile the same day, entered into the kinges Campe, beyng voyde of men, and fortefyed with Hierlettes and Lackeyes, and there spoyled Hales, robbed Tentes, brake vp Chestes, and caried away Caskettes, and slue suche seruauntes, as they there found: For the which act they were long imprisoned and sore punished, and lyke to haue lost their lyues if the Dolphyn had lenger lyued.

But

But when the king of Englande by a fearefull messenger was sodenly aduertised of thys newe onset, and also heard the outcrie of the Lackeyes, he fearing least his enimies were gathered together agayne, and doubtyng that the great number of prisoners that were taken, would rather take parte with the enemies then with him, did therefore by proclamation commaund throughout the armie that euery man should kyll his prisoner, vpon paine of death. When this dolorous commaundement was pronounced, pittie it was to see, and more lothsome to beholde how some frenchmen were sodainely sticked with daggers, some brayned with Polaxes, some beaten downe with Malles, some their throtes cut, and some their bellies cut, and their paunches hanged out, so that in effect, hauing respect to the great number of prisoners, fewe or none was saued.

When this lamentable manslaughter was fynished, the Englishe men forgetting their woundes, and not remembring what paine they had sustayned all that daye in fighting with their enimies, as men that were freshe and lustie, raunged themselues agayne in araye, both prest and ready to abide a newe fielde, and also to inuade a fresh their enimies, and there withall courageously set vpon the Erle of Marle and Fawconbridge, and the Lords of Lonray and of Thyne, which with .vj.C. men of armes had all daye kept together, and slue them out of hande.

After this last conflict, the king of Englande passed thorough the fielde, and sawe neyther resistaunce nor the apparaunce of any frenchmen, sauing the dead Corpses, wherefore he caused a retrayte to be blowen, and brought all his armie together, about foure of the clock at after noone, and first (as Hall sayth) callyng his prelates together, caused them to geue thankes to God, by whose almightie power he had receaued that victorie, and to sing the Psalme of In exitu Israel. &c. Commaunding euery man to kneele downe, when they came at this verse, Non nobis domine, non nobis, sed nomini tuo da gloriam. Which is in Englishe, Not vnto vs O Lorde, not vnto vs, but vnto thy name be geuen the prayse and glory, & then caused the psalme of Te deum to be song, so that it might euidently appere that this noble prince had a perfite fayth and trust in the ayde of God, which heard his prayer, and regarded his fayth, and therefore gaue him the victorie.

That night he was refreshed with suche as he founde in the Frenche campe, and in the morning Mountioy king at Armes, and foure Heraultes came vnto him to knowe the number of prisoners, and to desyre buriall for them which were slayne. But before he aunswered the Heraults, he calling to remembraunce, that it was more honourable to be praysed of his enimies then extolled of his friendes, did therefore demaunde of them why they made to him that request, for that he was not certaine whether the prayse of that victorie ought to be attributed to him or to their Nation? O Lorde quod Mountioy, thinke you vs officers of Armes to be rude and bestiall? If we for the affection that we beare to our naturall Countrie, would eyther for fauour or meede hyde or denie your glorious victorie: The Foules of the ayre and wormes of the ground will beare witnesse agaynst vs, and so wyll the Captiues that are yet in your possession. Wherefore according to the dutie of our office, which is or should be alwayes indifferently to write, and truly to iudge, and therefore we saye and affirme, that the victorie is youres, the hor noz is youres, and youres is the glozie, aduising you as you haue manfully gotten it, so politiquely to vse it. Well sayde the king, seing this is your determination, I wyllingly accept it, desyzing you to shewe me the name of the Castell neere adioyning, and they answered it was called Agincourt: Then sayde the king, this conflict shall be called the battayle of Agincourt, which victozie hath not bene obteyned by vs noz our power, but by the ayde and sufferaunce of almightie God, foz the iniurie and vntruth that we haue receyued at the handes of your pzince and his nation. And that daye he feasted the French officers of armes, and graunted to them their request, which busily sought thozough the fielde foz such as were slayne: But the Englishmen suffred them not to go alone, foz they searched with them, and found manye hurte, but not in ieopardy of their lyfe, whome they tooke pzisoners, and bzought them into their tents.

When the king of Englande had well refreshed himselfe and hys souldyours, and had taken the spoyle of suche as were slaine, he with his pzisoners in good ozder returned toward his towne of Calice.

When tydings of this notable victozie was perfitely knowne in Englande, there was no small ioye and reioysing with pzaysing of God, and making of Bonefyzes with all the triumph that might be made.

On the Sundaye, after the king was departed toward Caleys, diuers Frenchmen repayzed to the playne where the battayle was, and remoued agayne the dead bodyes, some to finde out their Masters, and to bury them, and some to take the reliques which the Englishmen had left. Foz the Englishe men tooke nothing but Golde, Siluer, Jewelles, riche apparell and costly armour: But the ploughmen and Peysaunts spoyled the deade Carcasses, leauing them neyther shyzt noz clowte, and so they laye starke naked vntill Wednesday. On the which day diuers of the noble men were conueyed into their countries, and the remnaunt were by Philip Erle of Charoloys (soze lamenting the chaunce, and moued with pittie) at his coste and charge buried in a square plot of fiftene hundzed yardes, in the which he caused to be made thzee pittes, wherin was buried by accompt fiue thousand and. viij. hundzed persons beside them which were caryed away, and other that were wounded to the death, and were caryed to Hospitalles and there dyed.

And certainely by the relation of Heraultes, and declaration of other noble perſons worthy of credite, as Enguerrant writeth, there were ſlaine at this battayle on the French parte, aboue ten thouſand perſons, whereof were princes and nobles bearing banners. Crrbj. and all the remnaunt ſauing. rbj. C. were knightes, Eſquires and Gentlemen: So of noble men and Gentlemen were ſlayne eyght thouſand, and foure hundred, of the which fiue hundred were dubbed knightes, the night before the battayle. From the fielde eſcaped alyue the Erle Dampmartyn, Clunet of Brabant, Sir Lewes of Burbon, Sir Galliot of Gaulles, Sir John Dengearmes, and fewe other men of name.

Of Engliſhemen were ſlaine at this battaile, Edward Duke of Yorke, The Erle of Suffolke, Sir Richard Kikeley, and Dauigam Eſquier, and of all other not aboue fiue or ſixe hundreth perſons.

After that the king had refreſhed himſelfe in the Towne of Calice, and that ſuch priſoners as he had left at Harflew, as you haue heard, were come vnto him to Calice: Then he the firſt day of Nouember with all his priſoners tooke ſhippyng at Calice, and the ſame day landed at Douer, hauyng with him the deade bodyes of the Duke of Yorke, and the Erle of Suffolke, and cauſed the Duke to be buryed at his Colledge of Foderynghey, and the Erle at Ewhelme. And by ſoft iourneyes he came to London, and was met and receyued at Blackheth by the Maior and Aldermen of London, clothed in ſcarlet, and three hundreth Commoners clothed in murrey, with all ioy and ſolemnitie, praiſyng God for the high honour & victorie that he had obteyned.

Heauy newes to the french king.

But now to returne to the french king, when ỹ heauy newes of the loſſe of the aforeſayde battaile came vnto him, he then lyeng at Roan, and wyth him him the Dolphyn, the Dukes of Berrey, and Briteyn, and his second sonne the Erle of Ponthewe, though the same were most grieuous vnto him, no man ought to merueyle. Wherefore the Frenche king perceyuyng that the warre was nowe but newely begon, determined to prouide for chaunces to come before they should sodeinly happen. And first he elected his chiefe officer for the warres called the Constable, which was the Erle of Arminacke, a wise and pollitique Capteine, and an auncient enemie to the English men, and Sir John of Cozsey was made maister of the Crosbowes, and then they fortefyed townes, and furnished garisons. While these thinges were thus in working, eyther for Melancholy that he had for the losse sustayned at Agyncourt aforesayde, or else by some sodeine disease, John Dolphyn of Vyennoys, heyre apparant to Charles the French king, departed out of this natu-

1415 4 After this notable victorie obteyned by the Englishe men, and that king Henry was departed into England, and the French king had made his new officers, as aforesayd. Thomas Duke of Exceter Captein of Harflew, accompanied with three thousand Englishmen, made a great road into Normandy, almost to the Citie of Roan: In which iourney he gate great aboundaunce both of riches and prisoners. But in his returne the Erle of Arminack newly made Constable of Fraunce, entendyng in this his first iourney to winne his spurres, and in his companie aboue fiue thousand horsemen, encountered with him. The skirmishe was sore, and the fight fierce, but because the Englishe men were not able to resist the force of the French horsemen, the Duke to saue his men, was compelled to retyre as politikely as he could deuyse:
A sore skirmishe. But for all that he could do, he lost three hundreth of his men. The Frenche men not content with this good lucke, folowed them almost to the Barryers of Harflew. When the Englishe men within the towne espied the chase, they issued out in good order, and met with their enemies, and not onely slue and tooke a great number of them, but also chased them aboue. viij. Myles towarde the Citie of Roan.

Sigismond Emperour. And about this season, Sigismond Emperour of Almaine, which had maryed Barbara daughter to the Erle of Zilie, Cosyn Germain remoued to king Henry, a man of great vertue, & fidelitie, which had not only long labored to set an vnitie and concorde in Christes Church, and Christian religion, but also he sent dyuerse Ambassadors, aswell to the Frenche king as to the king of England, because he was farre distant from their countries and regions to encrease perfect peace and vnitie. Wherefore he perceyuyng that his Ambassade brought nothing to such conclusion as he wished, did therefore in his awne person come from the furthermost part of Hungary into Fraunce, and after into England, entendyng to knit together all Christian Princes in one amitie and frendship, and so beyng friendes together, to make warre and reuenge their quarelles agaynst the Turke, the persecutor of Christes fayth, and enemy to all Christendom. And with this noble Prince came the Archebishop of Reynes, and dyuerse other noble men, as Ambassadors from the French king, into England. The king of England for olde amitie betwene the house of England and Beame, accompanied with all his Albert duke of Holland.

During which tyme, there came into Englande Albert Duke of Holland, who also was friendly entertayned. And these two Princes were by the king conueyed to Windsore to saint Georges feast, and there were elected companions of the noble order of the Garter, and had the Coler and Habite of the same to them deliuered, and sate in their stalles all the solemnitie of the feast, by the which order they knowleged themselues to be highly honoured, and much exalted. After this solempne feast finished, the Duke of Holland well feasted, and greatly rewarded, returned into his Country. But the Emperour tarryed styll, neuer ceasyng to declare and perswade, what vtilitie, what goodnesse, and what ioy might ensue, if both the realmes of England and Fraunce were brought to a finall concord, and perfect vnitie. But the euill chaunce of the French Nation was to his purpose a barre, and a let, because they were predestinate to suffer yet mo plagues and detrimentes at the handes of the English men. For when concorde was at hande, and peace was enteryng into the Gates, a new cause of more discorde and dissension sodeinly brake out, and came to the kinges knowlege: For he beyng informed of the losse of his men in the territorie of Roan (as you haue heard) was so sore displeased, that he would heere of no treatie, nor haue once this worde (peace) named.

The Emperour entereth into a league with the king of England.

The Emperour like a wise Prince, perceiuyng that the tyme would not serue to bring to passe that he came for, ceassed any further to trauaile therein. And leauyng all treatie and perswasion for Fraunce, he entered into a league and amitie himselfe with the king of England. Which confederatye least it should be broken, they studyed and deuised all wayes and meanes possible, for the preseruation and obseruation of the same: Which plaine meanyng, and true dealyng was afterwarde to them both, not onely much honour, but great commoditie. Nowe when the Emperour had thus concluded a league with the king of England, he tooke his iourney homeward into Germanie: and the king of England, partly to shewe him pleasure, and partly because of his awne affayres, associated him to his towne of Calice: during which time the Duke of Burgoyn offered to come to Calice to speake with the Emperour and the king, because he hearde talke of the league and confederacie that was concluded betweene them. The king sent to the water of Graueleyng, the Duke of Gloucester his brother, and the Erle of Marche, to be hostages for the Duke of Burgoyn, and sent also the Erle of Warwike with a noble companie to conduct him to his presence. At Graueleyng foorde the Dukes met, and after salutations done, the Duke of Burgoyn was conueyed to Calice, where of the Emperor, and of the king he was highly welcomed and feasted: During which tyme, a peace was concluded betweene the king of England, and the Duke of Burgon, for a certein space, concernyng onely the Counties of Flaundrys, and Arthoys, for the which cause the French king and his sonne was highly displeased. The Duke of Gloucester was receyued at Graueleyng by the Erle of Caroloys, sonne to the Duke of Burgoyn, and by him honourably conueyed to Saint Omers, and there lodged ged that night. The next day the Erle Caroloys came with diuers noble men to visit the Duke of Glouceſter in his lodgyng. And when he entered into his Chamber, the Dukes backe was towarde him, talkyng with ſome of his ſeruantes, and did not ſee nor welcome the Erle Charoloys at the firſt entrie: But after he ſayde ſhortly, without any great reuerence or comming towardes him: ye are welcome fayre Coſſyn, and ſo paſſed forth his tale with his ſeruauntes. The Erle Charoloys for all his youth was not well content, but ſuffered for that tyme.

When the Duke of Burgoyn had done all thinges at Calice that he came for, he after the. ix. day returned to Graueſyng, where the Duke of Glouceſter and he met againe, and louyngly departed, the one to Calice, and the other to Saint Omers: For the which voyage the Duke of Burgoyn was ſuſpected to be enemie to the Crowne of Fraunce. After the Dukes departure, the Emperour was highly feaſted and rewarded, and at his pleaſure ſayled into Holland, and ſo road into Beame. The king likewiſe tooke Ship and returned into England, on Saint Lukes euen, the yere of our Lorde. 1417.

In this meane tyme, the Erle of Arminack puffed vp with his laſt victorie, although the honour were ſmall, and the gaine leſſe, determined clerely to get againe the towne of Harflew. Wherefore as cloſely as he could, he gathered together men in euery place, and appoynted them all to mete him at Harflew at a day aſſigned. The appoyntment was kept, and the towne was beſieged both by water and land, before the Capteynes of the towne knewe perfectlye the firſt motion. For Iohn Vicont Narbon, Viceadmirall of Fraunce had brought the whole nauie to the ryuage and ſhore adioinyng to the towne, entendyng priuily to haue entered the towne before he had beene perceyued. But this ſubtile imagination tooke no place, for they which kept the watche tower, ſodeinly perceyuyng their enemies to approche, rang the Larom Bell: And the Duke of Exceter incontinently cauſed all men to repayre to the walles, and fortefyed the Gates, and diſpatched a ſwift Barke to the king of England with letters, requiryng him of ayde and ſuccour. And although the French men perceyued that their wily enterpriſe was knowne, and that the towne could not ſo ſodeinly be ſtolen and taken as they had deuiſed, yet they continued their ſiege both by water and by land, and made dyuerſe aſſaultes, at the which if they nothyng gayned, yet euer ſomewhat they loſt.

Harflew beſieged by the Frenchmen.

When theſe newes were come to the eares of king Henrie, and that he knewe that his people were in great ieopardie, except that great diligence were vſed for their reliefe and deliueraunce, he without delay apparelled a great nauie, and made Chiefteine thereof the Duke of Bedford, who beyng accompanied with the Erles of Marche, Orenford, Huntyngdon, Warwike, Arondell, Sariſbury, Deuonſhire, and dyuerſe Barons, with two hundreth ſayle of good Shippes, well furniſhed with men, munition, and victualles, did with all ſpede ſet forwarde, and beyng chipped at Rye, they with good expedition came to the mouth of the Riuer of Seyne. And when the Vicont of Narbon, who with his nauie kept the mouth of the Riuer of Seyn, perceyued the Engliſhe nauie to approche, he geuyng a token to all his companie, couragiouſly ſet foorth towarde his enemies. The Duke in

likewise valiauntly encountred with them, the fight was long, but not so long as perillous, for battailes of the sea be euer desperate. But after long fight the victorie fell to the Englishe men, and they tooke and sonke almost all the whole nauie of Fraunce, in the which were many Ships, Hulkes, and Caricks, to the number of fiue hundreth. Of the which three great Carectes were sent into England. And in the same conflict were slaine of the Frenche men no small number, as it appeared by their dead bodyes, which swarmed euery day about the Englishe shippes.

The Frenchmen ouerthrowne vpon the Sea.

After this victorie fortunately obteyned, the Duke of Bedford sayled by water vp to the very towne of Harflew, and without let or impediment landed and refreshed it both with victuall and money: which succours if they were welcome to the Duke of Excester his Uncle, I report me to them that haue bene in necessitie, and would haue gladly bene refreshed.

Harflewe is rescued by the Englishemen.

When the Erle of Arminacke heard that the puyssaunt Nauie of Fraunce was vanquyshed and taken, he reysed his siege before the towne, and returned with small hope vnto Paris, as he that had no hope, nor sawe no lykelyhood or meane to recouer agayne the towne of Harflewe, for the which he so sore thirsted.

The Erle of Arminack departeth frō the siege of Harflewe.

After thys discomfiture and great losse, the fortitude and strength of the Frenchmen beganne to decaye, and their bragging bewtie beganne to fade. For nowe the Princes and Nobles of the realme fell into diuision and discorde among themselues, as who say, that the Nobility studyeng how to reuenge their olde iniuries and displeasures, refused to take payne for the aduauncement of the publique wealth, and sauegarde of their awne countrie. And for priuie displeasure, couert malice or hatred, their power began to ware so slender, and their libertie was brought into suche a malicious diuersitie and doubtfull difference, that, as here after shall be shewed, it was meruey le ỹ their countrie was not brought to a perpetuall bondage: Which thing no doubt had followed, if this king Henry of Englande had lenger lyued in this transitorie worlde. For notwithstanding that the Duke of Orleaunce, the Captaine and head of the one faction, was at that tyme captiue and prisoner in England, yet there grew so much priuie displeasure and cancardhatered betwene Charles the Dolphyn and John Duke of Burgoyn, that whyle the one studied and compassed howe to ouercome the other, with armour or with pollicie, with dissimulation or craftie conueyaunce, euerye Journeyman of their faction, and euery noble man partaker with the one or the other, put all their whole studie and diligence to aduaunce forward their sect and parte, and not one of them would take heede how to resist or refell the present ieopardie which was comming out of Englande. And as one inconuenience suffereth many to follow, so was it in Fraunce at this time: For the french king was not of good memorie: The warre that was towarde seemed both doubtfull and perillous: The princes were vntrusty, and at discord, and an hundreth mo things, which might bring the realme to extreme miserie and vtter destruction, as after you shall here.

Discorde among the noble in Fraūce

When the Duke of Bedford had atchieued his enterprice, and performed his commission both in raysing the siege of Harflewe, and victualling of the towne, he with no small number of prisoners, and great abundaunce of praye, as well in shippes and in prouision for the sea, returned into Eng-

1416 5 A parliamẽt.

Shortly after this, the king assembled his high courte of Parliament, and there in open audience made to them a short and pithie Oration, declaring to them the iniuries lately done and committed by the French Nation, and shewed also the iust and lawfull occasion of his warres, and signified also what discorde and ciuile dissention reigned amongst the Nobilitie of Fraunce, and rehearsed many things for the which it were now very necessarie and needefull for his grace and the realme, to represse and ouercome them with all their power and puyssaunce, and that without deferring or prolonging of time, and therefore in all gentle maner desyred them to prouide for money and treasure out of hande for the conduct and wages of souldiours, to the intent that nothing should lacke when they should be ready to set on their enimies.

The whole parliament hearing his causes so iust, and his request so reasonable, did immediately geue their generall assent to ayde him, and caused such somes as they agreed vpon to be foorthwith collected and payed, so glad was all men of these warres, and as all they conceaued good opinion thereof, so it happened in the ende most honorable to the king, and profitable to the subiectes.

John Duke of Bedford made gouernour of the Realme of England.

In this parliament also John Duke of Bedford was made Gouernor or Regent of the realme, and head of the publique wealth, which office he should enioye as long as the king was making warre on the French nation. The king before he would take his voyage, sent the Erle of Huntyngdon to serche and scowre the Seas, least any Frenchmen lyeng in wayte for him might attrap him sodenly, or he had any knowledge of their setting forward.

John Holland Erle of Huntingdon.

This lustie Erle called John Holland, sonne to the Duke of Excester, which was behedded at Circiter in the time of king Henry the fourth, and Collyn to the king, with a great number of shippes searched the sea from the one coast to the other. And in conclusion he encoũtred with. ix. Caricks of Jeane (which Lorde Jaques the Bastard of Burbon had reteyned to serue the french king) and set vpon them sharply, the conflict was great, and the fight long: But in conclusion the Frenchmen were ouercome and fled, and three of the greatest Caricks with their patrones, and Monsire Jaques de Burbon their Admirall were taken with asmuch money as should haue payd the Souldiours of the whole fleete for halfe a yere: And three other Caricks were bowged and sent to the bottome of the sea.

Jaques Bastard of Burbon.

The king of Englande sayleth with a power into Fraunce.

The king heering of this good chaunce, about the ende of Julij tooke his Ship at Portesmouth, accompanyed with the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, brethren to the sayde king, the Erles of Huntyngdon, Merchall, Warwike, Deuonshire, Salsburie, Suffolke and Somerset, the Lords Rosse, Willoughby, Fitz Hugh, Clynton, Scrope, Matriuers, Bourchier, Ferrers of Groby & Ferrers of Chartley, Fanhope and Gray of Codnore, Sir Gilbert Umfreuyle, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and dyuers other: And so hauing winde and wether to his desyre, he landed in Normandie neere vnto a Castell called Touque, where he consulted with his Captaines what waye was best to be taken concerning their high enterprise.

When the Normans heard of the kings arryuall, they were sodainely striken with a deadly feare, and as men amased, and halfe out of their wittes, and forſoke their houſes and bagge and baggage, and ranne into the ſtrong and walled townes. And likewiſe the men of warre, which were left in euerye place to ſcowre the Country, fled into the walled townes, among the rude Commonaltie.

When king Henry had taken counſayle, he layed ſiege to the Caſtell of Touque, being very well fortefied both with nature and mans arte, and began to aſſault it: And although that they within valiauntly defended it, yet by fine force the king ouercame it and tooke it, and all the men that were therein, whome alſo he tooke to mercy, and made Captaine thereof Sir Robert Kirkeley knight. Touque caſtell beſieged and taken.

From thence he paſſed forth to the ſtrong towne of Cane, which ſtandeth in a playne fertile countrey, no ſtronger walled then depe ditched, which was well victualled and replenyſhed with people: For the Citezens fearing the kinges comming, had prouyded for all things neceſſary for defenſe. And aſſone as the king was come he caſt a depe trench with a high mount to prohibite them within the towne to haue any egreſſe or outward paſſage: and that done, beganne fiercely to aſſault the towne: But the men of the towne were nothing abaſhed, and ſtood manly to their defence. The fight was fierce and euery man tooke heede to his charge. The Engliſhmen ſtudied all the wayes poſſible to dammage their enimies, ſome ſhot arrowes, ſome caſt ſtones, and other ſhot Gonnes: Some brake the walles with engines, ſome ſet ſcaling ladders to the walles, and other caſt in Wildfyre, euery man labored to come to hande ſtrokes, which was their deſyre. On the other ſyde, the Normans threwe downe great ſtones, Barres of yron, dartes, hot Pitche, and bremmyng Brimſtone and boyling lead. Diuers dayes this aſſault continued to the great loſſe & hurt of the Engliſhmen. When king Henry perceyued this, he abſteyned from the aſſault, & determined vnderminyng to ouerthrow the walles & towres of the towne, & the Pioners wrought ſo faſt that within fewe dayes, the walles ſtood onely vpon Poſtes ready to fall, when fyre ſhould be put vnto them. The king cauſed his people to approche the walles, and to keepe the Citezens occupied, leaſt they ſhould make a countermine, or to be an impediment to his workemen and labourers, wherefore he cauſed the aſſault to be cried agayne: Then euery man ran to the walles, ſome with ſcaling ladders, ſome with hookes, and ſome with coardes and plom nets, euery man deſyring to get vp on the walles, and hande to hande to graple with his enemie, the Citizens manfully defended. While the fight was quick and fierce on both ſydes: The Engliſhmen in diuers places perſed and brake thorough the walles, and diuers ouertures and holes were made vnder the foundation by the Pioners, by the which the Engliſhmen might eaſely enter into the towne. The king hauing compaſſiō of the townes men, deſyring rather to haue them ſaued then deſtroyed, ſent them worde by an Herault, that yet was time of mercie and clemencie, if they would ſubmit themſelues to his grace: But they obſtinately hoping of ſuccour, anſwered that they would ſtand at their defenſe. Then the Engliſhmen againe ſcaled the walles, and entred thorow the trenches into the towne: The fight was ſore by the ſpace of an houre, but in concluſiō the Engliſhmen obteyned. Cane beſieged and aſſaulted.

Nowe when the king was poſſeſſed of the towne of Cane, he firſt of all commaunded all harneys and weapons to be brought into one place, which was done with diligence without any reſiſtence. Then the miſerable people kneeling on their knees cryed for mercie: To whom the king gaue certaine comfortable wordes and bade them ſtande vp, and then he reſorted to the Church and gaue thanks to God, & after he cauſed a good and great watch that night to garde the towne. And the next day in the morning he called the Magiſtrates and gouernours of the towne into the Senate houſe, where ſome for their ſtony ſtubbernelſe, and mad obſtinacie were adiudged to die, and other were ſore fyned and highly raunſomed. Then he callyng together hys ſouldyours and men of warre, both gaue to them high laudes and prayſes for their manly doings, and alſo diſtributed to euery man accordyng to his deſert the ſpoyle and gayne, taken of the towne and townes men, chiefely becauſe he had tried at that aſſaulte their valiaunt courages, and vnfearefull heartes.

Nowe though the towne were wonne, as aforeſayde, yet the Caſtell which was ſtrong and well fortefied, both with men & al things neceſſary for defence, was ſtill in the Frenchmens poſſeſſion, the captayne whereof, to the entent to ſhew himſelfe valiaunt and not wyllyng to breake his othe, boaſted that he would rather dye in defenſe, then freely to yeelde the Caſtell. King Henry was not minded to ouerthrow the Caſtell (without which it was not eaſie to be won) becauſe it was bewtifull & neceſſary both to kepe the towne from goyng backe, & alſo to defend the ſame when opportunitie ſhould ſerue: Wherefore he ſent worde to the Lorde Mountainy being captaine, that if he would yeelde the Caſtell by a daye, he ſhould departe without dammage: And if he would be obſtinate, he ſhould finde no fauour. When the Captaine and his companions had well conſidered vpon the condition offered, he rendred the Caſtell and yelded themſelues. And ſo the king was poſſeſſed both of the towne and Caſtell of Cane.

Caſtell of Cane is rendred to the king.

While the king of England was beſiegyng this towne, the French men had neyther a conuenient armie to reſiſt their power, nor were redy or able relieue their friendes in this miſerable neceſſitie, becauſe they had ſuch diuiſion & diſſenſion among themſelues, and a good cauſe why: For king Charles was of ſo ſmall wit by reaſon of his ſickneſſe, that he could not rule, and ſo was ſpoyled both of his treaſure and kingdome, and euery man ſpent and waſted the common treaſure.

Charles the Dolphyn of Fraunce.

Charles the Dolphyn beyng of the age of. xbj. or. xbij. yeres, onely lamented and bewayled the ruyne and decay of hys countrie: He onely ſtudyed the aduauncement of the common welth, and he onely deuyſed how to reſiſt his enimies: But hauyng neyther men nor money, was greatly troubled and vnquieted. And in concluſion, by the counſaile of the Erle of Arminack Conſtable of Fraunce, he founde a meane to get all the treaſure and riches which Quene Iſabell his mother had gotten and horded vp in dyuerſe ſecret places: and for the common vtilitie of his Countrie, he ſpent it wiſely in wagyng of his Souldiours, in preparyng of thinges neceſſarie for the warre. The Queene forgettyng the great perill the realme ſtoode in, but remembryng the diſpleaſure to her by this act done, declared her ſonne and the Conſtable to be her mortall enemies, and promiſed that they ſhould be perſecuted to the vttermoſt. And euen for very womanly malice, ſhee ſet in the higheſt aucthoritie about the king her huſband, John Duke of Burgoyn, geuyng

John Duke of Burgoyn is made Regent of Fraunce.

The Duke of Burgoyn hauyng nowe the swoorde of auctoritie, for the which he had so sore longed, and glad to be reuenged of his olde iniuries, began to make warre on the Dolphyn. And purposyng that when he had once tamed and framed to his purpose this yong vnbrideled Gentleman, then he determined, as he might to refell and withstand the common enemies of the realme. The same or like reason moued the Dolphyn, for he mindyng first to repelle and extinct the Ciuile dissension at home, before he would inuade forein enemies, prepared warre to subdue and destroy John Duke of Burgoyn, as the chiefe heade & leader of that wicked and great mischiefe, whereby the realme was much vnquieted, & more decayed, and in a maner brought to a finall ruyne and vtter destruction. Thus Fraunce was inflamed, and in euery part troubled with warre and diuision, and yet no man would eyther prouide in so great a daunger, nor once put forth their fynger to remoue the mischiefe.

King Henry not mindyng to lye still in Normandie, nor yet to leaue his enterprise vnperfourmed, sent the Duke of Clarence to the Sea coast, which with great difficultie gate the towne of Bayeux. The Duke of Gloucester also with small assault, and lesse defence tooke the towne of Liseaux. In the meane season, King Henrie taryed still at Cane, forteflyng the Towne and Castell, and put out of the towne. xb. hundreth women and impotent persons, and replenished the towne with Englishe people. And while the King soiourned at Cane, he kept a solempne feast, and made there many knightes: And beside that, he shewed there an example of great charitie & mercy. For in searching the Castell, he found there innumerable substance of plate & money, belonging to the Citizens: whereof he would not suffer one penny to be touched or conueyed away, but restored the goodes to the owners, and deliuered to euery man his owne.

When the fame of the getting of Cane was blowen through Normandie, the Normanes were so sore afrayed, and so much abashed, that you should not onely haue sene men, women, and children ronnyng in euery way by great plompes from towne to towne, not knowyng whether to flie: But also the rurall persons and husband men draue the Beastes out of the Villages into suche places where they hoped of refuge or defence: So that a man would haue thought that Normandy had sodeinly bene left desolate and voyd of people and Cattaile. But when the rumor was spread abroade of his clemencie shewed to Captiues, and of his mercie graunted to suche as submitted themselues to his grace, all the Capteines of the townes adioynyng came willyngly to his presence, offering to him themselues, their townes, and their goodes. Wherevpon he made proclaymation, that all men which had or would become his Subiectes, and sweare to him allegeaunce, should enioy their goodes and liberties in as large or more ample maner then they did before, which gentle entertaynyng, and fauourable handelyng of the stubborne Normanes, was the very cause why they were not onely content, but also glad to remoue and turne from the Frenchparte, and become subiects to the Crowne of Englande.

When the king had set Cane in good order, he left there for Capteynes, the one of the towne and the other of the Caſtell, Sir Gilbert Unfreuile, and Sir Gilbert Talbot, and made Bailife there Sir Iohn Popham, and ſo departed from Cane to Argenton, which was ſhortly rendred vnto him. Then all theſe townes folowyng, without ſtroke ſtriken, yelded to him, in whom he placed dyuerſe Captaynes.

And while the king wanne thus in Normandie, his nauie loſt nothing on the Sea, for they ſo ſcoured the ſtreames, that neyther Frenchman nor Britein durſt appere: Howbeit one day there aroſe ſo hideous and ſo terrible a ſtorme, that neyther Cable helde, nor Anker preuayled, ſo that if the Erles of March and Huntyngdon had not taken the Hauen of Southhampton, the whole Nauie had periſhed, and the people had bene deſtroyed, and yet the ſauegarde was ſtraunge: For in the ſame Hauen two Balyngers, and two great Caricks laden with marchandiſe were drowned, and the broken maſt of another Caricke was blowen ouer the wall of Hampton (as diuers wryters affirme) ſuch is the power of the winde, and ſuch is the rygour of a tempeſt. When the fury of the winde was allwaged, and the Sea ware calme, the Erles of March, and Huntyngton paſſed ouer the ſea with all their companie, and landed in Normandie, marchyng toward the king, before whom the Normanes fled, as faſt as the fearefull hare doth before the gredie Greyhound. And ſo they paſſed through the Countrie, deſtroying of Villages, and takyng of praies, vntill they came to the king who then was goyng toward Rhoan.

A ſore tempeſt.

Sir Iohn Oldcaſtell.

And duryng this tyme Sir Iohn Oldcaſtell Lord Cobham, of whome mencion is made before, was taken, and after condemned and hanged, and burnt, the whole Hiſtorie whereof you may reade in the booke of the Monuments of the Church.

As the king paſſed to Rhoan, he was ſkirmiſhed with, in ſundry places, but in the ende the victorie ſtill happened vnto him, ſo that nothing that ſtood in his way could ſtop him, for he tooke by force Pountlarch, Louyers and Eureux, and at the laſt came before the Citie of Rhoan, the which was wonderfully fortefyed, for the while he had lyen at the ſiege of Cane, and was in other places of Normandy, the inhabitants of Rhoan had walled it round about, and made dyuers Bulwarkes for the defenſe thereof, they had alſo great great ſtore of victuals, for the whole countrie about had brought thether ſuch as they had: And thether alſo they had brought their plate, Jewels, and money, ſo that the towne was filled with great ryches & treaſure, which cauſed the king to be the more deſyrous thereof, wherefore the laſt daye of Julij he compaſſed the ſame rounde about with a ſtrong ſiege, and gaue therevnto a terrible aſſault. And to the intent that no ayde ſhould paſſe by the ryuer toward the Citie, a great chayne of yron was deuiſed at Pountlarche, and ſet on piles from the one ſide of the water to the other: and beſide that chaine he ſet vp a newe forced bridge, ſufficient both for cariage and paſſage. And at this time the Erle of Warwike was ſent to the towne of Cawdebeck ſtanding on the ryuer ſide betwene the Sea and the Citie of Rhoan, which towne he ſo hardly aſſaulted, that the Captaines offered to ſuffer the Engliſh Nauie to paſſe by their towne without hurte or detriment, to the Citie of Rhoan, and alſo that of Rhoan yeelded, they promiſed to render their towne without anye fayle orfarther delaye: And this compoſition they ſealed, and for performaunce of the ſame they deliuered pledges. And immediately after this agreement the Engliſhe Nauie, to the number of one hundreth Sailes, paſſed by Cawdebeck and came before Rhoan, and beſieged it on the water ſyde. To this ſiege came the Duke of Glouceſter with the Erle of Suffolke and the Lorde of Burgayny, which had taken the towne of Chierburgh, and were lodged before the port of Saint Hilarij, neerer their enemies then any other perſons of the armie.

Rhoan is beſieged.

During this ſiege, arryued at Harflewe the Lorde of Kylmay in Ireland with a band of. xvj. hundreth Iriſhmen, armed in Mayle with Dartes and ſcaynes, after the maner of their countrey, all talle, quick, and delyuer perſons, which came and preſented themſelues before the king, lyeng ſtill at the ſiege: Of whome they were not onely gentlye enterteyned, but alſo (becauſe the king was informed that the French king and the Duke of Burgoyne would ſhortly come, and eyther rayſe the ſiege, or victuall the towne at the Northgate) they were appointed to keepe the Northſyde of the army, and eſpeciall the way that came from the Foreſt of Lyons. Which charge the Lord of Kylmayn and his company ioyfully accepted, and did ſo theyr deuoyre, that no men were more prayſed, nor did more dammage to their enimies then they did, for ſurely their quickneſſe and ſwiftneſſe did more preiudice to their enimies, then their great barbed horſſes did hurte or dammage to the nymble Iriſhmen.

Iriſhe men.

Thus the Citie of Rhoan being compaſſed aboute with enimies, both by water and lande, hauing neyther comfort nor ayde of king nor Dolphyn. And although the armie were ſtrong without, yet within there lacked neyther hardy Captaynes nor manfull Souldiours. And as for people, they had more then ynough: For it was written by him that knewe the number, there were at the time of the ſiege within the Citie of Chriſtian people. CC. and. x. thouſand perſons. The king and his people aſſaulted the towne fiercely: The frenchmen defended it courageouſly and valiauntly: long was the ſiege, and terrible were the aſſaultes, to the loſſe and no gayne of neyther partie: wherefore after the king of England had well conſidered with him ſelfe that by the manifold aſſaultes many of his people periſhed, therefore at the laſt he determined to conquere them by famine. Wherefore he ſtopped all the paſſages both by water and lande that no victuall ſhould be conueyed to the Citie, and he caſt trenches round about, & ſet them full of ſtakes, and defended them with Archers, ſo that they within could haue no waye out, eyther to inuade their enemies, nor departe out of their fortreſſe.

And ſodainly a fayned tydings was brought, that the french king approched with all his power to rayſe the ſiege and to reſcue the Citie: wherefore king Henry commaunded all men to lye in their harneys, leaſt they might by ſome ſubtile cautele be ſurpriſed vnware, and taken vnprouyded. But the French king neyther came nor ſent, to the great wonder of the Engliſhe men.

This ſiege thus contynuyng from Lammas to Chriſtmas, dyuers enterpriſes were attempted and diuers polleties were deuiſed, how euery part might dammage and hurte his aduerſary and enemie, but no parte much reioyſed of their gayne. During which time, victuall began ſore to fayle within the towne, ſo that onely Vineger and water ſerued for drinke, yea and at the length dogges, Rattes, and Myſe ſerued for their meat, and the ſcarcety of victualles was ſo great, that daylie great numbers of people within the Citie dyed for hunger. And the riche men within the towne put out of the gates great numbers of poore people and children, which were by the Engliſhmen that kept the trenches, beaten and driuen back agayne to the gates of the towne, which agaynſt them were cloſed and barred. So that this miſerable people vncomfortably forſaken, and vnnaturally diſpiſed of their awne nation and houſhold felowes, betwene the walles of their Citie, and the trenches of their enimies lay ſtill cryeng for helpe and relefe, for lacke whereof innumerable ſoules daylie died and hourely ſtarued. Yet king Henry moued with pittie and compaſſion, did in the honour of Chriſtes birth on Chriſtmas day refreſhe all the poore people with victuall, to their great comfort, for the which act they not onely thanked him, but alſo prayed to God for his preſeruation and furtheraunce, and for the hinderaunce and euill ſucceſſe of their vnkinde Citezens and vncharitable countrie men.

This miſerable famine daylie more and more encreaſing, ſo daunted the heartes of the bolde Captaines, and ſo abated the courages of the riche Burgeſſes, and ſo tormented the bodyes of the poore Citezens, that the ſtowte Souldiour for faintneſſe could ſcaſe welde his weapon, nor the riche Marchaunt for money coulde not buye a chyuer of bread: So that the commonaltie cryed to the Captaines, and the needie people beſought the Lords to haue compaſſion vpon them, and to inuent ſome waye for their ſuccour and comfort.

The gouernours of the towne, after long conſultation had, conſydering the great neceſſitie that they were in, and ſeing none apparence of ſuccour or relefe, determined it both neceſſary and conuenient to treate with the king of Englande. And vpon newe yeres euen, there came to the walles at the gate of the bridge dyuers commiſſioners, appoynted by the Captaines, which made a ſigne to the Engliſhe men lyeng without, to ſpeake with ſome gentleman or other perſon of authoritie. The Erle of Huntingdon, which kept that part, ſent to them Syr Gilbert Umfreuyle, to whome they declared, that if they might haue a guyde and a ſafeconduyt, they woulde gladly ſpeake with the king. Sir Gilbert not onely promiſed to doe their meſſage,

but also to certefie them of the kings pleasure and purpose, which communication ended, he repayred to the Duke of Clarence, and other of the kings Counsayle, aduertising them of the request of the Citezens, which incontinent assembled themselues in the kings lodging, where Syr Gilbert Umfreuyle wisely and discreetely declared to the king, the mindes and entents of the Citezens. The king lyke a graue prince consydering that a thing gotten without effusion of blonde is both honorable and profitable, and sawe that the haute courages of the bragging French men were sore abated and almost tamed, thought it conuenient to here their lowly peticion and humble request, and therefore willed Sir Gilbert to aduertise them that he was content to here twelue of them, which should be safely conueyed to hys presence: And with this aunswere Sir Gilbert departed, and made relation thereof to the Capitaynes standing at the gate: who on the next daye in the morning appoynted foure knightes, foure learned men, and foure Burgesses all clothed in black, to go to the king of England. These twelue persons were receyued at the porte Saint Hillarij, by Sir Gilbert Umfreuyle accompanied with diuers gentlemen and yeomen of the kings houshold, commonly called yeomen of the Crowne, and they were conueyed to the kinges lodging. And shortly after, they were brought into the kings presence, who beheld them with a fierce and princely countenaunce. And one of them beyng of a stowte courage spake vnto the king as foloweth: Right high and mightie prince, if you will consyder wherein the glorie of victorie doth consist, you shall playnely perceaue that the same is in the taming of prowde men, and ouercomming of valiaunt souldyours, and subduyng of strong Cities, and not in slayeng of christen people by hunger and famine, wherein resteth neyther manhood, wyt nor pollecie. What glorie shall you obtayne in kylling of wretches by famine, which death of all deathes is to be dispised? If you wyll shewe your selfe charitable before God, or mercifull before men, let all oure poore people which will depart out of our Citie passe thorough your campe to get their lyuing in other places, and then manfully assault our Citie, and by force (if you dare) subdue and conquere it. And in this doyng if your enterprise succeede well, then shall ye not onely obteyne worldly fame and glory, but also merite much of God, in hauing pitie and compassion of the poore and needy people.

A prowde and presumptuous French man.

When this bragger had sayde, the king which no request lesse suspected then that which they desyred, began a while to muse. And when he had well considered the subtile & craftie inuention of the Messengers, he with a fierce countenaunce, and a bolde spirite made to them this aunswere. Thinke you O fantasticall Frenchemen, that I am so ignorant, that I can not perceyue your double dealyng and craftie conueyaunce? Judge you me so symple, that I knowe not wherein the glory of a Conquerour consisteth? Esteeme you me so ignorant, that I perceyue not what crafts and warlike pollicies by strong enemies are to be subdued and brought to subiection? Yes, I am not so loyteryng a truand as to forget so good a lesson. And if these things be to you blind and obscure, I will declare and open them vnto you. The Goddesse of warre called Bellona (which is the Correctrice of Princes for right withholdyng, or iniury doyng, and the plague of God for euill liuyng) hath these three handmaydes, euer of necessitie to attend vpon her, that is, blood, fyre, and famine, mine, which thre Damoselles be of that force and strength that euery of them alone is able to torment and afflict a proude Prince: But they all beyng ioyned together, are of puyssaunce able to destroy the most populous Countrie and richest region of the worlde. If I by assaultyng of your towne shoulde seeke your blood, although I gayned (as I doubt not but I should) yet my gaine were not clere without some losse of my people, If I set your Citie on fyre, and so consume it and you also, then haue I lost that precious Jewell which I haue so long laboured for. Therefore to saue mine awne people (which is one poynt of glorie in a Captein) and to preserue the towne, which is my iust and lawfull inheritaunce: And to saue as many of you as will not willyngly be destroyed, I haue appoynted the mekest of the three Damosels to afflict and plague you, vntill you be brideled and brought to reason, which shall be when it shall please me, and not at your appoyntment: And therfore I say and affirme, that the gaine of a Capteine by any of these three handmaides is both honorable and triumphant: But of all three, the yongest mayd is in all thing most profitable and commodious. And nowe to aunswere to your demaundes, as touchyng the poore people lyyng in the ditches, I assure you, I more lament your lacke of charitie toward your Christian brethren, yea, and your awne nacion, your awne blood, and your awne Countrie men, then I reioyce at the vndoyng of so many creatures, and castyng away of so many enemyes. You lyke Tirauntes put them out of the towne, to the entent that I should slay them, and yet I haue saued their lyues. You woulde geue them neyther meate nor drinke, and yet I beyng their mortall enemie haue succoured and relieued them: So that if any vncharitie be, it is in you: If any shame or reproch be taken, receyue it your selfe, for you be the doers. If I haue done them good, let God reward me, for I looke of them to haue no thankes, if you haue done them euill, so shall you be done to. And as to suffer your people to passe out of the Citie through my campe, no, no, I will not so accomplishe your cloked request, but you shall kepe them still to spend your victualles: And as to assault your towne, I will you knowe it, that I am thereto both able and willyng as I see tyme and occasion: But seyng the choyse is in my hande to tame you eyther with blood, fyre, or famin, or wyth all, I will take the choyse at my pleasure and not at yours. And with that the king with a frowning countenaunce departed from them into his Chamber, and commaunded them to dyne with his officers.

When he was departed, the French men mernayled at his excellent wit, and mused at the hautinesse of his courage, and after they had dyned and consulted together, they requyred once again to haue accesse vnto his royall presence, which when it was to them graunted, they humbly on their knees besought him to take a truce for. viij. dayes, in the which they might by their Commissioners take some ende and good conclusion betwene him and hys counsaile. The king like a piteous Prince, rather couetyng the preseruation of the people, then their destruction, after good deliberation taken, graunted to them their askyng, with the which aunswere they ioyously returned.

After their departure, there were appoynted and set vp three rich tents, the one for the Lordes of Englande to consult together: The seconde for the Commissioners of the Citie, and the thirde for both partes to argue and debate the matter in. The Commissioners for the Englishe part were, the Erles of Warwike, and Sarilburie, the Lorde Fitzhugh, Sir Water Hungerforde, Sir Gilbert Umfreuile, Sir John Robsert, and John de Vasques de Almada. And for the Frenche part were appoynted Sir Guy de Butteller, and fyue other.

Erles

During this truce, euery day the Commissioners met, the Englishmen accused, and the Frenchmen excused. The Englishemen demaunded muche, and the Frenchmen proffered little. Thus with arguyng and reasonyng the viij. day came, and nothing was done, nor one article concluded. Wherefore the Englishe men toke downe their Tentes, and the French men toke their leaue: But at their departyng, they remembryng themselues, required the Englishe Lordes for the loue of God that the truce might continue vntill the Sonne settyng the next day, to the which the Lordes assented.

When the Frenchmen were returned to Roan, sodeinly in all the towne sprong a rumor that the truce was expired, and nothing determined. Then the poore people ranne about the streetes lyke frantike persons, howlyng, cryng, and callyng their Capteynes and Gouernours murderers, and manquellers, saiyng that for their pryde and stiffe stomacke, all this miserie was happened vnto the towne, threatnyng to slay them if they woulde not agree vnto the king of Englandes demaund and request.

The Magistrates beyng amased with the furie of the people, called all the towne together, to knowe their mindes and opinions. The whole voyce of the Commons was to yeelde, yelde rather then starue. Then the French men in the Euening came to the Tent of Sir John Robsert, requiryng him of gentlenesse to moue the king that the Truce might be prolonged for foure dayes. The king thereunto agreed, and appoynted the Archbishop of Cantorbury, and the other seuen before named for his partie, and the Citizens appoynted an egall number for them. So the Tentes were againe set vp, and dayly were assemblies, and much treatie on both partes. And on the fourth day the treatie was concluded, to the great reioysyng of the poore Citizens of Roan, and the same treatie was conteyned in .xxij. Articles, which for that they are long, I do omit them: But the somme and effect of them were, that they yeelded the towne of Roan, themselues and their goodes vnto the king of England, the .xix. day of January, in the yere aforesayde.

The Citie of Roan is yelded vnto the King of England.

When the rendryng of the Citie of Roan was blowen through Normãdie, and the Kinges Proclamation published through the Countrie, it is in a maner incredible to here what a number of townes yelded vnto the king, not beyng once desyred, which to recite I purpose not, because at this day England possesseth not one of them.

Nowe when the gettyng of Roan, and the deliuery of all the townes aforesayde were blowen through the Realme of Fraunce, the heartes of the Frenchmen were sodeinly heauie, and their courages soone cooled. But who soeuer kicked and winched at this matter, John Duke of Burgoyn raged & swelled, yea, and so muche freated, that he wist not what to say, and lesse to do: And no marueyle, for he was at one tyme vexed with a double disease. For he ruled both king Charles and his, and did all thinges at his will, whether reason agreed or no, and for that cause he knewe that he was neyther free from disdeyn, nor yet deliuered from the scope of malice. And therefore he imagined ꝑ all mischiefes and calamities which chaunced in the common wealth ſhould be imputed and aſſigned to his vnpolitique doyng, or to hys negligent permiſſion. Wherefore he imagined it profitable to the realme, and to him ſelfe moſt auailable, if by any meanes poſſible he could deuiſe any way or meane, by the which he might reconcile and ioyne in amitye the two great and mightie kinges of England and of Fraunce. Which thing once obteyned, and beyng deliuered from all feare of exterior hoſtilitie, he determined firſt to reuenge his quarell agaynſt Charles the Dolphyn, & after to repreſſe all cauſes of grudge or diſdeyne, and to recouer againe both the fauour of the Commonaltie, and alſo to put away all cauſes of ſuſpicion or imagined infamie againſt him and his procedyngs. And intending to buyld vpon this fraile foundation, he ſent letters and Imbaſſadors to the king of England, aduertiſyng him that if he would perſonally come to a communication, to be had betwene him and Charles the French king, he doubted nothing but by hys onely meanes, peace ſhould be induced, and bloodie battaile excluded.

King Henry heard gently the Imbaſſadors, and agreed to their requeſt and deſyre, and ſo came to Maunt, where at the feaſt of Penthecoſt he kept a liberall houſe to all commers, and ſate himſelfe in great eſtate. On which daye eyther for good ſeruice before by them done, or for good hope of things to come, he created Gaſcon de Foyes a valyaunt Gaſcoyne, Erle of Longeuyle, and ſyr John Gray he made Erle of Tankeruyle, and ſyr John Bourſhier Erle of Ewe. After this ſolempne feaſt ended, the place of enterview and meeting was appointed, to be beſide Melaus on the ryuer of Seyne in a fayre playne, euery parte was by the Commiſſioners appointed to their groumde. The frenchmen diched, trenched and paled their lodgings for feare of after clappes: But the Engliſh men had their parte onely barred and poſted. The king of Englande had a large Tent of blewe Veluet and greene, richely embrodered with two deuiſes, the one was an Antlop drawing in an horſe Mill: the other was an Antlop ſitting in an high ſtage, with a braunch of Olife in his mouth. And the tent was garniſhed and decked with this poeſy. After buſie labour, commeth victorious reſt. And on the top and height of the ſame was ſet a great Egle of Golde, whoſe eyes were of ſuche orient Diamondes, that they gliſtered and ſhone ouer the whole field.

The French king likewiſe had in his Parke a fayre Pauilion of blewe Veluet, richely embrodered with flowre deluces, and on the top of the ſame was ſet a Hart flyeng made all of fyne Siluer winges enameled. Betwene theſe two Campes or encloſures was appointed a Tent of purple Veluet, for the counſaylours to meete in, and euery parte had an egall number to watch on the night, and to ſee good order on the daye.

A meeting betwene the king of Englande and the Frenche Quene. &c.

When the day of appointment approched, the king of England accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter his brethren, and the Duke of Exceſter his Uncle, and Henry Bewford Clerck, his other Uncle, which after was Biſhop of Wincheſter and Cardinall, and the Erles of March and Salſburie, and other to the number of a thouſand men of warre entred into his parke, and tooke his lodging. Likewiſe for the french part, thether came Iſabell the French Queene, becauſe the king her huſbande was fallen into his old freneticall diſeaſe, hauing in her company the Duke of Burgoyn, and the Erle of ſaint Paule: And ſhe had attending vpon her the fayre Lady Katheryn her daughter, and. xxvj. Ladyes & Damoſels, and had also for her furniture a thousand men of warre.

After these estates had reposed themselues one night in their Tents, the nert daye all suche as were appointed, repayred toward the pauilion ordeyned for the consultation. Where the king of Englande lyke a prince of great stomacke, and no lesse good behauiour, receyued humbly the Frenche Queene and her daughter, and them honorably embraced, and familierly kissed. The Duke of Burgoyn made lowe curtesie, and bowed to the king, whome the king louingly tooke by the hande, and honorably enterteyned him. After salutations and embracings finished, they fell to counsayle within the Pauilion assigned, which was kept with a garde appointed by both the parties, that none but commissioners should once attempt to enter. After the kings request made, and his demaunds declared: The French Queene and her company tooke leaue louingly of the king of England, and returned vnto Ponthoyse, to certefie her husband. And king Henry returned to Maunt. The nert day after they assembled agayne, and the French parte brought with them the Lady Katheryn, onely to the entent that the king of England seing and beholding so fayre a Lady, and so minion a Damosell, should so be inflamed and rapt in loue, that he to obteyne so bewtifull an espouse, should the sooner agree to a gentle peace and louing composition. This company met together eyght seuerall times, sometime the one parte was more, and sometime the other. And notwithstanding that the Englishe men and frenche men were lodged no great distaunce a sunder, yet was there neuer fray nor occasion of tumult or ryot prouoked or stirred of any of both the partes.

In this assemble many wordes were spent and no deedes done, many things required and fewe offered, many arguments made, and nothing concluded. Some write that the Dolphyn to let this treatie, sent to the Duke of Burgoyn Sir Trauagny du Chastell, declaring to him, that if he would let this agreement, he would common with him, and take suche an order, that not onely they but the whole realme of Fraunce should thereof be glad and reioyce: But what was the very cause of the breache, no man certainely declareth. When none effect ensued of this long consultation, both parties after a Princely maner departed, the Englishe men to Nantes, and the frenche men to Pounthoyse.

The king of Englande was nothing pleased that this communication came to no better ende: wherefore he mistrustyng the Duke of Burgoyn, to be the very let and stop of his desyres and requestes, sayde vnto him before his departing: Fayre Cossyn, we will haue your kinges daughter, and all things that we demaunde with her, or we will driue your king and you out of his realme. Well sayde the Duke of Burgoyn, before yon driue the king and mee out of hys Realme, ye shall be well wearied, and thereof we doubt little.

A treaty concluded betweene the Duke of Burgoyn, and the Dolphyn of Fraunce.

After this departure the Duke of Burgoyn being nobly accompanied, roade to the towne of Melune, where the Dolphyn then soiourneyed, and in the playne fieldes they two lyke friendes commoned together, and concluded apparantly an open amitie and sure friendshyp, which was written by Notaries, and signed with their handes, and sealed with their great seales of armes: But as the sequele sheweth, heart thought not that tongue talked, nor minde meant not, that hande wrote. This treatie was concluded ded the first daye of Julie. 1419. and was proclaymed in Paris, Amyence and Ponthoyse.

When this new alyaunce was declared vnto the king of England, then lyeng at Maunt, he was therewith sore displeased, and not without cause, for he perceaued that the force of these two princes were much stronger now being vnited in one, then they were before when they were separated and diuyded. Yet for all this great sworne amitie he went forward with his entended enterprise. Wherefore he sent Captaine Bueffe brother to the Erle of Foys newly created the Erle of Longeuyle, with .xv. hundreth men secretly to the towne of Ponthoyse, which on Trinitie Sunday early in the morning came into the towne, and so sodainely and quickly had set vp their scaling ladders to the wall, that they were entred into the towne, or the watch perceaued them, cryeng, Saint George, Saint George.

The Lorde Lisleadam Captaine of the towne perceauing the walles scaled, and the market place gayned, opened the gate towarde Paris, at the which, he with all his retinue and dyuerse of the townes men, to the number of eyght thousand, fled. For the Englishe men durst not, because their number was small, once diuide themselues or fall to pilfring, till about nine of the clock, at which time the Duke of Clarence came to their ayde with fiue thousand men, and by the way he encountred diuers Burgesses of the towne flyeng with all their substaunce toward Beauuoys, whome he tooke prisoners, and brought them to their olde dwellyng place.

When the Duke was come to Ponthoyse, he much praysed the valyauntnesse of the assaylants, and gaue to them the chiefe spoyle of the towne and Merchaunts, of the which they had a great and riche praye. Then the Duke passed forwarde and came before Paris, and lay before the Citie two dayes, and two nightes without any proffer, eyther of issue by his enimies or of defence if he had the same assaulted, which he could not well do because it was long and ample, and his number small, and for so great an enterprise not furnished, wherefore seing that his enimies durst not once looke vpon him, he returned agayne to Ponthoyse: For the taking of which towne the countrie of Fraunce, and especially the Parisians were sore dismayed and astonied, for now there was no Fortresse left hable to resist or withstande the Englishmen, bnt that they might come to Paris whensoeuer they would: In so much that the Irishe men ouercame all the Isle of Fraunce, and did to the french men innumerable dammages (as their awne writers affirme) and brought daylie prayes to the English army. And beside that, they would robbe houses, and lay beddes vpon the backs of the kyne and Oxen, and ride vpon them, and carie yong children before them, and sell them to the English men for slaues: which straunge doyngs so feared the french men within the territorie of Paris, and the countrie about, that the rude persons fled out of the Villages with all their stuffe, to the Citie of Paris.

The French king and the Duke of Burgoyn lyng at Saint Dionyse, heeryng of all these doynges, departed in all the hast with the Queene & her daughter to Troys in Champaigne, there takyng great deliberation what was best to be done, leauyng at Paris the Erle of saint Paule, and the Lord Lisleadam with a great puissaunce to defende the Citie. At the same tyme the Duke of Clarence tooke the strong towne of Gysors, and the towne of

Gayllard,

Gayllard, and all the townes of Normandie were shortly after eyther taken by force or rendred, except Mount Saint Michell, which because the gaine therof was very little, and the losse in assaulting of it seined to be very much, and also it could do small harme or none vnto the Countrie, therfore the same was neyther assaulted nor besieged.

And thus, as you haue heard, was the Duchie of Normandy reduced againe to the right line, which had bene from the tyme of king Edwarde the thirde in the yere of our Lorde. 1255. wrongfully deteyned from the kinges of England.

The wise men of Fraunce sore lamenting the chaunce of their Country, and the miserie of their people, sawe and perceyued that they had puissaunce inough to defende their enemies, if they were at a perfect concorde among themselues. And they sawe also that although there were a peace betweene the Dolphyn and the Duke of Burgoyn, yet they espied no good fruit to come therof: For the Duke eyther for secret displeasure ỳ he bare to the Dolphyn, or for the doubt that he had of the Englishemen, neuer assayled by himselfe the armie of king Henry, nor neuer sent ayde nor succours to the Dolphyn. Wherefore by meanes of Frendes a newe communication was appoynted, to the entent that the corrupt dregges of their olde malice and inwarde grudges might clerely be expulsed and cast out. The place of this metyng was appoynted at the Towne of Monstrell Faultyou, so called because a small brooke called You runneth there to the ryuer of Seyne. Ouer which riuer was made a Bridge with dyuerse Barres ouerthwart, so that the princes openyng the Barres might embrace eche other, and keeping the barres shut, eche might see and common with other at their pleasure. The day was appoynted when these two great Princes should meete, to the entent that all Ciuile discorde shoulde by this communication be cleere forgotten, or at the least should be suspended vntill the enemies were banquished and driuen out of their Countries. But this mocion succeded worse then the entreators deuised: For whilest euery man was fulfilled with hope of peace and concorde, craftie imagination crept out of cankerd displeasure, and had almost confounded altogether.

A meeting appointed betweene the Duke of Burgoyn, and the Dolphyn.

When the day and place of the solempne Enteruiew was agreed and assigned, Tauagny du Chastell, a man prompt and prone to all mischiefe, calling to his remembrance ỳ shamefull murder of Lewes Duke of Orleance, (vnder whome he had long bene a Capteine) done and committed by this Duke of Burgoyn, as before you haue heard, determined with himselfe to reuenge the death of his olde maister and Lorde. Some wryte that he was therevnto stirred and prouoked by the Dolphyn (and not vnlike) for the Dolphyn which bare a continuall hatred to the Duke of Burgoyne, imagined paraduenture by this meanes to represse and subdue the whole power and high pride of this Duke, without any suspicion of fraude or reproche of vntruth and villanie. The day came, which was the. xij. day of August, and euery Prince with his number appoynted came to this Bridge. The Duke of Burgoyne beyng warned by his friendes to keepe his Closure, and the Barres on his syde shut, little regarding his friendes monition, as a man lyst could not auoyde the stroke for him prouided, opened the Barres and Closure, and came to the Dolphyns presence, which was cleane armed, and kneled kneled downe on the one knee, shewyng to him great reuerence and humilitie. The Dolphyn shewed to him no louyng countenance, but reproued him, layng to his charge much vntruth, and great dishonour: The Duke againe boldely defended his cause, and kneeled still, and his swoorde was at his back, which with often turnyng and mouing was shaken very backwarde, wherefore the Duke chaunced to put his hand backe to plucke his swoorde forward. What, quod Sir Robert de Loyr, will you drawe your swoorde agaynst my Lorde the Dolphyn? When Tanagny du Chastell apperceyued that an occasion was geuen to performe his enterprice, he incontinent strake him with a Hatchet on the head, so that he coulde not speake, and other standyng by shortly dispatched him of his lyfe. Diuerse of his part, not thinkyng him to be dead, began to drawe weapon, amongest whome the Lorde Nouale was slaine, and the other taken. For this murther were condemned (but not apprehended) by Parliament, the President of Prouynce, the Vicont of Narbone, Guilliam Battailier, Tanagny du Chastell, Robert Loyr, and foure other. This was the ende of John called the proude Duke of Burgoyne, which more regarded ciuile warre then his awne life and welfare. And this sodeyn death, as I thinke, came not to him without desert, for shamefullye murtheryng of Lewes Duke of Orleaunce, the French kinges brother: such is the iudgement of God, that blood is recompensed with blood, and vnnaturall murther is requited with shamefull death, or sodeine destruction.

After this heynous murther thus committed, the Dolphyns seruaunts spoyled the Duke of all his garmentes, euen to his shirt, and couered his face with his hosen: But forasmuch as yet this is no part of the Historie of England, I will returne againe where I left.

When Philip Erle of Caroloys, sonne and heyre to this Duke John, and nowe by the murther and death of his father was made Duke of Burgoyne, and Erle of Flaundyrs, was informed of this misfortune, he toke the matter very grieuously and heauily, insomuch that none of his counsail durst once speake vnto him, and inespeciall the Ladie Michell his wife, who was sister to the Dolphin, and daughter vnto the French king, was in great feare to be forsaken, and cast out of his house and fauour: But as all thinges end, so sorrow asswageth. When his grieuous sorowe was somewhat mitigated, he first by the aduice of his counsaile, tooke into his fauour the fayre Duches his wife, and after sent diuerse notable Ambassadors to the king of England, who lay then at Roan, to treat and conclude a peace betweene them both for a certeyn space: To which request, in hope of a better chaunce, king Henry agreed. And after that, he kept a solempne Obsequie for his father at Saint Vaas in Arras. During which tyme the Erle of Saint Paule, and the Parisiens sent to the Duke of Burgoin Ambassadors, to know what they should do, and howe they should defende themselues agaynst the Englishe men. He gently answered, that he trusted shortly by the ayde of God to conclude a peace betwene England and Fraunce.

A peace concluded betweene Philip Duke of Burgoyn and the king of England.

When these Ambassadors were departed, the Duke after long consultation had with his counsaile and nobilitie, sent the Bishop of Arras and two notable persons to the king of England, with certeine Articles which the Duke of Burgoyn offered to him of loue, as he sayde. The king of England considerying with himselfe that the Duke of Burgoyne was a conuenient instrument ſtrument to bring his purpoſe to paſſe, did therefore louyngly receyue and honourably enterteyn his Ambaſſadors, ſayyng vnto them, that very ſhortly he would ſend his Ambaſſadors vnto hun, that ſhould declare vnto him hys lawfull and reaſonable requeſtes and deſyres.

With this meſſage the Dukes Ambaſſadors departed toward Arras: and incõtinent after their departure, king Henry ſent the Erle of Warwike, & the Biſhop of Rocheſter with many knightes and ſquiers, to the Duke of Burgoyn, who when they came to the Duke, declared the effect of their Ambaſſade. He gently heard their requeſtes, and ſome he allowed, and ſome he augmented, and ſome he altered and diſalowed: But in concluſion the Duke of Burgoyn, and the king of England agreed vpon certeyne Articles, ſo that the French king and his Commons would aſſent vnto the ſame. And ſhortly after it was agreed that the king of Englande ſhoulde ſende in the companie of the Duke of Burgoyn, his Ambaſſadors to Troy in Champein, ſufficiently auctoriſed to conclude ſo great a matter. The king of Englande beyng in good hope that all his affayres ſhould proſperouſly ſucceede and go forwarde, ſent to the Duke of Burgoyn, his Uncle the Duke of Exceter, the Erle of Sariſbury, the Biſhop of Ely, the Lorde Fanhope, & Lord Fitz Hugh ſir John Roblart and ſir Philip Hall, with diuers Doctors, and they were in number fiue hundreth horſe, which in the companie of the Duke of Burgoyn came to the Citie of Troys the .xxj. day of March. The Frenche king, the Queene, and the Ladie Katheryn, them receyued and hartely welcomed, ſhewyng great tokens and ſignes of loue and amitie. And after a fewe dayes they fell to counſaile, in the which it was concluded, that king Henry of England ſhould come to Troys, and marry the Ladie Katheryn, and the king ſhould make him heyre of his Realme, Crowne, and dignitie, after his departure out of this naturall lyfe, with many other articles which hereafter ſhall be reherſed.

When all theſe things were done and concluded, the Ambaſſadors of England departed toward their king, leauing behind them Sir John Robſart, to geue his attendaunce on the Lady Katheryn. When king Henry had heard his Ambaſſadors rehearſe the articles of the treatie and amity concluded, he condiſcended and agreed with all diligence to ſet forward to Troys, longyng for the ſight of the Lady Katheryn his newe ſpouſe. And being admoniſhed by the late miſchaunce of John Duke of Burgoyn, he did not raſhly preſume to aduenture himſelfe among his newe reconciled enemies: But when he ſawe all things ſafe and in good order, he being accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter his brethren, the Erles of Warwike, Sariſburie, Huntyngdon, Ewe, Tankeruyle and Longuyle, and xv. thouſand men of warre, departed from Rhoan to Ponthoyſe, and from thence to ſaint Dionyce, which is two leagues from Paris, and from thence to Pontcharenton, where he left a garriſon of men to keepe the paſſage, and from thence by Prouynce he came to Troys, where the Duke of Burgoyn accompanied with many noble men receaued him two leagues without the towne, and conueyed him to his lodging and his princes with him, and all his armie was lodged in villages there aboutes. And after he had awhyle repoſed himſelfe, he went to viſite the king, the Quene and the Ladye Katheryn, whome he found in Saint Peters Church, where was an honorable meeting and a louing embracing on both sydes, which was the twentie daye of Maye, and there at the same time were the Lady Katheryn and the king of Englande made sure together, and the thirde daye of June next following, they were with all solempnitie maried in the same Church. At which mariage the Englishmen made such triumphs & reioysing, as though nothing in the worlde coulde haue chaunced more happie and honorable.

King Henry marieth the Ladie Katherin daughter to the French king.

And when this honourable mariage was solempnized, and the feastes and triumphes of the same finished, then the two kings and their counsayle assembled together dyuers dayes, wherin the former league and treaty was in dyuers pointes altered and brought to a certainetie, by the deuise of the king of England and his brethren, when this great matter was finished, the kings for their parte sware to obserue the same in all pointes. Lykewise sware the Duke of Burgoyn, and a great number of Princes and nobles, which were present, and they were the better perswaded thereunto, for that they maruelled before at the noble actes done by king Henry, of whom they had knowledge onely by reporte, and nowe they more maruayled when they sawe and beheld the honour and wisedome of his person. And immediatly vpon this agreement, king Henry was proclaymed heyre and Regent of Fraunce. And as the french king sent the copie of this treaty to euery towne in Fraunce: So the king of Englande sent the same in Englishe to euery Citie and market towne of Englande, to be published and made knowne, the Copie of which articles here after ensue, worde for worde.

1 First, it is accorded betwixt our father and vs, that for as much as by the bond of Matrimonie made for the good of the peace betwene vs, and oure most dere beloued Katheryn, daughter of our sayde father, and of our most dere mother, Isabell his wife, the same Charles and Isabell bene made father and mother, therfore them as our father and mother we shall haue and worship, as it sitteth and seemeth so a worthy prince and princesse to be worshipped, principally before all other temporall persons of the worlde.

2 Also, we shall not distrouble, disseason or letten our father aforesayde, but that he holde and possesse as long as he lyueth, as he holdeth and possesseth at this time the crowne and the dignitie royall of Fraunce, and rentes and profites for the same, of the sustenaunce of his estate, and charges of the realme. And our foresayde mother also hold as long as shee lyueth the state and dignitie of the Quene, after the maner of the same realme, with conuenable conuenience parte of the sayed rents and profites.

3 Also, that the foresayde Ladye Katheryn shall take and haue dower in our Realme of England as Quenes of Englande here afore were wont for to take and haue, that is to say, to the some of .xl. M. Scutes, of the which two algate shall be worth a noble Englishe.

And if it ſo be, that ſuch maner of recompence be not made to the ſayd perſons by the lyfe of our ſayde father, we ſhall make that recompence, in ſuch maner of places and goodes, when it hapneth by Gods grace to the Crowne of Fraunce. And it ſo be that the landes, Lordſhips, rentes, or poſſeſſions, the which longeth to ſuch manet of perſons in the ſaid Duchie, and places be not geuen by vs, the ſame perſonnes ſhall be reſtored to them without any delay.

And that both realmes shall be gouerned, fro that we or any of our heires come to the same, not seuerally vnder diuers kinges in one time, but vnder the same person, which for the tyme shall be king of both the realmes, and souereigne Lord as aforesaid, kepyng neuertheless in all maner of other thinges to eyther of the same realmes their rightes, liberties, customes, vsages, and lawes, not makyng subiect in any maner of wise one of the same realmes to the rightes, lawes, or vsages, of that other.

28 Also that hencefoorwarde, perpetually shall be still rest, and that in all maner of wise, dissensions, hates, rancors, enuies, and warres, betwene the same realmes of Fraunce and England, and the people of the same realmes, drawyng to accorde of the same peace, may cease and be broken.

29 Also that there shal be from hencefoorward for euermore, peace and tranquilitie, and good accorde, and common affection, and stable friendship, betwene the same realmes, and their subiectes beforesaye: the same realmes shall keepe themselues with their Counsaile, helpes, and common assistance, against all maner of men that enforce them for to done, or to imagin wrongs, harmes, displeasures, or grieuaunce to them, or to eyther of them. And they shall be conuersant, and Marchandisen freely and surely together, paiyng the custome due and accustomed. And they shall be conuersaunt also, that all the confederates and alyes of our sayd father, and the realme of Fraunce aforesayde, and also our confederates of the realme of England aforesayde, shall in .viij. Monethes from the tyme of this accorde of peace, as it is notefyed to them, declare by their letters, that they wyll drawe to this accord, and will be comprehended vnder the treaties and accorde of this peace, sauyng neuertheless eyther of the same Crownes, & also all maner actions, rightes, and reuenues that longen to our sayd father and his subiectes and to vs, and to our subiectes, again such maner of allies and confederacies.

30 Also neyther our father, neyther our brother the Duke of Burgoyn shall begyn ne make with Charles, clepyng himselfe the Dolphyn of Vyennes any treatie or peace or accorde, but by counsaile and assent of all and eche of vs three, or of other three estates of either of the sayd realmes aboue named.

31 Also that we with assent of our sayde brother of Burgoyn and other of the nobles of the realme of Fraunce, the which therto ought to be called, shal ordeyne for the gouernaunce of our sayd father sekerly, louyngly and honestly after the astyng of his royall estate and dignitie by the maner that shall bee to the worship of God and of our father and of the realme of Fraunce.

32 Also all maner of persons that shall be about our father to do him personall seruice, not onely in office but in all other seruices, aswell the nobles and gentles as other shall be suche as hath bene borne in the realme of Fraunce or in places longyng to Fraunce, good, wise, true and able to that foresayde seruice. And our sayde father shall dwell in places notable of his obedience and no where elſe. Wherefore we charge and commaunde our ſayde liege ſubiectes and other beyng vnder our obedience that they keepe and do to be kept in all that longeth to them this accorde and peace after the forme and maner as it is accorded. And that they attempt in no maner wiſe any thing that may be preiudice or contrary to the ſame accord and peace vpon paine of life and lymme, and all that they may forfeyt againſt vs. Youen at Troys the xxi. day of May. 1420. and proclaymed in London the. xx. day of June.

33 Alſo that we for the thinges aforeſayde and euerye one of them ſhall geue our aſſent by our letters patentes, ſealed with our ſeale vnto our ſaid father with all approbation and confirmation of vs and all other of our blood roiall and of all the cities and townes to vs obedient ſealed with their ſeales accuſtomed. And further our ſayde father beſyde his letters patentes ſealed vnder his great ſeale ſhall make or cauſe to be made letters approbatory and confirmacions of the Peeres of his realme and of the Lords, Citezens, and Burgeſſes of the ſame vnder his obedience, all which articles we haue ſworne to kepe vpon the holy Euangeliſtes.

So ſoone as theſe articles were made and concluded, as aforeſayde, the king of Englaud hauing in his company the French king, and the Duke of Burgoyn came before the towne of Sene in Burgoyn, which toke part with the Dolphyn. And after that he had deſtroyed the Countrie about it, within. xb. dayes the towne was yeelded. And from thence he remooued to Mounſtrell Falt Yowe, where the former Duke of Burgoyn was ſlayne, as is before mencioned, which towne was taken by aſſault, and many of the Dolphyns part apprehended before they could get to the Caſtell. And after the getting of the towne, the Caſtell which was newly repleniſhed with men and victuall, denyed to render, and therefore it was ſtrongly beſieged.

The king of Englande ſent certaine of the priſoners that he had taken in this towne to aduiſe the captain of the Caſtell to yeeld the ſame: But they obſtinately denyed the requeſt, geuing euill ſpeech to the kinges Herault. Wherfore the king of Englande cauſed a Gibbet to be ſet vp before the Caſtell, on the which were hanged. xij. priſoners, all Gentlemen and friends to the Capitaine. When the Lorde of Guytry Lieutenant of the Caſtell perceiued that by no meanes he could be releeued nor ſuccored, and fearing to be taken by force, he began to treate with the king of England, which in eyght dayes would take none of his offers. But in concluſion he and his rendred themſelues ſimply, their lyues onely ſaued: And after ſixe weekes ſiege, the Caſtell was delyuered, and the Erle of Warwike was made Capitaine of the towne and Caſtell, which fortefyed the ſame with men, ordinaunce and artillarie. From thence the king of Englande departed to Molyn vppon Seyn, and beſieged it rounde about, in whoſe company were the French king, the young king of Scottes, the Dukes of Burgoyn, Clarence, Bedford and Gloucester. These valyaunt Princes and Noble men besieged the strong towne of Molyn vpon Seyn, as aforesaide, with all their force and army, by the space almost of.vij. Moneths. They without made Mynes, cast trenches and shot Gonnes at the walles. And they within, whereof the Lorde Barbason was chiefe, manfully defended the same, during the which siege, the Frenche Queene, and the Quene of Englande, and the Duches of Burgoyn came dyuers times to visite their husbandes, and to see their friends. This siege so long continued, that victualles within the towne beganne to fayle, and pestilence beganne to encrease, so that the Capitayne beganne to treate: And in conclusion the towne was delyuered vpon certaine conditions, whereof one was, that all that were consenting to the death of the Duke of Burgoyn should be deliuered to the king of England, whereof the Lorde Barbason was one, and so they were delyuered to the king, and he sent them vnder the conduyt tondupt of the Duke of Clarence vnto Paris, and there they were executed. And foorthwith the sayde Duke of Clarence was by the French king made Captayne of Paris, and had in possession the Bastill of Saint Anthony, the Louure, the house of Neele, and the place of Boys de Vyncens.

After the towne of Nolyn was yelded, as aforesayde, the king made Capteyne there the Erle of Huntyngdon. From thence he departed with his armie to Corbell, where the French king and the two Queenes then soiourned. And from thence the two kinges accompanied with the Dukes of Burgoyn, Bedford, Glouceſter, and Exceter, and the Erles of Warwike, Sarisbury, and a great number of other noble men, set forth toward Paris, whom the Citizens receyued ioyfully, in most honourable maner. The next day the two Queenes made their entry into Paris, where also they were receyued with all solempnitie, as was the two kings. Duryng the time that these two kinges lay in Paris, there was a great assembly called, aswell of the Clergie as of the Nobility, in ỳ which the two kings sate as iudges, before whom the Duches of Burgoyn by her aduocate appealed the Dolphyn and .vij. other for the death and murder of John Duke of Burgoyn her husbande. To the which apeale, the counsaile on the other part made dyuers offers of amends: But this matter was put of vntill an other day. To the Citie of Paris at this tyme resorted the three estates of the Realme, where euery person seuerally sware vpon the holy Euangelistes, to kepe, support, mainteyn, and defend the treatie & peace final which was cõcluded betweene the two Prynces and their counsayles, & therunto euery noble man spirituall, gouernour, and temporall ruler set to their seales, which instrumentes were sent to the kinges treasury of his Eschequer at Westminster, sauely to be kept, where they yet remayne. These two kinges soiorned in Paris at the feast of Chrystmasse. The French king lyng at the house of S. Paule, kept no estate nor open court to no man, except to his houshold seruauntes. But the king of England and his Quene, kept such solempne estate, so plentifull a house, so pryncely passyme, and gaue so many giftes, that all the noble men of Fraunce spake honourably of him.

The king of England taketh vppon him as Regent of Fraunce.

Sone after this feast of Chrystmasse, the king of England tooke vpon him as Regent of Fraunce to redresse causes, to remoue officers, to reforme thinges that were amisse, and caused a newe coyne to be made called a Salute, wherein were grauen the Armes of Fraunce, and the Armes of England quartered. And to set all thinges in a quietnesse, he ordeyned sir Gilbert Umfreuile Capteine of Melun furnished with a good number of valyant souldiours. And the Erle of Huntingdon his Cossin Germain he appointed Capteyne at Boys de Vincens. And the Duke of Exceter with fiue hundreth men of armes, was assigned to kepe the Citie and towne of Parys.

When the king had thus ordered his affayres accordyng to his deuise, he with the Quene his wife, his Pryces and Nobles, departed from Paris, and came to the Citie of Roan. But before his remouyng, he caused processe to be made agaynst Charles called the Dolphyn, commaundyng him to appere at the Table of Marble in Parys: where for lacke of appearaunce, he was with all solempnitie in suche a cause requisite, denounced giltie of the murder and homicide of John late Duke of Burgoyn: And by the sentence of the Court of Parliament he was banished the realme and territories of Fraunce, and depryued of all honours, names, dignities and preheminences which which he then had or hereafter might haue. Wherefore the Dolphyn went into Languedock, and after to Poyters, gettyng to him such friendes as he could, and especially he obteyned so highly the fauour of the Erle of Armynack, that he not onely tooke his part, but also relieued him with money, ayded him with men, and in his owne person continually serued him agaynst his foes and enemies.

While king Henry soiourned in the City of Roan, he receiued homage of all the Nobles of Normandie: Amongest whome the Erle of Stafford did homage for the Countie of Perche: And Arthure of Briteyn did homage for the Countrie of Jury, which the king before had geuen vnto them. He also ordeyned his Lieutenant generall both of Fraunce and Normandie, his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence: and his deputie in Normandie was the Erle of Sarisburie. And thus all thinges beyng set in order, the king and Quene of England departed from Roan to Amiens, and so to Calice, where he tooke shippyng, and hauyng a fayre passage landed at Douer, and came to Eltham, and through London to Westminster: But by the way he was receyued most ioyfully and honourably, namely by the Citezens of London.

King Henry with the Quene hys wife returneth into England.

The Coronation of Quene Katherine.

And shortly after, great prouision and preparation was made for the coronation of the Queene, who was crowned the. xxiiij. day of Februrary with all solempnitie.

Now while the king was thus occupyed in England, the Duke of Clarence brother to the king, and his Lieutenaunt generall in Fraunce & Normandie, as is aforesayd, assembled together all the garrisons of Normandie at the towne of Berney, & from thence departed into the Countrie of Mayn. And at Pount de Gene, he passed the riuer of Youe, and roade through all the Countrie to Lucie, where he passed the ryuer of Loyre, and entred into Intowe, and came before the Citie of Angiers, where he made many knightes, that is to say, Sir William Rosse, Sir Henry Godard, Sir Rowland Rider, and Sir Thomas Beaufoord called the Bastarde of Clarence and dyuerse other. And shortly after that he had forayed, brent, and spoyled the Countrie, he returned with pray and pillage to the Towne of Beufoorde in the Valley, where he was aduertised that a great number of his enemies were assembled together at a place called Bangie, that is to say, the Duke of Alanson callyng him selfe Lieutenaunt generall for the Dolphyn, who was accompanied with a great number of Erles and other the Nobles of Fraunce.

Andrew Forgusa a false and traytorous Lombard.

At this tyme the Duke of Clarence had a Lombard resortyng vnto him called Andrew Forgusa, which was reteined with the part aduerse, of whom the Duke required the number of his enemies: To whome he reported that theyr number was but small, and of no strength, and farre vnmeete to encounter with halfe the power of his puyssant armie, entisyng and prouokyng him to set on the French men, warrantyng him a famous victorie, and a faire day. The Duke geuyng to much credite to this Traytor, lyke a valyant and courageous Prince, assembled together all the horsemen of his armie, and left the Archers behinde him vnder the order of the Bastard of Clarence, saiyng that he onelye, and the nobles would haue the honour of that iourney. When the Duke was passed a streight and a narrow passage, he espyed his enemies raunged in verye good order of battaile: And the saide aduersaries had had layd such Busshementes at the streytes, that the Duke by no wayes without battaile could eyther retyre or flie. The Englishmen seeyng no remedy, valiauntly set on their enemies, which were foure to one: The battaile was fierce, and the fight deadly. The Englishemen that day did valiauntly, yet it anayled not, for they were oppressed with the number of Frenchmen. There were slaine the Duke of Clarence, the Erle of Tankeruyle, the Lord Rosse, Sir Gilbert Umfreuile, Erle of Kent, Sir John Lumley, and Sir Robert Uenred, and almost two. M. Englishmen. And the Erles of Somerset, Suffolke, and Perch, the Lorde Fitzwater, Sir John Barkley, sir Rause Neuile, Sir Henry Inglos, Sir William Bowes, Sir William Longton, and Sir Thomas a Borow, and diuers other taken prisoners. And of the frenchmen there were slaine aboue .xij. hundreth of their best men. The Bastard Clarence which tarryed at Beaufoord was informed of the number of the Frenchmen, wherefore he with all the Archers made hast to succor the duke: But they came to late: for the Frenchmen heeryng of the approchyng of the Archers, fled with their prisoners with all the hast they could, leauing behinde them the bodie of the aforesayd Duke, and the dead carions. When the Archers came and sawe their enemies gone, they lamented not a little the euill chaunce of the deceyued Duke: But seyng no remedie, they tooke the dead bodies and buried them all, sauyng the Dukes corps, which with great solempnitie was sent into England, and buryed at Cauntorbury besyde his father. After this, the English men brent & spoyled the Countrie of Maine, and so returned to Alaunson, and there departed euery man to his garrison. This battaile was fought at Bawgy in Aniow on Easter Euen in the yere of our Lorde. 1421.

The Duke of Clarences slaine.

The battayle of Bawgye.

King Henry beyng aduertised of this infortunate ouerthrowe, and deceiuable doyng of the Lombard, and losse of his brother, sent without delay, Edmond Erle of Mortaigne, a brother to the Erle of Somerset into Normandy, geuyng to him like Auctoritie and preheminence, as his brother the late deceassed Duke of Clarence had or enioyed. After this, he called hys high Court of Parliament, in the which he declared so wisely the actes that were done in the Realme of Fraunce, the estate of the tyme present and what thinges were necessarye for the tyme to come, (if they would looke to haue that Jewell and high kingdome, for the which they had so long laboured and sought for) that the Commonaltie graunted a fiftene, and the Clergie a double fiftene. And because no delay should be in the kinges affayres for lacke of payment, the Bishop of Winchester his Uncle lent to him. xx. thousande pounde, to be receyued of the same dismes or fiftenes.

When all thinges necessarye for this voyage were redie and prepared, he sent his brother John Duke of Bedford with all his armie (which the French men write to be foure thousand men of armes, and. xx. thousand Archers, and other) before him to Calice. And he himselfe shortly after in the middle of May passed the Seas, and arryued there in great triumph, where to him was shewed, that the Dolphyn with .vij. M. men had besieged the towne of Chartiers which was manfully defended by the Bastard of Thyan and other, set and appoynted there by the Duke of Excester.

King Henry not minding to lose so fayre a towne, departed in good order with all his armie towarde Paris. And at Mounstrell there receaued him hun the Duke of Burgoyn, which from that place attended vpon the king to Dowaste in Ponthiewe, and so came to Abbeuyle, and from thence to Boys de Vyncens, where he found the French king and Quene, whome he louingly saluted, and they him agayne honorably receaued. And there the king of England and the Duke of Burgoyn determined without delaye to fight with the Dolphyn and to raise the siege before Chartres. The king of Englād with al his power came to the towne of Maunt, & thether repayred the Duke of Burgoin with foure M.men: of whose cōming the king reioysed not a little. But before they departed from thence, they had knowlege & true instruction that the Dolphyn heryng of the puyssaunt army of the king, was reculed with his people vnto Towres in Towrain. Wherfore the king of England incontynent, not onely sent the Duke of Burgoyn into Picardy to resist the malice of syr Jaques Harcourte, which daylie inferred warre, and caused waste and destruction in the same Countrie: But also appointed James king of Scottes to lay siege to the towne of Direx, which so fiersly assaulted the same, that after sire weekes, they rendred the same to the king of Scottes to the behoose of king Henry his soueregne Lorde, who appointed Captayne there the Erle of Worcester.

The king himselfe remoued from Maunt, and passed ouer the Ryuer of Leyr, folowyng the Dolphyn toward Towers: But the Dolphyn mistrusting his power fled to Burges in Berry, and there determined to tarie vntill fortune would looke more fauourably vpon him.

The king of England with all his puyssaunce so fast folowed the flyeng Dolphyn, that victuall beganne to fayle: wherfore he consydering the daunger and hurte of his awne people, and sawe none aduantage to followe the Dolphyn, did for the safetie of his people returne ouer the ryuer of Leyr, and gate Gasconeyes vpon Youe, and a towne called the kings new towne, and dyuers other whose names were to tedious here to reherse.

The aforesaide towne was no lesse victualled then manned, and as well fortefyed, so that the king of Englande could neyther haue it delyuered vnto him, nor yet gayne it by assault without great losse and detriment. But yet he determined not to departe vntill he had eyther gayned or ouerthrowne the same: And duryng the time of this siege was borne at Wyndsore the kings sonne called Henry, whose Godfathers were John Duke of Bedford, and Henry Bishop of Winchester, and Jaquet Duches of Holland was Godmother, wherof the king was certefyed lyeng at this siege of Meaux, at the which he much reioysed, but when he heard of the place of his natiuity, whether he fantaysed some olde blind prophecie, or else iudged of his sonnes fortune, he sayde to the Lorde Fitz Hugh his Chamberleyn these wordes. My Lorde, I Henry borne at Monmouth shall small time reigne and get much: And Henry borne at Wyndsore shall long reigne and loose all: But as God wyll, so be it.

The birth of king Henry the sixt.

After the Quene of England was thus delyuered of her fayre sonne, she returned into Fraunce, first to her husbande, and after to her father and mother, where she was on all partes so honorably receaued and so louingly enterteyned and highly feasted, that she appered to be no lesse beloued nor welcommed vnto her noble husbande, then vnto her naturall parents.

During the time of the siege last aboue mencioned, Sir Olyuer Man-

ny a valiaunt man of warre of the Dolphyns parte, which before was captaine of the Castell of Faloys, and yelding it by composition, sware neuer to beare armour agaynst the king of Englande, assembled a great number of men of warre, as well of Britons as French men, that is to saye the Lorde Mountburchier, the Lorde Coynon, the Lorde of Chasteigiron, the Lorde of Tyntignace, the Lorde de la Howsslaye, and diuers other which entred into the Country of Constantyne in Normandy and robbed and killed the Englishe men where they migh eyther espie or take them at their aduauntage: But the Erle of Suffolk keeper of those marches hering of their doynges, sent for the Lorde Scales, Sir John Aston Baillife of Constantyne, Sir William Hall, Sir John Banester and manye other out of the Garrisons within that territorie, which encountered with their enimies at a place called Le Parke de oeuecque, in English the Bishops Parke. There was a sore and a long fight, and many a proper feate of armes was done that day and many a man was in that place ouerthrowen: The Englishe men onely desyred victorie, and the French men desyred a safe returne: But in conclusion the french men being not able to resist, began to flie, in the which conflict and fight there were slayne, the Lorde Coynon, the Lorde of Castell Giron and three hundreth other: And there were taken prisoners, the Lord de la Howslay, and syr Olyuer Mannay and.xr. other. The king being aduertised of this good chaunce and happy iourney sent for syr Olyuer Mannay to be brought vnto him, he then lyeng at Meaux. And when he sawe him he sayde: Faire father you haue sworne, & promised vnto vs that you would neuer make warre nor beare armour against vs nor our subiectes: ye are an auncient knight, and ought to haue kept your fayth and promise, which you haue vntruly and also vnhonestly broken, and yet we will not (although by the law of armes we might lawfully so doe) put you to death, but graunt to you your lyfe: But we will send you into England to learne you to speake Englishe. And shortly after he was sent to London, where he dyed, and was buried in the white Fryers.

The Scottes write (beleue them if ye will) that the king of Englande hering that the Dolphyn had sent for ayde into Scotlande, and that he had reteyned them in wages (for of their awne habilitie, they be neyther able to send an army ouer the sea, nor yet of substaunce to beare a continuall warre, for this all their awne Histories declare, and their Chronicles make mencion, and yet the countrie is not so pore, but the people be as prowde) sent one day for James the Scottishe king, and in the presence of his counsayle declared vnto him, what humanitie, what fauour and singuler affection king Henry his Father bare during his naturall lyfe, towarde the sayde king of Scottes: Putting him in remembraunce of the great loue and friendship which he himselfe sith the beginning of his reigne had shewed vnto him, and that neyther he nor his father had negligently omitted any thing that might apperteyn to the office of a friend or to the duetie of a Tutour, which should loue and cherish his Orphane or Pupile, promising him liberty with a great rewarde if he would cause the Scottes which were adherents to the Dolphyn to returne againe into their countrie and native region. To the which request the king of Scottes with a wise and good courage answered, sayeng: what your noble father hath done to me, and what fauour or benefite

I haue receyued at your handes, I shall not nor will not when I maye (I assure you, forget: And when my power shall serue, I shall not fayle to recompence your doings with lyke kindnesse. But of your request I meruaile not a little, first considering that I am a prisoner, and haue no possession of my realme: Secondarily that I am as yet neyther sworne to my subiectes, nor they by othe of allegeaunce are bounde to obey my commaundements. Wherefore I desyre you no more to moue me in this thing, which nowe I cannot doe: And yet if I might, I would first foresee whether it were for me honorable, or to my realme honest, to leaue our olde friend in his extreme neede and necessitie without ayde or comfort. With this aunswere the king of England was not content (as the Scottes say) but after that king James was departed from his presence, king Henry sayde, happie shall they be who shall be subiectes to such a king that is indued with suche wit and wisedome at these young yeres.

The king of Englande lyeng still before the towne of Meux in Brye (as you haue heard) and had fore oppressed them within the towne. Whereof hering the Lorde of Offmond with a company of chosen persons, sent by the Dolphyn, came priuely in the night to the walles, and set vp a ladder, and dyuers of his company went vp and entred the towne: But as he himselfe passed ouer a planke to haue come to the walles, he fell into a deepe diche. The Englishe men hering this noyes, ranne to the diche, where they tooke the Lorde of Offmound, and slue dyuers of his company which stood at defence. The Captaine within the towne perceauing that their succours were taken, playnely iudged that the towne could not long continue: wherfore they caused all the goodes of the towne to be brought into the market place, which was strong and well fortefyed. The king of Englande being hereof aduertised, commaunded in all haste to geue an assault to the towne, which was quickly done, so that the towne by fine force was within three houres taken and spoyled. And the same daye the king besieged rounde about the market place, and tooke the Mill adioyning to the same. The Captaynes perceauing in what case they were, fearing to be taken by assault, began to treate with the king of Englande, which appointed the Erle of Warwike and the Lorde Hungerforde to common with them: And in conclusion a treatie was taken, and so the towne and Market place with all the goodes were deliuered into the king of Englandes handes, the tenth daye of Maye, the yere of our Lorde. 1422.

The Lorde Offmond taken.

The towne of Meux & the Market place taken.

When the deliuery of the strong towne of Meux was published through the Countrie, all the townes and fortresses in the Isle of Fraunce, in Lannoys, in Brie, and in Campeigne yelded themselues to the king of England, which appointed in them baliaunt Capteynes and hartie Souldiours.

After that king Henry had thus taken and possessed the towne of Meux and other fortresses at his pleasure, he returned againe to Boys de Vyncennes, where he found the Frenche king, and the Queene, and his wife, who with all ioy receyued him: And so the .xxi. day of May beyng Whitsonneuen, the two kinges and the Queenes returned to Parys, where the king of England lodged in the Castell of Loure, and the French king in the house of Saint Paule. These two kinges kept great estate with their Queenes at this feast of Pentecost: But the king of England (as Enguerant both confesseth, festeth, and dyuerse other sayth) kept such glorious an estate, and so costly a Court, that he with his Queene sate at dinner in Parys richely appoynted with most riche vestures, adourned with Diademes of Golde, garnished and beset with precious stones, and decked with Jewelles both bewtifull and pleasaunt. Besydes this his Princes and estates, Barons and chiefe Captaynes were set in solempne estate, plenteously serued, and aboundantly feasted, so that the people of Paris which thether resorted to beholde this estate, iudged him to be more lyke an Emperour, then their awne king (which sate solitarily alone) to be like a Duke or a poore Marques: But now againe to returne to our Historye.

The Dolphyn knowyng by his Espyals where the king of Englande and his power lay, came with all his puyssaunce ouer the ryuer of Leyre and besieged the towne of Cosney, or Conny, and sent part of his armie to waste and destroy the confines of the Duchie of Burgoyn. And as he purposed, so it happened, for the Duke of Burgoyne with his power set forwarde to defend his awne lande and dominion, and wrote to the king of England to send ayde to them of Cosney or Conny, which had promised to render their towne to the Dolphyn if they were not reskued by the king of England within ten dayes. King Henry heeryng these newes, aunswered that he would not send one creature, but he would go before himselfe. And so with all diligence came to the towne of Corbell, and so to Senlys, where, whether it were with the heate of the ayre, or that he with his dayly labour was febled or weakned, he began to ware sicke, yea and so sicke that he was constrayned to tary and to send his brother the Duke of Bedford to performe his iourney & enterprise.

The king of Englande is sicke.

The Duke lyke a valiaunt Capteyne set forwarde to reskue the towne besieged, whereof heeryng the Dolphyn with all his Captaynes and hardie souldiours departed thence into Barry to his great dishonor and lesse gaine: And so was the Citie of Cosney, or Conny reskued, to the great honour of the Englishe Nation. But in this meane while, king Henry wared sicker and sicker, and beyng layd on a Horslitter, was conueyed to Boys de Vyncennes, to whome shortly after repayred the Dukes of Bedford and Gloucester his Uncles, and the Erles of Sarisbury and Warwike, whome the king most louyngly enterteyned and embraced: But when they behelde him (sayth Polidore) lyyng in such an extremitie and daunger, they could not refrayne from mournyng and bewaylyng of him. Howbeit the king with a Princely and courageous heart, without any outward shew either of sad countenaunce or sorow, comforted them, and encouraged them to be mery and ioyous. But when he perceyued his sickneslle so sore to encrease, that there was no hope of health or recouery, he rendred to God his most hartie thankes, and chiefely that he called him out of this miserable life, at such tyme as when he was of most perfite remembraunce, both toward God and the world, and also in the tyme of his flourishyng conquest, in the which he neuer receyued one spot of dishonour. And turnyng himselfe to his brethren and other noble personages there present, he sayde vnto them: My naturall brethren and trustie friendes, I see you lament and bewaile my death approchyng at hand, of the which death I am both glad and reioyce, for this short tyme of my mortall lyfe shall be a testimonie of my strength, a declaration of my iustice, and a settyng forth of all mine actes and trauayles, and finally shall be the cause that

The wordes of the king in his death bed spoken to hys brethren and others.

I by death shall obteyne fame, glory, and renowne, and escape the reprehension of cowardnesse, and the mote of all infamie, which I might haue chaunced to haue fallen into, if nature had lenger prolonged my lyte and dayes: for it is commonly sayd, that as tyme chaungeth, so maners and condicions alter, and in long time, all thinges continue not in one state. But as eternitie is the trumpher vpon tyme, so do I trust that after this short life to haue eternall beyng: And after this miserable pilgrimage, myne hope is to enioy the celestiall kingdome, and to come to the Palace of rest, & place of quietnesse.

Nowe as touchyng you (no doubt but this my sodeyne chaunce molesteth you) and not without a cause: You lament the calamitie and mischaunce that is like to fall on your Countrie, because that I in this troubleous time leaue you destitute of a Gouernour and Ruler, which chaunce is the lesse to be moned and regarded, because in all worldly thinges, somethyng euer lacketh, and nothing long endureth: Wherefore, because the olde sayng is, that in the time of necessitie, wit and wisedome is to be experimented, therefore I require you to consult, and to studie and take paine to come to the ende of the iourney, which I in my time haue begon and entered in, and chiefely because I haue euer loued and trusted you aboue all other persons: And therefore I desire you nowe to shewe like loue, and to be as trustie to my sonne that shall be your souereigne Lorde: So that whatsoeuer dutie, allegiaunce, or fauor for my liberalitie or kindenesse to you shewed, was to me eyther of honestie or ciuilitie due or owyng: Let the same for my sake, be extended, shewed and recompenced to mine heyre and successor little Prince Henry. Some persons haue hated the father, and yet loued the childe, and some haue loued the father, and yet murthered the childe, of which sort I neyther recon nor accompt you: But this I say, if you loue me, ye ought to loue my childe, not for hys desert, but for myne. And sith nowe I shall be taken from you before satisfaction or recompence be made vnto me for my manifolde goodnesse and ample benefites to you shewed in my lyfe: I say and affirme, that after my death (except you will be noted with the blot of ingratitude, I will not say vntruth) you ought to render the same to my childe your Nephewe and kinsman: I pray God that ye do not defraude me of the good expectation that I haue euer had of you. And because I will not charge you, I will therefore friendly exhort you, to bring vp my little infant in vertuous liuyng, morall doctrine, and prudent pollecie, to the entent that by your paine he may proue wise, by your instruction he may proue politique, and made able to rule and gouerne a kingdome, and not to be ruled of other: By the which deuoire you shall not onely do your duetie to your Prince and souereigne Lorde, but also deserue thankes of your native Countrie, to the which ye are most specially bounde. Besides this, my peticion is not onely to comfort my most deerest and welbeloued wife the Queene, nowe beyng (as I thinke, the most dolourous and sorowfullest woman liuyng) but also to loue her and honour her, as I haue both loued and honoured you.

And as touching the estate of my realmes: First I commaund you to loue and ioyne together in one league or concord, and in one vnfayned amitie, keepyng continuall peace and amitie with Philip Duke of Burgoyn. And neuer make treatie with Charles that calleth himselfe Dolphyn of Vien, by the which any part of the crowne of Fraunce, or of the Duchie of Normandie and and Guyan may be appayred or diminished. Let the Duke of Orleaunce and the other Princes still remaine prisoners, vntill my sonne come to his lawfull age, least they returnyng home againe, may kindle more fire in one day, then may well be quenched in three. If you thinke it necessarie, I would my brother Homfrey should be Protector of England, during the minority of my childe, prohibityng him once to passe out of the realme. And my brother of Bedford with the helpe of the Duke of Burgoyne, I will shall rule and be Regent of the realme of Fraunce, comaundyng him with fire & sword to persecute Charles callyng himselfe Dolphin, to the entent either to bryng him to reason & obeysaunce, or to drive and expell him out of the realme of Fraunce, admonishing you to lose no tyme, nor to spare no cost in recoueryng of that which to you now is offered. And finally whatsoeuer I haue gotten, or you shall obteyne, I charge you kepe it, I commaund you to defend it, and I desire you to nourishe it: For experience teacheth, that there is no lesse prayse to be geuen to the keper, then to the getter, for verely gettyng is a chaunce, but keepyng is wisedome.

Humfrey Duke of Gloucester protector of England.

John Duke of Bedford Regent of Fraunce.

The noble men present promised to obserue his precepts, and performe his desyres: But their heartes were so pensiue and so replenished with dolor, that no one without weepyng could behold the other, and the next day folowyng he ended his life in this world, beyng the last day of August. 1422.

The death of king Henry the fift.

This Prince was the noblest king that euer reigned ouer the realme of England, his famous prowes and martiall actes were suche, as bewtifyed and glorified all this region: But when his death was knowen to the common people, no estate from the highest to the lowest, but cryed out and lamented that most infortunate and vntimely death. For he was beloued of all, and disdeyned nor hated of none, no not of his very enemies, who also spake most honourably of him. But nowe as his death put great feare in the heartes of Englishe men for the atchiuyng of the enterprice of the conquest of Fraunce: So the same did encourage the French enemies that they ensured themselues to gaine, and get againe whatsoeuer before they had lost, as in deede in the sequele of this Historie it will to plainly appere. And the decease and sodeine death of this noble Prince is by diuers writers, dyuersly reported: some say he was poysoned, and to say truth, that might be so, for vndoubtedly the French men, namely the Dolphyn, feared the vtter ouerthrow and losse of his inheritance of the realme of Fraunce, as it was most like if God had geuen this Prince longer life, and therefore whatsoeuer the sayde Dolphyn could by any French practise do or attempt for his destruction, it was not left vndone. Some other write it was of a Palsey and a crampe: But other that seemeth herein to write most neere the truth, say that it was of a Pluriſis, which at that tyme was so rare a sickneſſe and so straunge a diſeaſe, that the same to the most part of men was vnknowen, and Phisitians beyng little acquainted therewith, knewe no present remedy for the same. This king reigned.ix.yeres.v.monethes, and.xxiij.dayes, & liued not, saith Hall, full.xxxviij. yeres, and Polidore sayth he liued but.xxxvj.yeres. Of stature he was somewhat tall, more than the common sort. Of bodie he was slender, and somewhat leane, well membred, and strongly made, a goodly countenaunce, but somewhat long necked, blacke heared, stoute of stomacke, and eloquent of tongue, and in Martiall affayres so valiaunt, as neuer was there any worthy of more prayse for his trauayles and victories in so short tyme.

The buriall of king Henry the fift.

His bodie beyng enbawmed was conueighed with all funerall pompe from Boys de Vyncennes to Paris, and so to Rhoan, to Abbeuile, to Calice, to Douer, and so through London to Westminster, where among his noble progenitours he was enterred.

And shortly after this solempne buriall, his sorowfull Queene returned into England, and kept her estate with the yong king her sonne.

Henrye the sixt.

When certaine knowlege of the death of king Henry the fift, was brought into Englande, then Thomas Duke of Exceter, and Henry Byshop of Wynchester, brethren vnto the king deceassed, and Uncles vnto the young Prince, callyng together the other Lordes of the counsayle, did cause their young Nephewe Prince Henry beyng then about the age of. ix. Moneths with sounde of Trumpets openly to be proclaymed king of England, & of Fraunce, the last daye of August. 1422. by the name of king Henry the sixte, to the great comfort and reioysing of all the Englishe Nation.

Henry the Prince proclaymed king Henry the. vj.

Shortly after the Duke of Gloucester returned into Englande, and first of all he called all the Lordes of the counsayle and nobles of the realme, and declared vnto them the last will and Testament of king Henry his brother, and what was his commaundement: By reason whereof he was chosen and named Protectour of the Realme of Englande. Which office when he had taken vpon him, he foorthwith ioyned vnto him as counsaylours the grauest, noblest, and wisest in the realme, and first tooke order for the stay of all things within this realme of England, and then with all speede prouyded for all things necessarie for the warre for the conquest of Fraunce, and appointed valiaunt and expert Captaynes that should be in a readynesse when opportunitie of time required. And besides thys, he by all pollitique meanes, gathered great sommes of money, and left nothing vndone that should aduaunce his pretended purpose.

Humfrey Duke of Gloucester made protector of ỹ realm of England.

Whyle these things were thus deuysed within the realme of England, the Duke of Bedford Regent of Fraunce, no lesse studied and tooke paine, to keepe and order the countries and regions by king Henry late conquered and gayned, and also determined not to leaue of from daylie warre and continuall trauayle tyll the time that Charles the Dolphyn (which was nowe a flote, because king Charles his father in the Moneth of October this present yere, was departed to God,) were eyther subdued or brought to due obeysaunce. And surely the death of this king Charles caused many alterations and chaunges in the realme of Fraunce, for a great parte of the nobilitie which they eyther for feare of the puissaunce of the Englishe men, or for to please and folowe the minde and appetite of Charles the Frenche king, toke parte with king Henry against the Dolphin: Hering now of the french kings death, returned from the Englishe parte and adioyned themselues to the company of the Dolphyn, and diligently studied howe to vanquisshe and driue awaye the Englishe nation out of the territorie of Fraunce.

The Duke of Bedford beyng greatly moued with these sodaine chaunges, fortefyed his townes both with Garrisons and municions, and assembled together a great armie both of Englishe men and Normans, to whom he made a long Oration, admonishyng them to obserue and keepe their othe and faith (which they had made to the late king Henry and his heires) inuiolate and vnbroken, wylling them in no wise to be the occasioners or counsayllers that yong king Henry should be deprined from his fathers lawful inheritaunce, by the hatred of certayne Traytors Frenchmen, which had renued the olde hatred being of late extinct betwene the realmes of England & of Fraunce, and studied to set all things agayne in a broyle: requiring them also to call to their memorie how that the realmes of England & of Fraunce, the two most famous regions of all Europe, by the benefite of almighty God were of late so vnited, connered, & ioyned together in an eternall league and composition, & so strongly established, that no worldly power were able or of puyssaunce sufficient, to resist or withstande the malice of the same: And although sometimes by chaunce of warre the losse might turne on their parte, yet in conclusion the detriment should be recouered, and a surplusage gayned. And if (according to their bounden duties) they would honor, serue and loue yong king Henry their souereigne Lorde, and woulde diligently persecute and set on his enimies, they should not onely shew themselues true and faythfull subiects to their true and vndoubted king: But also should for their fidelitie and good seruice receiue of him condigne rewardes, ouer and beyndes immortall fame and renowne.

An exhortation made by the Duke of Bedford vnto the French men that were vnder king Henries obeysaunce.

This exhortation stayed the hearties of many of the french Capitaynes, which wyllingly sware to king Henry feaultie and obedience, by whose example the commonaltie did the same. Thus all the people set in an order in the realme of Fraunce, nothing was minded but warre, and nothing was spoken of but conquest.

The Dolphyn which lay at this time in the Citie of Poytiers heering of the death of his parent, had his heart mired both with ioye and sorrowe: for notwithstanding that he was sorrowfull, as a naturall childe which lamented the death of his father, yet he was ioyous that power and princely estate was nowe to him happened, by the which he iudged that he should be the more able to defende his enemies and recouer more friends: and so calling together the princes of his faction, caused himselfe to be proclaymed king of Fraunce, by the name of Charles the. vij. And then being in good hope of recouerying his patrimony and expelling his enemies, with a haute courage prepared warre, and assembled together a great armie, and first the warre beganne by light skirmishes, but after it proceeded into mayne battayles. The Dolphyn thinking not to make long delayes in so great a cause, lest the power of his enimies might daylie be augmented, sent the Lorde

And from thence departed into Champaigne, and there beſieged the towne of Sens, and tooke ſyr Guillam Maryn the Captayne and ſlue all the Souldiours within the towne, and made there Capitaynes Sir Hugh Geddyng, and Sir Richard Awbemond.

Pount Melance recouered agayne by the Engliſhe men.

The Pariſians, which euer like the Wethercoke be variable and inconſtant, perceyuing that the Dolphyn daylie begamme to haue more ayde and power, then he was before accuſtomed, truſtyng to returne againe vnder his obeyſance and ſubiection (which they both wiſhed and deſired) to the entent that it ſhould not appere to come of their deſire, and that their fayth and fidelitie ſhould not be put in the Balaunce of diffidence with the Engliſh nation, ſent diuers Senators of their Citie as Ambaſſadors to the king of England, deſyring him of aide and ſuccour, to whom not onely great thanks were rendred for doyng their duetie of ſubiection, but alſo high feaſtes were made, and promiſes declared, that if they ſtill continued in due obeyſaunce, and were not adherent to the kings enimies, that neyther ſuccour ſhoulde want, nor coſt ſhould be ſpared for their common comfort, and publike vtilitie. With which aunſwere the company outwardly pleaſed (whatſoeuer they inwardly imagined) departed to Paris. In this ſeaſon Homfrey Duke of Glouceſter eyther blynded with ambicion or doting for loue, maried the Ladye Jaquet or Jacomin daughter and ſole heire to Wylliam of Bauier Duke of Holland, which was lawfull wyfe to John Duke of Brabant then lyuing, which mariage chaunced much to his diſhonor. For ſurely the ſweete taſt of this pleaſaunt mariage, brought after a ſower ſauce, both to the amorous huſbande, and to the wanton wyfe. For John Duke of Brabant, what with force, and what with ſpirituall compulſaries, neuer left of, till he had recouered his Lady out of the Duke of Glouceſters poſſeſſion, as after you ſhall here.

Humffrey Duke of Glocester marieth Jaquet the wyfe of John Duke of Brabant.

And in this preſent yere the Weſt gate of London, nowe called Newgate, which before was an vgly and filthy Dongeon, was now newly builded at the charges and expences of Richard Whytingdon, late Alderman and Maiour of London, by the handes of his Executors.

1423

These chaunces thus happenyng as you haue heard, John Duke of Bedford, Philip Duke of Burgoyn, and John Duke of Britaine, made an

an aſſemble and friendly enteruiewe in the Citie of Amias, where they renued the old league and auncient amitie made betweene the noble prince king Henry the fift, and them before concluded: addyng thereto theſe condicions and agreements, eche of them to be to other both friend and ayder, and the enemie of the one to be enemie to the other, and all they to be both friendes and ayders to the king of England, and well wylling to hys well wyllers, and auengers of his aduerſaries. And becauſe that affinitie is an embracer of amitie, there was concluded a mariage betweene the Duke of Bedford, and the Ladie Anne ſiſter to the Duke of Burgoyn. When theſe agrements were finiſhed, the Duke of Bedford departed to Troys in Champain, whether with high pompe was conueyed the Lady Anne of Burgoyn, which in the preſence of her brother and her Uncle Duke of Brabant, and of the Erles of Saliſburie and Suffolke, and of nine hundred Lordes, knightes and Eſquires, ſhe was maried to John Duke of Bedford, with ſuch ſolempnitie, feaſt and triumph, as before that time had not bene ſene of the Burgonions.

During this triumph, the Pariſians thinking to blinde the eyes of the Duke of Bedford wrote to hym, howe diuers Caſtels and fortreſſes lyeng round about their territorie, were repleniſhed with his enemies dayly ſtoppyng their paſſages, and robbing their marchantes, to their vtter vndoyng, if they by his helpe were not relieued: fraudulently meaning, and falſely entiſing him to abſent himſelfe from them, till their craftie conueyed purpoſe were compaſſed and atchiued. For diuers of them ſtubbernly bearing the yoke and ſubiection of the Engliſhe nation, perceyuing the Duke of Bedford and the principall Capitaines of the Engliſhe men to be farre from Paris, employeng themſelues to ioy and ſolace, for the honor of this high mariage, conſpired to bring into the Citie, Charles the Dolphyn, callyng himſelfe French king. And to the entent that their inuented purpoſe ſhould ſucceede, they thereof aduertiſed the Dolphyn and his counſayle, appoynting the day of his comming, and the time of his entrie. But the Duke of Bedford was informed of all their ſecret confederacie and ſedicious faction, wherefore he meaning not to loſe in ſhort time that which in no ſmall ſpace was gayned, put ſpurres to the horſe, and with a great power entered into Paris one day before the fayre was appointed, and two nightes before the looking for of his enimies, who being vnprouided, he ſodainely cauſed to be apprehended and taken, and openly put to execution. After this ieopardie thus eſcaped, he put diffidence in all the Pariſians, truſting little the Nobles, and geuing leſſe credite to the cõmons, determined to fortefie the garriſons of his awne nation, and all the Caſtels neere and adioyning to the Citie, which within ſmall time were abundauntly furniſhed. And to auoyde all night watchers adioyning to Paris, and the confines of the ſame, he firſt tooke into his poſſeſſion, eyther by aſſaulte or compoſition the towne of Trayneil and Bray vpon Seyne, and becauſe two Caſtels the one called Pacy, and the other called Curſay were alſo euill neighbors to the Pariſians, he ſent Sir John Faſtolffe great maſter of his houſholde, with a notable armie to beſiege the Caſtell of Pacy, which takyng vpon him that enterpriſe, ſo handeled his enimies, that the Capitayne named Guyllam Reymon Eſquire, and all the garriſon yeelded them ſimply to his mercy and diſcretion, whome he ſent as priſoners to the City of Paris, and after beſieged the Caſtell of Courſay, which

to him was ſhortly rendered vpon like appointment, and ſo with praye and priſoners he returned to the Lorde of Bedford his Maſter. In this verie ſeaſon the Dolphyn ſent Lorde Wylliam Stuard, Conſtable of Scotland, and the Erle of Uentadorne in Iuergne, and many other nobles of his parte, to lay ſiege to the towne of Crauant, in the Countie of Iurerre within the partes of Burgoyn, whereof hering the Lorde Regent, and the Duke of Burgoyn, they aſſembled a great armie, to the number of. xv. thouſand, whereof the Erle of Saliſburie was ordeyned Captaine, which came in good array to geue battayle to the beſiegers of the towne of Crauant, and becauſe the ryuer of Youne which runneth by the ſayde towne, was betweene the Engliſhe armie and their aduerſaries, they coulde not well aſſaile their enemies, which defended the bankes and paſſages very ſtrongly, yet notwithſtanding both horſemen and footemen of the Engliſhe parte, courageouſly put themſelues into the ryuer, and wyth fine force recouered the banke, whome the Burgonions incontinent folowed. When they were all gotten into the playne, the Archers ſhot, and the Bilmen ſtrake, and long was the fight in indifferent iudgement, but in concluſion the French men not able to reſiſt the force nor puyſſaunce of the Engliſhe Nation, were taken, eyther ſlayne or diſcomfited, for in that mortall battayle were ſlayne and taken to the number of eyght thouſand men, wherof was ſlayne of Engliſh men. xxx. C.

After this fortunate victorie obteyned, the Engliſh men entered into the towne of Crauant, much prayſing the doynges of the Capteynes, and the fidelitie of the Citizens, and when they had ſet all thinges in an order, they returned to Paris, where of the Regent they were ioyouſly receyued, which there conſtituted the Erle of Sariſbury (as he was wel worthy) Uicegerent and Lieutenant for the king and him in the Countries of Fraunce, Bry, and Champaine, and Sir John Faſtolfe he ſubſtituted Deputie vnder him in the Duchie of Normandie on this ſide the riuer of Seyne, and with that he deputed him gouernor of the Countries of Aniow and Mayne, and aſſigned able Capteines in euery holde and fortreſſe. The Erle of Sariſbury which could not ſleepe in his great office of truſt, layde ſiege to the towne and Caſtell of Mountaguilon in Brie, whereof were Capteynes, Pregent of Coteny, and Guille Bourgoys Britons, which valiauntly defended the Caſtell by the ſpace of fiue monethes, but in concluſion the aſſaylantes were ſo fierce that they within for ſauegarde of their lyues rendred the holde, and the Capteynes ſware neuer to bere armure agaynſt the Engliſhe men on this ſyde the riuer of Leyre: during which ſiege, the Erle of Suffolke toke by force the Caſtell of Couey: and the ſtrong Caſtell de la Roche he gat by appoyntment in Moſconoys.

James king of Scots being priſoner was releaſed & ſent home.

Nowe muſt I go backe to put you in memorie howe James king of Scottes, beyng both priſoner in the time of king Henry the fourth, and alſo as ſubiect to king Henrye the fift his ſonne, ſeruyng him in his warres in Fraunce till he departed out of this tranſitorie life at Boys de Uincens, and ſo as chiefe Mourner attended on the Corps of the ſayd deceaſſed king, vnto his buriall, and after at Weſtminſter was releaſed of his Captiuitie, and reſtored to his realme and poſſeſſion. For the true knowlege thereof, you ſhall vnderſtand that England demaunded a ſmal raunſome for ſo great a prince, as the Scottes accompt their king (and the Scottes were neither able, nor offered offered no somme conuenient) wherefore the counsaile of the realme of England grauously pondered, and wisely considered, that if by coniunction of mariage, England and Scotland were perfectly knit in one, that the indissoluble bande of amitie betweene the Frenche and Scottishe factions should be shortly broken and dissolued. Wherefore the protector of the realme of England by the consent of the whole Baronage of the same, gaue to him in mariage the Ladie Jane, daughter to John Erle of Sommerset deceassed, not onely sister to John then Duke of Sommerset, but also Cosin Germain removed to the king, and Niece to the Cardinall of Winchester, and the Duke of Exceter.

The king of Scottes hauyng a great affection to this fayre Ladie, but much more desiryng his deliueraunce and libertie, put in hostages for the residue of his raunsome, because a great part therof was diminished and abated for the money allowed to him for his mariage, and so was deliuered to depart at his pleasure. Alack, the olde prouerbes be to true: an Ape although he be clothed in purple, will be but an Ape, and a Scot neuer so gently entertayned of an Englishe prince, will be but a dissemblyng Scot. What kindnesse could be more shewed to a prisoner, then to bring him vp in good literature? what loue may be more declared to a captiue, then to instruct him in martiall feates, and warlike affayres? what fauour can be more ascribed to a highe and renoumed prince, then to geue in mariage to his vnderlyng and vassall, his Cosyn and kinswoman of his royall parentage lawfully discended. All these kindnesses suffised not, nor all these gratuities auayled not to make this king James friendly to the realme of Englande. For he notwithstandyng his homage done to the yong Henry king of England, and of Fraunce, at his Castell of Windsore this present yere, before three Dukes, two Archbishops, xii. Erles. x. Bishops. xx. Barons, and two. C. knightes and Esquiers and mo, according to the tenor hereafter folowyng.

The homage of the king of Scottes.

¶ I James Stuart king of Scottes, shall be true and faythfull vnto you Lorde Henry, by the grace of God king of England and Fraunce, the noble and superior Lorde of the kingdome of Scotland, and vnto you I make my fidelitie for the same kingdome of Scotland, which I hold and claime to hold of you, and I shall beare you my fayth and fidelitie of life and lim, and worldly honour agaynst all men, and faithfully I shall knowlege, and shall do to you seruice due to the kingdome of Scotland afore sayde. So God helpe me and these holy Euangelistes.

Neither regardyng his othe, nor esteemyng the great abundaunce of plate and riches, to him by the mother and vncles of his wife liberally geuen, and friendly deliuered (of which sort of richesse fewe or none before that day were euer seene in the Countrie of Scotlande) like a dogge which hath cast by his stomacke and returneth to his vomyt, or like a snake which after hys engendring with a Lamprey, taketh againe his olde poyson: After he had once taken the ayre, and smelled the sent of the Scottishe soyle, became like his fraudulent forefathers, an vntrue Prince, and like his proude progenitors toke the ymage of a braggyng and boastyng Scot, newly alied himselfe with the French Nation. And yet whatsoeuer he did, his Nation both write and testifie, that by the learnyng which he by the great benefite of the kinges of England duryng his Captiuitie in this realme had obteyned, replenished his his Countrie with good litterature, and by the nurture the which he was brought vp in England, he brought his people to ciuilitie: So that his captiuitie was to his Nacion the greatest libertie that euer they could haue, deliuering them from blinde ignorance, to excellent knowlege, reducing them from bestiall maners, to honest behauiour, and in conclusion causyng them to knowe vertue from vice, pollicie from rudenesse, and humaine honestie from wilde and beastly liuyng. This was the deliuerance and the doynges of James the first of that name king of Scottes, which neither reigned verye quietly, nor yet euer fauoured Englishe men before the French people: sauyng that he hauyng with him into his countrie a yong Gentleman of Northumberland called Andrew Gray (which duryng his captiuitie was hys companion) promoted him to the mariage of the heyre of the Lorde of Foules in Angus, of the which the Lord Grayes of Scotland at this day do descende.

1424 3 Nowe to retourne to the affayres of England. The Duke of Gloucester beyng Protector and Gouernour of the realme, called to him the peeres and nobility of the realme, and by their agreementes & deuises sent into Fraunce to the Regent his brother ten thousād men of warre, which were of the same Regent in the Countrie of Paris louyngly receyued, and accordyng to their degrees honestly entertayned. Duryng their liyng in Paris, diuers chaunces happened in Fraunce, for euen as Englishmen valiauntly wonne, and victoriously conquered townes and Castels with open warre and apparant conquest: so the Frenchemen fraudulently stale, and couertly obteyned diuerse fortresses and holdes, appertaynyng to the Englishe faction, and in especiall the fayre towne of Champaigne, and the pretie towne of Crotoy.

When the Duke of Bedford was aduertised of these craftie trickes and sodeine inuented traynes, he sent foorth an armie, first to Compaigne, whereof was Capteine the Erle of Suffolk, accompanied with the Erle of Ligny, and diuerse other Capteines of the English men, which lay on the one side of the riuer of Somme, and on the other syde lay the Lord Lisleadam, sir Thomas Rampston, and the prouost of Paris. The Frenchmen beyng strongly furnished and well victualed, courageously defended the towne against the assailantes. The Englishemen perceiuyng that Guillam Remond otherwise called Mariolayn, had beene the leader of the Souldiours within the towne, which before at Pacis was taken prisoner by sir John Fastolfe, caused him to be sent for to Paris, and so brought him to the siege, and set him in a Chariot with a Halter about his necke, and conueyed him to the Gibbet without the towne, sendyng worde to the garrison within the towne, that if they would not without delay render the towne and fortresse, they would incontinent strangle their olde Capteine and chiefe conductor. The Souldiours within the towne perceiuyng that if Guillam Raymond the onely trust of their reliefe, and the auncient friend in their necessitie should suffer death, that then their hope of all ayde were extinguished: and therefore for deliuerance of him and sauegarde of themselues, they yelded the towne: so that both he and they might depart with horse and harnesse onely, in sure conduite and safetie: yet long or the towne of Compaigne was deliuered, Sir Philip Hall, which was sent to Crotoy by the Lord Regent, with .viij. hundreth men to beseige the towne, gat it by assault sodeinly, or the Frenchmen had eyther disposed their garrison, or appoynted their lodgynges, and tooke all the men of warre, & put them to raunſom. And ſo theſe two townes cowardly ſtolen, were manfully recouered, but yet the writers of French fables that do deface the glory of the Engliſhmen, write & ſay that theſe townes were yelded to the Burgonians, which neither had the kepyng of them, nor were ſouldiours to any other perſon but to the king of England. While theſe thinges were thus doyng in Fraunce, Sir John de la Pole, brother to the Erle of Suffolke, Capteine of Iuranches in Normandie, aſſembled all the garriſons of the baſe Marches of the Countrie of Iniow, and came before the Citie of Angiers, and brent the ſuburbes, ſpoyled and deſtroyed the whole Countrie, and hauing as many prayes and priſoners as his men might carye, he was encountred by the Erle of Aubmerle, the Vicont Nerbone, and fiue thouſand Frenchmen: which findyng the Engliſhemen out of array becauſe of the cariage of their great ſpoyle, ſodeinly ſet on them, and ſlue three hundreth perſons, and tooke priſoners the ſaide Sir John delapoole, Sir John Ballet, John Iuford Lieutenant of Faloys, John Clifton, Henry Mortimer, and fiue hundreth other. Although the Frenche men gate this day in one place, yet they went not victors away in another, for the Baſtard de la Baulme, and the Lorde Craignac Capteines of Courrallon with a great band, made a roade into Maſconnoys, with whome by chaunce met Mathew Gough, and other Engliſhmen which were ſcouryng the Countrie, to ſee and here newes of their enemies, there was a ſore conflict, and an hard encounter, the partes in maner beyng of courage and number egal, but after long fight, the French men almoſt all were ſlaine and taken, and the Baſtard beyng well horſed fled, after whome folowed with the fierceneſſe of his ſpurres Mathewe Gough, and chaſed him to his Caſtell gate, and there tooke him as he would haue hid him in the ditch, and preſented him to the Erle of Sariſbury, returnyng from Compaigne to Paris, which not only gaue to him the rightes belongyng to the priſoner, but alſo rewarded him with a goodly Courſer, and highly exalted his name and manhoode.

About this ſeaſon, Arthur brother to John Duke of Britayn commonly called the Erle of Richemond, hauyng neither profite of the name nor of the Countrie, notwithſtandyng that king Henry the fift had created him Erle of Eury in Normandie, and gaue him not onely a great penſion, but the ſame towne of Eury: yet becauſe his brother the Duke of Britayne fearyng the Engliſhemen nowe hauyng Normandie, would ſmell and deſyre to taſte the ſweete ſoyle of Britayn, was late (contrary to his league and othe) returned to the part of Charles the Dolphyn, he likewiſe returned and craftely without cauſe fled into Flaūdrys, and ſo came to the Dolphyn to Poytiers, which was more glad of his comming then if he had gayned a C. M. crownes, for the Britons which kept the towne and Caſtell of Eury, hearyng that their maiſter was ioyned with the Dolphyn, both kept the Caſtell againſt the Duke of Bedford, furniſhyng it dayly with newe people and munitions, and alſo vered, ſpoyled, and robbed the Countrie adioynyng, doyng to the Engliſhemen the moſt hurt and hammage that could be deuiſed or imagined.

The Lorde Regent being aduertiſed of all theſe troubles and calamities, aſſembled a great armie both of Engliſhe men and Normans, entendyng to ſerch the Dolphin in euery part, to the entent to geue him battaile in a pitched field, and ſo to make a finall ende of his intended conqueſt. So ha-

uing in his company of Erles, knightes and Esquiers to the number (as the Frenche writers testifie) of.xviij. hundred men of armes, and eyght thousand Archers and other, came before the towne of Yury, which was well defended: but the Englishe men beganne to vndermine the walles, so that they within were glad to render the towne vpon condition, which was taken. Howbeit the Capitaynes of the Castell promised to yeelde, if their fortresse were not rescued at a daye assigned by the Dolphyn, with a number sufficient to rayse the siege, and vpon this promise hostages were delivered into the possession of the Lorde Regent. By his lycence an Herault was sent to the Dolphyn, to aduertise him of the time determined, the which herying of the distresse that his people and friendes were in, sent incontinent John Duke of Alanson his Lieutenant generall, the Erle Douglas whome at that setting forth he made Duke of Touraine, and the Erle Boughan, whom then in hope of good speede, he made Constable of Fraunce (which office he enioyed not fully an hundred houres,) and the Erles of Aumarle, Vantadoure, Tonnerre, Maulieurier, Forest, the Vicountes of Narbon and Thouars, the Lordes of Granuyle, Gaules, Malycorne, Manny, Ballay, Fountaynes, Mountfort, and many other noble knightes and Esquiers, to the number of.xv.M. French men and Britons, and.v.M. Scottes, whom the Erles of Douglas had transported late out of Scotland, more for meede then for loue.

Thys armie royall approched within two Miles of Yury, and sent.xl. light horsemen to viewe and espie both the number and conduit of the English men. These spies came very nere to the siege, and were espied and chased to their companions agayne, and declared all what they had seene and perceyued. The Duke of Alanson seing that he could not get any auantage of the English men, (although the Dolphyn had geuen him in straight commaundement to fight with the Regent) whether his heart fayled or he thought to wayte a more fortunate season for his purpose and enterprise, retired back with his whole army to the towne of Vernoyle in Perche, which belonged to the king of Englande, and sent worde to the garrison of that towne, that they had discomfited and slayne all the Englishe armie, and that the Regent with a small number, by swiftnesse of his horse had saued himselfe. The inhabitaunts of Vernoyle geuing to light credence to the Frenche fablers, receyued the Duke of Alanson with all his armie into the towne, and submitted themselues to him, which towne he desyred to haue of the gift of the Dolphyn as his owne inheritaunce and lawfull patrimony. Now approched the day of rescous of Yury, which was the day of our Lady the Assumption, at which day, no rescous appered to syr Gerrard de la Pallier Captaine of the Castell, which beyng in dispayre of all ayde and comfort, presented the keyes to the Duke of Bedford, and shewed him a letter signed and sealed with the handes of.xviij. great Lordes, which the daye before promised to geue the Duke battayle, and to dissolue the siege and raise the assaulte: well sayde the Duke, if their hartes woulde haue serued, their puyssaunce was sufficient once to haue profered, or to haue performed thys faythfull promise. But sithe they disdaine to seeke me, God and saint George wylling I shall not desist to folowe the tractes of their horses tyll one parte of vs be by battayle ouerthrowne: and so he gaue a safeconduyt to the Capitayne and other which would departe, but many of the Britons within the Caſtell of Yury, ſeing the faint hartes, and the falſe promiſes of the flattering French men, ſubmitted themſelues to the Lorde Regent, and ſware to be true to the king and him, whome he gently accepted, and put them in wages.

Then he furniſhed the Caſtell and towne with a newe garriſon, and incontinent he ſent the Erle of Suffolke with fiue hundred horſes, to eſpie where the French men were lodged, which paſſed by Dampeuile, and came to Bretnel, where he heard newes that the French men had taken Vernoile in Perche, and were there yet abyding, whereof with all diligent celeritie, he ſent worde to the Duke of Bedford, which not minding to leeſe his long deſired pray, ſet forward in great haſte toward their enimies. The French men hering of his comming, ſet their people in array, & made all one maine battayle wythout forward or rereward, and appointed certayne Lumbards and horſemen to breake the array of the Engliſhe men eyther behinde, or at the ſides, whereof was Capitayne Syr Stephyn Venoyles, called the hier. The Duke of Bedford, not ignorant howe to order his men, made likewiſe an entier battayle, and ſuffered no man to be on horſeback, and ſet the archers (euery one hauyng a ſharpe ſtake) both in the front of the battayle, and on the ſides lyke wings, and behinde the battayle were the pages with the Chariottes and cariages, and all the horſes were tyed together eyther with the reines of their bridles or by the tayles, to the entent that their enimies ſhould not ſodainely ſurpriſe or diſturbe them on the back behinde: and for to defend the cariages were appointed two thouſand archers. The French men at the firſt ſight remembring howe often times in pitched fieldes they had bene ouercome and vanquiſhed of the Engliſhe nation, beganne ſomewhat to feare, but when they ſawe no remedy but to fight, they tooke good courage to them, and ſet ſoftely forward. In which marchyng the Duke of Alaunſon, ſytting on horſeback, did with many good wordes encourage his Capitaynes and Souldiours to the battayle. The battaile of Vernoyle.

And in lyke maner the Duke of Bedford encouraged his people, and forthwith they gaue the onſet vpon their enimies, cryeng, Saint George, Bedford. And the French men likewiſe cryed, Mount ioy, ſaint Denyſe. Then the arrowes flewe out of the long bowes on the one parte, the quarrels out of the Croſſe bowes on the other parte. After they came to hande ſtrokes: great was the fight, and terrible was the battayle, with ſo indifferent iudgement of victorie, that no Herauld could determine to which parte Fortune moſt ſhewed her louing countenaunce. For on both ſides men were ſlayne and wounded, and on both partes ſome were felled and recouered, thus ſtil in a doubtfull iudgement the battaile continued about three houres. The Duke of Alaunſon in the meane ſeaſon neuer ceaſed to exhort and pray his people manly to fight, and not to ſuffer their enimies, (which were at the verie point to be ouercome) by their faint hartes to be victors, and ouercommers. Lykewiſe the Duke of Bedford rode about his armie, refreſhing the weake with freſhe men, and encoraging hys people with moſt pleaſaunt wordes: But at the laſte, when he perceiued the Frenchmen, what with heate, and with trauayle, to ware wearie and faint, and not to be ſo freſhe as they were before (for ſurely the nature of the Frenchmen is not to labor long in fighting, and much more braggeth then fighteth) he with all hys ſtrength ſet incontinent on them with ſuche a violence, that they bare them downe to the grounde by fine force. The frenche horſemen that daye did little ſeruice: for the archers ſo galled their horſes, that they deſyred not muche to approch their preſence. This battayle was fought the.xxviij.day of Auguſt, in the yere of our Lorde.1425. in the which battayle were ſlaine.

A great victorie.

In this battayle were ſlayne by reporte of Monioy king at armes in Fraunce, and the Engliſhe Heraulds there preſent, of Frenche men and Scottes. ix.thouſand and ſeauen hundred, and of the Engliſhe men.xxj.C. but no man of name, ſauyng fiue yong Eſquiers. And there were taken priſoners, John Duke of Alaunſon, the Baſtarde of Alaunſon, the Lorde of Fayect, the Lorde of Hozmit, Sir Piers Harriſon, Sir Loys de Uancorte, Sir Robert Bzuſſet, Sir John Turnebull a Scot, and two hundred Gentlemen, beſides common Souldiours.

After that the Duke of Bedford had thus obtayned the vpper hande of his enimies, and diſcomfited the onely ſtrength of the Dolphyn. Then he commaunded all the Frenchmen within the towne of Uernoyle, to go out and depart, or elſe to abide their aduenture. They perceyuing the euill ſucceſſe of their boſting enterpriſe, and ſeing no meane, whereby in ſo lowe an ebbe they might be ayded, delyuered vp the towne, and went forth out of the ſame, their lyues ſaued. Of which towne the Lord Regent conſtituted Captayne ſyr Philip Hall, and ſo departed from thence to the Citie of Roan, where with triumph (and not vnworthy) he was ioyouſly receyued and honourably feaſted. And after all thinges there ſet in an order, he remooued to Parys.

When this victorie was publiſhed through Fraunce: The Dolphyn was driuen out of all ꝑ Countries appertenyng to the crowne of Fraunce, and might reſort to no Countries except to Burbonoys, Aluerne, Berry, Poyctou, Towrain, a part of Aniow, and Barrain, and Languedoc. And becauſe cauſe diuerſe of his friendes, which were aduocates in Paris, exiled themſelues from the Parliament of Paris, which was with all rightes, and iuriſdictions therevnto belongyng, kept, and holden in the name of king Henry the firſt, as lawfull heyre, and very king of the realme of Fraunce: he therefore to ſhewe hymſelfe as a king, erected his court of parliament, his Chauncery, and all other Courts in the Citie of Poyctiers, and there eſtabliſhed his great ſeale, with all due circumſtaunces therevnto apperteinyng, which there continued by the ſpace of.xiiij. yeres, as you ſhall after here declared. The Duke of Bedford lyng at Paris, entendyng there to bring to obeyſaunce Charles the Dolphin, or elſe to driue him out of his little Conie holes, and ſmall countries, ſent the Lorde Scales, Sir John Wontgomerey, Sir John Faſtolf, with two thouſand men, to conquere the Countries of Aniow and Mayne, which without aſſault had rendred to them the ſtrong Caſtelles of Beamont le Vicont, Teume, Silly, Olle, Courceriers, Rouſſy, Vaſſe, Couetemenant, and twentie other, which for prolixitie of time, I thinke neceſſary to be omitted. For ſurely the Engliſhe puyſſaunce was ſo tryed, proued, aſſayed, and ſpred abroad throughout all Fraunce, that the Frenchemen thought that in concluſion the Engliſhemen would haue, or ſhould haue all thinges, whiche they either wiſhed or enterpriſed. The Duke of Bedford yet thirſtyng after more good fortune, ſent the Erle of Sariſbury, with a great armie accompanied with the Lord Scales, and other approued Capteynes, (whoſe names you haue heard before) into the Countrie of Aniow and Mayne, which were euill neighbours to the Duchie of Normandie: In which armie were ten thouſand men of warre, or there about. Theſe luſtie Capteynes entered firſt into the Countrie of Maine, and beſeiged the riche and ſtrong Citie of Mauns, the chiefe towne and empery of all that Countrie and region. And although the Citezens, aſwell for the ſodaine acceſſe of their enemies, as for the feare of the name of the Erle of Sariſbury (which was both dread of his enemies, and honoured of his friends) were ſomewhat amaſed and aſtoned: yet their Capteynes named ſir Baldwyn of Champaigne Lorde of Toſſy, Sir Guilliam de Marignie, and Sir Hughe de Goos, ſtudied and inuented all wayes poſſible howe to defend theyrſelues, and to do damage and harme to their enemies: and ſurely, they had within the towne a crewe and a companie of warlike and practiſed ſouldiours. The Engliſhemen approched as nighe to the walles as they might without their loſſe and detriment, and ſhot againſt their walles great ſtones out of great Goonnes (which kinde of enginnes before that tyme, was very little ſeene or hearde of in Fraunce,) the ſtrokes whereof ſo ſhaked, cruſhed and rined the walles, that within fewe dayes, the Citie was diſpoyled of all her towres and outward defences. The Citizens of Mauns much marueilyng at theſe newe orgaynes, both ſeeyng their deſtruction imminent, and deſperate of all ayde and ſuccour, offered the towne vpon this condicion: that all perſons which would tary within the towne might abyde, and all that would depart with horſe and harneſſe onely, ſhould be permitted: which offers were accepted, and the towne rendred, whereof the Erle made Capteyne the Erle of Suffolke, and his Lieutenant Sir John Faſtolfe. After this the ſayd Erle of Sariſbury beſieged the faire towne of Saint Suſan, whereof was Capteyne, Ambroſe de Lore, a man of no leſſe audacitie then pollecie, accompanied with a great number of hardy men of warre. When the Erle of Sarisburie had both viewed and seene the situation and nature of the place, he determined to assault it in that place which was most weake and worne: and so the trumpets blewe to the assault and scalyng Ladders were raysed to the walles, and the Englishe men with great noyse began to clime and ascende. The Souldiours which durst not come out of the towne to encounter with the Englishe armie, manfully ran to the walles to resist and defend the assaylants. And so all that day the assault with many aduentures still continued, and although the inhabitauntes and Citizens were sore wounded, they neuer left off both to defende themselues, and to annoy and hurt their enemies. When the Erle perceyued that by this light assault and sleight skirmishe he lost somewhat, and gayned nothing, he made a wall, and cast a trenche round about the towne: and caused his great ordenaunce to be shot at that part of the wal which was most feeble and slender, and so daily and nightly he neuer ceassed to beate, and breake downe the wall and Towres: so that within two dayes the most part of the wall was persed and cast downe to the ground. When the Capteine perceyued these newe feates, he began to entreate, and offered for himselfe and his souldiors, two thousand crownes, so that they might depart in their doblets onely, so their lyues were saued (which somme of money) because Winter approched: was taken, and the towne yelded. Of the which towne he made Capteine Sir John Popham, a valiaunt and a circumspect knight. After that, the said Erle besieged the towne and Castell of Mayon le Juhez, wherin was Captaine the Lord of Escotais: which towne after the space of fiue weekes was yelded (the liues of the defenders onely saued.) To the kepyng whereof he appoynted Sir John Montgomery knight. And after the feast of the Purification of our Ladie, he besieged the Castell de lafort Barnard: During which Siege, a sale was made of the towne of Alanson being in the Englishe mens possession by a Gascoyne and one of the Garrison there, for foure hundreth crownes, to Charles de Villiers, Peter le Beuffe, and other french Capteynes. When the day was appoynted of the deliueraunce both of the towne and the money, the Gascoyne opened and discouered the whole agrement to the Erle of Sarisbury: which ordeyned the Lorde Willoughby, and Sir John Fastolfe with two thousand Englishemen to encounter with the byers of the kinges towne of Alanson. At the day appoynted and time assigned, Charles de Villiers chiefe Marchant of this riche enterprise, early in the morning with two hundreth horsemen, and three hundreth footemen approched neere the towne, and abidyng for the Gascoyne, he there displayed his banner, thinkyng triumphantly to enter into the towne: but it happened otherwise. For or they were ware, or suspected any rescues, they were enuironed with the Englishe armie, and slaine and taken euery creature, saue Peter Danthenazy, and .xxv. other, which by the swiftnesse of their horses saued themselues.

Mayon and the Castell yelded.

After this conflict ended, the Lorde Willoughby with his companie returned to the Erle of Sarisbury, before the towne le fort Barnard: the Capteines whereof considering that there was no hope of succour to be sente to them, and that their vitaile diminished, and that they were not long able to abyde the harde assaultes of the Englishe Nation, rendered the towne and Castell, reseruing to them their horse and harnesse onely, which towne the

Erle receyued to the vse of the king: But the Regent for the valiaunt seruice done by the Erle, gaue the same Towne to hym and to his heyres for e-uer. Besides this, the Erle partly by assault, partly by composition, toke dy-uers other townes, as Saint Kales, where he made Captaine Richard Gethyne Esquier, Thanceaux Lermitage, where he made gouernour Mathew Gough, Guerland, of the which he assigned ruler, John Banaster, Malicorne, whereof he made Capteyne, William Glasdale Esquier, Lisle Soubz Boulton, wherof he made Capteine sir Lancelot Lisle knight, Lewpelland, whereof was made Capteyne, Henry Braunche, Mountleur, of the which was made Constable, sir William Oldehall knight, la Sulze, was assigned to the keepyng of John Suffolke squier, and beside this, aboue. xl. Castels and Pyles were ouerthrowne and destroyed. When the fame and report of these newes were blowen through Fraunce, some freated, some feared, and some raged for anger: But the veritie of all thinges beyng by the Duke of Bedford declared into England, all men reioyced and were verye glad: not onely for the conquest of so manie townes, but also that God had sent them victorie in a pitched fielde, and in a mortall battaile. Wherefore generall processions were commaunded, to render to God almightie humble and hartie thankes, by whose onely gift, and not by the power of man, these notable victories were gotten and acheued.

It is not conuenient that I should talke so much of Fraunce, and omit all thinges done in England: Wherefore, you shall vnderstand, that about Easter this yere, the king called his high Court of Parliament, at his towne of Westminster, and comming to the Parliament house, he was conueyed through the Citie vpon a great Courser with great triumph, which childe was iudged of all men, not onely to haue the very Image, the liuely portrature, and lonely countenaunce of his noble parent and famous father, but also lyke to succede, and be his heyre in all morall vertues, marciall policyes, and Princely feates, as he was vndoubted inheritor to hys realmes, seignio-ries and dominions. In which Parliament was graunted to the king a subsidie of. xij. pence of the pounde, towardes the maintenaunce of the warres, of all marchandise comming into this realme, or going out of the same, and three shillyngs of euery Tonne of wine, besides other sommes set on other liquor, for the terme of three yeres, & likewise was tared euery sack of wooll, aswell of English men, as of straungers. During which parliament, came to London Peter Duke of Quimber, sonne to the king of Portingale, & Cosin Germaine remoued to the king, which of the Duke of Exceter and the Bishop of Winchester his Uncles, was highly feasted, and liberally rewarded, and was elected into the noble order of the Garter. Duryng which season, Edmond Mortimer, the last Erle of Marche of that name (which long time had bene restrained from his libertie, and finally wared lame) deceassed without issue, whose inheritaunce descended to Lord Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heyre to Richard Erle of Cambridge, beheded, as you haue heard before, at the towne of Southhampton. Which Richard within lesse then. xxx.

and scepter of this Realme, as hereafter shall more manifestly appere. In the tyme of which Parliament also, whether it were, either for desert or malice, or to auoyde thinges that might chaunce, accordyng to a prouerbe, which

ſayeth, a dead man doth no harme. Sir Roger Mortimer, coſyn to the ſayde Erle, was attainted of treaſon and put to execution: of whoſe death no ſmall ſlaunder aroſe among the common people.

After all theſe actes done in England, and in Fraunce, Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, with the Lady Jaquet his ſuppoſed wife, paſſed the ſea, and came to Mons in Henawde, and there by force tooke all ſuche landes, as John Duke of Brabant her firſt huſbande had in poſſeſſion of the ſayde Lady Jaquet, which doing Phylip Duke of Burgoyn, beyng great friend to the Duke of Brabant, muche diſdayned, and more frowned at, and thought for the olde loue and familiaritie, that he bare to the Duke of Gloucester, that he woulde by friendly monicion, turne hym from hys vnhoneſt and vngodly lyfe, to a reaſonable reformation, and brotherly conformitie. Wherfore he wrote louyngly vnto hym, that he ſhould vtterly leaue of any further to folowe the newe attempted enterpriſe, aduertiſyng hym and proteſting openly, that the vſurping and wrongfull withholding of an other mans poſſeſſion, was not ſo vyle and ſlaunderous, as the defyling of a pure and cleane bed, and adulterouſly keping the wife of his Chriſtian brother. The Duke of Gloucester being in this caſe very wilfull, eyther blinded with dotage, or inflamed with couetouſneſſe of his wyfes poſſeſſions, regarding neyther the admoniſhment of the Duke of Brabant, nor yet the godly aduertiſement of the Duke of Burgoyne, ſware that he would not leue of to make farther warre, till he had expulſed the Duke of Brabant, out of hys wyfes ſegniories, territories and dominions. Wherefore the Duke of Burgoyn aſſembled together a great armie to make warre on the Duke of Gloucester, in the cauſe and quarell of the Duke of Brabant his friend and Coſyn. The Duke of Gloucester, partely for great affayres, that then were imminent in the realme of Englande, and partely to aſſemble more people, to reſiſt and withſtand the power of the Dukes of Burgoyn and Brabant, lett hys wyfe at Mons in Henaude, with the Lordes of the towne, which ſware to hym, to defende and keepe her agaynſt all men, till the time of his returne. Wherfore he leauing with her two thouſand Engliſh men, departed to Calice, and ſo into Englande.

When he was gone, the Duke of Burgoyne ſo threatened, ſo vexed, yea, and almoſt ſo famiſhed them within the towne of Mons, that they deliuered into his poſſeſſion the Lady Jaquet or Jacomyne: which incontinent ſent her to Gaunt, where ſhe diſguiſed her ſelfe in a mans apparell, and ſo eſcaped into a towne of her awne in Zeland, called Zirice, and from thence ſhe was conueyed to a towne in Holland, called Tergowe, where ſhe was honorably receyued, and there made her ſelfe ſtrong to withſtande her enemies: And for her ſuccour the Duke of Gloucester ſent to her fiue hundred men. The Dukes of Burgoyn and Brabant left her not all in quiet, but brent her townes in Holland, and ſlue her people in Zelande, to her great detriment and diſpleaſure. But in concluſion, this matter was brought before Martyn the fift Biſhop of Rome: which adiudged the firſt matrimonie with Duke John of Brabant, to be good and effectuall, and the ſecond eſpouſall celebrated with Duke Humfrey of Gloucester, to be of no value, force or effect, and that if the Duke of Brabant dyed, it ſhould not be lawfull to the Duke of Gloucester, to mary againe with the Lady Jaquet. The Duke of Glouceſter obeyeng to this ſentence, beganne to waxe lothe of his ſuppoſed wyfe, by whome he neuer had profite but loſſe: for whoſe cauſe his friends became his enimies, and for whoſe ſake he was openly ſlaundered. Wherefore he, by wanton affection blinded, toke to hys wyfe Elianor Cobham daughter to the Lorde Cobham, of Sterberow, which before (as the fame went) was his ſoueraigne Lady and paramour, to his great ſlaunder and reproche. And if he were vnquieted wyth his other pretenced wyfe, truely he was ten tymes more vexed, by occaſion of this woman, as you ſhall hereafter playnely perceyue: So that he beganne his mariage with euill, and ended it with worſe. The Ladye Jaquet after the death of John Duke of Brabant, maried a gentleman of meane eſtate, called Franke of Burſellen, for the whych cauſe the Duke of Burgoyne impryſoned her huſbande, and lefte her in great trouble: ſuche was the ende of theſe two mariages.

A little before this time, Sir Thomas Rampſtone, ſyr Philip Branch, Sir Nicholas Burdet, and other Engliſhe men, to the number of fiue hundred, repaired and fortified the towne of Saint James de Leitron, on the frontiers of Normandy, adioyning to Britain. Arthur Erle of Richemond and Yury brother to the Duke of Britayne, which like an vntrue Gentlemã, ſworne and forſworne to the king of England, ſodainely fled to Charles the Dolphyn: which much reioyſing of his fauour and amitie, gaue to hym the Conſtableſhip of Fraunce, which the Erle of Boughan ſlayne before at Vernoyl, a ſmall time occupied, and leſſe ſpace enioyed. This new Conſtable not a little ioyfull of his high office, thought to doe ſome pleaſure to the Dolphyn hys Maſter, and to aduaunce his name at the firſt entry into his authoritie, he imagined no enterpriſe to be to him more honorable, nor to his prince more acceptable, then to adnoyde and driue out of the towne of Saint James de Beueon, all the Engliſhe nation. So in hope of victorie he gathered together aboue .xl. M. men, of Britons, Frenchmen and Scottes, and enuironed the towne of Saint James, or Saint Jaques de Beuron, with a ſtrong ſiege. The Engliſhe men within, which in number paſſed not fiue hundred men, manfully defended the dayly aſſaultes of the fierce frenchmen. The Engliſhe men conſulted together what way was beſt to be taken: and after long debating, they determined to iſſue out of the towne, and to fight with their enimies. So on a day, when the Britons were wearied with a long aſſault, towards the euening the Engliſhe men came out of the towne one part by the poſterne of the Caſtell, and another parte by the gate of the towne, cryeng ſaint George Saliſburie: and ſet on their enemies both before and behinde. The French men ſeyng the courage of the Engliſhe men, and hearing their crie, thinking that the Erle of Saliſburie was come to raiſe the ſiege, ranne awaye like ſheepe, and there were taken ſlayne and drowned in the water of them foure thouſand men and mo. Beſides thys, theſe iolly Gallaunts left behinde them for haſte, all their tentes. xiiij. great Gonnes, and .xl. Barrelles of pouder, three hundred pipes of wyne, two hundred pypes of Biſket and floure, two hundred Frayles of Figges and Reaſons, and fiue hundred Barels of Hering.

A great victory hapned to the Engliſhe men.

The French men (beyng thus vanquiſhed) fell in diuiſion amongeſt themſelues: the one layeng to the charge of the other the loſſe of their men, and the cause of their flyeng. Such is euer the chaunce of the warre, ỳ when victorie is obteyned, the most cowarde and faint harted boy will boste and bragge, and when the battayle is lost, the fault is assigned to the best, and not to the worste. The new Constable was sore dismayed and much ashamed of this discomfiture and shameful flight, but there was no remedy but pacience: But to the entent to blot out and deface this shamefull flyeng with a notable victorie, he with a great armie entered into the Countrie of Anjowe, and brent, spoyled and destroyed two or three at the most, little poore thetched Villages: which small act done, his malice was quenched, and his olde griefe (as he thought) victoriously reuenged.

and

A variaunce betweene the Duke of Gloucester, and the Bysshop of Winchester.

In this season fell a great diuision in the realme of England, which of a sparkle was like to growe to a great flame: For whether the Bysshop of Winchester called Henry Beaufort, sonne to John Duke of Lancaster, by his thirde wyfe, enuied the auctoritie of Humfrey Duke of Gloucester protector of the realme, or whether the Duke had taken disdaine at the ryches and pompous estate of the Bishop, sure it is that the whole realme was troubled with them and their parte takers: so that the Citezens of London fearing that which might insue vpon the matter, were fayne to keepe daylie and nightly watches, as though their enemies were at hande to besiege and destroy them: In so much that all the shoppes within the Citie of London were shut in for feare of the fauourers of these two great personages, for eche parte had assembled no small number of people. For pacifying wherof, the Archebyshop of Cauntorburie, and the Duke of Quymber, called the prince of Portyngale, roade eyght times in one day betweene the two aduersaries, and so the matter was stayed for that time. The Byshop of Winchester not content with his Nephewe the Lorde Protector, sent a letter to the Regent of Fraunce, the tenor whereof ensueth.

RIght high and mightie prince, and my right noble, and after one, leneſt Lorde, I recommend me vnto you with all my heart. And as you desire the welfare of the king our soueraigne Lorde, and of his realmes of Englande and Fraunce, and your awne health and oures also, so hast you hether. For by my truth, if you tarie, we shall put thys lande in aduenture wyth a Fielde, suche a Brother you haue here, God make hym a good man. For your wysedome knoweth, that the profite of Fraunce standeth in the welfare of Englande. &c. Written in great haste on Allhallow euen. By your true seruaunt to my lyues ende. Henry Winchester.

The Duke of Bedford beyng sore greeued and vnquieted with these newes, cõstituted the Erle of Warwike, which was lately come into Fraunce wyth fiue thousand men, hys Lieutenaunt in the French dominions, and in the Duchy of Normandie, and so with a small company, he wyth the Duches his wyfe, returned agayne ouer the Seas into Englande, and the .v. day of January, he was with all solemnitie receyued into London, to whom the Citezens gaue a paire of Basynnes of siluer and gilte, and a thousande Marke in money: and from London he roade to Westminster, and was lodged in the kinges Palayce. The .xxv. day of Marche after hys comming to London, a Parliament begamne at the towne of Leycester, where the Duke of Bedford openly rebuked the Lordes in generall, because that they in the tyme of warre, through their priuie malice and inwarde grudge, had almost

moued the people to warre and commocion, in which time all men ought or should be of one minde, harte and consent: requiryng them to defende, serue and dread their soueraigne Lorde king Henry, in perfourming his conquest in Fraunce, which was in maner brought to concluſion. In this Parliament the Duke of Glouceſter layed certaine articles to the Byſhop of Wynchesters charge, the which with the aunſwers hereafter doe enſue.

The Articles of accuſation and accord, betvvene the Lorde of Glouceſter, and the Lorde of VVincheſter.

Articles set foorth by the Duke of Glouceſter againſt Henry Byſhop of wincheſter.

HEre inſueth the articles, as the kings counſayle hath conceiued, the which the high and mightie prince, my Lord of Glocester hath furniſed vpon my Lord of Wincheſter Chauncelour of England, with the anſwere to the ſame.

1 Firſt, where as he beyng Protector and defendor of thys lande, deſyred the Towre to be opened to him, and to lodge him therein, Rychard Woodeuile Eſquire, hauing at that time the charge of the keeping of the Towre, refuſed his deſire, and kept the ſame Towre agaynſt him, vnduely and agaynſt reaſon, by the commaundement of my ſayde Lorde of Wincheſter: and afterwarde in approuing of the ſayde refuſe, he receyued the ſayde Wodeuile, and cheriſhed him agaynſt the ſtate and worſhip of the king, and of my ſayde Lorde of Glouceſter.

2 Item, my ſayde Lorde of Wincheſter, without the aduiſe and aſſent of my ſayde Lorde of Glouceſter, or of the kings counſayle, purpoſed and diſpoſed him to ſet hand on the kinges perſon, and to haue remoued him from Eltham, the place that he was in, to Windſore, to the entent to put him in gouernaunce as him liſte.

3 Item, that where my ſayde Lorde of Glouceſter, to whome of all perſones or that ſhould be in the lande, by the waye of nature and byrth, it belongeth to ſee the gouernaunce of the kings perſon, informed of the ſayde vndue purpoſe of my ſayd Lord of Wincheſter, declared in the article nexte aboue ſayde. And in letting thereof, determyning to haue gone to Eltham vnto the king, to haue prouided as the cauſe required. My ſayde Lord of Wincheſter, vntruely and agaynſt the kinges peace, to the entent to trouble my ſayde Lorde of Glouceſter goyng to the king, purpoſing his death in caſe that he had gone that way, ſet men of armes and Archers at the ende of London bridge next Southwarke: and in forbarring of the kings high way, let drawe the cheyne of the Stulpes there, and ſet vp Pypes and Hardels, in maner and forme of Bulwarkes: and ſet men in Chambers, Sellers, and Windowes, with Bowes and arrowes and other weapons, to the entent to bring to finall deſtruction my ſayde Lorde of Glouceſters perſon, as well as of thoſe that then ſhould come with him.

4 Item, my ſayde Lorde of Glouceſter ſayth and affyrmeth, that our ſoueraigne Lorde his brother, that was king Henry the fift, tolde him on a time, when our ſayde ſoueraigne Lorde beyng Prince, was lodged in the Palaice of Weſtminſter in the great Chamber, by the noyes of a Spanyell there was on a night a man ſpied and taken behinde a tapet of the ſayd chamber, the which man was deliuered to the Erle of Arundell to be examined vppon the cauſe of his beyng there at that time, the which ſo examined, at that tyme, confeſſed that he was there by the ſtirring vp and procuring of my my sayde Lorde of Winchester, ordeyned to haue slayne the sayd prince there in his bed: Wherefore the sayde Erle of Arundell let sacke him foorthwith, and drowned him in the Thames.

5 Item, our souereigne Lorde that was, king Henry the fift, sayde vnto my sayde Lorde of Glouceſter that his father king Henry the fourth lyuing, and visited then greatly with sickneſſe of the hande of God, my sayde Lorde of Winchester sayd vnto the king (Henry the fifth then being prince) that the king his father, so visited with sickneſſe was not personable: and therfore not disposed to come in conuersation and gouernance of the people, & for so much, counsayled hym to take the gouernaunce and crowne of thys land vpon him.

The aunswere of the Bishop.

The answere of the Bysshop of Winchester vnto the former articles.

HEre ensue the aunsweres to the accusations made by my Lorde of Winchester Chauncelour of England, vnto the causes and matters of heauinesse, declared in articles agaynst him by my Lorde of Glouceſter.

1 First, as of the refuse made vnto my Lorde of Glouceſter, of openyng the tower to him, of his lodgyng therein, by the commaundement of my sayde Lorde of Wyncheſter, he aunswereth: that in the presence of my sayde Lorde of Glouceſter, before his commyng out of his Countie of Henaulde, for causes such as were thought reasonable, it semeth lefull that the tower should haue bene notablie stored and kept with vitaile, howbeit, it was not foorthwith executed, and that in likewise after that my sayde Lorde of Glouceſter was gone into his sayde Countie of Henawd for sedicious and odious billes and language, cast and vsed in the Citie of London, soumyng of insurrection and rebellion agaynst the kinges peace, and destruction aswell of diuerse estates of this land, as straungers beyng vnder the defence, in somuche that in doubt thereof, straungers in great number fled the land: and for the more sure keepyng of the sayd Tower, Richard Wooduile Esquier, so trusted with the king our souereigne Lorde that dead is (as well ye knowe) and also Chamberlain and Counsailor vnto my Lorde of Bedford, with a certeine number of defensible persons assigned vnto him, was made deputie there, by the assent of the kinges counsayle, beyng that tyme at London, for to abyde therein for safegarde thereof, and straitly charged by the sayde counsayle, that duryng that tyme of his sayde charge, he should not suffer any man to be in the Tower stronger then him selfe, without especiall charge or commaundement of the king by the aduice of his counsaile.

2 Item, that after, sone vpon the commyng of my sayd Lord of Glouceſter into this lande from his Countrie of Henawld, the sayde Lords of the kings counsaile were informed, that my sayde Lorde of Glouceſter, grudged with the sayd maner of enforcyng the Tower, and let say to them of London, that he had well vnderstand, that they had beene heauily threatned for the tyme of hys absence, and otherwise then they should haue bene if he had bene in thys land, Wherefore he was right euill contented, and especiall of the sayde forcyng of the Tower, set vpon them in maner of a chast vilaine. Considering the good equitie and truth that they had alwayes kept vnto the king, offring them therupon remedie if they would.

Frier Randolph.

3 Item that after this, Richard Scot Lieutenant of the Tower, by the commaundement of my sayd Lorde of Glouceſter, brought vnto him Frier Randolfe, the which had long before confessed treason, done by him agaynst

the kings person that dead is, for the which knowlege he was put to be kept in the sayde Tower, and straightly commaunded vnder great paine geuen vnto the sayd Scot, to kepe hym straightly and surely, and not to let him out of the sayd Tower without commaundement of the king, by the aduice of his counsaile. The which sayd Frier Randolfe, my sayde Lorde of Glouceſter kept then with himselfe (not wittyng to the sayd Scot) as he declared vnto my sayd Lord of Winchester. Sone after that he had brought the sayd Frier Randolfe vnto my Lord of Glouceſter, saiyng vnto my Lord of Winchester, that he was vndone but he helped hym, and expressed as for cause of the sayd withholdyng of Frier Randolfe: And saiyng moreouer, that when he desired of my sayd Lorde of Glouceſter, the deliueraunce of the sayd Frier Randolfe, to leade him againe vnto the Tower, or sufficient warrant for his discharge, my sayd Lord of Glouceſter aunswered him, that his commaundement was sufficient warrãt and discharge for him. In the which thing aboue sayde, it was thought to my Lord of Winchester that my sayd Lord of Glouceſter, tooke vpon him further then his Auctoritie stretched vnto, and caused him to doubt and dread, least that he would haue proceeded further. And at such time as the said Woodeuile came vnto him to aske his aduice and coũsaile, of lodgyng of my sayde Lorde of Glouceſter in the tower: he aduised and charged him, that before he suffered my sayd Lorde of Glouceſter or any person lodge therein stronger then himselfe, he should puruey him a sufficient warrant thereof, of the king by the aduise of his counsaile.

4 Item, as to the sayd article of the aforesayd causes of heauinesse, my said Lord the Chauncelor aunswereth, that he neuer purposed to set hand on the kinges person, nor to remoue him, or that he should be remoued, or put in any maner of gouernaunce, but by the aduice of the kinges counsaile. For he could not conceiue any maner of goodnesse or of aduauntage that might haue growen vnto him thereof: But rather great perill and charge, and hereof my sayd Lord of Winchester is redy to make proofe in time & place cõuenient.

5 Item, as to the third article of the foresayd causes and heuinesse, my said Lorde Chauncelor aunswereth, that he was oft and dyuers times warned, by dyuers credible persons, aswell at the tyme of the kinges last Parliament, holden at Westminster, as before and sithe, that my sayd Lord of Glouceſter, purposed him bodily harme, and was warned thereof, and counsayled by the sayd persons, and that diuerse times to abstaine him from commyng to Westminster, as my sayde Lorde of Winchester declared vnto my sayde Lorde of Glouceſter.

6 Item, that in the tyme of the sayd Parliament, diuerse persons of lowe estate of the Citie of London in great number, assembled on a day vpon the Wharffe, at the Crane of the Vintrie, and wished and desyred that they had there the person of my Lorde of Winchester, saiyng: that they would haue throwen him into the Thamise, to haue taught him to swim with winges. Whereof billes and language of slaunder, and threatnynges were cast and spoken in the sayde Citie, by my sayde Lorde the Chauncelor, which caused him to suppose, that they that so sayd and did, willed and desyred his destruction, although they had no cause.

7 Item, that after the commyng to London of Sir Raufe Bottiller, and maister Lewes, sent fro my Lord of Bedford, to the rest of the Lordes of the counſaile, they beyng informed that my ſayd Lorde of Glouceſter did beare diſpleaſure to my ſayd Lord of Wincheſter: They came to my ſayd Lorde of Glouceſter to his Inne, the ſecond Monday next before Alhallowen day, and there opened vnto him, that they had knowledge and vnderſtandyng of the ſayde diſpleaſure, prayeng him to let them knowe if he bare ſuche diſpleaſure agaynſt my ſayd Lorde of Wincheſter, and alſo the cauſes therof. At the whiche time (as my ſayd Lorde of Wincheſter was afterward informed) that my ſayde Lord of Glouceſter affirmed that he was heauie toward him, and not withouten cauſes that peraduenture he would put in writyng.

8 Item, that after the Monday next before Alhallowen day laſt paſt in the night, the people of the ſayd Citie of London, by the commaundement of my ſayde Lorde of Glouceſter, as it was ſaide: For what cauſe my Lorde the Chauncelor wiſt not, aſſembled in the Citie, armed and arrayed, and ſo continued all that night. Amongeſt diuers of the which (the ſame night by what excitation, my ſayde Lorde the Chauncelor wiſt not) ſedicious and heauie language was vſed, and in eſpeciall againſt the perſon of my ſayde Lorde the Chauncelor. And ſo the ſame Monday at night, my ſayd Lord of Glouceſter, ſent vnto the Innes of Court at London, charging them of the Court dwellyng in the ſame, to be with him vpon the Morow, at eyght of the Clocke in their beſt array.

9 Item, that on the morowe, beyng Tewesday next folowyng earely my ſayd Lorde of Glouceſter, ſent vnto the Maior and Aldermen of the ſayd Citie of Londō, to ordein him vnto the number of thre .C. perſons on horſback, to accompanie him to ſuch place as he diſpoſed him to ride, which (as it was ſayd) was vnto the king, to the entent to haue his perſon, and to remoue him from the place that he was in, without aſſent or aduiſe of the kinges counſail, the which thing was thought vnto my ſayde Lorde the Chauncelor, that he ought in no wiſe to haue done, nor had not bene ſeene ſo before.

10 Item, that my ſayde Lorde the Chauncelor, conſideryng the thinges aboueſayde, and doubtyng therefore of perilles that might haue enſued therof, intendyng to puruey thereagaynſt, and namely for his awne ſurete and defence, accordyng to the lawe of nature, ordeyned to let that no force of people ſhould come on the Bridge of London toward him, by the which he or his might haue bene indaungered or noyed, not intendyng in any wiſe bodilye harme vnto my ſayd Lord of Glouceſter, nor to any other perſon, but onely his awne defence in eſchewyng the perill aboueſayde.

11 Item, as toward the fourth and fift of the ſayde articles, my Lorde the Chauncelor aunſwereth, that he was euer true, to all thoſe that were his ſouereigne Lordes, and reigned vpon him, and that he neuer purpoſed treaſon or vntruth agaynſt any of their perſons, and in eſpeciall agaynſt the perſon of our ſayd ſouereigne Lorde king Henry the fift. The which conſideryng the great wiſedome, truth and manhoode, that all men knewe in him, he would not for the tyme that he was king, haue ſet on my ſayd Lord the Chauncelor ſo great truſt as he did, if he had found, or thought in him ſuch vntruth. The which thing my ſayde Lorde the Chauncelor offered to declare and ſhewe, as it belongeth to a man of his eſtate to do, requiryng therevpon my Lord of Bedford, and all the Lordes ſpirituall and temporall in this Parliament, that it might be ſeene, that there were Judges conuenient in this caſe, that they would do him right, or else that he might haue leaue of the king by their aduise, to go sue his right, before him that ought to be his iudge.

12 And as towarde the letter sent by my Lord of Winchester, vnto my lord of Bedford, of the which the tenor is before reherſed, of the which my lorde of Gloucester complained him of the malicious and vntrue purpose of my said lorde of Winchester, as towarde the assembling of the people, and gatheryng of a field in the kings land, in troublyng therof, and agaynst the kings peace: My sayde lorde of Winchester aunswereth, that if his sayde letters duly vnderstand, and in such wise as he vnderstood and meant in the writyng of them it may not reasonably be gathered and taken, that my sayde lorde of Winchester, entended to gather any field or assemble people, in troubling of the kings land, and agaynst the kinges peace, but rather he purposed to acquite him to the king in his truth, and to kepe the rest and peace in the kinges land, and to eschewe rebellion, disobedience and all trouble: For by that that in the begynnyng of the sayd letter, he calleth my sayde Lorde of Bedford, his leuest lord, after one, that is the king, whome he ought to accept of dutie of his truth, the which he hath euer kept and will keepe.

13 Moreouer in the sayde letter, he desireth the commyng home of my lord of Bedford, for the welfare of the king, and of his realmes of England and of Fraunce, the which stande principally in his keepyng of rest and peace, and prayeth my sayd Lorde of Bedford to speede his commyng into England, in eschewyng of ieopardie of the lande, and of a fielde the which he dread him, might haue folowed if he had long tarryed: As toward those wordes, and ye tary we shall put this land in aduenture with a field, such a brother ye haue here. &c. My sayde Lorde of Winchester sayeth, the sooth is: before or he wrote the sayd letter, by occasion of certeine ordinaunces, made by the Maior and Aldermen of London, against the excessiue takyng of Masons, Carpenters, Tilers, Plasterers, and other labourers, for their daily tournayes, and approued by the kynges aduise and his counsaile, there were cast many heinesses and sedicious billes, vnder the names of such labourers, threatning risyng with many thousandes, and manassyng of estates of the lande, and likewise sedicious and euill language sowen, and so continued and likely to haue ensued of purpose and intent of disobedience and rebellion. To the redressyng of the which, it seemed to my lorde the Chauncelor, that my sayd lord of Gloucester, did not his endeuor nor diligence that he might haue shewed, for lacke of which diligence, they that were disposed to do disobeysance, were incouraged and inboldened. So that it was like that they should haue made a gatheryng, and that the king and his true subiectes, should haue bene compelled to haue made a field, to haue withstand them, the which field makyng had bene aduenturyng of this lande: And in tokenyng that it was neuer my sayde lorde Chauncelors intent to gather no field, but as truth most stirred him agaynst such as riotously would make suche assemble agaynst our souereigne Lorde, and the weale of this land. He desired so hastely, the commyng of my sayde lorde of Bedford, the which he would in no wise haue so greatly desired, if he would haue purposed him vnto any vnlawful makyng of a field, for he wist well that my sayde lorde of Bedford would most sharpely haue chastised and punished, all those that so woulde any riotous assemble make. When this aunswere was made, the Duke caused this writyng folowyng,

An order taken that an othe ſhould be miniſtred.

14 Be it knowen to all folkes, that it is the intent of my lorde of Bedford, and all the lordes ſpirituall and temporall, aſſembled in this preſent Parliament, to acquite him and them, and to procede truly, iuſtly, and indifferently, without any parcialitie, in any maner of matters or quarelles, moued or to be moued, betwene my lorde of Gloucester, on that one partie, and my lorde of Winchester, Chauncelor of England on that other partie. And for ſure kepyng of the kinges peace, it is accorded by my ſayd lorde of Bedford, and by my ſayde lordes ſpirituall and temporall, an othe to be made, in forme as foloweth, that is to ſay.

The Othe of the Lordes.

The othe of the Lords.

That my ſayde Lorde of Bedford, and my ſayde Lords ſpirituall and temporall, and eche of them ſhall as farre forth as their cunnings and diſcretions ſuffiſen, truely, iuſtly and indifferently, counſayle and aduiſe the king, and alſo proceede and acquite themſelues, in all the ſayde matters and quarrels, without that they, or any of them, ſhall priuely and apertly, make or ſhewe himſelfe to be party or parciall therein, not leauing or eſchewyng ſo to doe, for affection, loue, meede, doubt, or drede of any perſon or perſons. And that they ſhall in all wiſe, keepe ſecrete all that ſhall be commoned by way of counſayle in the matters and quarrels aboue ſayde, in the ſayde Parliament, without that they or any of them ſhall, by worde, wryting of the king, or in any wiſe open, or diſcouer it to any of the ſayde parties, or to any other perſon, that is not of the ſaide counſayle: But if he haue a ſpeciall commaundement or leaue thereto of the king, or of my ſayde Lorde of Bedford. And that eche of them ſhall, with all his might and power, aſſiſt by waye of counſayle, or elſe ſhewe it vnto the king, my Lorde of Bedford, and to the reſt of my ſayd Lords, to put the ſayd parties to reaſon, and not to ſuffer that any of the ſayde parties, by them or by their aſſiſtents, proceede or attempt by way of fight agaynſt the kings peace: nor helpe, aſſiſt, or comfort any of them thereto, but let them with all their might and power, and withſtande them, and aſſiſt vnto the king, and my ſayde Lorde of Bedford, in keepyng of the kings peace, and redreſſing all ſuch maner of proceeding by waye of fight or force.

The Arbitrament.

The Arbitrement.

IN the name of God, we Henry Archebyshop of Cauntorburie, Thomas Duke of Excester, John Duke of Norffolke, Thomas Byshop of Dureſme, Phillip Byshop of Worceſter, John Byshop of Bathe, Humfrey Erle of Stafford, Wylliam Alnewik keper of the kings priuie ſeale, Rauffe Lorde Cromewell, Arbitratoures in all manner of cauſes, matters and quarrels of heauinesſes and greeuances, with all incidents, circumſtaunces, dependents, or connexes, beyng and hangyng betweene the high and worthy Prince Humfrey Duke of Glouceſter, on the one partie, and the worſhipfull father in God, Henry Byshop of Wyncheſter and Chauncellour of England, on the other partie, by eyther of them for the peaſing of the ſayde quarels and debates, taken and choſen in maner and forme, as it is conteyned more plainly in a compromiſe made thereupon, of the which the tenour ſheweth in thys forme.

Memorandum, the .vij. day of March, in the fourth yere of our ſoueraine Lord the king, Henry the ſixt. The high and mighty prince Humfrey Duke of Glouceſter, at the reuerence of God, and for the good of the king our ſoueraigne Lorde in this lande, and namely at the reuerence, and ſpecially at the requeſt and prayer of the mightie and high Prince, my Lorde of Bedford his brother, agreed him to put and putteth all maner matters and quarels in deede, with all their incidents, circumſtaunces, dependentes and connexes, that touchen him and his perſon, that he hath in any wiſe, doe, or feeleth him greeued, or heauie agaynſt my Lorde his Uncle, my Lorde of Wincheſter. Or elſe that my Lorde of Wyncheſter findeth him greeued agaynſt him, in as much as they touch him or his perſon, fro the beginning of the worlde vnto this day: In the aduiſe, ordinaunce and arbitrament of the worthy father in God, Henry Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, the high and noble prince Thomas Duke of Excester, and John Duke of Norffolke, the worſhipfull father in God Thomas Byshop of Dureſme, Philip Byshop of Worceſter, John Biſhop of Bathe, The noble Lorde Humfrey Erle of Stafford, the worſhipfull perſons, Mayſter Wylliam Alnewike keeper of the kings priuie Seale, and Raufe Lorde Cromewell, promiſing and behighting, by the fayth of his body, and worde of his princehood and kings ſonne, to doe, kepe, obſerue and fulfill, for him and his behalfe, all that ſhall be declared, ordeyned and arbitred, by the foꝛeſayde Archebiſhop, Dukes, Biſhops, Earle, keeper of the pꝛiue ſeale, and Loꝛde Cromwell, in all matters and quarrels aboue ſayde: Graunting alſo and pꝛomyſing ouer that, to be compꝛehended in the foꝛeſayde arbitrement, as towarde putting awaye all heauyneſſe oꝛ diſpleaſures in any wiſe, conteyned by my Loꝛde of Glouceſter, agaynſt all thoſe that haue in any wiſe aſſiſted, counſayled, oꝛ fauoured vnto his ſayde Uncle of Wyncheſter, and as towarde any matters, that be touching my Loꝛde of Glouceſter, remitteth it and the gouernaunce theꝛeof vnto the king and his counſayle, they to deme it by the aduiſe of his counſayle, as him thinketh it to be done. In witneſſe of the which thing, to this pꝛeſent compꝛomiſe, my ſayde Loꝛde of Glouceſter, hath ſubſcribed his name with his awne hande Humfrey Glouceſter. And in like foꝛme, my Loꝛde of Wincheſter in an other compꝛomiſe, hath ſubſcribed with his awne hande, vnder the woꝛde of Pꝛieſthood, to ſtande at the aduiſe, oꝛdinaunce and arbitrement of the perſons aboue ſayde, Mutatis Mutandis.

A decree oꝛ oꝛder taken by the kings counſayle foꝛ the pacefying of the quarrels and variaunces that were betweene the Duke of Glouceſter, and the Biſhop of Wincheſter.

The cauſes befoꝛeſayde and quarels by vs ſene, heard, and diligently examined and decreed, by the aſſent of the ſayde parties, oꝛdeyne and awarde, that my loꝛds of Glouceſter and of Wincheſter, foꝛ any thing done oꝛ ſpoken, by that one partie againſt that other, oꝛ by any of theirs, oꝛ any other perſon oꝛ perſons, afoꝛe the. vij. day of this pꝛeſent moneth of Marche, neuer hereafter take cauſes, quarrels, diſpleaſures oꝛ heauineſſes, that one againſt the other, ne neyther agaynſt the counſaylers, adherents oꝛ fauourers of that other, foꝛ any thing oꝛ things that are paſt. And that my ſayde loꝛde of Glouceſter, be good loꝛde to my ſayd loꝛde of Wincheſter, and haue him in loue and affection as his kinſeman and Uncle. And that my ſayde loꝛde of Wincheſter, haue to my ſayde loꝛde of Glouceſter, true and ſadde loue and affection, doe and be readie to doe to him ſuche ſeruice, as appertayneth of hone ſty to my ſayde loꝛde of Wincheſter and hys eſtate to doe. And that eche of them be good Loꝛde vnto all thoſe adherents, counſaylers and fauourers of that other, and ſhewe them at all times fauoꝛable loue and affection, as foꝛ any thing done by them, oꝛ ſayde afoꝛe the ſeuenth day of Marche.

And we decree, oꝛdayne and awarde, that my ſayde Loꝛde of Wincheſter, in the pꝛeſence of the king our ſoueraigne Loꝛde, my Loꝛd of Bedfoꝛd, and my Loꝛde of Glouceſter, and the reſidue of the loꝛdes ſpirituall and temꝛoꝛall, and commons beyng in thys pꝛeſent Parliament, ſay and declare in maner and foꝛme that foloweth.

The ſaieng of the biſhop of wincheſter vnto ỹ Duke of Glouceſter

My ſoueraigne loꝛde, I haue well vnderſtande, that I am noyſed among the ſtates of your lande, howe that the king our ſoueraigne loꝛde that was that time, being pꝛince and lodged in the great chamber at Weſtminſter, by the bayeng of a ſpanyell, there was on a night taken, behinde a tapet in the ſame chamber, a man, that ſhould haue confeſſed that he was there by mine excitation and pꝛocuring to haue ſlaine the foꝛeſayd Pꝛince there in his bed, wherevpon he was ſacked, and foꝛthwith dꝛowned in the Thames. And furthermoꝛe I am accuſed, how that I ſhould haue ſtirred the king that laſt died, the time alſo that he was pꝛince, to haue taken the gouernaunce of this realme, and the crowne vpon him, lyuing his father the ſame tyme beyng king: Thoꝛough which language and noyſing I feele my name and fame greatly enblemiſhed, in diuers mens opinions. Wherevpon I take firſt

God

God to my witnesse, and afterwarde all the worlde, that I haue bene at all times, and am true louer and true man, to you my Soueraigne lorde, and shall be all my lyfe. And also I haue bene to my soueraigne lorde, that was your father, all time of his reigne, true man: and for such he tooke me, trusted me, and cherished me to his liues ende, and as I trust no man will affirme the contrary, nor neuer in my lyfe procuring, nor imagining death nor destruction of his person, ne assenting to any such thing, or lyke thereto, the tyme that he was king or prince, or else in other estate. And in likewise, I was true man to king Henry the fourth, all the time that he was my soueraigne lorde, and reigned vpon me: In which matters, in all maner of wise, that it liketh to you my soueraigne lorde for to commaunde me, I am ready for to declare me: And furthermore, where, how and when, it shall like you by the aduise of your counsayle to assigne me. Wherfore, I beseech you my soueraigne lorde, as humbly as I can, conspdering that there is no grounded processe, by the which I might lawfully in these matters aboue sayde be conuict, blessed be God, to holde me and declare me, by the aduise of all the lordes, spirituall and temporall, being in this present Parliament, true man to you my soueraigne lorde, and so to haue bene vnto my soueraigne lordes that were your father and Graundfather, and true man also, to haue bene at all times vnto your sayde father, whilest he was prince, or else in any other estate, the sayde slaunder and noysing notwithstanding. And this same declaration to be enacted, in this your sayde present parliament.

The which wordes declared in maner as it is aboue sayd, by my said lord of Winchester, it seemeth to my sayde lordes the Arbitratours, that it is meete that my sayde lorde of Winchester draw him aparte, and in the meane tyme, the lordes being present, be singulerly examined therupon, and say their aduise: And if it be assented by them, in maner as my sayde lorde of Winchester desireth, let him be called agayne, and that then my lorde of Bedford haue these wordes in effect that follow.

Fayre Uncle, the king my lord, by the aduise of his counsayle, hath commaunded me to say to you, that he hath well vnderstande, and considered all the matters which ye haue here openly declared in his presence, and therupon ye desire a petition that he will declare you, and by the aduise and assent of the Lordes spirituall and temporall, beyng in this present Parliament, he declareth you a true man to hym, and that ye haue so be to my Lorde his father, and Graundfather, also true man to my Lorde his father whiles he was Prince or else in any other estate, the sayde dislaunder and noysing notwithstanding: And wil that the said declaration be so enacted in this present parliament. After the which wordes thus sayde, as before is declared, by the sayd Lordes Arbitratours, that my sayde lorde of Winchester shoulde haue these words that foloweth, to my sayd Lord of Gloceſter.

My Lorde of Gloucester, I haue conceyued to my great heauinesse, that ye should haue receyued by diuers reportes, that I should haue purposed and imagined agaynst your person, honor and estate, in diuers maners, for the which ye haue taken agaynst me great displeasure, Sir I take God to my witnesse, that what reportes so euer haue beene to you of me, peraduenture of such as haue had no great affection to me, God forgeue it them, I neuer imagined, ne purposed any thing that might be hindering or preiudice

to your person, honor, or estate. And therefore, I pray you that ye be vnto me good lord from this time forth, for by my will I gaue neuer other occasion, nor purpose not to doe hereafter thorough Gods grace.

The which wordes so by him sayde, it was decreed by the sayde Arbitratours, that my lorde of Glouceſter ſhould aunſwere and ſay.

Faire Uncle, ſithe ye declare you ſuche a man as ye ſaye, I am right glad that it is ſo, and for ſuch a man I take you. And when this was done, it was decreed by the sayd Arbitratours that euery eche of my lordes of Glouceſter and Wincheſter ſhould take eyther other by the hande, in the preſence of the king and al the parliament, in ſigne and token of good loue and accord, the which was done and the parliament was adiourned till after Eaſter.

When the great fyre of thys diſcention, betweene theſe two Noble perſonages, was thus by the arbitratours to their knowlege and iudgement vtterly quenched out, and layde vnder boorde all other controuerſies betwene other Lordes, taking parte with the one partie or the other, were ſone appeaſed and brought to concord, For ioy whereof the king cauſed a ſolempne feaſt, to be kept on whitſon Sonday, on the which daye he created Richard Plantagenet, ſonne and heire to the Erle of Cambridge (whom his father at Hampton, had put to execution, as you before haue heard) Duke of Yorke, not foreſeing before, that this preferment ſhoulde be his deſtruction, nor that his ſeede ſhould be of hys generation, be the extreme ende and finall confuſion. He the ſame day alſo promoted John Lorde Mowbrey and Erle Marſhall, ſonne and heire to Thomas Duke of Norffolke, by king Richarde the ſecond exiled this Realme and dominion, to the tytle, name, and ſtile of the Duke of Norffolke, during which feaſt, the Duke of Bedford adourned the king with the high order of knighthood, which on the ſame day dubbed with the ſworde theſe knights, whoſe names enſue.

After this ſolempne feaſt ended, a great ayde and ſubſidie was graunted, for the continuance of the conqueſt in Fraunce, and ſo money was gathered red, and men were prepared in euery Citie, towne and Countrie: Duryng which businesse, Thomas Duke of Exceter the sad, wise, and well learned Counsailer, great Uncle to the king, departed out of this mortall lyfe, at the manno^r of Greenewiche, and was with all funerall pompe conueyed through London to Bury, and there buried. In which yere also dyed the Ladie Elizabeth his halfe sister, and of the whole blood with king Henry the fourth maried to Lo^rde John Holland Duke of Exceter, and after to the Lo^rde Fanhope, buryed at the Blacke Friers of London.

The death of Thomas Duke of Exceter.

While these thinges were thus appointyng and concludyng in England: The Erle of Warwike Lieutenant fo^r the Regent in the realme of Fraunce, entered into the Countrie of Mayne, and besieged the towne of Chasteau de Lo^rde, the which shortly to him was rendered, whereof he made Capteyne Mathew Gough Esquier. After that, he toke by assault ẏ Castell of Mayet, and gaue it fo^r his valiantnesse to John Winter Esquier, & after that he conquered the Castell of Lund, and made there gouerno^r William Gladdisdale gentelman. At which place he was info^rmed, ẏ the French men were assembled together, in the Countrie of Beausse, wherfo^re like a valiant Capteine, he with all his power marched thetherward, to encounter with his enemies, and to fight with his aduersaries, which hauing knowlege of his ap^rproching, fled, and durst not abide the triall, no^r ieopard the aduenture, and in his returning, he besieged the Castell of Montdublean, wherof was Capteine sir Roberton des Croir, which siege cõtinued thre wekes, but in conclusion ẏ English men so so^re charged them within, ẏ the capteine with his whole company were content to yelde the Castell, their liues, ho^rse, and harnesse, onely reserued: Which to them was after long consultation had, & many agrements made, frankely graunted. And the sayd Erle of Warwike, leauyng there the valiant Lo^rd Willoughby, returned againe to Paris. Duryng which season, he was o^rdeyned by the assent of the thre estates of the realme of England, to be gouernour of the yong king, in like maner as the noble Duke of Exceter before his death was appoynted & assigned, but yet he taried still in Fraunce, and did there no small seruice as you shall hereafter perceyue.

The Lo^rde Willoughby made gouerno^r of the yong king.

The Regent of Fraunce thus beyng in England, meanes was made by the Duke of Burgoyn, fo^r the deliuerie of the Duke of Alanson, which was taken pr^risoner at the battaile of Uernoyle the last yere. So he fo^r the somme of two hundreth thousand crownes, was deliuered and set at large: but neither fo^r the release of all, o^r abatement of part of his raunsome, he would in no wise acknowlege the king of Englãd, to be his liege and souereigne lo^rd: Such affection bare he to the Dolphyn, and such truth shewed he to his naturall Countrie. When all thinges were concluded, o^rdered, and establysshed, both fo^r the conseruation of peate and tranquilitie within the realme of England, and also fo^r the maintenaunce of warre, fo^r the finall gainyng of the region of Fraunce: The Duke of Bedfo^rd and his wife, toke their leaue of the king, at Westminster, and landed at Calice, with whome also passed the seas, Henry Bishop of Winchester, which in the sayde towne was inuested with the Habite, Hat, and dignitie of a Cardinall, with all Ceremonies to it apperteynyng. Which degree king Henry the fift, knowyng the haute courage, and the ambicious minde of the man, pr^rohibited him on his allegeance once, either to sue fo^r o^r to take: meanyng ẏ Cardinals Hats should not presume ſume to be egal with princes. But now the king beyng yong, and the Regent his friend, he obteyned that dignitie, to his great profite, and to the impouerishing of the ſpiritualtie. For by a Bull Legantine, which he purchaſed at Rome, he gathered ſo much treaſure, that no man in maner had money but he and ſo was he ſurnamed the rich Cardinall of Winchester, and neyther called learned Biſhop, nor vertuous Prieſt.

After that, the Duke of Bedford was returned into Fraunce, the Lord of Ruſtian Marſhall of Briteyn, aſſembled a great companie of the Britiſhe nation, which fortefyed and repayred the towne of Pontorſon, and after the ſaide Marſhall, with a thouſand men entered into the Countrie of Conſtantyne in Normandie, and came before the towne of Iuranches. The Engliſh men within the garriſon, iſſued out, and boldely fought with their enemyes: But after long conflict & many ſtrokes geuen, the Britons were ouercome, and the Lorde Ruſtian taken, and the moſt part of his people ſlaine.

The Duke of Bedford heeryng that the towne of Pontorſon was newly fortefyed, and ſtrongly defended, ſent thether the Erle of Warwike, accompanied with the Lorde Scales, and diuerſe other valiaunt Capteynes and Souldiers, to the number of.vij. thouſand men to beſiege the Towne, which ſo enuironed it on euery part, that neyther man could ſteale out, nor beaſt could paſſe in. The ſiege long continuyng, vitaile began to ware ſcant in the Engliſhe armie, wherefore the Lord Scales hauyng in his company, ſir John Harpeley Baily of Conſtantyne, Sir William Brearton Baily of Cane, Sir Raufe Teſſion, Sir John Carbonell, and three thouſand good men of warre, departed from the ſiege to get vitail, powder, and other things neceſſary for their purpoſe and enterpriſe. And as they were returnyng with their cariages on the ſea coaſt, nere to Saint Michaels Mount, they ſodeinly were encountered with their enemies, whereof the chiefe were the Baron of Coloſes, the Lorde Hauſeboſt Capteine of the ſayde Mount, the Lorde Mountabon, the Lorde Mount bourchier, the lorde of Chaſteau Giron, the lord of Tyntygnat, the lorde Chaſteau Brian, with.vj. thouſande men of warre. The lorde Scales and his companie (ſeyng that they were compaſſed on euery ſyde with deadly daungers, for the ſea was on the one ſyde, and their enemyes on the other, & no meane way to eſcape or flie) diſtended from their horſes, and like gredie Lions together in an vnpeaceable fury, ſet on their enemies. The ſkirmiſhe was ſtrong, and the fight was fierce, the Engliſhe men kept themſelues ſo cloſe, that their enemies coulde haue no aduauntage of them. At the laſt the lorde Scales cryed Saint George, they flie, with that the Engliſhemen tooke ſuch a courage, and the Frenchemen that fought before, were ſo diſmayde that they began to flie. The Engliſhe men leaped againe on horſeback, and folowed them, and ſlue and tooke aboue xj.hundreth perſons, amongeſt whome were taken, the Baron of Coloſes, and the Lorde of Chaſteau Brian, and.xxx. knightes.

A fierce ſkirmiſhe at the ſiege of Pontorſon.

After this victorie, the lorde Scales with his vitayles, proniſion, and priſoners, returned to the ſiege, where he was of the Erle and other noble men ioyouſly receyued, and for this noble fact, highly magnified and prayſed. While the ſiege thus continued before Pountorſon, Chriſtopher Hanſon and other ſouldiours of the garriſon of ſaint Suſan, made a road into the Countrie of Iniow, and came to a Caſtell named Ramfort, which Caſtell was ſo priuily ſcaled, that the Capteyne within and his company, were taken or ſlaine before they knewe of their enemies approchyng. When knowlege of this feate was made open to the Frenchemen, which were aſſembled to the number of. xx. thouſand to rayſe the ſiege, and to breake vp the Campe, lying before the towne of Pountorſon, they left that iourney for a tyme, and returned to the Caſtell of Ramfort, and beſieged the ſame by the ſpace of ten dayes.

The Engliſhemen conſideryng the multitude of the enemies, and the farre abſence of their friendes, began to treate with the French men, and ſo vpon condicion to depart with bagge and baggage, horſe and harneſſe, they rendered vp the Caſtell, and departed with more riches then they brought, which Caſtell thus poſſeſſed by the Frenche men, they forgat the reſkue at Pountorſon, and brake vp their armie. But ſoone after, the lorde of Rair, callyng himſelfe Lieutenant generall for the Dolphyn, accompanied with the Lorde Mount Jehan, the lorde Beaumanoyre, and the lorde Tuſſie, and other to the number of three thouſand perſons, entered into the Countrie of Mayn, and layde ſiege to the Caſtell of Malicorne, whereof was Capteyne an Engliſhe man, called Oliuer Oſbaterſby, which Caſtell with the Captein was by force taken and obteyned: in like maner they toke the little Caſtell of Loue, and therein William Blackeborne, Lieutenant for William Glaſdale Eſquire, and put him to raunſome, and ſlue all his ſouldiors. After this victorie, in the which they muche gloried, the Frenchmen perceyuyng that the Erle of Warwike continued ſtill his ſiege before the towne of Pountorſon, and knowing by their eſpials, that the Engliſhmen were determined to geue them battaile, if they once attempted to rayſe the ſiege, and therefore fearing to fight in an open battaile, reculed backe againe to the Dolphyn with little gaine, and ſmall honour. The Frenchmen and Britons beyng ſtraightly beſieged within the towne of Pountorſon, perceiuyng no likelihood of ſuccors to come, and ſeyng the Engliſhe armie daily did encreaſe, fearyng the ſequele thereof, if they by violence ſhould be taken and banquiſhed, they offered the towne, ſo that they might depart with horſe and harneſſe only: which requeſt (after long ſute and petition) to them was hardely graunted. The Erle lyke a balyaunt Capteyn, entered into the towne, and there appoynted for gouernours, the Lord Roos, and the Lorde Talbot, and leauyng there a conuenient garriſon, returned to the Lorde Regent.

Pountorſon recouered by the Engliſhe men.

After the takyng of this towne, there was a league, and a treatie concluded betwene the Regent and the Duke of Briteyn, by the which agreement both the townes of Pountorſon, and Saint James de Beuron were beaten downe to the ground, and clerely defaced. After the Lorde of Rais was departed out of the territorie of Mayn as you haue heard, Chriſtopher Hanſon, Philip Gough, Martyn Godfrey called the ſtaler, and diuerſe other of the garriſon of Saint Suſan, to the number of. xxx. Archers, went out in a Morning to ſeeke their aduentures, and came neere to the Caſtell of Saint Laurence de Mortiers (at the ſame very ſeaſon) when Sir James de Sepeaulx Capteyne of the ſame, was gone out of hys Caſtell with the greateſt number of his retinewe, to a Churche directly againſt the Caſtell. In the Maſſe tyme, the Engliſhemen entered by ſubtiltie into the gate, and ſo gat the Dongeon. And when ſir James returned from Maſſe, as he entered into the gate he was taken, and his men fled, and ſo was the Castell furnished with Englishe men, and Capteine thereof was appoynted, Sir William Oldehaule.

The same season, Sir John Fastolfe, gouernor of the Countries of Aniow and Maine, assembled a great puyssaunce of men of warre, and layd a siege before the Castell of Saint Owen Destays, beside the towne of Lauall, whereof was Capteine Sir Guillam Orenge, which, after ten dayes besiegyng, rendered the Castell, their liues and armure onely except: howbeit, one railyng and slaunderous person was put to terrible execution. And from thence, the sayd sir John remoued to the strong Castell of Grauile, and after .xij. dayes, they within offered to yelde the Castell by a day, if they were not succored by the Dolphyn or his power. The offer was taken, and pledges deliuered, which were Guillam Cordouen, and John de Maisiery Esquiers. After these pledges deliuered, sir John Fastolfe returned in post to the Regent, aduertisyng him of this composition and agrement: wherefore the said Lorde raysed a great power, to fight with the Frenchmen at the day appointed, and in his companie were the Erles of Mortaigne, and Warwike, and the Lordes Roos, and Talbot, Sir John Fastolfe, Sir John Aubemond, Sir John Ratclife, and dyuerse other, to the number of .xx. thousand men, and so marched forwarde in hope to meete and ioyne Battaile with their enimies. But their aduersaries which were not farre of, durst not approche, wherefore the Regent sent sir Jhon Fastolfe incontinent to receyue the Castell: but they within (contrary to their promise and appoyntment) had newly vitailed and manned the place, and so forsakyng their pledges and felowes in armes, refused to render the fortresse accordyng to the appoyntmēt: wherfore the pledges were brought before the sight of them within the Castell, and there openly put to death. After this, the Lord Talbot was made gouernor of Aniow and Mayn. And Sir John Fastolfe was assigned to another place: which Lord Talbot, beyng both of noble birth, and haute courage, after his commyng into Fraunce, obteyned so many glorious victories of hys enemies, that his onely name was, and yet is dreadfull to the French nacion, and much renoumed amongest all other people. This holy Capteyn, a sonne of the valiant Mars, entered into Mayne, and slue men, destroyed Castels, and brent townes, and in conclusion, sodeinly tooke the towne of Lauall: but the Lorde Loghac, and dyuerse other, retrayted themselues into the Castell, and there remayned eight dayes. Duryng which tyme, it was agreed, that all Capteynes, Burgesses, and men of warre, which were within the Castell, should depart with bagge and baggages, paiyng the Lorde Talbot for all thinges, one hundreth thousand Crownes. And the Castell so beyng deliuered, was committed to the keepyng of Gilbert Halsall, which after, was slaine at the siege of Orleaunce, for whom was made Capteine Mathewe Gough, which beyng at the iourney before Senlies, by treason of a Miller that kept a Mill adioinyng to the wall, ỳ Frenchmen entered into the towne, and brought it into their subiection and obeysaunce.

The Lorde Talbot a valyaunt captayne.

The Duke of Alaunson, which, as you haue heard, was late deliuered out of Englande, reuiued agayne the dull spirites of the Dolphyn, and the faint hartes of his Capitaynes, promysing to them great victorie with little trauayle, and much gaine with small labour, wherfore in hope of good luck, he determined to doe some notable feate agaynst the Englishe men. Then happened a chaunce vnlooked for, or vnthought of, euen as they would haue wished or desired, for not onely the Magistrates, but chiefly the spirituall persons of the Citie of Mouns, knowing that the Duke of Britaine and his brother, were reuerted and turned to the French partie, beganne sore to mourne and lament, that they were subiectes and vassals to the yoke and power of the Englishe men. Wherfore they determined and fully concluded, to aduertise of their mindes and determinations, the Capitaynes of Charles the Dolphyn, (of them called the French king) and so by certain false Friers, thereof wrote humble and louing letters. These newes pleased muche the French Capitaynes, but no lesse you may be sure the Dolphyn himselfe, as a thing discended from heauen, of them vnsought, vnimagined and not deuised. Wherefore to take opportunitie when time serued, and not to leese so great a benefite so honestly offered, the Lordes Delabreth and Fayet, Marshals of Fraunce, accompanied with the Lordes of Monte Jhon, of Buel Dozuall, Torsye and Beaumamoyze the heire, and Guyllyam his brother, and. v. C. other hardie Capitaynes and valiaunt Souldiers, tooke vpon them this enterprise, sending great thankes and laudes to the Clergie and Citezens, for their assured fidelitie to their soueraigne lord, promising them to be there at the day appointed, not doubting to finde them readye accordyng to their promise, gladly to receiue them.

The Citie of Mouns lost by treason.

When the daye assigned and the night appointed was come, the French Capitaines priuely approched the towne, making a little fire on an hill in the sight of the towne, to signifie their comming and approching. The Citezens which by the great Church were looking for their approche, shewed a burning Cressel out of the Steeple, which sodainly was put out and quenched. What should I saye, the Captaines on horseback came to the gate, and the Traytors within slue the porters and watchemen, and let in their friendes, the footemen entered first, and the men of armes wayted at the barriers, to the intent that if much neede required, or necessitie compelled, they might fight in the open field. And in the meane season, many Englishe men were slayne, and a great clamour and a houge noise was harde through the towne, as is wont and accustomed to be in a towne, by treason sodainly surprised and taken: but what was the cause of the crie, or beginning of the noyse, few except the confederates, eyther knew or perceyued. For the remnaunt of the Citezens beyng no partakers in this faction, imagened that the English men had made hauock in the towne and put all to the sword. The Englishmen on the other side, iudged that the Citezens had begonne some newe rebellion agaynst them, or else had striuen amongs themselues. The Erle of Suffolk, which was Gouernour of the towne, heryng the clamour and noyse of the people, hauing perfite knowledge of suche as escaped from the walles, in what case the Citie stood in, without any taryeng or prolongyng of time, entered into the Castell which standeth at the gate of Saint Uincent, whereof was Constable Thomas Gower Esquire: whether also fled so many English men, that the place was pestred, & there if they were not relieued, likely to be famished: but surely they were sore assaulted and marueylously hurte, with the shot of the Arblasters and Crossebowes, but they defended themselues so manfully, that their enemies gat small aduauntage at their handes. But all their hardinesse had not serued, nor all their pollicy had not defended them, if they had not priuely sent a Messenger to the Lorde Talbot, which then lape at Alanson, certefiyng him in what case they stood, for vitaile had they none, municions fayled, and the Castell was almost vndermined, so that pelding must folowe, and resistaunce could not prenayle. The Lorde Talbot hering these newes, neyther slept nor banquetted, but with all hast assembled together his valiaunt Capitaynes, to the number of .vij. hundred men of warre, and in the euening departed from Alanson, and in the morning came to a Castell called Guyerche two Myles from Maums, and from thence sent as an espiall Mathew Gough, to espie the gouernaunce of the enemies, and if he might, to shewe to his countreymen that he was at hande, to be their ayde and reskues. Mathew Gough so well sped, that priuely in the night he came into the Castell, where he knewe howe that the French men being lordes of the Citie, and now casting no perilles, nor fearing any creature, beganne to ware wanton and fell to ryot, as though their enemies could doe them no dammage: thinking that the English men which were shut vp in the Castel, studied nothing but how to escape & be deliuered. When Mathew Gough had knowne all the certainty, he priuely returned agayne, and within a mile of the Citie met with the Lorde Talbot, and the lorde Scales, and made open to them all thinges according to his credence, which to speede the matter, because the day approched, with all haste possible came to the posterne gate, and alighted from their horses, and about sixe of the clock in the morning they issued out of the castell, cryeng Saint George, Talbot. The Frenchmen which were scarce vp, and thought of nothing lesse then of this sodaine approchment, some rose out of their beds in their shirts, and lept ouer the walles, other came naked out of the gates for sauing of their liues, leauing behinde them all their appareil, horses, armour and ryches, none was hurte but such, which eyther resisted, or would not yeelde, whereof some were slaine and taken prisoners. There were slaine and taken foure hundred gentlemen, and the villaines frankely let go. After this, inquisition was made of the authors of this vngracious coniuration, and there were accused thirtie Citezens, twentie priestes, and fiftene Friers, which according to their desertes were put to execution.

Traytours iustly executed.

The foundation of Louayne.

In this yere, as sayth Carion, the Vniuersitie of Louayne in Brabant was founded by John Duke of Burgondy.

And here to encourage and moue the worshipfull and good Citezens of London to be thankefull to God, and beneficiall to their poore neighbours, and to the common weale, I thought it good to note vnto you the charitable deede of a worthie Citezen and Alderman of London named John Raynewell, who about this time gaue certayne landes and tenements lyeng in the sayd Citie, to the Chamber of London, for the which the sayde Chamber is bound for euer to discharge the inhabitauntes of the wardes of Dowgate, Billingsgate and Algate, of all such fiftenes as from time to time shall be graunted vnto the king (so that it passe not three fiftenes in one yere.)

The Citie of Maums again recouered by the Englishe men.

The Citie of Maums this being reduced into the Englishe mens handes, the lorde Talbot departed to the towne of Alanson. After which marciall feate manfully atchyeued, the Erle of Warwike departed into Englande, to be gouernour of the yong king, in stead of Thomas Duke of Exceter, late departed to God. In whose steede was sent into Fraunce, the lord Thomas

Mountacute Erle of Salisburie, with fiue thousand men, which landed at Calice, and so came to the Duke of Bedford in Paris. Where he consulting with the Duke of Bedford, cõcerning the affayres of the realme of Fraunce: seing all things so prosperously succeede on the English parte, beganne mervaylously to phantasie the Citie and countrey of Orliance, standing on the Riuer of Loyre. But because the Citie was well fortefied both by the nature of the situation of the place, and by the pollicie of man, he imagined it not the worke of one day, nor the studie of one houre. Wherefore he remitted it to a farther deliberation, yet he was the man at that time, by whose wyt, strength and pollicie, the Englishe name was much fearefull and terrible to the French nation, which of himselfe might both appoint, commaund and doe all things in maner at his pleasure, in whose power, (as it appered after his death) a great parte of the conquest consisted and was esteemed, because he was a man both painefull and diligent, redy to withstande things perillous and imminent, and prompt in counsayle, and with no labour would be weeried, nor yet his courage at any time abated or appalled, so that all men put no more trust in any one man, nor no singuler person gat more the hartes of all men. After this great enterprise had long bene debated and argued, in the priuie counsayle, the Erle of Salisburies deuise, (although it seemed hard and straunge to al other, and to him as it were a thing predestinate very easie) was graunted and allowed, which enterprise was the finall conclusion of his naturall destiny, as you shall shortly perceyue. Thus he replenished with good hope of victorie, and furnished with artilery, and munitions apperteyning to so great a siege, accompanied with the Erle of Suffolke and the Lorde Talbot, and with a valiaunt company, to the number of ten thousand men, departed from Paris, and passed through the countrey of Beause: he toke by assault the towne of Yainuile, but the Frenchmen fled into the Castell, and there continued fiue dayes, at the end wherof they rendered themselues simply: of the sayde number, some were put to death for certaine causes, and some were taken to mercie: he toke also the towne of Bawgency, suffering euery man, which would become vassayle and subiect to the king of Englande, to inherite their landes and enioy their goodes. The townes of Meum vpon Loyre and Jargenan, hering of these treatise, presented to him the keyes of the towne, vpon lyke agreement and equall conditions.

After this in the Moneth of September, he layde his siege on the one side of the water of Loyre, and besieged the towne of Orleaunce, before whose comming, the Bastard of Orleaunce, and the Bysshop of the Citie and a great number of Scottes hering of the Erles intent, made diuers fortifications about the towne, and destroyed the suburbes, in the which were .xij. Parishe Churches, and foure orders of Friers. They cut also downe all the Vines, trees and bushes within fiue leagues of the towne, so that the Englishe men should haue neyther comfort, refuge, nor succour.

Here muste I a little digresse, and declare to you, what was this Bastard of Orleaunce, which was not onely now Capitayne of the Citie, but also after by Charles the first made Erle of Dunoys, and in great aucthoritie in Fraunce, and extreme enemie to the Englishe nation, as by this storie you shall apparantly perceyue, of whose line and stem discended the Dukes of Longuile, and the Marques of Rutylon. Lewes Duke of Orleaunce

murthered in Paris, by John Duke of Burgoyn, as you before haue heard, was owner of the Castell of Concy, on the Frontiers of Fraunce towarde Arthoys, wherof he made Constable the lord of Cawny, a man not so wise as his wife was faire, & yet she was not so faire, but she was as well beloued of the Duke of Orleaunce as of her husband, betwene the Duke & her husband (I cannot tel who was father) she conceyued a child, & brought forth a prety boy called John, which child being of the age of one yere, the Duke diseased and not long after the mother & the Lorde of Cawny ended their lyues. The next of the kinne to my Lorde Cawny, chalenged the enheritaunce, which was worth foure thousand crownes a yere, alleging that the boy was a bastard: and the kindred of the mothers side, for to saue her honestie, it plainely denied. In conclusion, this matter was in contention before the Presidents of the Parliament of Paris, and there hanged in controuersie till the childe came to the age of eyght yeres olde. At which time it was demaunded of him openly whose sonne he was: his friendes of his mothers side aduertised him to require a daye, to be aduised of so great an aunswere, which he asked, and to him it was graunted. In the meane season his sayde friendes perswaded him to claime his inheritaunce, as sonne to the Lorde of Cawny, which was an honorable lyuing, and an auncient patrimony, affirming that if he sayde contrarie, he not onely slaundered his mother, shamed himselfe, and steyned his blood, but also should haue no lyuing nor any thing to take to. The scholemaster thinking that his Disciple had well learned his lesson, and would reherse it according to his instruction, brought him before the Judges at the day assigned, and when this question was repeted to him agayne, he boldly answered, my hart geueth me, and my noble courage telleth me, that I am the sonne of the noble Duke of Orleaunce, more glad to be his Bastard with a meane lyuing, then the lawful sonne of that coward Cuckold Cawny, with his foure thousand crownes. The Justices much marueyled at his bold answere, and his mothers cosyns detested him for shaming of his mother, and his fathers supposed kinne reioyced, in gaynyng the patrimonie and possessions. Charles Duke of Orleaunce hering of this iudgement, tooke him into his family, and gaue him great offices and fees, which he well deserued, for (during his captiuitie) he defended his landes, expulsed the English men, and in conclusion procured his deliueraunce.

Orleaunce besieged.

This couragious Bastard, after the siege had continued three weekes full, issued out of the gate of the bridge, and fought with the Englishmen, but they receyued him with so fierce and terrible strokes, that he was with al his company compelled to retire and flie back into the Citie: but the Englishe men folowed them so fast, in killing and taking of their enemies, that they entered with them the Bulwarke of the bridge: which with a great Towre standing at the ende of the same, was taken incontinent by the English men. In which conflict many French men were taken, but mo were slaine, and the keeping of the Towre and Bulwarke was committed to Mylliam Glasdale Esquire. When he had gotten this Bulwarke, he was sure that, by that way neither man nor vitaile could passe or come. After that, he made certain Bulwarkes round about the Citie, casting trenches betwene the one and the other, layeng ordinaunce in euery part, where he sawe that any battery might be deuised. When they within perceyued that they were enuironed with fortresses treſſes and ordinance, they laied Gonne againſt Gonne, and fortefied towres agaynſt Bulwarkes, and within made new Rampires, and buylded newe Mudwalles, to auoyde crackes and breches, which might by violent ſhot ſodainly inſue. They appointed the Baſtard of Orleance, and Stephyn Veignold called the heire, to ſee the walles and watches kept; and the biſhop ſaw the inhabitants within the Citie were put in good order, and that vittailes were not wantonly conſumed, nor vainely ſpent.

In the Tower that was taken at the bridge ende, as you before haue heard, there was a high Chamber, hauyng a Grate full of barres of yron by the which a man might loke all the length of the bridge into the City, at which grate, many of the chiefe Capteynes ſtoode dyuerſe times, viewyng the Citie, and deuiſyng in what place it was beſt aſſautable. They within the Citie perceyued well this totyng hole, and layde a piece of ordinaunce directly agaynſt the Windowe. It ſo chaunced that the.xix. day after the ſiege layd before the Citie, the Erle of Sariſbury, Sir Thomas Gargraue, and William Glaſdale, and diuerſe other, went into the ſayde Tower, and ſo into the high Chamber, and looked out at the grate, and within a ſhort ſpace, the ſonne of the maiſter Goonner, perceyuyng men looke out at the Chamber windowe, tooke his matche, as his father had taught him, which was gone downe to dinner, and fired the Goon, which braſte and cheuered the yron barres of the grate, wherof, one ſtrake the Erle ſo ſtrongly on the hed, that it ſtroke away one of his eyes and the ſide of his cheeke, Sir Thomas Gargraue was likewiſe ſtricken, ſo that he died within two dayes. The Erle was conueyed to Meum vpon Loyre, where he lay beyng wounded.viij.dayes, and then died, whoſe bodie was conueyed into England, with all funerall pompe, and buried at Billam by his progenitors, leauyng behinde him an onely daughter named Alice, maryed to Richard Neuill, ſonne to Rauſe Erle of Weſtmerland, of whom hereafter ſhall be made mencion. What detriment, what dãmage, and what loſſe ſucceded to the Engliſhe publike wealth, by the ſodeine death of this valiaunt Capteyne, not long after his departure, manifeſtly appered. For the high proſperitie, and great glorie of the Engliſh nacion in the partes beyond the ſea, began ſhortly to fall, and little and little to vaniſhe awaye: which thing, although the Engliſhe people like a valiaunt and ſtrong bodie, at the firſt tyme did not perceyue, Yet ſhortly after, they felt it growe like a peſtilent humor, which ſucceſſiuely a little and little corrupteth all the members, and deſtroyeth the bodie. For, after the death of this noble man, fortune of warre beganne to chaunge, and triumphaunt victorie beganne to be darkned. Although the death of the Erle were dolorous to all Engliſhmen, yet ſurely it was moſt dolorous to the Duke of Bedford, Regent of Fraunce, as he which had loſt his right hande, or lacked his weapon, when he ſhoulde fight with his enemie. But ſeeyng that dead men cannot with ſorowe be called againe, nor lamentation for dead bodies cannot remedie the chaunces of men liuyng: He (like a prudent gouernor and a politike patrone) appoynted the Erle of Suffolk to be his Lieutenant, and Capteyn of the ſiege, & ioyned with him the Lord Scales, the Lord Talbot, ſir John Faſtolfe, and diuerſe other valiant knightes & ſquiers. Theſe Lordes cauſed Baſtiles to be made round about the Citie, with the which they troubled their enimies, and aſſaulted the walles, and left nothing vnattempted, which might be to them any aduauntage, or hurtfull to their enemies.

In the tyme of Lent, vitaile and artillerie began to ware scant in the Englishe armie, wherefore the Erle of Suffolke appoynted Sir John Fastolfe, Sir Thomas Rampstone, and Sir Philip Hall, with their retinues, to ride to Paris to the Lord Regent, to enforme him of their scarcenesse and necessitie. Which beyng therof informed, without any delay, or prolongyng, prouided vitaile, artillery and munitions, necessary & conuenient for so great an enterprice, and laded therewith manie Chariots, Cartes, and horses: and for the sure conduite, and sauegarde of the same, he appoynted Sir Simon Morhier, Prouost of Paris, with the garde of the Citie and diuerse of hys awne housholde seruaunts, to accompanie Sir John Fastolfe, and his Cōplices, to the armie lyyng at the siege of Orleaunce. The which departed in good order, to the number of fiue hundred men of warre, beside wagoners, out of Paris, and came to Paynuile in Beausse, and in a morning earely in a great frost they departed, from the place towarde the siege, and when they came to a towne called Ronuray, in the laundes of Beausse, they perceyued their enemies commyng agaynst them, to the number of. ir. or. r. thousande French men and Scottes: The Capteines whereof was Charles of Clere-mont, sonne to the Duke of Burbon, then beyng prisoner in Englande, Sir William Stewarde Constable of Scotland, a little before deliuered out of Captiuitie, the Erle of Pardriacke, the Lorde John Vandosme, Vidame of Charters, the Lord of Touars, the Lord of Lohat, the lorde of Eglere, the lorde of Beauiew, the Bastarde Tremorle, and many other baliaunt Cap-teynes. Wherefore Sir John Fastolfe and his Companions set all their cōpanie in good order of Battaile, and pitched stakes before euery Archer, to breake the force of the horsemen. At their backes they set all their wagons, and cariages, and within them they tied all their horses, so that their enemies could neither assaile them on the backsyde, nor yet spoyle them of their horses, and in this maner they stood still, abiding the assault of their aduersaries. The Frenchmen (by reason of their great number) thinkyng the victorie to be in their handes, egerly lyke Lyons set on the Englishemen, which with great force them receyued, and manfully defended: for it stood them vpon, consi-deryng the vnequalitie of the number. And after long and cruell fight, the Englishemen droue backe and vanquished the proude Frenchmen, and com-pelled them to flie. In this conflict were slaine, Lorde William Stewarde Constable of Scotland, and his brother, the Lorde Dorual, the Lord Dela-bret, the Lorde Chasteanbrian, Sir John Basgot, and other Frenche men and Scottes, to the number of. xxb. hundreth, and aboue. xi. hundreth taken prisoners, although a French writer affirme the number lesse.

After this fortunate victorie, sir John Fastolfe and his companie (of the which no man of any reputation was eyther slaine or taken) came with all their cariages, vitaile, and prisoners, to the siege before Orleaunce, where they were ioyously receyued and welcomed of all the Souldiours. This con-flict (because the most part of the cariage was Herying and Lenten stuffe) the Frenche men call the vnfortunate battaile of Herynges.

The battayle of Herrings.

The Erle of Suffolke, beyng thus vitayled, continued his siege, and euery day almost skirmished with his enemies, which, being in dispayre of all succours, began to common amongest themselues, howe they might render the towne, to their most honour and profite. After much reasonyng, and long debatyng amongest the Capteines, and the Magistrates of the towne, what way was best to be folowed: Some affirmed it not only to be shamefull and dishonourable, but also vnnaturall and vnreasonable, to yelde the towne to the Englishemen, beyng neither friendes nor fauourers of the Frenche nacion: other, fearyng the victory of the Englishemen, imagined, that if they by force possessed the Citie, they would do to them as tyrantes be accustomed to serue wilfull and obstinate people, and therefore they thought it a great folly and a notable lightnesse, aswell not to beware of the one, as to denie or refuse the other. But when they saw, that their glorie must nedes decline to a shame and reproche, they thought to find a meane way to saue themselues, and their Citie from the captiuitie of their enemies, and deuised to submit their Cuyte, themselues, and all theirs vnder the obeysance of Philip Duke of Burgoyn, because he was brought out of the stocke & blood royall of the auncient house of Fraunce: thinkyng by this meanes (as they did in deede) to breake or minishe the great amitie betweue the Englishe men and him.

After this poynt concluded, they made open and sent to the Duke al their deuises and intentes, which certefied them that he would gladly receyue their offer, so that the Regent of Fraunce would thereto agree and consent. And thervpon dispatched certeyn Ambassadors to the Duke of Bedford, to whom these newes were straunge and not very pleasant, vpon which poynt, he assembled a great counsaile. Some thought that maner of yeeldyng to be both honorable and profitable to the king of England, by reason whereof, so great a Citie, and so rich a Countrie, should be brought out of the possession of their enemyes, into the handes of their trustie friendes, without further coste or bloodshed. The Duke of Bedford and other were of a contrary opinion, thinkyng it both dishonourable, and vnprofitable to the realme of England, to see a Citie so long besieged at the costes and expenses of the king of England, & almost brought to the point of yeldyng, to be yelded to any other forein Prince or Potestate, and not to him or his Regent, the example whereof might prouoke other townes hereafter to do the same. This reason tooke place, and the Regent aunswered the Dukes Ambassadors, that it was not honorable nor yet consonant to reason, that the king of England should beate the Bushe, and the Duke of Burgoyne should haue the birdes: Wherefore sithe the right was his, the warre was his, and the charge was his, he sayde that the Citie ought not to be yelded to no other person, but to him, or to his vse and profite. By this little chaunce, succeded a great chaunge in the Englishe affayres, for a double mischiefe of this aunswere arose and sprong out. For first the Duke of Burgoyne began to conceyue a certein priuie grudge agaynst the Englishemen for this cause: thinkyng them to enuy and beare malice agaynst his glory and profite, for the which in continuance of tyme he became their enemie, and cleued to the Frenche king. Secondly, the Englishemen left the siege of Orleaunce, which by this treatie they might haue had to friend, or to haue continued neuter, till their Lorde the Duke of Orleance, or the Erle of Angulosme his brother were deliuered out of the captiuitie of the Englishe people. But if men were Angels and forsaw thinges to come, they lyke beastes would not runne to their confusion: but fortune which guideth the destenie of man will turne her wheele as shee lusteth, who so euer

ſayth nay.

While this treatie of the Orleaunces was in hande, Charles the Dolphyn daily ſtudied, and hourely laboured, to plucke the fauour and heartes of the Nobilitie of Fraunce, from the Engliſhe Nation, to the entent, that he might aſſemble a puyſſaunce ſufficient, to relieue his friendes, beyng ſhut vp in the Citie of Orleaunce. While he was ſtudiyng and compaſſyng this matter, there happened to him a ſtraunge chaunce, of the which I will write a little, becauſe ſome of the Frenche Auctheurs, and eſpecially, Iohn Bouchet writeth of it to much.

Ione a mayde commonly called by the frenchmen la Puzelle de dieu.

For as he and other ſay, there came to him beyng at Chynon, a mayde of the age of. xx. yeres, and in mannes apparell, named Ione, borne in Burgoyne, in a towne called Dromy beſyde Vaucolour, which was a greate ſpace a Chamberlein in a common Hoſtrey, and was a Rampe of ſuch boldneſſe, that ſhe would courſe horſes, and ride them to water, and do thinges, that other yong maydens both abhorred and were aſhamed to do: yet as ſome ſay, whether it were becauſe of her foule face, that no man would deſire it, either becauſe ſhe had made a vowe to liue chaſte, ſhe kept her maydenhed, and preſerued her virginitie. She (as a monſter) was ſent to the Dolphyn, by ſir Robert Bandrencort Capteyne of Vaucolour, to whome ſhe declared, that ſhe was ſent from God, both to ayde the miſerable citie of Orleaunce, and alſo to reſtore him to the poſſeſſion of his realme, out of the which he was expulſed and ouercommed: reherſyng to him viſions, traunces, and fables, full of blaſphemie, ſuperſtition, and hypocriſye, that I marueyle much that wiſe men dyd beleeue her, and learned Clerkes would write ſuch phātaſyes. What ſhould I reherſe, howe they ſay, ſhe knewe and called him her king, whome ſhe neuer ſawe before? That ſhe had by reuelation a ſworde, to her appoynted in the Church of Saint Katheryn, of Fierboys in Toraine where ſhe neuer had bene? that ſhe declared ſuch priuie meſſeges from God, our Ladie, and other ſaints, to the Dolphyn, that ſhe made the teares ronne downe from his eyes? So was he deluded, ſo was he blinded, and ſo was he deceyued by the Deuilles meanes which ſuffered her to begin her race, and in cōcluſion rewarded her with a ſhamefull fal. But in the meane ſeaſon, ſuch credence was geuen to her, that ſhe was honored as a ſaint of the religious, and beleued as one ſent from God of the Temporaltie, inſomuch that ſhe (armed at all poyntes) rode from Poyters to Bloys, and there founde men of warre, vitaile, and munitions, readie to be conueyed to Orleaunce.

The Engliſhemen perceiuyng that they within could not long continue for default of vitail & powder, kept not their watch ſo diligently as they were accuſtomed, nor ſcoured not the Countrie enuironed, as they before had ordeyned: which negligence, the Citizens beyng ſhut in perceyuyng, ſent word thereof to the French Capteynes, which with Puzell in the dead time of the night, and in great raine and thunder, with all their vitaile and artillerie entered into the City. And the next day the Engliſhemen boldely aſſaulted the towne, promiſyng to them that beſt ſcaled the walles great rewardes. Then men mounted on Ladders couragiouſly, and with Gonnes, Arowes and Pikes, beate their enemyes from the walles.

The Frenchmen, although they marueyled at the fierce fighting of the Engliſhe people, yet they were not amaſed, but they defended themſelues

to the darke night, on which day no great priuate feate worthy of memorie, was eyther attempted or done. The Bastarde of Orleaunce (seyng the puissaunce of the Englishe nation) beganne to feare the sequele of the matter: wherefore he sent worde to the Duke of Alaunson, aduertisyng him in what case the towne then stoode, and that it could not long continue wythout hys hasty speede, and quick diligence. Which delaying no time, nor deferring no space, came with all his army within two leagues of the City, and sent worde to the Capitaynes, that on the next morowe they should be ready to receiue them. Which thing the next daye they accomplished, for the Englishe men thought it to be much to their auaile, if so great a multitude entered into the Citie, vered with famine and replenished with scarcenesse. On the next day in the morning the Frenchmen altogether issued out of the towne, and assauted the fortresse or Bastile, called the Bastile of Saint Loure, the which with great force, and no little losse they tooke and set it on fyre, and after assauted the Towre at the bridge foote, which was manfully defended. But the French men being more in number, so fiercely assauted it, that they tooke it or the Lorde Talbot could come to succours, in the which Wylliam Gladdisdale the Capitayne was slaine, and the Lorde Morlyns, and the lorde Pownyngs also.

The Frenchmen puffed vp with this good luck, seing the strong Fortresse was vngotten, which was vnder the defence of the lorde Talbot, fetched a compasse about, and in good order of battayle marched thetherward. The lorde Talbot lyke a Capitayne without feare or dread of so great a multitude, issued out of his Bastile, and so fiercely fought with the french men, that they not able to withstand his puissaunce, fled (lyke sheepe before the Wolffe) agayne into the Citie, with great losse of men and small artillerie: and of the Englishe men were lost in the two Bastiles fiue hundred persons. Then the Erle of Suffolke, the lorde Talbot, the lorde Scales, and other Capitaines, assembed together, where causes were shewed, that it was both necessary and conuenient eyther to leaue the siege for euer, or to deferre it till an other time, more luckey and conuenient. And to the intent that they should not seme eyther to flie or to be driuen from the siege by their enimies, they determined to leaue their fortresses and Bastiles, and to assemble in the plaine field, and there to abide all the day, abyding the outcomming and battayle of their enimies. This conclusion taken, was accordingly executed. The French men wery with the last bickering, held in their heades, and durst not once appere: and so they set fyre in their lodgings, and departed in good order of battayle from Orleaunce. The nert day, which was the eyght day of May, the Erle of Suffolk, ryding to Jargeaur with foure hundred Englishe men, and the Lorde Talbot with an other company returned to Meum. Which towne after that he had fortefied, he incontinent assauted and wanne the towne of Lauall and the Castell, forbering and punishing the townes men, for their hard hartes, and cancarde obstinacie: and leauing there a garrison, reculed to Meum.

After that the Englishe men were thus retired from the siege of Orleaunce, and seuered themselues in dyuers townes and fortresses, holding on their parte: The Duke of Alaunson, the Bastard of Orleaunce, Jone the Puzell, the Lorde of Gaucort, and diuers other french men, came before the towne towne of Jargeaux, where the Erle of Suffolke, and his two brethren ſoiourned, the twelue day of June, and gaue to the towne a great and terrible aſſault, which the Engliſhe men, (being but a handefull) manfully defended on three partes of the ſame. Poyton of Sentrailes, perceyuing one part of the towne to be vndefended, ſcaled the walles on that part: and without any difficultie tooke the towne, and ſlue ſir Alexander Pole brother to the Erle, and many other, to the number of two hundred: but they not much gayned, for they loſt three hundred good men and more. Of the Engliſhe men were taken.xl.beſide his brother John. After thys gayne and good luck, the frenchmen returning towarde Orleaunce, fell in contention and debate, for their captiues and priſoners, and ſlue them all, ſauing the Erle and his brother.

After the gayning of the towne of Jargeaux, the ſame armie came to Meum, and tooke the towre at the bridge, and put therein a garriſon, and from thence remoued to Bangency. Which garriſon being not vittayled rendered the towne, ſo that they might depart with bagge and baggage, frankly and freely: which deſire to them was graunted. At this towne of Bangency met with the Duke of Alaunſon, Arthur of Britayne the falſe forſworne Gentleman to the king of Englande, newelye made Conſtable of Fraunce (as you haue heard) with whom was the Lorde Delabret with.xij. hundred men, to whome daylie repayred freſhe ayde out of euery parte, as the Erle of Vandoſme, and other to the number of.xx.or.xxiij. thouſand men. All theſe men of warre, determined to go to Meum, and to take the towne, but they were informed, that the Engliſhe men had left the towne deſolate, and were returned to the Lorde Talbot to Jeneuile. Then they concluded to paſſe towarde that towne. But as they marched forward vpon a Saterday, they had perfite knowlege, that the Lorde Talbot with fiue thouſand men, was comming to Meum. Wherfore they intending to ſtop him a tyde, conueyed their company to a ſmall Village called Patay, which way they knewe that the Engliſhe men muſt nedes paſſe by. And firſt they appointed their horſemen, which were well and rychely furnyſhed, to go before, and ſodainely to ſet on the Engliſhe men, or they were, eyther ware or ſet in order. The Engliſhe men comming forwarde perceyued the horſemen, and imagining to deceyue their enimies, commaunded the footemen to enuirone and encloſe themſelues about with their ſtakes, but the frenche horſemen came on ſo fiercely, that the archers had no leyſure to ſet themſelues in aray. There was no remedie, but to fight at aduenture. This battayle continued by the ſpace of three long houres. And although the Engliſhe men were ouerpreſſed, with the number of their aduerſaries, yet they neuer fled back one foote, till their Captayne the Lorde Talbot was ſore wounded at the backe, and ſo was taken. Then their hartes began to faint, and they fled, in which flight, there were ſlayne aboue twelue hundred, and taken.xl. whereof the Lorde Talbot, the Lorde Scales, the Lorde Hungerford, and Sir Thomas Rampſtone, were the chiefe: Howbeit diuers archers which had ſhot all their arrowes, hauing onely their ſwordes, defendyng themſelues, and with the helpe of ſome of the horſemen, came ſafe to Meum.

The Lorde Talbot, the lord Scales, and the lorde Hungerford taken.

When the fame was blowen abroade, that the Lorde Talbot was taken, all the French men not a little reioyſed, thinking ſurely that nowe the rule of the Engliſhe men ſhould ſhortly aſſwage and ware faynt: for feare whereof, whereof, the townes of Jeneuile, Meum, Foꝛt, and dyuers other, returned from the Englishe parte, and became French, to the great displeasure of the Regent. From this battayle departed without any stroke striken, syꝛ John Fastolffe, the same yere, foꝛ hys valyauntnesse elected into the oꝛder of the Garter: Foꝛ which cause the Duke of Bedfoꝛd, in a great anger toke from hym the Image of saint Geoꝛge, and his Garter: but afterward, by meane of frends, and apparaunte causes of good excuse by him alleged, he was restoꝛed to the oꝛder agayne, agaynst the minde of the Loꝛde Talbot.

Charles, calling himselfe French king, being aduertised of this victoꝛy, thought nowe that all things succeeded, accoꝛding to his opinion and good hope, which euer was of that high courage and haute minde, that in hys most aduersitie, he neuer dispayꝛed in good lucke at length: so that the Erle of Salisbourie being dead, and the Loꝛde Talbot lyuing in captiuitie (which were the gloꝛy of his enimies) he thought to enteꝛpꝛise great and waighty things, where befoꝛe he medeled with small and little doings. Foꝛ fulfilling of his minde and appetite, he determined, first to conquere the Citie of Reynes, to the intent that he being there, might accoꝛding to the fashion of his pꝛogenitoꝛs, with all accustomed Ceremonies, be sacred and annoynted king, that all men might see and peꝛceyue, that he was by all lawes and decrees, a iust and a lawfull king. Wheꝛefoꝛe he assembling together a great armie, and hauing in his companie Joan the Puzell, whome he vsed as an Oꝛacle and a Southsayer, passed thoꝛough Champaigne by the Towne of Anxer which he besieged, they within sent to him Messengers, pꝛayeng him of certaine dayes of abstinence of warre, in the which (if they were not rescued) they pꝛomised to render the towne. He not wylling to recompence with ingratitude the louing hartes of the Citezens, graunted gently to their petition, and leauing there certain persons, to see that they should not iuggle with hym, departed from thence to Troys, being the chiefe Citie of Champaigne, which he besieged twelue dayes. Sir Phillip Hall Captayne there, vnpꝛouyded both of vitayle and men, mistrusting that ayde would not come in time, vpon composition rendered the towne, so that he and his, with all their mouables might in safetie departe the Citie: which demaunde was agreed to. After that Troys was yeelded, the commonalite of Chalons rebelled againſt sir John Iwbemond their capitayne, and constrayned him to deliuer the towne vpon like composition, which againſt his will he was faine to doe: and likewise did the citizens of Reins, desiring him to geue safe conduite to all Englishe men, safely to departe.

Troys besieged and yelded to the French men.

Iwbemond delyuered to the French.

Reynes delyuered to the French.

When he had thus conquered Reyns, he in the pꝛesence of all the Noble men of his faction, and the Dukes of Loꝛayne and Barre, was sacred king of Fraunce, by the name of Charles the first, with all tytles and ceremonies thereto appertayning. They of Anxer which were not rescued within the time appointed, bꝛought the kayes to him, and submitted themselues to hys obeysaunce: lykewise did all the Cities and townes adioyning, geuyng thankes to almightie God, which hauyng compassion on their miserie, had restoꝛed them to libertie and freedome.

Charles the Dolphyn crowned king of Fraunce.

The Duke of Bedfoꝛd, hearing that these townes had returned to the parte of his aduersaries, and that Charles late Dolphin had taken vpon him the name and estate of the king of Fraunce, and also seing that daylie Cities and townes returned from the Engliſh part, and became French, as though the Engliſhe men had nowe loſt all their hardie Chiefetaynes and valyaunt men of warre, eſpyed and euidently perceyued, that the laſte and vttermoſt point of recouery, was driuen onely to ouercome by battayle, and to ſubdue by force. By which victorie (as he put his confidence in God) he truſted not onely to ſcourge and plague the Cities, which were ſo ſodainely thaungeable, but alſo to aſſwage and caulme the haute courage of the newe facred French king and his companions. Wherefore he hauing together ten thouſand good Engliſhe men (beſide Normans) departed out of Paris in warlike faſhion, and paſſed through Brie to Monſtrell Faultyow, and there ſent by Bedforde his Herault letters to the French king, alleging to him that he contrary to the lawes of God and man, yea and contrary to the finall concluſion, taken, concorded, and agreed betweene his noble brother king Henry the fift, and king Charles the fift, father to the ſayde now vſurper, leauyng all humaine reaſon and honeſt communication (which ſometime appeaſeth debates and pacifyeth ſtrifes) onely allured and entyſed by a deuelish Witch, and a fanaticall Enchauntereſſe, had not only falſely and craftely taken vpon him, the name, title & dignity of the king of France: but alſo had by murder, ſtealing, craft, and deceitfull meanes, violently gotten, and wrongfully kept, diuers Cities and townes, belonging to the king of England, his moſt deſt beloued Lorde, and moſt deereſt Nephew. For proſe wherof, he was come downe from Paris with his armie, into the Countrie of Brye, by dent of ſworde, and ſtroke of battayle, to proue his wryting and cauſe true, willing his enimie to choſe the place, and he in the ſame would geue him battayle.

The newe French kyng, departyng from his ſolempne ceremonies at Reins, and remouing from thence to Dampmartine, ſtudiyng howe to compaſſe the Pariſians, eyther with money, or with promiſe, was ſomewhat troubled with this meſſage, howbeit, he made a good countenaunce, and a French bragge, aunſwering to the Herault: that he would ſooner ſeeke hys mayſter the Duke, then that the Duke ſhould purſue him. The Duke of Bedford hering his aunſwere, marched toward him, and pitched his field in a ſtrong place, and ſent out diuers of his raungers, to prouoke the Frenche men to come forward. The French king was in maner determined to abide the battayle, but when he heard ſaye by his Eſpialles, that the power and number of the Engliſhe men were to his army equall in power, he determined that it was more for his profite, to abſtaine from battayle without daunger, then to enter into the conflict with ieopardie: fearing leaſt that with a raſhe courage, he might ouerthrowe all his affayres, which ſo effectuouſly proceeded. And ſo well aduiſed, he turned with his armie a little out of the way. The Duke of Bedford perceyuing his faint courage, followed him by Mountaynes and dales, till he came to a Towne in Barre, not farre from Senlis, where he found the French king and his army. Wherefore he ordered his battayle, lyke a man expert in marciall ſcience, ſetting the Archers before, and himſelfe with the noble men in the mayne battayle, and put the Normans on both ſides for the winges. The French king alſo ordered hys battayles, according to the deuiſe of his Capitaynes. Thus theſe two armies without any great doing (except a fewe ſkirmiſhes, in the which the Dukes light horſemen did very valyaunly,) laye eche in ſight of other, by the ſpace of two dayes and two nightes. But when the French king ſawe, and perceyued, how glad, howe diligent and couragious the Engliſhe men were to fight and geue battayle, he imagined that by his tarieng, one of theſe two things muſt nedes chaunce: that is to ſay, eyther he ſhould fight againſt his will, or lye ſtill like a coward, to his great rebuke and infamie. Wherefore in the dead of the night (as priuely as he could) he brake vp his campe and fled to Bray. When this flight was perceyued in the morning, the Regent could ſcarce refraine his people, from folowyng the French army, calling them cowardes, daſtardes, and loutes, and therefore, he perceyuing that by no meanes, he could allure the newe French king to abide battayle, miſtruſting the Pariſians, and geuing no great credite to their fayre, ſwete, and flattering wordes, returned agayne to Paris, to aſſemble together a greater power, and ſo to proſecute his enimies.

In this ſeaſon, the Bohemians (which belike had eſpyed the vſurped auctoritie of the Biſhop of Rome) began to Rebell againſt his See. Wherefore, Martin the fift, Biſhop of Rome, wrote vnto them to abſteyne from warre, and to be reconciled by reaſon, from their damnable opinions. But they (beyng perſwaded to the contrary) neyther gaue eare vnto him, nor yet obeyed his voyce. Wherefore the Biſhop of Rome, wrote to the Princes of Germanie, to inuade the Realme of Beame, as the den of heretykes. Beſide this, he appoynted Henry Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Cardinall of Saint Euſebie, a man very well borne (as you haue heard) but no better borne then high ſtomacked, to be his Legate in this great iourney, and to bring out men from the Realme of England, into the Countrie of Beame. And becauſe the warre touched religion, he licenced the ſayd Cardinall, to take the tenth part of euery ſpirituall dignitie, benefice and promocion. This matter, was declared in open Parliament in England, and not diſſented, but gladly aſſented to, wherfore the biſhop gathered the money, and aſſembled foure thouſand men, and mo, not without great grudge of the people, which daily were with tallages and aydes wearied, and ſore burdened. And when men, munitions, and money were redie for his high enterpriſe, he with all his people came to the Sea ſtrond at Douer, redie to paſſe ouer the Sea into Flaundrys.

But in the meane ſeaſon, the Duke of Bedford conſideryng, how townes dayly were gotten, and Countries hourely wonne in the realme of Fraunce, for lacke of ſufficient defence and number of men of warre, wrote to his brother the Duke of Glouceſter, to relieue him wyth ayde, in that tempeſtuous tyme and troubleous ſeaſon. When this letter was brought into England, the Duke of Glouceſter was not a little amazed, becauſe he had no armie redie to ſende at that tyme: For by the reaſon of the Crewe ſent into Beame, he could not ſodeinly rayſe a new armie. But becauſe the matter was of ſuch importance, and might neyther be from day to day differred, nor yet long delayed, he wrote to the Biſhop of Wincheſter, to paſſe with all his armie toward the Duke of Bedford, which at that tyme had both nede of men and aſſiſtaunce, conſideryng that nowe, all ſtood vpon loſſe or gaine: which thing done, and to his honor achieued, he might performe his iourney againſt the Bohemians. Although the Cardinall was ſomewhat moued with this countermaund, yet leaſt he ſhould be noted, not to ayde the Regent of Fraunce, in ſo great a cauſe, and ſo neceſſary an enterpriſe, he bowed from his former iour-ney, and passed the sea with all his companie, and brought them to his Cosin, to the Citie of Parys.

Charles the Frenche King, hauyng knowlege in the meane season by his espials, which went round about the Country, to intise & sollicite townes and Cities, to returne from the Englishe part, and become French, that the inhabitantes of Champaine, and Beuauoys, ought to him great loue and singuler fauour, and gladly coueted to renounce the subiection of England, and to be vnder his protection, and also offered to open him their Gates, so that they should not thereby, be in ieopardie of their lyues, and losse of their goodes, with all hast and diligence remoued towarde Champaigne. The Duke of Bedforde beyng aduertised of his progresse, and hauyng his armie augmented, with the newe ayde, which the Cardinall had of late conducted, marched forward with great speede to encounter and geue battayle, to hys mortall enemie the French king. When the Duke was come to Senlis, the Frenchmen were lodged on the Mountpilioll, betwene Senlis and Champaigne. Euery army knewe of other, and euery host might beholde other. Then the Campes were trenched, and the battayles pitched, and the fieldes ordered.

Thus these great armyes laye two dayes, nothyng doyng but wyth skirmishes, in the which the Normanes sore vexed the French men. Wherefore the Lord Regent, gaue to them many high laudes and prayisynges, and determined surely the next day to set on the French king in his Campe, if he would abyde battaile. But while king Charles did polletikely consider, what a variable Lady, Fortune was, and what a sodein and vnthought chaunce of a small thing, might do in a battaile: for the detrimentes and ouerthrowes, that he and his Nacion had taken and tasted by the Englishe men, were to them a learnyng, to auoyd open ioinyng, mutuall conflict, and force to force. And beside that, he had by his searchers and spyes, plaine and perfect knowlege, that many and diuers Cities and townes in Fraunce, abhorryng the English libertie, and aspiryng to the French bondage and native seruitude, (accordyng to the nature of Asses, which the more they be charged with, the more they desyre) would (when they saw their tyme) not onely rebell and returne to his faction and part, but also were redie to ayde and assist him, in recouery of his desired realme and auncient dominion, in expellyng also the Englishe nation out of the territories of Fraunce. And therefore he imagined that the Duke of Bedford, was so hastie to geue him battaile, thinkyng that if he then were ouercome, the game had for the Englishemen bene clerely gotten, and to the Frenchmen, a perpetuall checkmate. Wherefore he determined neuer (except very necessitie compelled or constrayned him) to fight in open battaile with the Englishemen, nor by a field to aduenture his realme with them, of whome his predecessors so often tymes had bene vanquished, wherefore like a carpet Capteyne, he in the night, remoued his Campe and fled to Crespie, and yet his number was double to the Englishe armie. The Duke of Bedford seeyng that the French king, was thus cowardly retrayted, and as a man which durst not once assay the stroke of an Englishe arme, shamefully reculed: with all his power and armie, and returned againe to Parys, sore suspectyng the deceptfull fayth of the polletique Parisians. The Bishop of Winchester, after the French kinges flight, went into Beame, and there there did somewhat, but what it was Aucthours kepe silence, and so do I: But shortly he without any great prayse, and small gaine, returned into England, more glad of his retraite, then of his aduauncyng forwarde. Sone after the Bishop of Rome without his agreement, vnlegated him, and set an other in his steede and aucthoritie, with which doyng he was neyther content, nor pleased.

The coronation of King Henry the first at westminster.

On the first day of Nouember, beyng the day of Saint Leonard, king Henry, in the eight yere of his reigne, was at Westminster with all pompe and honor, crowned king of this realme of England.

But to returue to the troubleous warres in Fraunce. After that the French king was fled from the Duke of Bedford (as you haue heard before) and was come to Crespy in Ualoys, he was credibly informed, how the Citizens of Champaigne, desired greatly to be vnder his gouernaunce and subiection. Wherefore he mindyng not to lese so fayre an offered pray, ceassed not till he came to the towne, where with al reuerence and benignitie, he was receyued and welcommed. And after that, were rendered to him the townes of Senlis and Beauoys. And the Lorde Longuenall tooke by stealth, the Castell of Iumerle, and slue all the Englishe men, and in short space, the Lorde Barbason, which long had bene prisoner in the Castell Gaylard, so muche, what with fayre wordes and large promises, perswaded his kepers, that he not only deliuered his owne person, but also caused the towne, to turne from the English men, to the part of king Charles his mayster. Which king although he much reioyced, at the good successe, that Fortune had to hym sent, yet he was somewhat desperate, how to recouer his countrie from the possession of the English men, except he vnknitted the knot and league, betwene the Duke of Burgoyn and them. Wherfore, he sent his Chauncelor, and diuers Ambassadors to the Duke of Burgoyn, first excusyng himselfe of the death and murther of Duke John his father, and after, declaryng to him, that there could be nothing more foule, more dishonest, nor more detestable, then, for his owne peculiar cause, and priuate displeasure, to ioyne with hys auncient enimies, and perpetuall aduersaries agaynst his native Countrie and naturall Nacion: Not onely requiryng him of concord, peace, and amity, but also promisyng golden Mountaines, and many more benefites, then at that tyme, he was eyther able or could performe. This message was not so secrete, nor the doyng so closely cloked, but the Duke of Bedforde, thereof was plainely enformed. Which, beyng sore troubled, and vnquieted in hys minde, because he sawe the power of the Englishe nacion, dayly waxe lesse, he of all thinges first foreseyng, if any losse should of necessitie chaunce, of those townes and Countries, which his noble brother king Henry the fift had cõquered, in the very Countrie of Fraunce, for lacke of tuicion or defence: yet for an Ankerholde, he determined to kepe, possesse, and defende, the Duchie of Normandie, the olde inheritaunce and auncient Patrimonie of the kinges of England, and from them onely, by force and not by iustice, by violence and not by right, sithe the tyme of king Henry the thirde, (the deuilish deuision then reignyng in the realme) wrongfully deteyned, and iniuriously vsurped. Wherefore, he diligently prouidyng, for thinges that might chaunce, appointed gouernor of the Citie of Paris, Lewes of Lurenborough, Bishop of Turwyne and Ely, beyng Chauncelor of Fraunce, for the king of England, a man of no lesse wit, then of birth, leauyng with him a conuenient number of Englishmen to defend both the Citie and territorie of Paris, and the Isle of Fraunce, then beyng in the Englishe mens possession and gouernaunce.

These thinges thus ordered, he departed from Paris, into Normandie, and called at Roan a Parliament, of the three estates of the Duchie, in the which he declared vnto them, the great liberties, the manifolde priuileges, the innumerable benefites, which they had receyued of the kinges of England, duryng the tyme that they were possessors, and Lordes of the same Duchie, not puttyng in oblivion, the miserie, bondage, and calamitie, which they had susteyned, by the intollerable yoke, and dayly tributes, continually layde in their neckes lyke Asses, by the cruell and couetous Frenchmen: And puttyng them also in remembraunce, how the kinges of England, were not onely brought foorth and discended of the Normans blood and progenie, but were the very true and vndoubtfull heyres, to the same Countrie & Duchie, lineally succedyng, and lawfully discendyng from Rollo the hardie, first Duke and prince of the same Dominion: Requiryng them further, to liue in loue and amitie amongest them selfes, to be true and obedient to the king their souerigne Lorde, and to kepe their othe and promes, made and sworne to his noble brother, king Henry the fift, promisyng to them, English libertie, and priueleges royall.

While the Duke of Bedford was thus interteinyng and encouragyng the Normans, Charles the newe French king, beyng of his departure aduertised, longyng and thirstyng for to obteyne Paris, the chiefe Citie & principall place of resort, within the whole realme of Fraunce, departed from the towne of Senlis wel accompanied, and came to the towne of Saint Denise, which he found desolate, and abandoned of all garrison, and good gouernāce. Wherefore, without force and small damage, he entered into the voyd towne and lodged his armie at Mountmartir, and Abbeuilliers, nere adioinyng, and lyng to the Citie of Parys. And from thence, sent John Duke of Alanson, and his sorceresse Joan (called the Mayde sent from God) in whom, his whole affiaunce then consisted, with three thousand light horsemen, to get againe the Citie of Paris, eyther by force, or by fayre flatteryng, or reasonable treatie, and after them, he without delay or deferryng of tyme, with all hys power, came betwene Mountmartir and Parys, and sodeinly approched the gate of Saint Honore, settyng vp Ladders to the walles, and castyng faggots into the ditches, as though he would with a French brag, sodeinly haue gotten the fayre Citie. But the Englishe Capteynes, euery one keepyng his warde and place assigned, so manfully and fiercely, with a noble courage, defended themselues, their walles and Towers, with the assistence of the Parisiens, that they rebutted and draue away the Frenchmen, and threw downe Jone, their great Goddesse, into the botome of the towne ditche, where shee lay behinde the backe of an Asse, sore hurt, till the tyme that she all filthie with mire and durt, was drawen out, by Guyschard of Thienbrone, seruaunt to the Duke of Alaunson. The French king, seyng the great losse, that he had susteyned at this assault, and accompted his pretensed conquest in maner impossible, leauyng the dead bodies behinde him, and takyng with him, the wounded Captaynes, which were of no small number, returned into Berry. But in the meane way, the Citezens of Laignie became his subiectes, and made made to him an othe, promisyng to continue from thencefoorth to him, both true and obedient.

The Duke of Bedford, beyng in Normandie, and heryng of this sodain attempt, lost no tyme, nor spared no trauaile, till he came to Parys. Where he not onely thanked the Capteynes, and praysed the Citizens for their assured fidelitie and good will, towarde their king and souereigne Lorde, but also extolled their hardinesse, and manly doynges, aboue the Starres, and highe elementes: promisyng to them, honour, fame, and great aduauncementes. Which gentle exhortacion, so incoraged and inflamed the heartes of the Parisians, that they sware, promised, and concluded, to be friendes euer to the king of England and his friendes, and enemies alwayes to his foes and aduersaryes, makyng proclamation by this stile. Friendes to king Henrie, friendes to the Parisians, enemyes to England, enemies to Parys. But if they spake it with their hearts, eyther for feare, that Charles the French king should not punishe them, if he once obteyned the superiorite ouer their Citie and towne, or that they flattered the Englishemen, to put themselues in credite with the chiefe Capteines, you shall plainely perceiue, by the sequele of their actes.

The Duke of Bedford commendeth the Citizens of Paris.

Sone after these doynges, came to Parys with a great companie Philip Duke of Burgoyn, which was of the Regent, and the Ladie his wife, honourably receyued, and highly feasted. And after long consultation had, for the recoueryng of the townes, lately by the French king stollen and taken, it was agreed, that the Duke of Bedford, should rayse an armie, for the recouerie of the sayd fortresses, and that the Duke of Burgoyn, should be his deputie, and tary at Parys, for the defence of the same. After this great businesse thus concluded, and appoynted, the Duke of Bedford himselfe, without any great resistance, recouered againe the towne of Saint Denise, and dyuers other Castels. And after that done, he sent the Bastard of Clarence, to lay siege to the Castell of Toursie, beyng both by the naturall situation, and mannes pollicie, very strong and in maner vnable to be beaten downe. The siege continued six monethes, but in conclusion, the Captaine discomfited of all releue and succor, rendred the fortresse, the life of him and his souldiours onely saued: which offer was taken, and the Castell rased, and cast downe to the ground. Duryng this siege, Sir Thomas Kiriell knight, with foure hundreth Englishemen, departed from Gourney in Normandie, and road by Beauoys, spoilyng, robbyng and wastyng the Countrie, to the Suburbes of Cleremount. Whereof, heeryng the Erle of the same towne, assembled all the men of warre, of the garrisons adioynyng, to fight with the Englishmen: and so the French men with all diligence set forwarde, and found their enemies in a straight place, nere vnto Beauoys. The Erle of Cleremount seing that he could not hurt them with his men of armes, by reason of the straight, came downe on foote with all his companie, and fiercely set on the Englishe men. The fight was fierce, and the aduauntage doubtfull. But in conclusion, the archers shot so terribly, that the Frenche men not able to abide the smart, and gaules of the arrowes, fled apace, and the Englishemen leauyng the straight, leaped on horsebacke, and folowed the chase. In the which were taken two hundreth prisoners, and thrise as many slaine. The Erle, by the swiftnesse of his horse escaped his enemies, and came to the towne of Beauoys:

uoys: and ſo Sir thomas Kiriell, with plentie of ſpoyle and priſoners, returned to Gouruay, rendryng to God his hartie thankes for that good chaunce and happie victorie.

Yet fortune ſent not this good luck alone, for the Erle of Suffolke at that ſame very ſeaſon, beſieging the towne of Aumarle, whereof was capitaine the Lorde Rambures (after. xxiij. great aſſaultes geuen to the fortreſſe) had the towne and Caſtell to him ſimply rendered. Wherefore, he cauſed.xxx. of the townes men, for their vntruth to be hanged on the walles, and all the reſt he raunſomed, and ſent the Capitayne into England, where he remayned ſixe yeres continually, and after by exchaunge was deliuered. After this, the Erle fortified the towne with men, munitions and victaile, and ſo by a little and little, the Engliſh men recouered agayne many townes which before they had loſt, without any great loſſe of their people. Which thing the Frenche men well conſydering, imagined by what meanes, how to get againe the towne of Laual, which the Lorde Talbot (before as you haue heard) gat by ſcalyng in a night. Wherfore to poſſeſſe their deſired pray, they with money and gay promiſes, firſt corrupted a Miller, that kept a Mill adioyning to the wall, ſo that the Miller ſuffered the Lorde Homet with three hundred other, to paſſe thorough his Mill into the towne, in a very darke night. When they were entered, they ſlue the keepers of the gate, and let in the Lorde Bertrand de la Ferrier, with fiue hundred men of armes: which eyther ſlue or tooke priſoners, all the Engliſhe men within the towne, And ſhortly after, Syr Stephin de Vignoles called the Heire, tooke by ſcaling, the towne of Louiers in Normandy, and did much dammage, to all the townes adioyning.

1420 9 While theſe chaunces happened, betwene the Engliſhe men and French men, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, maried the Ladye Iſabell, daughter to Iohn king of Portyngall, and great aunt to the king of England. In honour of which mariage, he inſtituted and beganne an order of. xxvj. knights without reproche, called the order of the golden Fleece, and deuiſed ſtatuts, Mantels, collers and ceremonies for the ſame, much lyke to the ordinaunces of the noble order of the Garter begonne in Englande, almoſt an hundred yeres before the inuention of this fraternitie and friendſhip. On the which wyfe, he begat the hardie Duke Charles, father to Marie, after maried to Maximilian king of the Romaynes, as (when place requireth) ſhall be hereafter to you declared.

The order of the golden fleece.

In thys very ſeaſon the Engliſh men in the colde Moneth of December, beſieged the towne of Laigny, in the which was the Puzel and dyuers other good Capitaynes. But the weather was ſo colde, and the rayne ſo great and continuall, that they of force compelled, not by their enemies, but by the intemperate ſeaſon, reyſed their ſiege: and in their returne, the Puzell and al the garriſon within the towne, iſſued out and fought with the Engliſh men, where (after long fighting) both parties departed without eyther great gaine or loſſe. After this enterpriſe done, the Duke of Burgoyne accompanied with the Erles of Arundell and Suffolke, and the Lorde Iohn of Lurenbrough, wyth a great puyſſaunce, beſieged the Towne of Compeigne: which towne was well walled, manned and victailed, ſo that the beſiegers muſt eyther by aſſault or long taryeng, wearie or famiſhe them within the towne.

The towne of Laigny beſieged.

towne. So they cast trenches, and made mynes, and studied all the wayes that they could deuise, howe to compasse their conquest and interprise. And it happened in the night of the Ascention of our Lorde, that Ponthon of Xentrales, Jone the Puzell, and fiue or sixe hundred men of armes, issued out of Compeigne, by the gate of the bridge towarde Mowntdedier, intending to set fyre in the tents and lodgings of the Lorde of Bando, which was then gone to Marigny, for the Duke of Burgoyns affayres. At which time syr John of Luxenborough, wyth eyght other gentlemen (which had riden about the towne to serche and viewe, in what place the towne might be most aptly and conueniently assaulted or scaled) were come nere to the lodging of the Lorde of Bando, where they espyed the French men, which beganne to cut downe tents, ouerthrowe pauilions, and kill men in their beds. Wherefore shortly they assembled a great number of men, as well English as Burgonions, and couragiously set on the Frenche men. Sore was the fight and great was the slaughter, in so much that the French men, not able lenger to indure, fled into the towne so fast, that one letted the other to enter. In which chace was taken, Jone the Puzell, and diuers other: which Jone was sent to the Duke of Bedford to Roan, where (after long examination) she was brent to ashes. This witch or manly woman (called the mayde of God) the French men greatly glorified and highly extolled, alleging that by her Orleaunce was vitayled: by her king Charles was sacred at Reynes, and that by her, the Englishe men were often times put back and ouerthrowne. O Lorde, what dispraise is this to the Nobilitie of Fraunce? What blot is this to the Frenche Nation? What more rebuke can be imputed to a renowmed Region, then to affirme, write and confesse, that all notable victories, and honorable conquestes, which neyther the king with his power, nor the nobilitie with their valiantnesse, nor the counsayle with their wit, nor the commonaltie with their strength could compasse or obtaine, were gotten and atchiued by a shepherdes daughter, a Chamberlein in an hostrie, and a beggers brat: which blinding the wittes of the French nation, by reuelations, dreames and phantasticall visions, made them beleue things not to be supposed, and to geue fayth to things impossible. For surely, if credite may be geuen to the actes of the Clergie, openly done, and commonly shewed, thys woman was not inspired with the holy ghost, nor sent from God (as the French men beleeue) but an Enchantaresse, an organe of the Deuill, sent from Sathan, to blinde the people, and bring them in vnbeliefe: as by a letter sent from the king of England may appere: But for that the same is long, I thought it sufficient to rehearse the effect thereof, which was as foloweth.

Jone the Puzell taken and brent.

First that she two yeres and more, contrarie to Gods lawe, and the honest estate of womanhood, was clothed in mans apparell, and exercised the office of a Capitayne in the warres.

Also, she affirmed that she was sent of God, and that she had spoken personally with God.

Also, she caused her selfe to be honored and worshipped of many, as a woman sanctified.

And for a true declaration of the falsitie and lewdnesse of her doing, she being called before the Bishop and the Uniuersity of Paris, was there with great great ſolempnity adiudged and condempned, a ſuperſtitious Sorcereſſe, and a diueliſhe Blaſphemeres of God, and as an erronyous wretch was conſumed with fyre. And at the time of her death, ſhe confeſſed how the Deuill had deluded and deceaued her.

This letter, the king of England, ſent not onely to the Duke of Burgoyne and other Princes, to declare the veritie of the matter, and the adminiſtration of Juſtice, but to admoniſhe all rude and ignoraunt perſons, in all other countries, to refraine from the credite and beliefe of the ſayenge, of ſuche prophane prophecies, and craftie imaginers, as this pieuiſhe painted Puzell was. Yet notwithſtandyng, this lawfull proceſſe, this due examination and publike ſentence, John Buchet, and diuers French writers affirme her to be a ſaint in heauen. But becauſe it is no point of our fayth, no man is bound to beleue his iudgement, although he were an Archdeken.

John Bucher.

Paulus Emilius.

But Paulus Emilius, a famous writer, rehersing that the Citezens of Orleaunce, had buylded in the honor of her an Image or an Idole, ſayth that Pius Byſhop of Rome, and Anthony Byſhop of Florence, much maruayled and greatly wondered at her actes and doings. With which ſaiyng, I can very well agree, that ſhe was more to be maruayled at, as a falſe prophetiſſe, and ſeducer of the people, then to be honored or worſhipped as a Saint ſent from God into the realme of Fraunce. For of this I am ſure, that all auncient writers, as well diuine as prophane, allege theſe three thinges beſide dyuers other, to apperteine to a good woman. Firſt chamefaſtneſſe, which the Romaine Ladies ſo kept, that ſeldome or neuer they were ſeene openly talking with a man: which vertue at this day amongſt the Turkes, is highly eſteemed. The ſecond is pittie: which in a womans hart, abhorreth the ſpylling of the bloud of a poore beaſt, or a fely birde. The thirde is womanly behauiour, auoyding the occaſion of euill iudgement, and cauſes of ſlaunder. If theſe qualities, be of neceſſitie, incident to a good woman, where was her chamefaſtneſſe, when ſhe daylie and nightly was conuerſant with comen ſouldiours and men of warre, amongſt whome is ſmall honeſtie, leſſe vertue and chamefaſtneſſe leaſt of all exerciſed or vſed? Where was her womanly pittie, when ſhe taking to her the heart of a cruell beaſt, ſlue man woman and childe, where ſhe might haue the vpper hande? Where was her womanly behauiour, when ſhe cladde her ſelfe in a mans clothing, and was conuerſaunt with euery loſell, geuing an occaſion to all men to iudge, and ſpeake euill of her, and her doings. Then theſe things, being thus plainely true, all men muſt needes confeſſe, that the cauſe ceaſing, the effect alſo ceaſeth: ſo that if theſe morall vertues lacking, ſhe was no good woman, then it muſt needes conſequently folow, that ſhe was no ſaint.

Three properties that appertaine to a good woman.

Now leauing this woman, conſumed to aſhes, let vs returne agayne to the ſiege of Compeigne, which ſtill contynued. During which tyme, the Regent ſent to the Duke of Burgoyne, lyeng at the ſiege, the Erle of Huntyngdon, ſir John Robſert with a thouſand Archers, which daylie ſkirmiſhed with them of the towne, and made ſuche Baſtiles and fortreſſes, that the towne muſt nedes be rendered, or elſe they within famiſhed. But ſee the chaunce, when victorie was at hande, tydings were brought to the Duke of Burgoyn, that Philip Duke of Brabant, was departed out of this worlde, leauing behinde him no heire of his body: To whome the ſayde Duke pretended tended to be nert heyre, wherefore he taking with him, his beſt Capitaynes, for the recouery of ſo great a Duchy, departed from the ſiege, leauing his poore people behinde him, and ordeyned in his place, for his Lieutenaunt, Sir John Lurenborough, which being of ſmall ſtrength and leſſe courage, after the Dukes departing, aduiſed the Engliſh men to depart for that time, till the nert Sommer: which thereto at the firſt, would in no wiſe agree. But there was no remedy, for he was Capitaine generall, and had the ordinaunce vnder his rule, ſo that without that, they could nothing doe: Wherefore in great diſpleaſure, they returned into Normandy. After whoſe departure, the Captaine ſet fire in all the Baſtiles, and ſecretly departed, leauing behinde him diuers peeces of ordynaunce, for lack of of cariage. Wyth which returne, the Dukes of Bedford and Burgoyn, were ſore diſpleaſed: for if he had continued his ſiege eyght dayes lenger, the towne had bene rendered, without dent of ſworde. For peſtilence and famine, had almoſt conſumed all the Souldiours, and left the towne without ſafegard or defence.

After this ſiege broken vp, John Duke of Norffolke tooke againe the townes of Dampmartyn, and the Chaſſe Mongay, & diuers other townes. And the Erle of Stafford tooke the towne of Bzie, in Countie Robert, and from thence, forraged all the Countrey to Sens, and after tooke Queſnoy in Bzie, Grand Puys, and Rampellon, with many priſoners, as ſir Jaques de Milly, and ſir John de la Hay. During which time the French men tooke Louiers, and Villuence. And then the towne of Melune rebelled, and had ſuche ayde of other townes adioyning, that the Engliſh Souldiours, were fayne to leaue Melune, Moret, and Corbell. Thus, according to the chaunce of warre, the one parte gat, and the other loſt. Thus the Engliſhe affayres (as you haue heard) within the realme beganne to waner, and ware variable, which cauſed the Engliſhe Capitaynes to be of diuers opinions. For one part being ſorie and penſiue, adiudged the things preſent, light and of no moment, in compariſon of them which they ſaw likely to folowe: and another ſort, adiudged that preſent time to be moſt ieoperdous, and perillous: Becauſe they ſawe the power of their enemies nowe increaſed, and their owne ſtrength rather decayed, then conſerued. And ſo euery man ſtudyeng on this buſineſſe, aduiſed ſecretly with himſelfe, what counſayle was beſt to be taken, and what way was beſt to be folowed, to remedie theſe things, thus waueryng in a doubtfull Ballance, did at the laſt conclude, that it was moſt apt and mete, for the time preſent, that king Henry in his royall perſon, with a new armie, ſhould come downe into Fraunce, partely to comfort and viſite his owne ſubiects there: partly eyther by feare or fauour (becauſe a childe of his age and beautie doth commonly allure to him, the hartes of the elder perſons) to cauſe the Frenchmen to continue in their due obeyſaunce towarde him. Wherefore after a great hoſt, conuenient for that purpoſe, aſſembled, and money for the maintenaunce of the warre, redy gathered, and the realme ſet in order, and the Duke of Glouceſter appoynted Gouernour (which during the kings abſence, appeaſed diuers riottes, and puniſhed many offenders) the king with a great power, tooke ſhypping at Douer, and landed at Calice, and there taried a good ſpace, and from thence, he remoued to Roan, where with all triumph, he was receyued, and there ſoiourned till the middeſt of Auguſt, hys nobles daylie

1431 10 In the Month of November, he remoued from Roan to Pontboise, and so to saint Denice, to the intent to make his entrie into the Citie of Paris, and there to be sacred king of Fraunce, and to receyue the Scepter and Crowne of the realme and Countrey.

The coronation of king Henry the first in Paris.

There were in his company of his owne Nation, his Uncle the Cardinall of Winchester, the Cardinall and Archebyshop of Yorke, the Dukes of Bedford, Yorke, and Norffolke, the Earles of Warwike, Salisburie, Orford, Huntyngdon, Ormonde, Mortayn, Suffolke, and of Gascoynes, the Erle of Longuile, and Marche, beside many noble men of Englande, Guyan & Normandy. And the chiefe of the French nation were the Dukes of Burgoyn, and Lewes of Lurenbrogh Cardinall and Chauncellour of Fraunce for king Henry, the Byshops of Beauoys and Neyon, both peeres of Fraunce, beside the Byshop of Paris, and dyuers other Byshops, the Erle of Waudemount, and other noble men, whose names were to tedyous to reherse. And he had in a garde about his person, three thousande strong archers, some on horseback, and parte on foote. And as he was comming, betweene Saint Denice and Paris, he was met at the Chapell, in the meane way, by Syr Simon Morner Prouost of Paris, with a great company, all clothed in redde Satin, with blewe Whoodes, which did to him due reuerence and lowe obeysaunce. After whome came dyuers riche and notable Burgesses of the towne of Paris, all appareled in Crimosyne cloth. After they had done their reuerence, there approched to the king the.ix. worthies, sytting richely on horseback, armed with the armes to them apperteyning. Next after them, came the knight of the watch, for the prouost Marchants, and with him, all the officers of the Courte, appareled in blew, and Yattes redde. And in a long space after, came Master Philip de Moruillier, chiefe president of the Parliament, appareled in a robe of estate: and all the other Presidentes of the Parliament, clothed in robes of Scarlet, and in lyke robes folowed the Lordes of the chamber of accomptes, and of the finaunce, the Masters of the requestes, the Secretaries, and Regesters, and euery company, as their course came, saluted the king with eloquent Orations and heroicall Uerses, and so conueyed him to the gate of Saint Denice, where the Prouost of the Marchauntes, and the Shriefes of the towne receyued him with a Canapy of blew Ueluet richely embraudred, with flower Delices of Golde, and bare the same ouer him, through the towne, which on euery side was hanged with riche clothes of Arras and Tapissery. And at euery porte and bridge where he passed, was set a Pageaunt of great shew and small cost, which because they were but trifles, I ouer passe, and speake but of one deuise, made before the gate of the Chastelet, where vpon a stage stoode a goodly childe, clothed with habite royall, set full of flower Delices, hauing two crownes on his head, representing the yong king, and on his right hande stoode two noble personages, in the armes of Burgoyne and Flaunders: and on the left side of him, stode three personages clothed in the armes of Bedford, Salisburie, and Warwike, which to him delyuered the swoorde of England. This Pageaunt was well regarded, and highly praysed. From thence he departed to the Palace, and offered in the Chapell, and from thence he departed to the house of Tournelles, and there tooke tooke his repaſt. And the next day he was conueyed to Boys de Vincennes, where he repoſed himſelfe till the fiftene day of December: on which daye, he returned to the Palace of Paris. And on the .xvij. of the ſayde Moneth, he departed from the Palace in great triumph, honorably accompanyed to our Lady church of Paris: where with all ſolempnitie he was annoynted and crowned king of Fraunce by the Cardinall of Wincheſter: (the Byſhop of Paris not being content that the Cardinall ſhould doe ſuch a high ceremonie in his Church and iuriſdiction.) At the offering he offered Bread and Wine, as the cuſtome of Fraunce is. When the diuine ſeruice was finiſhed, and all ceremonies due, to that high eſtate accompliſhed, the king departed towarde the Palaice, hauing one crowne on his head, and another borne before him, and one ſcepter in his hand, and the ſecond borne before him. What ſhould I ſpeake of the honorable ſeruice, the daintie diſhes, the pleaſaunt conceytes, the coſtly Wynes, the ſweete Armony, the Muſicall inſtrumentes, which were ſeene and ſhewed at that feaſt, ſithe all men may coniecture, that nothing was omitted, that might be bought for Golde, nor nothing was forgotten that by mans wyt could be inuented. Yet this high and ioyous feaſt, was not without a ſpot of diſpleaſure, for the Cardinall of Wincheſter which at this time, would haue no man to him egall, commaunded the Duke of Bedford, to leaue of the name of Regent, duryng the time that the king was in Fraunce: affirming the chiefe ruler being in preſence, the aucthoritie of the ſubſtitute was cleerely derogate: according to the common ſaying: in the preſence of the high power, the ſmall aucthoritie geueth place. The Duke of Bedford tooke ſuch a ſecret diſpleaſure with thys doing, that he neuer after fauored the Cardinall, but repugned and diſdayned at all things that he did or deuiſed. And ſo becauſe the Cardinall would haue no temporall Lorde eyther to him ſuperiour or with him egall, he ſet foorth this proude and arrogant concluſion, thorow which vnhappie diuiſion, the glorie of the Engliſhe men beganne firſt to decay, and bade away in Fraunce.

The nert day after this ſolemne feaſt, were kept triumphant Juſtes, and Turneys, in the which, the Erle of Arundell, and the Baſtard of Saint Poll, by the iudgement of the Ladies, wan the price, and gat the honor. When he had kept open houſe to all commers, by the ſpace of .xx. dayes, becauſe the ayre of Paris was ſomewhat contrariant to his pure complexion, he was aduiſed by his counſaile, to returne to Roan. But before his departure, he cauſed all the Nobilitie, the Preſidentz of the Parliament, the Prouoſtes of the Citie, and of the Marchantes, and the chiefe Burgeſſes of the Towne and Citie, and all the Doctors of the Vniuerſitie, to be aſſembled in his preſence: to whome the Duke of Bedford made a long and ſolempne Oracion, perſwadyng the Frenchmen to the loue and obedience of king Henry, whom he termed their naturall ſouereigne Lorde and Prince, diſcended from the Ladie Iſabell, daughter & ſole inheritrice to king Philip (the fayre) French king.

When the Duke had finiſhed and ended his Oracion, the people beyng glad, and reioyſyng at his ſaiynges, cryed: Viue le Roy: Liue king Henry, liue king Henry. After which crie paſſed, the Noble men, aſwell of Fraunce, as of Normandie, did to him homage, and the common people, ſware to him fealtie: to whome (although he were a childe) he gaue both pleaſaunt and good words, with harty thanks, to the great admiration of the french people.

After

After he had feasted the Nobles and Commons of Fraunce, within the Citie of Paris, he with a great companie, departed from thence, and by smal iourneyes came to Roan, where he kept with great solemnitie, the high feast of Christmasse. While these noble Ceremonies were thus in doyng, in the Citie of Paris, sundrie chaunces diuersly happened in seuerall places, to the displeasure of the one part, and to the gaine of the other. For Sir Fraunces Surrien Arragoys, a noble Captaine in Normandie, toke by force and pollecie, the towne of Mounterges, with a great pray of treasure and prisoners, and therein he put a garrison, and vitailed the towne, to the great displeasure of the French king. About the same season, the Erle of Arundell, beyng truely informed, that the Lord Bousac, Marshall of Fraunce, was come to Beauoys, intendyng to do some feate in Normandie, assembled the number of xviij. hundreth men, & layd himselfe priuely, in a close place, not farre from the sayd towne, and sent a great number of light horsemen, to ron to the barriers of the Citie. The Frenchmen, like valiant men of warre, issued out, & manfullfully fought with the Englishmen: which sodainly fled toward the stale. The Frenchemen couragiously folowed, thinkyng the game gotten on their syde: But when they were entered into the straight, the Erle set freshly on them, so that after long fightyng, there were slain and taken, in maner all the french men, saue a few which fled into the towne with the Marshall. Amongest the Captaynes was founde prisoner, the valiaunt Captaine, called Poynton of Sanctrayles, which (without delay) was exchaunged for the Lord Talbot, before taken prisoner, at the battaile of Patay. There was also taken one called the shepherd, a simple man, and a sely soule, whom the Frenchmen reputed, to be of such a holinesse, that if he touched the wall of a towne, of their enemies, that incontinent, it would fall to the ground, and ouerturne. Such false phantasticall fayners, were at that tyme muche regarded, and no lesse beleued in Fraunce.

Richard Beauchamp Erle of Warwike.

This chaunce succeded not fortunately alone: For Richard Beauchamp Erle of Warwike, had a great skirmish before the towne of Gournay, where he discomfited and repulsed his enemies, and besyde the carions which were left dead on the ground, he tooke prisoners, three score horsemen, all Gentlemen of name and armes. Like chaunce of infortune, happened at the same tyme, to Renate or Reyn. Duke of Barre, a great friend to Charles the French king, both in lendyng him money, and also in ministryng to him ayde and succors. This Duke beatyng displeasure to Anthonie Erle of Vaudemont his Cosyn and kinseman, gathered together a great army, and besieged the towne of Vaudemont. The Erle before the Dukes approchyng, to the entent that he would not be enclosed and compassed aboute by his enemies within a wall, leauyng behynde him a conuenient crew of men of warre, to defende the towne for a tyme, with all diligence rode to the Dukes of Bedford, and Burgoyne, beyng then at the great triumph at Paris, whose parte he had euer taken. After long consultation, it was agreed that Sir John Fastolfe should go with him, hauyng in his companie sixe hundreth Archers, and the Duke of Burgoyn sent to him his Marshall, called Sir Anthonie Doulongon, with. xb. hundreth men.

The Erle of Vaudemont thus beyng accompanied, marched towarde his enemies. Duke Reine heezyng of his comming toward him, was somewhat dismayed, fearyng least if his enemies should approche to the walles, and be espyed by the garryson within the towne, that at one tyme he should be assayled before, by them that would issue out of the towne, and behind, by the Erle and his armie. Wherefore like a hardie Captein, he brake vp his siege, and met face to face with the Erle and his companie: betwene whome, was a cruell and mortall battaile. The horsemen endured long, but in conclusion, the Englishe Archers so galled the horses, and so wounded the men, that the Barroys and their friendes were compelled to flie: In which chase was taken, the sayd Duke of Barre, the Bishop of Mies, the Lord of Rodemaque, Sir Euerard of Salebery, the Vicount Darcy, and two hundreth other, beside three thousand men, which were slaine. In this lucky tyme also, no lesse occasion of victorie, was offered to the Englishe men, beyng in another part, if when the pigge had bene profered, they had opened the poke: For Robert Lord Willoughby, and Mathew Gough, a valiaunt Welsheman, with. rb. hundreth Englishemen, layd siege to a towne in Iniow, beyng both by situation and pollecie, very strong and defensible, called Saint Seueryne. The Englishemen assayled it not so couragiously, but they within, with egall audacitie, boldely made defence: so that fortune semed, to way both the parties in egall ballaunce. Charles the French king, beyng thereof aduertised, sent with all speede the Lorde Ambrose de Lore, with many noble and valiaunt personages, to ayde and relieue his friendes, inclosed in the towne by his enimies. This Lorde de Lore, beyng Capteyne of the towne, made much hast to comfort his Deputie and Capteine within the same, and so marched forward with great speede: but fearyng to be sodeinly compassed about, he taryed still at Beaumont, lookyng for the armie and Capteynes that should folowe, and then altogether to set on their enemies, and so to rayse the siege. While he made there his abode, and tooke his leasure, the Englishemen, by their espials were assertayned and aduertised, what progresse their enemies made, and what they intended. Wherefore they politikely prouided, to fight with the one part, before the whole puyssaunce were ioyned. And so a great part of them departed secretly in the night, toward their enemies, and found the watche so out of order, and oversene, that a thousand men were entered into the campe before they were espyed. But the sleayng of men, and cuttyng downe of Tentes, awaked the Captaynes, whome this sodeine feare, and vnlooked chaunce so greatly abashed, that no man in maner, eyther could here his felowe or himselfe, or could make signe to expulse or driue out their enemies out of their campe. But when the day begame to appere that all thing might be seene and perceyued, the Englishemen geuen to couetousnesse of spoyle, and desyre of rauine, neither chased, nor folowed their enemies, but beyng content with their pray and gaine, began to retreat towarde the siege againe. But see the chaunce: the French men which were cõmyng after, and heard by the noyse of the people, that some fray was then in hand, put the Spurres to the horse, and set on their enemies, beyng laden with bagges and wallettes, of prayes and spoyles. The other part which before fled, returned againe, and assayled their enemies. The Frenchmen egerly assayled, and the Englishemen manfully defended, which beyng out of order, were compelled to flie, of whome Mathew Gough and diuerse other were taken prisoners, and yet of the other part many were slaine, and a great number taken, a-mongest whom, was the Lorde of Loze, which foz all the battaile, was kept and not deliuered.

The Lozd Willoughby, heeryng of this chaunce, rayſed the ſiege and departed, very ſoze diſpleaſed. Therefoze let euery Captain take good heede of victozie, the which as ſhe is harde to obtein, ſo ſhe is quicke to flie away: foz it is daply ſene, that he which thinketh ſurely, that he hath her in his handes, befoze he can catche her, is decepued, and ronneth into a great loſſe and daũger: and on the other ſide, when ſhe is gotten, (except good watch be hourely kept) ſhe will ſteale away, with much hurt and detrument, to the firſt gayner. Thus the Engliſhemen, foz the greedie appetite of gayne, loſt the tryumphant victozie, which they had in their handes. While the Engliſhe and French nacion thus ſtroue and contended foz preeminence principally, yea, and foz ꝑ ſuperioz power of life, by the vnreaſonable rage of warre in Fraunce, the riche men were ſpoyled of their goodes, the ſpirituall perſons were tared and brought lowe, the common people were ſlaine, murdzed and troden vnder the foote, women were defyled, virgines were rauiſhed, townes were deſtroyed and waſted, towne dwellers and Citizens were robbed and exiled, bewtifull buyldyngs, were cruelly brent, and nothyng was ſpared, which by fire, blood, oz famine, might be catched oz deſtroyed, beſyde a hundzeth moze calamities, that daply vexed and troubled the miſerable French nacion.

Although Fraunce were at this tyme thus miſerably afflicted: yet England was not without ſome trouble: foz daply Engliſhemen, as well noble as meane perſonages, were ſlaine, taken, wounded, oz hurt, their ſubſtaunce were continually exacted, and conſumed foz maintenaunce of the warres, ſo that miſchiefe and calamitie was indifferent to both the nacions, and quietneſſe and gaine, were expulſed and baniſhed from them both: in ſo much that the lamentacion and doloz of both the Countries, were heard thzough the whole weſt part of the wozlde, and of their continuall diſſencion, all Europe and Affrik, had their eares and mouthes full, ſo that all men, not onely marueyled, that Fraunce could ſo much trouble ſo long tyme ſuſtaine, but moze wondered that the realme of Englande, beyng but an Iſle, was able ſo to ſcourge, plague, and trouble the large Frenche region, foz which cauſe Eugenie the fourth beyng Biſhop of Rome, intendyng to bzyng this cruell war to a friendly peace, ſent his Legate, called Nicolas, Cardinall of the holye Croſſe, into Fraunce, to the entent to make an amitie, and a concozd betweene the two pzinces, and their realmes. This wiſe Cardinall, came firſt to the French king, and after to the Duke of Bedfozd beyng at Parys: exhoztyng concozde, and perſwadyng vnitie, ſhewyng, declaryng, and arguyng peace to be moſt honourable, and moze pzofitable to Chziſtian Pzinces, then moztall warre, oz vncharitable diſſencion.

When the Legate had thus perſwaded the Pzinces on euery part, they both gently aunſwered, that they were content to come to a reaſonable ende. But when the firſt communication was moued, and by Commiſſioners treated, their doynges were ſo farre diſagreeable from their wozdes, that not onely reaſonable and honeſt condicions of peace, could be neyther heard noz accepted, but moze frowardneſſe, pertinacye, and malice, was kindled and ſpzong vp in their ſtomacks, then befoze that tyme had bene ſeene. The Cardinal being in vtter diſpayze, of concludyng a peace betwene the two realmes (least he should seme to depart empty of al things, for ꝑ which he had taken so much trauaile) desyred a truce for sixe yeres to come, which request, as it was to him by both parties hardly graunted, so was it of the frenche men sone and lightly broken after his returne: For the Bastard of Orleaunce, newly made Erle of Dunoys, tooke by treason the towne of Charters from the Englishe men: affirming by the lawe of armes, that stealing or byeng a towne, without inuasion or assault, was no breach of league, amity or truce. In the which towne, he slue the bishop, because he was a Burgonion, through which occasion, new malice encreased, and mortall warre began againe to rise and spring.

A truce taken wyth Fraunce for sixe yeres.

While these thinges were thus doyng in Fraunce: There chaunced in Englande by certeine light persons (who as some write bare no good will to priestes) dwellyng in Abyngton, that a tumult and an assembly was made, to the disquietnesse of the realme, but by wisedome of the protector, the same was sone pacified, and the chiefe Auethour thereof, whose name was William Maundeuile, alias John Sharpe, being apprehended, was put to execution, and so were sundrie other. After these thinges thus quieted, the Cardinal began to common with the Duke of Glouceſter, cõcernyng the affayres and busines of Fraunce: But the Duke of Glouceſter, suspectyng that the truce would not long continue betwene both the realmes, (as it did not in deede) deuised how to send more ayde, and men to the Duke of Bedford, and gathered by more money and treasure, for the further maintenaunce of the warres, and resistence of their enemies. Wherevpon the Duke of Glouceſter called a Parliament, in the which money was assigned, and men were appoynted. During which Parliament, James the king of Scottes sent Ambassadors, to conclude a peace with the Duke of Glouceſter, which (because the king was absent) referred the matter to the thre estates. After long consultacion, not without great argumentes, a peace was graunted and cõcluded, which all men iudged should long continue, because king James was then vexed with ciuile warre, and intestine dissencion, and also the Frenche men had taken truce, as you haue heard for sixe yeres.

A peace concluded with the Scottes.

When this Parliament was finished, the Cardinall well garnished with men & money, departed out of England, & came to Roan to the king, to whom also resorted from Paris, John Duke of Bedford, to debate and consulte of things, not vnlikely to happen and chaunce. Wherfore a great counsaile was celebrate wtin the Castell of Roan, & many doubts were moued and disputed.

After this disputacion, with many argumentes ended, the Dukes of Bedford and Yorke, and Edmond late Erle of Mortain, and nowe by the death of John Duke of Somerset, (which died without heire male, leauyng behinde him, a sole daughter called Margaret, after Countesse of Richmõd) erected to the name and tytle, of Duke of Sommerset, liked and approued, the first argument, and first moued reason: affirmyng best, that warre must be prouided for, and that money ought to be disbursed, and to auoyde all doubtes, that a greater armie, was necessary to be gathered together and assembled. When all things were agreed, king Henry departed to Calice, and from thence to Douer, and so by easye iourneys he came the .xxj. day of Febrary, to the Citie of London, where he was receyued, not only with great pompe and triumph, but also highly presented with giftes and money, as in the Chronicle of Robert Fabian, you may rede at large, which I ouerpasse.

King Henry the sixt returneth out of Fraunce into Englãd.

After that the king was departed into England, the Duke of Bedford, Regent of Fraunce, and Captaine of Calice, taryed behinde in the Marches of Picardie: where he was informed, that certein ſouldiours of Calice, grudgyng at the reſtraint of woolles, began to mutter and murmure agaynſt the king and his counſaile, ſo that the towne of Calice was like to ſtand in ieopardie. Wherefore the Duke foreſeyng the miſchiefe that might inſue, and thinkyng it wiſedome to withſtand the firſt mocion, cauſed the Chieftaynes of this faction to be apprehended, & after due examinacion had, diuers were put to death, and many baniſhed and exiled the Marches for euer. After that he had purged the towne of that vngracious and ſeditious companie, and had furniſhed it with new Souldiours and diſcrete men of warre, he was determined, firſt to repayre againe to Paris, but his heart would not ſerue him: for ſith his departure, Ladie Anne his wife and Duchies, was departed to God, and honorably enterred in the Celeſtins at Paris: by whoſe death, and for other cauſes, (as partly you haue heard) the ſure loue, and approued fidelitie, betwene the Duke of Burgoyn, his brother in lawe and him began to wax faint and colde. For which cauſe, he beyng perſwaded by the Lorde Lewes of Lurenborough, Biſhop of Tyrwine and Ely, and Chauncelor of Fraunce for king Henry, agreed to mary the Lady Jaquet, daughter to Peter Erle of Saint Paule, and neece to the ſayd Biſhop, and to Lorde John of Lurenborough, to the intent that by this newe affinity the olde acquaintaunce and familiaritie, which he had with the Noble family of Lurenborough ſhoulde be renued and inforced, and with a more ſure knot, knit and confirmed. Wherevpon, he departed from Calice to Tirwyne, where he was highly receyued of the Erle of Saint Paule, and his brethren, and there he maryed the fayre and freſhe Ladie Jaquet, of the age of. xvij. yeres, with all triumph and nuptiall ſolempnitie. After which ceremonie ended, he returned with his new ſpouſe to Calice, and ſo into England, where he with his wife remayned vntill Auguſt next, and then returned againe to Paris. The Duke of Burgoyn, (whoſe mynde began to incline, a little and little, toward king Charles) was ſore grieued and angrie, that the Duke of Bedford was ioyned in affinitie with the noble and famous houſe of Lurenborough: by the which he ſawe, that the power of the Engliſhemen ſhould be greatly aduanced. But the mariage was fully ended, and he could find no remedy.

While theſe things were doing thus, in other places, the French ſouldiours lacking wages (and amongſt them a great number, which in hope of pray, and deſire of ſpoyle, had caſt vp the Plough, and left their labour) beganne priuely (as time ſerued, and occaſion gaue place) to take both Engliſh men and Burgonions, and raunſomed and ſpoyled them at their pleaſures. And although they were prohibited thus to doe (during the time of truce and peace) yet in concluſion they ſpared not openly to rob, ſpoyle and burne: yea and to ſteale townes, which they affirmed to be no breache of truce. The Engliſhe pricked and bered with theſe open wrongs and manifeſt iniuries, prepared for warre, after the ſixt Moneth that the truce was taken and concluded. And by this meanes, the warre was renewed and begonne agayne. The vntrue French men breakers of peace, and not keepers of of truce, reyſed a crewe of men, and ſodainely tooke the towne of ſaint Valerie, ſtanding in Normandy on the Riuer of Some: and another army vnder the conduyt of Sir Ambroſe, Lorde of Loze, waſted and deſtroyed all the Countrie about Caen. The Duke of Bedford not minding to lye ſtill in ydelneſſe, ſent the Erle of Arundell, the Erle of Warwicks ſonne, the Lord Liſle, Adame Marchall of Fraunce for king Henry, and twelue hundred men with ordinaunce and munitions, to beſiege the towne of Laigny, vpon the riuer of Marne. Which Erle, with the ſhot of a Canon, brake the Arche of the bridge, and gat from the French men their Bulwarke, and ſet it on fire. Dyuers aſſaults were attempted, but the towne was well defended: for wythin were ſhut vp eyght hundred men of armes, beſide other meane Souldyours.

The Duke of Bedford being thereof aduertiſed, gathered an armie of fiue thouſand men of warre, and hauing all things neceſſary, he came to the ſiege before Laigny. He there made a bridge of Boates, and brought his ordinaunce ſo neere the towne, that to all people, it ſeemed not long able to reſiſt. But the Erle of Dumoys Baſtard of Orleaunce, with dyuers hardie Capitaines, as valyauntly repulſed, as the Engliſhe men aſſauted. Thys ſiege continued, as fyre agaynſt flame, and ſometime flame againſt fyre. For although the Engliſh men ſlue the more number, yet they gat neyther pray, nor botie: and although the French men kept valyauntly the walles, and defended the loupes, yet they both loſt men and Capitaynes, and were long ſecluded from their ayde and ſuccors, till Charles the Frenche king perceyuing this towne, to be the three corner key betweene the territories of the Engliſh men, the Burgonians, and his awne, and that the loſſe thereof, ſhould turne him to innumerable dammages and hurtes, ſent the Lorde of Rieu, Poyton the Heire, the Lorde Gancort, and fiue thouſand men wyth great plentie of vittayles, to the intent eyther to rayſe the ſiege, or to vittayle the towne. The French Capitaynes made a bragge, as though they would fight with the Engliſh men within their field and Campe. The Engliſh men would not iſſue out, but kept themſelues in good order, euer loking for their entrie and inuaſion. The Regent perceyuing, that they approched not, ſent to them an Herault of armes, declaring his intent, and the courage of hys company, which nothing more deſired then battayle. And to ſhewe himſelfe as a Capitaine, meaning that which he offered, and not diſſimuling that which he ſpake: he incontinent diuided his men into three battayles, no more wiſely ordered, then politiquely gouerned: as who would ſaye, come on French man, if thy hart wyll ſerue. But hys aduerſaies more craftie then hardy, more politique then courageous, framed themſelues in ſuche order of battayle, as they were able to doe all thing, and yet in concluſion (concerning martiall feates) they did nothing. For while they made a proud bragge, and a ſtoute ſkirmiſh with the Engliſh men, they appointed dyuers rude and ruſticall perſons, to conuay into the towne .xxx. Oxen, and other ſmall vytayle, but thys ſwete gayne was ſowrely payde, for if the loſſe with the gaine be pondered in one balaunce, for hauing regarde to .xxx. leane Oxen, in the conflict were ſlayne, the Lorde Ventrayles brother to Pothon, the valyant Capitayne John, brother to the Lorde Gawcort, and fiftie other noble and valyaunt perſonages, beſide other common people, which bought that bargaine, gaine, aboue the price of the common Market. The French men perceyuing their infortunate chaunce, and not onely conſidering, the vnſpeakable heate which then wearied their people, being in the beginning, of the hote month of Auguſt: but alſo perceyuing the Engliſhe men to be planted and ſetled, in a place vnable to be wonne, and in a grounde both daungerous to inuade, and hard to aſſayle, like men deſperate of gayne, and without hope of victorie, departed to Fort vnder Yerre, where by a bridge of Tonnes, they paſſed into the Iſle of Fraunce.

The Duke of Bedford (like a wiſe prince) not minding to leaſe the more for the leſſe, nor the accident for the ſubſtaunce, fearing that Paris and other townes more neceſſarie to the Engliſhe men, and of more eſtimation would returne to his aduerſaries, thinking if the greater power were holden, the leſſe ſhould be ſone obtayned, reyſed his ſiege and returned to Parys, nothyng leſſe minding then to try hys quarrell wyth dent of ſworde agaynſt his enemies: and ſo ſent Bedford his herault to the Lorde Gawcort, and other Chiefetaynes of his army, offering him battayle, and a pitched field, within a conuenient grounde, where ſo euer he would, within the Iſle of Fraunce, aſſigne or appoynt. To the which officer of Armes, the Capitaynes anſwered, that battayle they feared not, nor the Engliſhe puyſſaunce, they not much regarded, but they ſayde: that time was to gayne, and time was to loſe, of the which two, they doubted not to eſpie the one, either for their great gaine, or to their apparaunt loſſe. Wherevpon they ſent the Lorde Ambroſe de Loze with. vij.C. horſemen to rob and ſpoyle the poore people, comming to the fayre, on the day of Saint Michaell the Archangell, kept in the ſuburbes of the towne of Caen. But when Dauy Hall Eſquire, Capitayne of the towne for the Duke of Yorke, iſſued out to fight with him, he departed by flight, without eyther botie or gayne of the fayre. The Frenchmen perceyuing, that neyther power, force, nor pollicie could auayle againſt the Engliſhe nation, determined to trip and deceyue them, by their accuſtomed ſeruaunt called Mayſter Treaſon, and ſo by money corrupted Piers Audebeuffe, Conſtable of the Caſtell of Roan, that the Marſhall of Fraunce, and the Lorde Fountaynes, with two hundred perſons diſguiſed, entered into the Caſtel, but they were ſone eſpied, and driuen to the Dongeon, where they were taken and yelded: whereof ſome were hanged, ſome headed, and ſome raunſomed at the pleaſure of the Regent: and ſuch ende had the Traytors, which would by treaſon rather then by battayle, obtayne their praye and deſired purpoſe.

Treaſon.

Thys Pageaunt played, the Regent ſent Peter of Lurenborough Erle of Saint Paule, and Robert Lorde Willoughby, with a competent crewe of men to beſiege the towne of Saint Valerie, which the French men a little before had taken. Theſe valyaunt Cappitaines not minding to ſlepe their buſineſſe, enuironned the towne with a ſtrong ſiege. Within the towne were Sir Lewes de Vancort, ſyr Philip de la Toure, and ſyr Reignold de Verſeilles Capitaynes, with three hundred good fighting men, which by the ſpace of three weekes, manfully defended the ſame. But at the.xvj.day, they perceyuing the fiercenes of the Engliſh men, and the weakeneſſe of themſelues (hauing no hope of reliefe, nor confidence in any ayde) rendered the towne, their horſe and harneis onely ſaued. The Erle put in the garriſon of the the towne freſhe and valyaunt Souldiours, and appointed Capitaine there, Sir Iohn Awbemonde: in the which towne ſodainely, whether it were by infection of the ayre, or by corrupt vittayle by long lyeng, which the townes men did eate, a great peſtilence ſprang in the infortunate Countrey. Which after ſo many calamities and euill chaunces, being two times beſieged by the French men, and thrise recouered by the Engliſh Nation, was now inferted and corrupted with the peſtilent plague: whereby two partes of the people, within ſhort ſpace were deſtroyed and conſumed. A great peſtilence.

After this towne gotten, the Erle of ſaint Paule, and the Lorde Willoughby returned to the Regent, where they were wel welcomed. And after, the ſaide Erle departed from Paris, to lay ſiege to the Caſtell of Monchas, but being encamped nere to the towne of Blangy, he by a ſodaine Maladie, finiſhed his dayes, and departed the worlde, leauing hys ſeigniories to Lewes his ſonne and heire. For which dead Erle were ſolempne obſequies kept, both in Paris and in London, becauſe he was father in lawe to the Regent. In the meane ſeaſon, the French men entered into the coſtes of high Burgoyne, and brent, tooke and deſtroyed townes: for which cauſe, the Burgonions beyng ſore diſpleaſed, aſſembled a great armie, both to reuenge their quarels, and alſo to recouer agayne the townes, from them vniuſtly taken: to whom, as to his friends the Duke of Bedford ſent Robert Lorde Willoughby, and Syr Thomas Kiriell, with a conuenient company of Souldiours, which entering into the laundes of Laonoys, were encountered with a great number of their enemies: Notwithſtanding, after long fyght, the French men were ſlayne and diſperſed: wherof were left dead in the field, an hundred and ſixtie horſmen, beſide priſoners, which after in a furie, were all killed and put to death. The death of the Erle of ſaint Paule.

Whyle theſe chaunces thus happened in Fraunce, Iohn Lord Talbot gathered together a crewe of choſen men of warre in England to the number of eyght hundred, and ſayled into Normandie, and paſſed by Roan towarde Paris, and in his way he toke the ſtrong Caſtell of Ioinge, betwene Beauoys, and Giſors, and cauſed all the French men within, to be hanged on the walles, and after raſed and defaced the Caſtell, & came to the Duke of Bedford to Paris. The preſence of which renowmed Capitayne (a marueilous thing it is to ſee) ſo encouraged the hartes of the Engliſh nation, that they thought nothing able to reſiſt their puyſſaunce, and ſo diſcouraged the hartes of the French men, that they were in doubt, whether it were better to fight or to flie. And thys was not without a cauſe: for ſurely he was a choſen Capitaine, and in martiall feates a man fully inſtructed, and hys courage and practiſe in warre, was fearefull to the French nation, and to his awne Countrymen an eſpeciall hope, and a ſure defence. When this hardye Baron, had commoned with the Regent, & agreed what ware he ſhould take, without long delay or prolonging of tyme, he departed from Paris with hys armie, and beſieged the Caſtell of Beaumont vpon Oiſe, whereof was Capitayne, Syr Amadour de Vignolles brother to the Heire. Which Caſtell was ſone rendered vpon condition. After that he regayned without long ſiege, the townes of Creile, the bridge of Saint Marens, the newe towne in Eſmoy, Creſpi in Valloys, and Cleremount in Beauoys: and ſo with great riches and fatte priſoners, he returned agayne to Paris. Thus prosperous successe happened not to the Lorde Talbot alone: but also the very same season, the Erle of Arundell tooke the Castell of Bomeline, and rased it to the grounde, and after tooke by force the Castell of Dozle, and from thence came to Saint Seleryne, where the Lorde Ambrose of Loze was Capitayne, which issued out and fought with the English men so egerly at the first, that he droue them back an arrow shot by fine force. But the Erle so incouraged his men, that they tooke newe courages to them, and set so fiercely on the French men, that they slue a great number, and droue the remnaunt into the towne.

After this victozie he besieged Louiers, whereof was Capitayne, the Heire and his brother, which rendered the towne, without stroke oz assaut. Foz all this good luck, the Erle forgat not to returne, to the towne of Saint Seleryne, but assembled a great armie, and enuironed the Towne about with a strong siege. When he had lien there almost three moneths, euery day attempting oz doing somewhat, foz the perfozmaunce of his enterprise, in conclusion at the three Moneths ende, he gaue so fierce an assault, that by force he entered the towne, and slue John Allemagne and Guillam sent Aubyne, the chiefe Capitaynes, and eyght hundzed other men of warre, and the children of the Lorde Loze were taken captiues: he replenished and fozteried the towne againe with newe men, and munitions, and made there Capitayne Sir John Cornewall. Which act thus accomplished, he departed, and came before the strong towne of Silly, and there pitched hys Campe. The inhabitaunts of the same, somewhat dismaied with the chaunce, that late happened to the towne of Saint Seleryne, delyuered to him pledges, vpon this condition: that if they were not rescued within thirtie dayes next insuyng, then they (their lyues saued) should render the towne into his possession: which offer was taken. The Capitaynes within the towne sent a Poste to the French king, to aduertise him of their hard chaunce, which incontinent sent to them Arthur Erle of Richmond (but after some wzyters, John Duke of Alaunson) with a great company of men. When the Erle sawe the French succours appere, he restozed agayne the pleges to the Gouernours of the towne, and issued out of his campe, taking a place most mete and conuenient foz to abide battayle, foz which he soze thirsted and longed. The Duke oz the Erle (take which you list) lyeng by a brooke side, which a man might stride ouer, seyng the Englishe men so warlike and strongly embattayled, thought it not foz his profite to geue battayle, oz to set fozwarde: but in the dead time of the night cowardly fled, and with shame returned: although some French wzyters affirme, that he looked that the Erle of Arundell should haue giuen him battaile, and because he profered not fozward, therefoze the French men departed. This appereth to be an apparaunt lye, and a French bragge: foz if they came to rescue the towne, why did not they geue battayle, and so dziue away the English men from the towne? If they came to fight, why departed they without any stroke striken? But it seemeth that they came, to make a French face, and foz to doe nothing. Foz they without skirmishe oz succouring the towne, departed in the night secretly (as you haue heard.) When they within the towne knew that their succours fayled, they rendered themselues to the mercy of the Erle of Arundell, which gently receiued them, and leauing a garrison in the towne, departed to Maums, and in the meane way, tooke the Caſtels of Mellay and ſaint Laurence. About this time the Lord Willoughby, and Syr Thomas Kiriell, returning with great victories out of the parties of Burgoyne, toke in their waye, the towne of Louiers, and furniſhed it, both with men and munitions.

Amongeſt ſo many good chaunces, ſome euill are accuſtomed to fall, and happen, or elſe the gayners will not know themſelues. So it happened, that a great number of rude and ruſticall perſons in Normandie, dwellyng by the ſea coaſt, eyther prouoked or intiſed therevnto by the French king, or deſyrous of alteracion and chaunge (which thing the common people muche couet and deſyre) made an inſurrection, and put on harneſſe, and by force expulſed certein garriſons out of their holdes, and tooke certeine townes: publiſhyng and proclaimyng openly, that their onely purpoſe and intent was, to expell and baniſhe the whole Engliſhe Nacion, out of their Countries and coaſtes. Wherefore it may euidently appere, that the blacke Ethiopian * or the blacke coloured Rauen, will ſoner turne their colours, then the vniuerſall people bred in Fraunce, will hartily loue, and inwardly fauor an Engliſhe borne childe. And yet the Normans of long tyme, louingly and gently, haue obeyed to the ſubiection of England, and haue of the Engliſhe Nacion bene well accepted and regarded, but now they forgetting their dutie, and remembryng theyr hurtes, did not feare to rebell agaynſt theyr Prince and ſouereigne Lorde.

An inſurrection in Normandie.

* that is a man of Inde, commonly called a blacke Moryan.

This miſchieuous companie, thus frantikely gathered together, with al ſpeede marched towarde Cane, to the intent there, both to aſſemble a greater number of people, & alſo to conſult what way they ſhould folow in their new begon attemptate. But the Dukes of Yorke and Sommerſet, which then were lyng in Normandy, heryng of this vngracious faction, and troubleous commocion, and hauyng knowlege by theyr eſpyals what iourney they intended to take: incontinent without delay, ſent the Erle of Arundell, and the Lord Willoughby, with .vj. thouſand Archers, and .viij. hundreth light horſes to ſtay and kepe them, eyther for ſettyng foorth, or makyng further progreſſe, The Erle of Arundell goyng one way, appoynted the Lorde Willoughby, with two thouſand Archers, and a certaine number of horſemen, to go before him, to lie in watche and ſtale, ſecretly by the way, to ſtoppe the iourney and paſſage of the rebelles, when they ſhould approche. The Lorde Willoughby, couertly couered himſelfe and his companie, ſendyng worde to the Erle, of the place where he laye, to the entent that he might make a ſigne and token (when tyme ſhould be moſt luckey and fortunate) to inuade and ſet on their enemies. Which thing done, the Erle folowed at the backe, the ragged route, and miſchieuous multitude, as a man, that draue the Deere before him into the Buckſtalle, or the ſely Conies into the ſecrete Hay. When the ignorant multitude approched nere to the place of the ſtale, the Erle made a token, and ſhot a Goon for a ſigne. Then the Lorde Willoughby, ſet on them before, and the Erle behinde, ſhotyng ſo fiercely, that the daſtard people partly amaſed with the ſodaine chaunce, and partly galled and wounded with the ſhot of the arrowes, threwe away their harneſſe, deſiryng nothyng but death. The Erle of Arondell (moued with compaſſion) cauſed his ſouldiors to leaue of and ſtay, from farther murther or bloodſheddyng, and apprehendyng ſuch as he thought to be leaders, and chiefe ſtirrers of the people, let

the other returne home frankely and freely: but yet there were a. M. and more ſlain, before the ſouldiors could be brought again vnder their ſtādards.

After this commocion appeaſed, and the ſodeine rage in the beginnyng ſtayed and brideled, diligent inquirie was made of the malefactors, and ſuch as were found gilty, by diuers terrible executions (accordyng to their deſerts) miſerably ended their trapterous liues. Duryng which rebellion, Peter Rokefort and his companie, gat by treaſon the towne of Depe, and dyuers other holdes, thereunto adioinyng. After the Erle of Arondell, had obteyned ſo many Conqueſtes, and notable victories (as you haue heard) he attempted another, which was the laſt worke and extreme labor of his liuyng dayes. For the Duke of Bedford, beyng informed, that his aduerſaries, had ſodainly ſurpriſed and taken the towne of Rue, and therein had put a garriſon, which ſore vexed the Countries of Ponthiew, Arthoys, and Bolenoys, ſent worde to the Erle, that he without delay, ſhould beſiege the ſayd towne. The Erle obeyed to his commaundement, and incontinent, ſent for all the people vnder his gouernaunce, and in his marchyng forwarde, came to Gouerney, where he heard tell, how that there was a certain Caſtle, nere Beauoys, called Gerborye, which eyther by force of raſyng, or violence of weather, was ſore decayed and defaced. And becauſe this place was oppoꝛtune and very neceſſary, to prohibite, let and ſtop the Engliſhe men, to make ſodein runnynges in, or rodes into the Countrie of Beauoys: Charles the French king commaunded Sir Stephen de Veignolles, commonly called the Heire, to ſee the Caſtell reedefied and fortified. The ſayd ſir Stephen with a great companie, came to the ground, and lackyng neyther ſtuffe neceſſary, nor artificers ſufficient, in ſmall tyme erected the Caſtell, and began to defende the fortreſſe. The Erle of Arundell, beyng credibly informed of their doyngs, and perceiuyng that this newe edification was verye preiudiciall to the Engliſhe part, determined firſt to take the Caſtell, ſuppoſyng to finde there little or no reſiſtence, but he was deceyued, for there was the Heire, wyth many good and valeaunt Captaines. The Erle with fiue hundreth horſemen, encamped himſelfe in a little cloſe, not farre from the Caſtell: the frenche men which were three thouſand men, perceiuyng that the Erle and his horſes were wery, and that his archers were not yet come, determined for their aduauntage to ſet on him, before the commyng of his footemen, which they knewe to be little more, then a myle behind the Erle. Wherefore for a pollecie, they ſet forth fiftie horſemen, as though there were no mo in the Caſtel. The Erle perceiuyng that, ſent forth Sir Randolfe Standiſhe, to encounter with them, hauyng in his companie a hundreth horſes: the Frenchemen fought courageouſly a while, and ſodainly came out all the remnaunt, and ſlue Sir Randolfe Standiſhe, and all his companie, and boldely ſet on the Erle and his bande, which manfully defended them, ſo that the Frenchemen gat little aduauntage, for all their great number. The Heire perceiuyng the courage and defence of the Engliſh people, cauſed three Culuerines to be ſhot amongeſt them, whereof, one ſtrake the Erle on the Ancle, and ſo brake his legge, that for paine he fell from his horſe, then the French men entered amongeſt the Engliſhe armie, and tooke the Erle beyng on the ground, priſoner, and Sir Richard Wooduile, and fiue ſcore more, and there were ſlain almoſt two hundreth. The remnaunt ſaued themſelues as well as they might.

The

The Erle was caryed to Beauoys, where, of this hurt he shortly dyed, and was buried in the Friers Minors. He was a man of a singuler vertue, constancie, and grauitie, whose death in so troubleous a world did sore appall the heartes of his nacion. By this infortune, Rue was not besieged, nor Gerborie taken, such is the chaunce of warre. The death of the Erle of Arundell.

About the Moneth of June, John Duke of Burbon, and Auerne, taken prisoner at the battaile of Agyncourt, xviij. yeres past, (as you before haue heard) nowe paying his raunsome, which was. xviij. thousand pound sterlyng, and hauyng redy prepared all thinges necessary, for his triumphaunt returne into his countrie, was taken with a most sore and grieuous Feuer, whereof shortly he dyed, in the Citie of London, on the day appoynted for his departure into Fraunce: whose corps was enterred in the Gray Friers of the sayd Citie: So by this, euery creature may see: that man purposeth, and God disposeth. The death of John Duke of Burbon.

I may not forget a chaunce which happened this yere, to the example of Princes, and a spectacle for gouernors. For the deuill himselfe, to set further diuision betweene the Englishe and French Nacion, did apparell certeine Clawpoules & Parasites, commonly called Titiuils, and tale tellers, to sow discorde and discencion, betwene the Dukes of Bedford, and Burgoyne, not fayning trifles nor phantasies, but thinges of reproche, repugnaunt to both their honours, estates, and dignities, with the which, eche of them was as well pricked, as hastely spurred, so that all loue, betwene them ceased, all affinitie was forgotten, and all olde familiaritie was cast by disdaine, into the caue of oblition. Such a pestilent breath hath Flattery, and such mischiefe ensueth of Princes light credence. This grudge was perceyued, by their mutuall friendes, which by charitable exhortacion and Godly aduertisement, exhorted them to renue their olde loue and familiaritie, and to mete and entreuien, in some place decent and conuenient. The Duke of Bedford gladly condiscended to come to saint Omers, beyng the Duke of Burgoyns towne, and thither accordyng to his appoyntment, he in honourable estate came and resorted, and likewise did the Duke of Burgoyne. The Duke of Bedford, beyng Regent of Fraunce, and sonne, brother, and vncle to kinges, thought that the Duke of Burgoyn, should first haue visited and saluted hym: Duke Philip on the other part, beyng Lorde and soueraigne of the towne, iudged it not mete, nor to stand with his honour, to go to him, where he was lodged, but was content by intreatie of friendes, to mete him in a place indifferent, betwene both their harberowes: which offer was not accepted, & so both parties departed discontent, and neuer after saw or commoned with other. What should I speake of the courage of these two prowde princes, the Duke of Bedford mindyng to haue no peere, and the Duke of Burgoyne willyng to haue no superior, by whose prowde disdaine, and enuious discorde, shortly England lost, and Burgoyne gayned not long, as you shall perceyue in thys Historie folowyng. The falling out or breche of friendship betwene the Duke of Bedford and the Duke of Burgoyne.

The Bastard of Orleaunce, called the Erle of Dumoys, the Lorde Rochford Marshall of Fraunce, with other, in the begynnyng of this. xiij. yere, tooke the towne of Saint Denise by treason, and skirmished with them of Paris, and leauyng behinde him a great garrison, toke the towne of Pondone, and the bridge of Saint Marence by composition, and at that time 1434 was was taken the towne of Mount Meulan, by ſodeyn ſcalyng of two fiſhermen: which entered vp at a common priuie, ſtandyng on the wall. Thus townes vnwalled, were praies to rauenous men of warre, ſo that the poore inhabitantes within them (not beyng able to keepe their fidelitie or allegeaunce, when ſhield and defence lacked) were conſtrayned and compelled to yelde and render themſelues to the more power, and vpper hande: leaſt they being nedy and innocent people, ſhould be vexed and tormented, with the vnreaſonable men of warre: So that in all Chriſtendom, no region was more vnquiet, more vexed, more poore, nor more to be pitied, then the Countrie of Fraunce. And although the rude and poore people, ſuffered many plagues and aduerſities: yet the Souldiours proſpered not in all thinges. For although pray and ſpoyle ſometyme refreſhed their mindes, and did comfort their ſtomackes, yet at another tyme they were ſlaine, taken and kicked vp, or they were ware. For euery Prince ſtudied, and circumſpectly compaſſed, how to kepe defend & releue, the Cities and townes, of their ſeuerall faction, and priuate fidelitie. Wherefore when ſacietie of ſlaughters, and aboundance of murthers, had repleniſhed the ſtomackes of both the Nacions, and that both in generall had perceyued their hurtes, pondered their loſſes, and conſidered their ruynes, and dayly afflictions: although their ſtomackes were haute, and their hearts ſtonie, yet they waxed ſoft, priuily enclining to peace, and wiſhyng concorde, and not without an vrgent cauſe: For all thinges neceſſarie to mannes liuing, penury ſhewed her ſelfe forth, and aboundance was hidden in a Caue. The corne fieldes lay vntilled, the medowes were ouertroden, the woodes were ſpoyled, ſo that all men went to harneſſe, and no man to the Plough. The Churches were ſeldome vſed for deuotion, but many times ſpoyled for deſyre of gaine. Theſe and ſuch innumerable miſchiefes, cauſed both the people beyng enemies, to deſyre peace, and yet the one part diſdeyned openly to offer it, or the other priuately to receyue it.

The nature and property of warre.

The crie and noyſe of this perillous and inſaciable warre, was blaſted through Europe, deteſted through Chriſtendome, and eſpecially at the counſaile of Baſill, where then the Emperour Albert, and all the Princes and Poteſtates of Chriſtendome, or their Deputies were aſſembled, for the vnion of that vngracious Sciſme, in the vſurped Sea of Rome. Wherfore, the Emperour and the temporall Princes, ſuppoſyng the exhortacion of diſcrete fathers, ſhould more profite amongeſt the two highe ſtomacked nacions of England and Fraunce, deſired Eugeny then Biſhop of Rome, to be the authour and Arbitrer of that great ſtrife & contencion: ſo that by his meanes, counſaile, and exhortacion, the weapon might be taken out of the handes of two ſo inuincible nacions, which neuer would yelde or bow, the one to the other, neyther yet once heere of abſtinence of fightyng, or refuſyng from war: ſo much were their heartes hardened, and ſo princely were their ſtomackes. And one thing put them in good comfort of ſome good concluſion, becauſe the Duke of Burgoyne was willyng (ſo that it were not of his awne ſute) to returne and reconcile himſelfe to Charles, his mortall enemie and auncient aduerſarie. Wherfore by authoritie of this generall Counſaill, two Cardinals came to the towne of Arras in Arthoys, whither were ſent for the king of England, Henry Beuford, Cardinall of Wincheſter, Henry, Archebiſhop of Yorke, William de la Pole, Erle of Suffolke, and John Holland Erle of Huntyngdon, Huntyngdon, with diuers other knightes and Eſquiers: and for the French king were there preſent, Charles Duke of Burbon, Lewes Erle of Vandoſme, Arthure of Britayne, Conſtable of Fraunce, the Archebiſhop of Reyns, and Sir Philip Harcourt. There was the Duke of Burgoyn in proper perſon, accõpanied with the Duke of Gelders, & the Erles of Eſtamps, Lygny, Saint Paule, Vaudemont, Neuers, and Daniell, ſonne to the prince of Orange, with a great gard and a galland companie.

Upon the day of the firſt ſeſſion, the Cardinall of Saint Croſſe, declared to the three parties, the innumerable miſchiefes, the multitude of inconueniencies, which had ſucceded through all chriſtendome, by their daylie diſcorde and continuall diſcention: exhorting and requiring them for the honor of God, for the loue that they bare to the ſetting forth of Chriſtes religion, and for the aduauncement of the publique wealth of all Chriſtendome, that they would laye all rancour aparte, repreſſe all wrath and anger, and conforme themſelues to reaſon, and to godly concorde, by the which, they ſhould receyue honor, profite, and continuall quietneſſe, in the worlde, and of God, a reward euerlaſting. After which admonition thus to them geuen, and after diuers dayes of communication, euery parte brought in their demaunde, which were moſt contrary, and hard to come to a good concluſion. The Engliſhe men required, that king Charles ſhould haue nothing, but at the hande of the king of Englande, and that not as duetie, but as a benefite by him of hys meere liberalitie giuen and diſtributed, to which the Frenchmen aunſwered that: king Charles would haue the kingdome frankely and freely, without begging it of an other man: requiring the king of England to leaue the name, armes, and tytle of the king of Fraunce, and to be content with the Dukedomes of Aquitayn and Normandy, and to forſake Paris and all the townes which they poſſeſſed in Fraunce, betwene the Ryuers of Loyre and Some, being no parcell of the Duchy of Normandy. The Engliſh men loth to leſe ſo good a botie as Paris, did not eſteme and allow the demaunds of the French Ambaſſadors, and they on the other ſide, couetyng and deſyring to obtayne agayne the renoume and glorye of their Region, which was Paris, would in no wiſe condiſcend, to any parte of the Engliſhe requeſtes. Thus the pride of the one parte, and the ambition of the other letted concorde, peace, and quietneſſe. The Cardinalles ſeing the froſtie hartes, and hardened mindes of both parties, determined not to diſpute the titles, but offered to them honeſt and reaſonable condicions of truce and peace, for a ſeaſon: which articles both parties, eyther for frowardnes, or for diſdayne openly refuſed: In ſo much as the Engliſh men in great diſpleaſure departed to Calice, and ſo into England. One writer affirmeth, that they beyng warned of a ſecret conſpiracie moued agaynſt them, ſodainely remoued from Arras, and ſo ſayled into their countrey.

Whiles this treatie of peace was thus in communication at Arras, the Lorde Talbot, the Lorde Willoughby, the Lorde Scales, with the Lorde Liſle Adame, and fiue thouſand men beſieged the towne of Saint Deniſe, with a ſtrong bande. The Erle of Dunois hearing thereof, accompanied with the Lorde Lohac, and the Lorde Bueill, and a great company of horſemen haſted thetherward to raiſe the ſiege, and in the meane way they encõtered with ſyr Thomas Kiriell, and Mathew Gough, ryding alſo towarde

S. Deniſe beſieged.

S. Deniſe, betweene whome was a great conflict, and many ſlayne on both parties: but ſodainely came to the ayde of the Frenche men, the garriſon of Pount Melance, which cauſed the Engliſhe men to returne without any great harme or dammage, ſauing that Mathew Gough by ſonderyng of his horſe was taken and caried to Pount Melance. During which fight, the towne of ſaint Deniſe, was rendered to the Lorde Talbot and the other Lordes, which cauſed all the walles to be raſed, and abated downe to the grounde, ſauing the walles of the Abbay, and a Tower called Uenyn. After this towne gotten, the Lorde Willoughby left Sir John Ruppelley at Pounthoyſe, and departed to gouerne Paris, which then began to ſmoke, and ſone after braſt out in flame(as you ſhall ſhortly perceiue.) After whoſe departure the inhabitants of Pounthoyſe rebelled, and droue out the Engliſh men by very force, and rendered themſelues ſubiectes to king Charles. This towne was ſmall, but the loſſe was great, for it was the very conuenient kay betweene Paris and Normandie, ſo that nowe the gate betweene them both, was ſet open and the paſſage at large.

Let vs now agayne returne to the counſayle at Arras. After the Engliſhe Ambaſſadors were departed, the French men and the Burgonyons beganne familierly to common of a peace, and talke of an amitie, to the which motion, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, was neyther deafe nor ſtraunge: for he in the beginning of his rule, being much deſyrous to reuenge and puniſhe the ſhamefull murther done to his father, and to kepe himſelfe in his highe eſtate, and preheminence, beganne to be aſſociate, and to reigne with the Engliſh power, and to ſerue the king of England, thinking that by his amitie and ioyning, he ſhoulde neither harme nor hurte the common wealth of the Country, wherof at that time he bare the whole rule, nor yet loſe one iote or point of his authoritie, or gouernaunce. But when it happened contrary to his expectation, that the king of Englande by the right courſe of inheritaunce, tooke vpon him the whole rule and gouernaunce, within the realme of Fraunce, and ordered by the aduiſe of his counſayle, all cauſes, iudgements, warres and concordes, and that the Duke iudged that he was not had in great confidence, nor in perfite truſt, as he thought, becauſe the Duke of Bedford would not ſuffer the towne of Orleaunce to be rendered to him, (as you before haue heard:) He therefore imagined, and determined with himſelfe to returne into the pathe againe, from the which he had ſtrayed and erred, and to take part and ioyne with his awne bloud and Nation: ſo that ſome honeſt meane might be ſought by other, and not by himſelfe, leaſt peraduenture by his awne ſeeking, he might binde himſelfe in conditions hurtfull and ſore inconueniences, to the Frenche king, and alſo be noted of vntruth and traytorous behauiour toward the king of England and his nation: to whom he had done homage, league, and ſworne fealtie. Now this counſayle was to him a cloke for the rayne, as who ſhould ſay, that he ſought not amitie of the french king (which thing in hys hart he moſt coueted and deſyred) but was therevnto perſwaded by the generall counſayle, and by the Biſhop of Rome, to whome it was reaſon, in all honeſt requeſts that he ſhould ſubmit himſelfe, and humblye obey. And ſo ſhadowed with this counſayle, wythout long argument or prolonging of time, he toke a determinate peace, and a final concluſion vpon theſe conditions: that he ſhould haue to him deliuered uered the Counties of Arthoys, Ponthiew, and Bullonoys, & the townes of Amience, Cozby, Mondidyer, Peron, Saint Quintine, and Abbeuile, wyth many other seigniozies, & superiozities, which be not foz my purpose to reherse. Prouyded alway, that the French king paying in redy money to the Duke oz hys heyzes foure C. M. Crownes, should haue the sayde townes and Countries to be redeliuered againe: and many other things the French king graunted to the Duke of Burgoyne, which after he was not able to perfozme noz accomplish, foz he had no power to make deniall to the Duke, of any demaunde oz request, which the Duke eyther phantasied oz moued: as who would say, that he thought in himselfe, that such an aduersary which desired so honest, and so reasonable condicions (considering the state of the time, and the occasion of concozd, most apparauntly offered to him) ought neyther to be refused noz cast awaye, the which chaunce was to him luckey and foztunate: foz surely the thing fozeseene and looked foz, succeeded and tooke place, as you shall perceyue. This concozde was so pleasaunt to the French king, that he not onely sent foz him: but as a Swan that swimmeth after her make, mette hym in pzoper person, at the Citie of Reynes, and forthwith they entered into a league with perfite amitie and friendship.

A peace concluded betweene the French king and the duke of Burgoyn.

When thys league was swozne, and this knot knit, the Duke of Burgoyne, to set a vayle befoze the king of Englandes eyes, sent Thoison Doz, his king at armes to king Henry with letters: that he being not only waxed faint, and wearyed, with continuall warre, and daylie conflictes, but also chafed daylie with complaints and lamentation, of his people, which of the french men suffred losse and detriment, embzayding and rebuking him openly, affirming that he onely was the suppozter and mainteiner of the English people, and that by his meanes and power, the moztall warre was continued and set fozward, & that he moze diligently studied, and intentiuely toke paine, both to keepe and maintaine the Englishe men in Fraunce, and also to aduaunce and pzomote their desires and intentes, rather then to restoze king Charles his Cosyn, to his rightfull inheritaunce, by reason of which things and many other, he was in maner compelled and constrayned to take a peace, and conclude an amitie with king Charles, exhozting king Henry when honest and reasonable conditions were offered, to take them, and to make an ende of the warre which so long had continued, to the decaye of both the realmes, and to the effusion of chzisten bloud, beside the great displeasure of almightie God, which is the aucthoz of peace and vnitie: pzomising him his ayde and furtheraunce in that behalfe, with many glosyng and flatteryng wozdes, which I passe ouer.

This letter was not a little looked on, noz finally regarded of the king of England, and his sage counsayle: not onely foz the waightinesse of the matter, but also foz the sodaine chaunge of the man, and foz the straunge superscription of the letter, which was: To the high and mightie pzince, Henry by the grace of God, king of England his welbeloued Cosyn: Neyther naming him king of Fraunce, noz his soueraigne Lozde, accozding as (euer befoze that time) he was accustomed to doe. Wherfoze all they which were present, being soze moued with the crafty doing and vntrue demeanoz of the Duke, whom they so much trusted, could neyther temper their passions, noz yet moderate their yze, noz yet bzidle their tongues: but openly called him

Traytor, deceyuer, and most inconstant prince. But when the rumor of the Dukes reuerting was published amongst the common people, they lette worldes and went to stripes: for they being moued and pricked with this vnhappie tydings, ran fiercely vpon all the Flemings, Hollanders, and Burgonions, which then inhabited within the Citie of London, and the suburbes of the same, and slue and hurt a great number of them, before they by the kings proclamation could be prohibited to leaue of and abstayne from suche violence and iniurious doing: for the king nothing more minded, then to saue innocent bloude, and defend them which had not offended.

After the letter twise red, and wisely brooked, he willed the officer at armes to tell his mayster, that it was not conuenient, nor honorable for him, to be enimie to the English nation, without cause or occasion geuen: but his duetie, all things considered, was to haue kept his auncient truth and olde allegeaunce rather then to be the occasion of newe warre and freshe discention: aduertising him farther, that it was not the point of a wise man, to leaue and let passe the certaine for the vncertaine, admonishing him also, not to mingle and mixe his safetie and sureuesse, with the vnstablenesse and vnsuretie of his newe alye and Cosyn king Charles.

When the Messenger was departed, the king of Englande and hys counsayle thought and determined to worke some displeasure to the Duke, and to set some conspiracie against him in his awne Countrey, wherefore by rewardes, they did suborne and corrupt certaine Gouernors and rulers of townes and Cities, within the Dukes countries and dominions (which nations surely be euer procline and readie to commotion and rebellion.) But the Gauntoys, which of that feate euer bare the Bell, and were the common rysers agaynst their souereigne Lords, some of them imagening that the power of the Englishe men was not long lyke to continue within the realme of Fraunce, more for feare then loue of their Duke, sat still and moued not, but let other townes alone, which sore troubled the Dukes wittes, and a great whyle did disquiet and vexe his senses.

The death of Iohn Duke of Bedford Regent of Fraunce.

But in this time, and the .xiiij. day of September, died Iohn Duke of Bedford Regent of Fraunce, a man as politique in peace, as hardy in warre whose bodie was with great funerall solempnitie buried in the Cathedrall Church of our Lady in Roan, on the North side of the high aulter, vnder a sumptuous and costly monument: which tombe and sepulture, when king Lewes the .xj. sonne to this king Charles, which recouered agayne Normandie did well aduise and beholde, certaine noble men in his company, hauing more youth then discretion, and more enuie in their hartes then considerations of their parents, counsayled him to deface and pluck downe the tombe, and to cast the dead carcasse into the fieldes: affirming that it was a great dishonor both to the king and to the realme, to see the enemy of his father, and theirs, to haue so solempne and riche memoriall. King Lewes aunswered agayne, sayeng: what honor shall it be to vs, or to you to breake this monument, and to pull out of the ground and take vp the dead bones of him, whome in his lyfe, neyther my father nor your progenitors with all their power, puissaunce and friendes were once able to make flie one foote backward, but by his strength, wyt, and pollicie, kept them all out of the principall dominions of the realme of Fraunce, and out of this noble and famous Duchy of Normandy: wherefore I say, first God haue his soule, and let his body now lye in rest, which when he was alyue, would haue disquieted the proudest of vs all: and as for the tombe, I assure you, it is not so decent, nor conuenient for him, as his honor and actes deserued, although it were much richer and more beawtifull.

Duchy

This yere chaunced a maruellous great frost, the which beganne the xxvj. of Nouember and continued vntill the .x. daye of February next folowyng, in the which tyme the Thames was so feruently frosen, that no ship nor other vessell could come within the same. By reason whereof the ships that came from Burdeaux, were forced to vnlade at Douer & other places, and were cõpelled to bring their Wines by land ouer Shoters Hil to London.

After the death of thys noble prince and valyant Captayne, the Duke of Bedford, the bright Sunne that commonly shone in Fraunce fayre and bewtifull vpon the Englishe men, begamne to be cloudie, and daylie to ware darker: for the French men seing the chiefe Capitaine taken awaye, beganne not onely to refuse their obedience and loyaltie, which they had sworne and promised to the king of Englande, but taking swordes in hande, rebelled, persecuted and openly defyed the English men, yet all these mischaunces, not one point abated the valyaunt courages of the English people: for they nothing mistrusting God, nor good fortune, set vp a newe sayle, and beganne the warre newe agayne, and appointed for Regent in Fraunce, Richard Duke of Yorke, sonne to Richarde Erle of Cambridge, althoughe the Duke of Yorke, both for birth and courage, was worthy of this honour and preferment, yet he was so disdayned of Edmonde Duke of Somerset beyng Cosyn to the king, that he was promoted to so high an office (which he in very deede gaped and looked for) that by all wayes and meanes possible, he both hindered and detracted him, glad of his losse, and sorie of his well doing, causing him to linger in England without dispatch, till Parys and the flower of Fraunce were gotten by the French king. The Duke of Yorke perceyuing his euill will, openly dissimuled that, which he inwardly thought, eche working things to the others displeasure. This cancarde malice, and pestiferous diuision so long continued, in the hartes of these two Princes, till mortall warre consumed them both, and almost all their lines and offsprings, as within fewe yeres you shall perceyue.

Richarde Duke of Yorke made Regent of Fraunce.

The Normans rebell.

The Normans of the Countrie of Caux, beyng somewhat hartened, by the death of the Duke of Bedford, beganne a newe rebellion, and slue diuers Englishe men, and robbed many prettie townes, which were of king Henries faction and part, and tooke the towne of Harflew by assault, and diuers other townes. The Lord Talbot beyng aduertised of this rebellion, sent for the Lord Scales, Sir Thomas Kiriell, and the Lord Hoo, which afflicted and plagued the people of Caux, that they slue aboue fiue thousand persons, and brent all the townes and villages in the countrie, not beyng walled, so that in that part, was neither habitacion nor tillage, for all the people fled into Britayn, and all the beastes of the Countrie were brought to Cawdebec, where a good sheepe was solde for an Englishe penny, and a Cow for .xij. pence. Dayly was skirmishing and fightyng in euery part, in so much that the Lorde Scales with foure hundreth Englishmen, discomfited at the Rye beside Roan, the Heire and fiftene hundreth valiaunt Frenchmen, and Sir

Good cheps victuall.

Richard Reignold de Fountaynes, Sir Aleyne Gerond, Alayne de Monsay, and Geoffrey Grame Capteyne of the Scottes, and three hundreth and mo, were taken prisoners, beside seuen fayre and pleasant Coursers. But this victorie stayed not the hartes of the French nacion, for their myndes were so full of treason, and their malice so great agaynst the Englishmen, that many townes turned to the part of king Charles, without conquest or desyre, and diuers were sold for couetousnesse, and many were deliuered by treason, as Depe, Boys de Uincenes, and other.

Thomas Lorde Beamond, which of late was come to Paris with eight hundreth men, issued out of Parys with six hundreth souldiers, onely entending to see and vieue the doynges and number of the French armie, but he was sodeinely espyed, and compassed about: so that within a small space, he was discomfited and taken, and with him foure score prisoners, beside two hundreth which were slaine in the fielde, and the remnant chaced to the very gates of the Citie. The Parisians, and in especiall the Master of the Hales, and some of the Uniuersitie, and Michaell Laillier, and many notable Burgesses of the towne (which euer with an Englishe countenaunce couered a French heart) perceiuyng the weakenesse of the Englishemen, and the force and strength of the Frenchmen, signifiyng to the Frenche Captaynes their myndes and intentes, willed them to come with all diligence, to receiue so rich a pray, to them without any difficultie offered and geuen. The Constable delaying no tyme, came with his power, and lodged by the Charterhouse: and the Lorde Lisleadam, approchyng the walles, shewed to the Citizens, a Charter, sealed with the great seale of king Charles, by the which he had pardoned them their offences, and graunted them all the olde liberties and auncient priuileges, so they would hereafter be to him obedient, true, and seruiceable: which thing to them declared, they ranne about the towne cryng: Saint Denise, liue king Charles. The Englishe men perceiuyng this, determined to kepe the gate of Saint Denise, but they were deceyued, for the Cheynes were drawen in euery strete, & women and children cast downe stones, and scaldyng water on the Englishe mens heades, and the Citizens persecuted them, from strete to strete, and from lane to lane, and slue & hurt, diuers and many of them. The Bishop of Tyrwine, Chauncelor there for king Henry, and the Lord Willoughby, and Sir Simon Morier, tooke great paine to appease the people, and represse their fury: but when they saw that all auayled not, they withdrew themselues, to the Bastile of Saint Anthony, which Fortresse they had well vittayled and furnished, wyth men and munitions.

The Parisians rebell.

Whiles this rumor was in the towne, the Erle of Dumoys and other scaled the walles, and some passed the riuer by Boates, and opened the gate of Saint James, at the which the Constable with his Banner displayed entered, at whose entrie the Parisians were verye glad, and made great ioy. The Bishop and the Lorde Willoughby, with their small companie, defended their fortresse, tenne dayes, loking for ayde, but when they sawe that no comfort appered, they yelded their fortresse, so that they and theirs with certain baggage, might peaceably returne to Roan, which desire was to them graũted. Then as they departed, the Parisians rayled, mocked, and taunted the English men, with the most spitefull wordes, and shamefull termes, that could could be inuented or deuised: so that all men may apparauntly perceyue, that their hartes neuer thought, as their tongues vttered.

After this glorious gaine, the French king besieged the towne of Craile, vpon Oyse, whereof Sir William Chamberlain was Captain, which with fiue hundreth Englishmen issued out of the towne, and after long fight, discomfited his enemies, and slue two hundreth, and tooke a great number prisoners: the remnant not likyng their market, departed to Compeigne, and other townes adioinyng. Duryng which season.xij. Burgesses of the towne of Gysors, solde it for money to Poyton of Xantrayles, but he had not the Castell deliuered. Wherfore with all his power, he besieged the same, whereof the Lorde Talbot beyng aduertised, sent for the Lord Scales, and they both with.xviij. hundreth men, rescued the Castell, tooke the towne, and discomfited their enemies, and slue of them aboue foure hundreth persons. Nowe was the olde prouerbes verefied, that he that commeth a day after the fayre, commeth to late, and when the steede is stolen, it is no boote to shut the stable doore. For when Paris, Saint Denise, Saint Germaynes in Lay, and many other townes in Fraunce were taken and betrayed, for lacke of succours and sufficient garrisons, then the Duke of Yorke appoynted at the Parliament before to be Regent of Fraunce, and by the disdeyn and enuy of the Duke of Sommerset and other, not till now dispatched, was sent into Normandie, with. viij. thousand men, and in his companie the Erles of Sarisbury, and Suffolke, and the Lorde Fauconbridge, and diuers valiaunt Capteynes. When he was landed at Harflew, the Erle of Sarisburie besieged the Castell of Chamboys, which shortly was to him rendered. Then the Duke remoued to Roan, where he set good orders, and did great iustice in the Countrie, wherefore the Normanes in their Chronicle, highly extoll and much magnifie him, for that poynt: Howbeit, they say, that he gate by long siege, the towne and Abbey of Fecampe, and did none other notable act, duryng the tyme of his rule and gouernaunce.

Philip Duke of Burgoyne, which (as you haue heard) brake both his othe and promise with the king of England, imagined with himselfe, that the Englishe men were like shortly to be expulsed out of all the townes on that syde the sea, and that they had no certein refuge nor place to resort to, out of ieopardie, but only the towne of Calice. Wherefore he assembled his counsaile, and the heades of the Cities and townes of Flaundyrs, Brabant, Holland, and Zeland, in the towne of Gaunt, where was declared vnto them, the right, title, and interest, that he had to the towne of Calice, and the countie of Guisnes, as a very patrimonie belongyng to his inheritance: shewyng further, that the sayd towne was the golfe and swallower vp of all the golde and siluer of his Countries and dominions, for so much as there was the staple of wooles, tynne, lead, and other merchandise, for the which the Englishe men would take no common currant money, but onely gold and siluer, to the great impouerishment of his seignyories & Regions: saiyng further, that Calice only was the common stop, betwene his Countries and Britayn, and Spaine, so that Southward, nor Westward, his subiectes could not passe, without the daunger of that towne. Wherefore these detrimentes considered, he determined if they would assent, shortly to recouer and conquere that towne and the Countie of Guisnes. To this purpose all the counsayle, and common people,not onely agreed, but also promised ayde, both of men and money. Lorde howe the Fleminges bragged, and the Hollandyrs craked, that Calice should be wonne,and all the Englishemen slaine, swearyng, and staryng, that they would haue it within three dayes at the most: thinkyng verely, that the towne of Calice, could no more resist their puyssaunce, then a pot of double beere, when they fall to quaffyng.

To tell you what ordenance was new cast, what powder was bought, what engines were deuised,what harnesse was prouided, what vitaile was purueyed for that great enterprice: I will not comber you,in rehersyng enery thyng particulerly,,because the Flemynges write, that the prouision was more then tongue could speake,or heart could thinke, yet you may beleue as you list. These doynges were not so priuie,but Sir John Radeliffe Deputy of the towne of Calice, was thereof enformed, and shortly of the same aduertised king Henry, and his counsaile, which incontinent sent thether the Erle of Mortayne,sonne to the Duke of Sommerset, and the Lorde Cammeys, with. rb. hundreth men, and great foyson of vitaile, which issued out of Calice, and came before Grauelyne, where they were encountered wyth a great number of Flemynges, which were shortly discomfited, and foure hundreth of them slaine,and six score taken prisoners,and caried into Calice. And within two dayes after, the Englishemen drawe by fine force, the Lords of Wauraine and Bado,to the Barriers of Arde,and discomfited the companie,to the number of. rb. hundreth,and slue. bij. baleaunt Captaynes, & toke many Gentlemen prisoners. Philipe Duke of Burgoyn,abidyng still in his high and warlike enterprice, assembled together of Flemynges, Picardes, Hollanders, and Henowiers,a great armie, to the number of. rl.thousand, so well armed,so well vitayled, so well furnished with ordenaunce, and well garnished in all thinges, that they thought in their heartes, and blasted among themselues, that the Calicians, would leaue the towne desolate, and flie for their sauegarde, heeryng onely of the approchyng of the Gauntoys. But they reckned before their host,and so payde more then their shot came to. When this gallant armie was passed the water of Grauelyn, the Duke entendyng to begyn his great conquest, besieged and assaulted the little and poore Castell of Oye,which hauyng in it but fiftie souldiers, of the which.rij solde their liues derely,the remnant compelled by necessity, yelded themselues simplie to the Duke, which to please the Gauntoys, beyng of the most puyssaunt companie in his armie,liberally gaue to them both the Castell and the prisoners, as a signe and token of good lucke, and fortunate victorie. Which rude and beastly persons, nothyng expert in warre, or lawes at armes,not onely rased and abated the Castell, but also hanged. rrir. of the captiues, and had so done with all the remnant, if the Duke, (disdaynyng their cruelties) had not entreated for the rest.

After this victorie,little honourable, and lesse profitable, the Picardes besieged the Castell of Marke, and thre times assaulted it,more to their losse then gaine. The English men within, whereof Sir John Geddyng was Capteyn,set out the banner of Saint George,and rang the belles,to the entent to haue succours from the towne of Calice. But the Capteynes there, myndyng not to lease the more for the lesse, nor the substance for the accident, wished them good luck,& good fortune without any ayde sendyng. For doubt of the Dukes great armie and power. The ſouldiers within Marke, beyng but two hundreth and fire, ſeyng no hope of ſuccour, & deſperate of comfort, rendered themſelues to the Duke vpon condicion that their liues and lunmes ſhould be ſaued, and ſo they were conueyed in ſure cuſtodie to the towne of Gaunt, and the Caſtell of Marke was raſed and defaced.

Calice beſieged by the Duke of Burgoyn.

After this act done, the Duke of Burgoyn, accompanied with the duke of Cleues, the Erle of Eſtampes, the Lords of Dantoynge, Croy, Creſquy, Humiers, and many other valeaunt Barons, and Knightes, with his great armie, came before the towne of Calice, and placed his ſiege about the ſame, moſt to his aduauntage, and to the moſt diſpleaſure of his enemies. He gaue three great aſſaultes to the towne, but his people were not ſo fierce to aſſaut, but the Engliſh men were as quicke to defende, ſo that he gaynyng ſo little at theſe three enterpriſes, was content to abſtaine from further approchyng toward the walles. At the firſt aſſault the Heire, which was come to ſee the Duke of Burgoyn, was ſore wounded and hurt. Beſyde this, the Duke had daply one great eye ſore, which was becauſe that at euery tyde, ſhippes arriued in the Hauen, out of England, openly before his face, laden with vitaile, munitions, and men, and alſo the Calicians would for the nonce, put out cattaile into the marſh, vnder the towne walles, to the entent to prouoke the Fleminges to come within their catchyng and daunger, which beyng couetous of pray and gaine, often aduentured, and ſeldome returned againe: for many by this meanes were taken priſoners, but many mo ſlaine with ordinaunce. The Duke one day road about, to viewe and beholde the ſituacion, and the walles of the towne, to the intent to take his moſt aduauntage, either by aſſault or ſhot of ordenaunce. He was quickly eſpyed, and with the ſtroke of a Canon, a Trompetor which road nert before him, and three horſes in his companie were ſlaine out of hand. When he ſawe that all thinges ſucceded not to his purpoſe, he firſt ſet the Lorde of Croy, and a conuenient number, to beſiege the Caſtell of Guiſnes, where the ſayd Captain gat little profite, and did leſſe harme: And after deuiſed howe to ſtop the Hauen, ſo that no ſuccours ſhould enter there, and alſo to prohibite them within the towne to make any egreſſe or road outward, and ſo by this meanes to famiſhe and compell them to yelde and render the towne. This deuice was ſet forwarde, and nothyng ſlept: for foure great Hulkes were laded with great ſquare ſtones, ſemented and ioyned together with lead, to the intent that they ſhould lye ſtill like a mount, and not to ſeuer a ſonder. Theſe ſhippes with the remnant of the Dukes nauie were conueyed into the mouth of Calice hauen, and in a full ſea by craft and pollecie, were ſonke downe to the ground, but whether God would not that the hauen ſhould be deſtroyed, eyther the conueyers of the Hulkes, knewe not the very Channell, theſe foure great ſhippes at the lowe water, lay openly vpon the ſandes, without any hurt doyng to the rode or Chanell, which when the ſouldiers had perceyued, they iſſued out of the towne, and brake the ſhippes, and caryed both the ſtones and the tymber into the towne, which ſerued them well to their fortificacions. The ſeconde deuiſe was alſo accompliſhed, which was a ſtrong Baſtell, ſet on a little mountaine, furniſhed with foure hundreth men and much artillery, which fortreſſe did let the Engliſhe men to iſſue out, when they would, to their great diſpleaſure and diſturbance.

Whiles theſe things were in doing, there arryued into the Dukes armie an Herault of Englande called Pembroke, belonging to the Duke of Glouceſter, which declared to the Duke of Burgoyne, that the Protectour of England his Mayſter (if God would ſend him wind and weather) would geue battayle to him and hys whole puyſſaunce, eyther there, or in any other place within his awne Countrey, where he would appoint: but the day he could not aſſigne, becauſe of the inconſtancie of the winde, and mutabilitie of the aire. The Duke (like a noble man) aunſwered the Herault: Sir, ſay to your mayſter, that his requeſt is both honorable, & reaſonable, howbeit, he ſhall not neede to take paine, to ſeeke me in mine awne Countrey, for God wylling he ſhall finde me here, till I haue my will of the towne, readie to abide him, and all the power that he can make. After this aunſwere made, the Herault was highly feaſted, and had a Cup, and a hundred golden Gyldens to him delyuered for a rewarde, and ſo returned to Calice. After whoſe departure, the Duke called a great counſayle in the chiefe Paulion of the Gauntoys, and there declared both the Heraults meſſage and his aunſwere deſyring them to regarde his honor, the eſtimation of their Countreis, and the honeſties of themſelues, and like men to receyue their enemies, and valyauntly to defend their aduerſaries, promiſing to them victorie, gaine, and perpetuall glorie.

Whiles this great matter was in conſultation, the Calicians, not well contented with the Baſtell, which the Duke had newly buylded, iſſued out of the towne in a great number, part on foote, and part on horſeback. The footemen ran to aſſaut the Baſtile, and the horſemen went betwene the armie and the aſſaylaunts, to ſtop the ayde and ſuccors which might come. The alarmy was ſounded, in ſo much that the Duke in proper perſon was comming on foote to releue his people, but by the meanes of the horſemen, he was ſtayed and kept back a ſpace, in the which delay of time, the Engliſhe men by fine force gat the place, and ſlue a hundred and ſixtie perſons, the remnaunt were taken priſoners, and defaced the fortreſſe, and ſet it on fyre: caryeng with them all the ordinaunce and artilerie into the towne of Calice, to the great diſpleaſure of the Duke and his counſayle. The next day after, there ſprang a rumor in the armie (no man could tell how) that the Duke of Glouceſter with a great puiſſaunce was already embarked and chipped, and would arryue at the next tide, and come downe before Calice, and raiſe the ſiege. What was the very cauſe, I can not truely write: but ſurely the ſame night the Duke fled away, and ſent in all haſt to the Lorde of Croye, to raiſe his ſiege before Guyſnes, which tydings were to him very ioyous, for he neyther got nor ſaued: ſo theſe two Capitaines departed leauing behinde both ordinaunce, vitaile and great riches. The french writers, to ſaue the honor of the Duke of Burgoyne, ſay that there was a certaine diſcord and commocion amongſt the Flemings and duche Nation: affirming that the great Lordes and the Picardes, (whome the Frenche men greatly extoll) would betray and ſell the Flemings and their friends, and that for the ſame cauſe, in a great furie they cried home, home, and would not tarrie, for no requeſt the Duke could make, nor no exhortation that could be geuen: and ſo by their miſgouernaunce, the Duke was enforced to rayſe his ſiege and to departe. The Flemiſhe authors affirme the contrary, ſaying: that they were were readie to abide the comming of the Duke of Gloucester, but the Duke of Burgoyne fearing to be trapped, betwene the Duke of Glouceſters armie before, and the garriſon of Calice behinde, ſo that he could eſcape by no way, fled away in the night, geuing to them no warning before. So that for lack of time, and conuenient ſpace, to lade and cary their ſtuffe, and being commaunded to retire with all ſpeede and diligence, they were compelled to loſe, and leaue behinde them their vitayle and tents, to their great loſſe and detriment. Now it is at your liberties (gentle Readers) whether you will geue credite to the French men (which were abſent and no doers in the act) or to the Flemings, which were partakers of the loſſe and diſhonor. But the infallible veritie is, that he fled the .xxvj. day of July in the night, & the nert day in the morning the Duke of Gloucester landed in Calice hauen, and ſtraight went into the Campe, where his enimies the night before were lodged, and there he found many goodly peeces of ordenance, and in eſpecially one called Dygeon, named after the chiefe towne of Burgony, beſide pauillions, Wine, Beere, Meale, and innumerable vittayle.

The Duke of Gloceſter ſeing his enemies reculed, hauing in his company .xxv. M. men, entered into Flaunders, burning houſes, kylling ſuch as would reſiſt, deſtroyeng the Countrey on euery parte, ſetting fyre in the townes of Popozniche and Baillens, and waſted the ſuburbes of many faire Cities, and in all this way, they loſt no man, nor ſawe any creature appere to defend the Countrey. After they paſſed by Newe Caſtell, and deſtroyed Rynelure, & Vallon Chapell, and then entred into Arthoys, to Arques and Blandeſques, ſetting fyre in euery part where they came. Thus they paſſed by Saint Omers, to Guyſnes, and ſo to Calice at ſixe weekes ende, where they were well refreſhed: for in all this iorney, they had little plenty of good bread, which cauſed much faintneſſe, and diuers diſeaſes in the armie. When the Duke of Gloucester had ſufficiently plagued and waſted the Countreys of the Duke of Burgoyn, and brought great prayes of beaſtes and ſpoyle to the towne of Calice, he ſetting there all things in good order, returned into Englande, where he was aduertiſed, how James king of Scottes, contrary to his othe, league and promiſe, had beſieged the Caſtell of Rokeſborough, with thirtie thouſand men, wherof Sir Raufe Gray was Capitaine which manfully defended it twentie dayes, but the Scottiſhe king being aduertiſed, that the Erle of Northumberland was comming to fight with him, fled with no leſſe loſſe, then diſhonor to his towne of Edenbrough.

After this daungerous buſineſſe finiſhed, and for a time ended, by meane of friends, and deſire of Princes, a truce or abſtinence of warre for a certaine time was moued betwene the king of England, and the Duke of Burgoyne, for which cauſe were ſent to Graueline for the king of England, the Cardynall of Winchester Henry Beaufford, John Lorde Mowbrey Duke of Norffolke, Humffrey Erle of Stafford, and diuers other well learned and honorable perſonages: and for the Duke there appered the Duches his wyfe, the Byſhop of Arras, the Lorde of Croy, and diuers other. At which treatie, a truce was taken for a ſmall time, and for a leſſe ſpace obſerued. Which abſtinence of warre was concluded betwene the king of Englande, and the Duches of Burgoyne (leauing out the Duke and his name.) Some thinke that the king of England would not enter in league with him, becauſe he

he had broken his promise, wryting and fidelity, written, sealed, and swore to him, and to his father. Other imagened this to be done by a cautell, to cast a mist before the French kings eyes, to the intent he should beleue, that this feat was wrought by the Duches, without assent or knowledge of the Duke or his counsayle, and so he was not bounde to accomplish anye act or thing done in his wyfes treatie.

Katheryn mother to king Henry the sixt deceassed.

About thys season, Katheryn Quene and mother to the king of Englande departed out of this transitorie lyfe, and was buryed by her husband, in the Minster of Westminster. Thys woman after the death of king Henry the fift her husbande, beyng young and lustie, followyng more her awne appetite, then friendly counsayle, and regarding more her priuate affection, then her open honour, tooke to husband priuely a goodly gentleman, and a beautifull person, garnished with many goodly giftes, both of nature and of grace, called Owen Tuther, a man brought foorth, and come of the noble linage and auncient lyne of Cadwaleder, the last king of the Brytons, by whome she conceaued and brought foorth three goodly sonnes, Edmond, Jasper, and another, which was a Monke in Westminster, and liued a smal tyme, and a daughter, which in her youth departed out of this transitorie lyfe: After whose death king Henry, because they were hys brethrene of one wombe descended, created Edmond Erle of Richemond, and Jasper Erle of Pembroke, which Edmond engendered of Margaret daughter and sole heyre to John Duke of Somerset, Henry which after was king of thys realme, called king Henry the seauenth, of whome you shall heare more hereafter. This Owen after the death of the Quene hys wyfe, was apprehended and committed to warde, because that contrarie to the statute made in the sixt yere of thys king, he presumptuously had maried the Quene, without the kinges especiall assent and agreement, out of which prison he escaped, and let out other with hym, and was agayne apprehended, and after escaped agayne.

Owen Tuther maried vnto Katheryn Queene and the late wife of king Henry the fift.

The Duches of Bedford maried to Sir Richard Wooduile.

The Duchesse of Bedford, syster to Lewes, Erle of Saint Paule, minding also to mary, rather for pleasure then for honor, wythout counsaile of her friendes, maried a lustie knight, called Sir Richarde Wooduile, to the great displeasure of her Uncle the Bysshop of Tyrwyne, and the Erle her brother: but they now could not remedie it, for the chaunce was cast and passed. This Sir Richard was made Baron of Riuers, and after Erle, and had by thys Ladye many noble sonnes, and fayre daughters: whereof one was Lady Elizabeth, after Queene of Englande, maried to king Edward the fourth (as hereafter you shall perceyue.)

Jane the Queene of England deceassed.

Whiles this mariage was celebrating, Jane late Quene of England, and before Duches of Britayne, daughter to the king of Nauerre, and wife to king Henry the fourth, died at the mannor of Hauering, and was buried by her husbande at Caumtorbury, in which tyme diseased the Countesse of Warwike, and Henry Archebishop of Yorke.

And here I may not forget the double dealing, and craftie demeanour, of James king of Scottes: which being (as you haue heard) late prisoner in Englande, not onely was garnished with learning and ciuilitie (which things were rare and straunge before that time, within the realme of Scotland) but also set at libertie, and honorably sent home. And to the intent that his

his amitie might be perpetuall, and that loue might continually ſucrede betweene both the realmes, by his meane and accorde: firſt, his great raunſome was abridged, and diminiſhed, and after he was ioyned in mariage with one of the bloud royall, as before you haue heard: yet this vngentle prince, and forgetfull friend, putting in obliuion both the duetie of his obeyſaunce, towarde his ſoueraigne and liege Lorde, and the othe and promiſe that he made to king Henry, when he did to him homage, and fealtie at the Caſtell of Windſore (as before you haue heard) turned his back to his friend and kinſman and loked to the French parte, which neuer did him honor nor profite, not onely ſending into Fraunce daylie ayde and ſuccours, agaynſt the Engliſhe nation, but alſo by newe alliaunce ſought and practiſed wayes and meanes, how to ioyne himſelfe with forrein princes, to greue and hurte his neighbours and adioynaunts of the realme of Englande. And although his awne power were ſmall, to doe them any great damage, yet he thought that he being lincked in ſuche noble houſes, ſhould the leſſe feare the malice of his enimies: vpon which feeble foundation, he concluded two mariages, the one with Lewes the Dolphin, ſonne to Charles the French king, and the other with Frauncis Duke of Britayne. Which mariages were not deſired for loue or riches, but onely for ayde to reſiſt and driue out the Engliſh men out of Fraunce. For the Lady Margaret maryed to the Dolphin, was of ſuch naſty complexion and euill ſauored breath, that he abhorred her company, as a cleane creature doth a carion: wherevpon ſhe conceyued ſuch an inwarde griefe, that within ſhort time after, ſhe ended her dayes. Although this Lady had ſuch impediments (as you haue heard) yet her ſiſter Iſabell, maryed to Frauncis Duke of Britayne, lacked neyther exceeding bewtie, nor pleaſaunt breath: but as for wyt, womanhood, and ciuile behauior, ſhe neuer had, nor exerciſed. Wherefore when the Duke before his maryage, was by his counſayle admoniſhed to refuſe and forſake ſo innocent a creature, he more moued with her fayre face, then her womanly wiſedome aunſwered: that it was ynough for a Woman to iudge the difference betweene the ſhyrte and the doblet of her huſbande, and to knowe him in the darke from another man.

For theſe mariages, king James demaunded of his commons a great ſubſidie or tallage, which was ſore grudged at, and in maner denied: ſo that he maried them with fayre promiſes, and ayde and ſuccour agaynſt the Engliſhe men, rather then with bagges of money, or Cheſtes of Plate. Thys forreyn alliaunce little profited or auayled the realme of Scotland, nor this newe amitie defended not king James: for Walter Steward Erle of Athole, which pretended a tytle to the crowne, by reaſon that he was begotten of king Robert the ſecond, by his firſt wyfe, and by whoſe occaſion, Robert Duke of Albany, murdered Dauid Duke of Rothſay, elder brother to thys king James (as in the ſtory of king Henry the fourth, you haue heard declared) after the coronation of king James the firſt in Scotland, earneſtly ſollicited him to put to death Duke Murdo, and all the offſpring of Robert firſt Duke of Albany, truſtyng that after he had deſtroyed that lyne (which was a ſtop in his way) to inuent ſome meane how to deſtroy the king and his children, and ſo to obteyne the Crowne and preheminence of the Realme. Wherefore he perſwaded Robert Steward his Nephew, & Robert Grame hys Colyn, and diuers other, to murther and slay the king their souereigne Lorde, which thereto by deuilish instigation incensed and procured, came to the towne of Pertho (commonly called S. Johns towne) and there entered into the kings priuie chamber, and slue first diuers of hys seruauntes, which made resistaunce, and after killed the king with many mortall strokes, and hurt the Quene, which in defense of her husband felled one of the Traytors. When this vngracious deede was blowen about the towne, the people rose in great plumpes, and found out the principall quellers, and them brought to straight prison, which afterward (according to their deserts) were with most terrible torments put to death and executed.

After James the first, succeded James the seconde, his eldest sonne, which fearing sedition and ciuile discord, vexed more his awne nation, then the Englishe people did.

Nowe leauyng Scotland, let vs returne to the businesse of Fraunce. Whiles the Scottes were compassyng how to destroy their king: the Lorde Talbot with a great companie layd siege to the Castell of Tankeruile, which after foure monethes was to him simplie rendred and geuen vp. This towne was no great gaine to the Englishe men: for in the meane season the French king in his awne person besieged the strong towne of Monstreau Faultion, whereof Thomas Gerard was Captein: which more for desyre of reward, then for feare of enemies, solde the towne to the French king, and had of him great giftes, and good chere, which afterwarde was well knowen, to hys shame & reproch. This towne had bene rescued or the French king foughten withall, if one chaunce had not happened: For the Duke of Yorke was discharged of his office of Regent, and the Erle of Warwike preferred to the same, so that the Duke of Yorke lyng at Roan, would haue gladly rescued the towne, if his authoritie had not succesed, and the Erle could not, for the winde was so clene contrary to him, that he & his armie tarryed for the winde aboue ten weekes. And so betweene the discharge of the one, and the charge of the other, this Towne of Monstreau, was deliuered and solde.

The Castell of Tankeruile taken.

The Erle of Warwike made Regent of Fraunce.

This present yere was a Parliament kept at Westminster, in the which were diuers notable conclusions ordeyned and taken, aswell for the preseruation of peace and concorde at home, as for the maintenance of warre, and hostilitie in outward regions: in the which Parliament, (who so will loke on the actes) shall perceyue that one act made, for byyng and sellyng by straungers, was profitable for the publike wealth of this realme, if it were well kept (as a fewe good actes or none be, eyther by the negligence of the gouernours, or by the insolencie and lewdnesse of the people.)

Nowe must we speake somewhat of Charles the French king: which after he had gayned againe the Citie of Paris, and diuerse other townes, was so puffed vp with pride, that he thought it but a trifle to conquere Normandie, and expulse all the Englishe nacion out of his Countries and seignories. Wherefore he sent Arthure of Britayne Constable of Fraunce, and John Duke of Alanson, into Normandie with a great army, which besieged the towne of Auranches, standyng vpon the knop of an hill, nere to the Britishe sea, both well walled and well manned. While they lay there long, little gettyng and much spendyng, the Lorde Talbot with a valiaunt companie of men approched nere the French men, and encamped themselues in the face of

of their enemies, to prouoke and intice them to battaile and fight. The frenche men refusyng this offer, kept themselues within their trenches, dayly fortifyng and repairyng their Campe. The Englishemen perceiuyng their doynges, remoued their armie halfe a Mile farther, geuyng their enemyes rowme to issue out and to fight, but all this little auayled: for the Frenchmen lay still and stirred not. The Lorde Talbot seyng their faint heartes, rayſed his field, and in the open sight of them all, entred into the towne, and the nert day issued out, and found the French men ridyng abroad, to destroy the plain Countrie, whom he enuironed, bet, and discomfited, slayeng many, and takyng diuerse prisoners.

This yere, sayth Cooper, all the Lions in the Tower of London dyed, which before had liued there a long tyme.

On the first day of Nouember this present yere, the Erle of Warwike as Regent of Fraunce, passed the sea, after he had bene seuen tunes shipped and vnshipped, and landed at Humflew, with a thousand freshe Souldiers, and came to Roan, and then the Duke of Yorke returned into England, neyther wholy pleased, nor half content. For he secretly smelled, that some men priuily disdeyned his aduaūcement, and enuied his promocion: yet (like a wise man) he kept his tongue close, whatsoeuer his heart thought. Betwene the chaūge of these two Capteines, the Duke of Burgoyn (which sore enuied the glory of the Englishe men) besieged the Castell of Croitoy with ten thousand men and mo, hauyng with him great plentie of Goonnes, and goodly ordenaunce. The Erle of Warwike heryng of this feate, sent the Lord Talbot, the Lord Fauconbridge, sir Thomas Kiriell, sir John Mountgomery, Thomas Limbrike, Thomas Chandos, Dauy Hall, & diuers other knightes and squiers, and many tall yomen, to the number of fiue thousand men, which passed the riuer of Some, beside the towne of S. Valery: for the passage of BlauncheTaque was very daungerous to go through, because the Duke of Burgoyn had layd there ordinaunce, and other engines, to let, trouble, and stoppe the Englishemen to go ouer at that foord. And yet, where the Lorde Talbot passed, his men went in the water vp to the Chinne, so glad were the men to rescue their felowes. When the Duke of Burgoyn was informed of the approchyng of the Lord Talbot and other, he with all his power sauyng foure which were left in a Bastile, by him there newly buylded, fled to Abbeuile, which Bastile was sone gayned, and the men within eyther slain or taken. 1437 16

After this towne receyued, the Lorde Talbot sent worde to the Duke of Burgoyn, that he would vtterly waste and destroy the Countrie of Picardie, except he (like a valiant Prince) would geue him battaile. And accordyng to his promise, he brent townes, spoyled, and slue many people in Picardie, but for all his doynges, the Duke would not appere, but stale away from Abbeuile, & fled to Amias. So the Lorde Talbot was. xx. dayes full in the Countries of Picardie, and Arthoyse, destroiyng and brennyng all that they could see or come to, and after departed. And in the meane season, Sir Thomas Kiriell had gotten all the Dukes cariages, and ordenaunce, and left as much vittaile in the towne of Croytoy, as would serue fiue hundreth men a whole yere, and conueyed the remnant in safetie to the Erle of Warwike, which not onely receyued the Capteynes with good semblaunce, and louyng chere, but also highly magnified their actes, and much prayſed theyr

After this enterprise atchieued, Henry Erle of Mortaine, sonne to Edmond Duke of Sommerset, arriued at Chierburgh with foure hundreth archers, and three hundreth speares, and passed through Normandie, tyll he came into the Countie of Mayne, where he besieged a Castell, called Saint Inyan, in the which were three hundreth Scottes, besyde French men. This Castell he tooke by a strong assault, and slue all the Scottes, and hanged the Frenchmen, because they were once sworne Englishe, and after brake their othe: and after he gat also another Castell, two miles from Saint Julians, called Alegerche, which was shortly after recouered, and the Lord Camenis which came to the rescue of the same, in the meane way was trapped and taken. Thus the victorie flowed sometyme on the one part, and sometyme on the other, but the treason of the Frenchemen farre surmounted in gettyng, both the pollecy & strength of the English Captaynes: for by the vntruth and falshode of the very Burgesses and inhabitauntes of the townes, of Meaux in Brie, and Saint Susanne, the same yere were solde and deliuered to the French part in the ende of this. xvj. yere.

This yere king Henry caused a solempne obite and terrement to be kept within Paules Church of London, for Sigismond the Emperour, who also was knight of the Garter.

1438 This yere happened many vntemperate stormes, whereof rose suche a 17 skarcitie, that wheate was solde at three shillynges foure pence the Bushell, wine at. xij. pence the Gallon, Bay salt at. xiiij. pence the Bushell, and mault at. xiij. shillynges foure pence the quarter, and all other graynes were sold of an excessiue price, aboue the olde custome.

In the Moneth of June, the Erle of Huntyngton (as Stewarde of Guyen) with two thousand Archers, and foure hundreth speares, was sent into Gascoyn, as a supplement to the Countrie, and the Cõmons of the same. For the king of England and his counsaile, were enformed that the Erle of Dumoys, lay on the Frontiers of Tholose, secretely by rewardes and fayre promises, entisyng and prouokyng diuers townes in Guien to become french and leaue the Englishe nacion. Wherefore, this Erle (like a pollitike warriour) altered not onely the Captaynes in euery towne and Citie, but also remoued the Magistrates, and chaunged the officers, from towne to towne, and from rowme to rowme, so that by this meanes at that tyme, the Erle of Dumoys lost both trauaile and cost. In the same moneth also, Sir Richard Wooduile, Sir William Chamberlain, Sir William Peyto, and Sir William Storie, with a thousand men, were sent to stuffe the townes in Normandie, which surely at that tyme had thereof great neede: for the Englishe Captaynes had small confidence in the Normans, and not to much in some of their awne Nacion. For that harlot bribery, and her felow couetousnesse, ran so fast abroad with French Crownes, that vneth any creature, (without an especiall grace) could holde either hand close, or purse shut, such a strong percer is monie, and such a gredie glotton is auarice. You haue heard before, howe that king Charles heart by gettyng of Paris, was set vpon a merye Pinne, and thought dayly that all thinges more and more, would both apply to his purpose, and folow his appetite. Which inuented imagination, sodainly both deceyued him, and also abated his haute courage & prowde stomacke.

Two shrewd companions.

For

For sodainly there arose a straunge storme, and a quick pirie, so mischieuous and so pernicious, that nothing more execrable, or more to be abhorred, could happen in any christian Region. Which seditious tempest, if wise counsaile had not with all speede repressed, no doubt, but king Charles, and the whole publike welth of Fraunce, had bene turned vp, and clene ouerthrowne. For Lewes Dolphin of Uien, and heyre apparant to king Charles, a yong prince of a froward stomacke and euill condicions, desyryng libertie, and to be out of warde and rule, with such as were of his nature and condicions, began to conspire agaynst his father, and soueregne Lord. The chiefe of this vngracious faction with him, were John Duke of Alaunson, and John Duke of Burbon. These confederates gathered together a great power, and the Dolphyn tooke vpon him, the rule and gouernaunce of the Realme orderyng causes, not in his fathers name, nor by his authoritie, but after his awne will, affection, and phantasie. When king Charles his father, had knowlege of this vnnaturall disobedience, and insolent & proude doyngs, he was (and no marualle) greatly moued with this sodaine commocion: thinkyng himselfe borne, and predestinate to trouble, remembryng that it was no small thing, in his awne Countrey so many yeres, both with straungers, and with his awne Nacion, to fight and striue for rule and dignitie, but nowe to be constrayned to contend and make warre with his awne sonne, for the Crowne and Regiment of his realme and Dominion. Yet these thinges did not bring him, beyng a man of great wit and counsaile, dayly troubled and vnquieted with calamities and displeasures, into vtter dispayre, or extreme wanhope: but like a politike prince, determinyng to withstand and resist the smoke at the begynnyng, before the fyre and flame brast out abroad, called together all such as he had eyther in great confidence, or especiall fauour, communicating to them all his inwarde thoughtes and priuie purposes. After long consultacion had, it was agreed by the most part, that this sore was more mete to be cured by politique and wittie handlyng, rather then by force, and dent of sworde. Wherefore, letters were written, and postes were sent to euery Citie and Borough, straightly prohibityng all and singuler persons, either to heere, or obey, any precept or commaundement, set forth or published by the Dolphyn himselfe, or by other, or in his name, and all offences done in that confederacie, were by open proclamacion freely forgeuen and remitted. And beside this, diuerse graue and sage persons, were sent to the Dolphyn, and his alies, to common and conclude a peace, and reconciliacion betweene the French king and them, declaryng to them, that their ciuile warre, and inward dissencio, was the very meane to cause their enemies, vtterly to plague and destroy their natiue Country, which was almost desolate, & brought into subiection, by the continuall practised war before. By which meanes and persuasions, the knot of this seditious faction, was losed and dissolued: and the king with his sonne, and other confederates, openly agreed and apparauntly pacified. And so the spring of these mischieuous sect, was stopped and repulsed, or the flood had any thing encreased, or flowen farther.

Lewes Dolphyn of Uien conspired against king Charles the French king beyng his father.

The English men (which euer sought their aduauntage) herying of this domesticall diuision in the realme of Fraunce, raysed an army, and recouered againe diuers townes, which were stollen from them before by the Frenche nacion: and made great prouision to recouer againe the Citie of Paris, but when they heard that the Dolphyn was returned againe to his father, and that all his Mates were ioyned with the French king, they left of from that enterprise, and reuoked their purpose.

The conduyt in Fletestret.

This yere the Conduyt in Fletestrete in London was begon to be builded by Sir William Eestfield knight, and late Maioz of London, and the same was finished at his costes and charges, without any charge of the Citie, by the handes of his executoꝛs.

In the Month of Nouember this present yere, there was such a great frost, and after that so deepe a snowe, that all the ground was couered with white, and al the diches hardened and frosen, which weather put the English men in comfoꝛt to recouer againe the towne of Ponthoise, by the French king gotten befoꝛe, by coꝛrupting with money diuers Burgesses of the towne. Wherefoꝛe the Englishemen being clothed all in white, with John Loꝛde Cliffoꝛde their Capitaine, came in the night to the diches, and passed them without daunger, by reason of the frost, and sodaynely scaled the walles, slue the watche, and tooke the towne with many profitable prisoners. When this towne was thus gotten, Loꝛde Richard Beauchampe Erle of Warwike and Regent of Fraunce, died in the Castell of Roan, and was conueied into England, and with solempne ceremonies was buryed in his College of Warwike, in a very solempne and sumptuous Sepulture.

The death of the Erle of Warwike Regent of Fraunce.

Then was the Duke of Yoꝛke agayne made Regent of Fraunce, which accompanied with the Erle of Oxfoꝛde, the Loꝛde Burchier, called the Erle of Ewe, Sir James of Oꝛmond, the Loꝛde Clinton, and dyuers other Noble men, sayled into Noꝛmandy: Befoꝛe whose arryuall, the Frenche king beyng soꝛe greeued with the taking of the towne of Ponthoyse, assembled a great army, and besieged the sayde towne himselfe, and made rounde about it Bastiles, Trenches, and diches, and daylie shot oꝛdynaunce, and gaue therevnto dyuers great and fierce assautes. But John Loꝛd Clifford, lyke a valyaunt Capitayne defended the towne with such valyauntnesse, that the French men rather loste then gayned. The Duke of Yoꝛke at his landyng, hauing true knowledge of this siege, sent foꝛ the Loꝛde Talbot, and a great number of souldiours, and so came nere to the towne of Pounthoise, and there encamped himselfe, and sent woꝛde to the French king, that he was there, readie to geue him battayle, if he would come out of his Campe and Bastiles. King Charles was ruled by his counsayle, which in no wise would suffer him to aduenture his person, with men of so lowe and base degree: bydding him to remember, what losses he and hys aunceſters had susteyned, by geuing to the English men battayle: which thing they principally desire, wylling him to keepe his ground still, and to bid them enter at their perill, and in the meane season, to stop the passage of the Riuer of Oyse so that no byttayle could be brought to the Englishe armie by that waye, by which meanes he should not onely obtaine his purpose, but also cause the Englishe men to recule back againe, foꝛ lack of bittayle and succours. The Duke of Yoꝛke perceyuing that the French king was nothing minded to fight, determined to passe ouer the ryuer of Oyse, and so to fight with him in his lodging, wherevpon he remoued his Campe, and appointed the Loꝛd Talbot and other, to make a countenaunce as they would passe the Riuer by foꝛce at the gate of Beaumont, and appointed another company with boates

of timber and leather, and bridges made of cordes and ropes (whereof he had great plentie, caried with him in Chariottes to passe ouer the ryuer benethe the Abbay. While the Lord Talbot made a cry, as though they would assayle the gate, certaine Englishe men passed the water ouer in boates, and drewe the bridge ouer, so that a great number were come ouer, or the Frenche men them espied. When they sawe the chaunce, they ran lyke mad men, to stop the passage, but their labour was lost, and all their paine to no purpose: for the most parte of the Englishe people were sodainely transported, in so much that they chased their enimies by fine force into the towne agayne, and tooke Sir Guilliam de Chastell, Nephew to the Lorde Canehy, and dyuers other gentlemen prisoners. The French men seyng their damnage irrecuperable, returned to the French king, accompting to hym their euill chaunce and vnlucky fortune, which therewith was not a little displeasaunt: and well perceiuyng, that if he taried the comming of the Englishe men he was like to be eyther in great ieoperdy, or sure to sustayne much dishonor and great dammage. Wherefore he remoued his ordinaunce into the Bastile of Saint Martyne, which he had newly made, and leauyng behinde hym the Lorde of Cotigny, Admirall of Fraunce, with three thousand men to kepe the Bastiles, dislodged in the night from Maubuysson and came to Poissye: for if he had taryed still in that place, the Lorde Talbot with certaine of his trustie souldiors, which passed the riuer of Dyse in two small leather boates had eyther slayne or taken hym in his lodging the same night. The Englishe men the next daye in good order of battayle, came before the towne of Pountoise, thinking there to haue found the French king, but he was gone, and in his lodging they founde great ryches, and muche stuffe, which he could not haue space to conuey for feare of ỹ sodaine inuasion. Then the Duke of Yorke with his company entered into the towne, and sent for newe vittayle, and repayred the towres and bulwarkes about the towne, and dyuers times assayled the Bastile of the French men, of the which he passed not greatly because they were not of power, eyther to assault, or stop the vittayles or succours from the towne. The Duke lyeng thus in the towne of Pontoise, was aduertised that the French king and the Dolphin with all the Nobilitie of Fraunce, were lodged in Poysye, wherefore he intendyng once agayne to offer hym battayle, left behinde hym there for Capitayne, syr Geruays Clifton, with a thousand souldiours, and remoued his armie, and came before Poysye, and set himselfe and his men in good order of battayle, readie to fight. There issued out diuers gentlemen, to skirmishe with the Englishe men, but they were sone discomfited, and foure valyaunt horsemen were taken prisoners, and dyuers slayne. The Englishe men perceiuyng the faynt hartes, and colde courage of their enemies, which nothing lesse desyred, then to encounter wyth the English nation in open field, dislodged from Poysye, and came to Mant, and sone after to Roan.

When the Regent and the Lorde Talbot, were returned agayne into Normandy, the French king (for all his euill luck) forgat not the towne of Pontoise, and first he considered what charges he had susteyned, both during the time of the siege, and also in making Bastyles, trenches, and other deuises: and after remembred, that his people, and especially the Parisians (to whome this towne was an euill neighbor) would rayle and say, that he was not able, or lacked courage to get ſo ſmall a towne, or to diſcomfite halfe a handefull of amaſed people. Wherefore theſe things ſet in order, he aſſembled all his puyſſaunce, and returned ſodainely againe to Pontboiſe: where he firſt by aſſault gat the Church, and after the whole towne, and tooke the Capitaine priſoner, and dyuers other Engliſhe men, and ſlue to the number of foure hundred, which deerely ſolde their lyfes: for one French writer affirmeth, that the French king loſt there three thouſand men and mo, and the whole garriſon of the Engliſhe men, was onely a thouſand: ſo they gayned the towne, but they gat no great bootie of men. When the fame of thys victorie was blowen abroade, the hartes of the townes men waxed faynt, in ſo muche that Melune, Corbuell, Eureux, and diuers other townes, yeelded and turned at a prowde crake, or a French bragge, without ſtroke ſtriken, or any blowe geuen.

After theſe hote rages, the weather beganne to waxe more temperate, for king Henry, and king Charles were agreed to ſend Ambaſſadors to common and treate ſome good peace and concluſion betweene them and their realmes. So the king of Englande ſent the Cardinall of Wincheſter, with diuers other noble perſonages of his counſayle to Calice, with whome was alſo ſent Charles Duke of Orleaunce, yet priſoner in Englande, to the entent that he might be both the aucthor of the peace, and procurer of his deliueraunce. The French king ſent the Archebiſhop of Reyns, and the Erle of Dumoys: and the Duke of Burgoyne, ſent the Lorde Creuecuer, and diuers other, becauſe that the Duke of Orleaunce was paſſed the ſea with the Engliſh Ambaſſadors, they would meete in none other place to common, but in Calice. The French Ambaſſadors perceyuing their mind, came to Calice, where the Duke of Orleaunce, gently receyued the Erle of Dumoys (his Baſtard brother) thanking him hartely for his paine taken, in gouerning his countrey, during the time of his captiuity and abſence. Diuers communications were had, as well for the deliueraunce of the Duke, as for a finall peace: in ſo much, that after much conſultyng and little doing, another tyme was appointed for a newe aſſembly, and euery parte to declare to their ſouereigne, the requeſt and deſire of the other. So theſe Ambaſſadors tooke their leaue and departed, and the Engliſhe commiſſioners conueyed agayne the Duke of Orleaunce into England, which had nothing then to pay hys raunſome, and yet he could not be deliuered without payment. The cauſe why theſe commiſſioners did not agree, was (as the French writers ſaye) that the Engliſhe men demaunded, not onely to haue and poſſeſſe peaceably the two Duchies of Aquitayne and Normandy, to their kinges and princes diſcharged of all reſort, ſuperioritie, and ſouereigntie, frankely and freely, againſt the realme of Fraunce, the kings and Gouernors of the ſame for euer: but alſo required to be reſtored to all the townes, Cities, and poſſeſſions, which they, within thirtie yeres next before gone and paſt, had conquered in the realme of Fraunce. The Engliſh men thought that they demaunded but right and reaſon: and the French men, thought their requeſt to be moſt hurtfull to their realme, and auncient glorie. So both parties, rather minding to gayne or ſaue, then to loſe, departed for that time (as you haue heard). After which diet prorroged for a time, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, partly moued in conſcience, to make ſome amendes and recompence to Charles Duke of Orleaunce (then being prisoner in England) for the death of Duke Lewes his father) whome Duke John father to this Duke Philip, shamefully slue, and cruelly murdered in the Citie of Paris) as in the time of king Henry the fourth, is plainely mencioned (and partly intending the aduaunceiment of his niece, Lady Marie daughter to Adolph Duke of Cleue, by the which aliaunce, he trusted surely to knit suche a firme knot, and friendly amitie with the Duke of Orleaunce, that all olde rancor should cease, and all discord should be forgotten: and in their places concord should be stablished, and perpetuall loue embraced) sent messengers into England, to the sayde Duke, declaryng to him his good will, deuise and entent. The which proffer he not onely accepted, but also was most ioyfull thereof. And as some writers affirme, the sayde Duke of Burgoyne payde for his raunsome and delyueraunce foure hundred thousand crownes, but other say three C. M. and so he was deliuered out of Englande into Fraunce at that time, both speaking better Englishe then French, and also swearing, neuer to beare armor agaynst the king of England. After his arriuall in Fraunce, he came to the Duke of Burgoyne his speciall friend, gratifying and thankyng him of his libertie and deliueraunce: and accordyng to his promise and conuention, he maryed the fayre Lady Mary in the towne of S. Omers, on whom he begat a sonne, which after was French king, and called Lewes the xi. After his deliuerance from captiuity he forgat not hys Uncle John Erle of Ingoleline, which had bene as a pledge in Englande for the debt of Duke Lewes of Orleaunce his father, sithe the last yere of king Henry the fourth (as in his storie is declared): but made friends, borowed money, and morgaged land, and so set him at libertie, and brought him into his Countrey: This John engendered Charles, father to Fraunces, the first of that name, which after the death of Lewes the. xi. obteyned the crowne of Fraunce.

Charles

The delyuerye of the Duke of Orleaunce, who had bene long prisoner in England.

Here is to be noted, that olde rancor newely appeased, will commonly spring out agayne: for although the vnhappie diuision, betweene the two noble families of Orleaunce and Burgoyne, were by this great benefite and mariage, for a time geuen ouer and put in oblition, and so continued by the space of twentie yeres and more, yet their children and Cosyns, within few yeres after, fell so farre at square, that the house of Burgoyne was spoyled of the fayrest flower of his garlande, as you shall here afterwarde at large declared, and in especiall in the time of king Fraunces the first, the very heire of the house of Orleaunce, which not onely continually vered with mortall warre, Charles the fift, Emperor of that name, lineall successour to Philip Duke of Burgoyne: but also did as much as in him lay, to depriue the sayde Charles of his honor and possessions (as men writyng their lyues, wil hereafter declare.)

In the beginnyng of this .xix. yere, Richard Duke of Yorke Regent of Fraunce, and gouernor of Normandie, remembryng the great charge, and waightie office to him deliuered and committed, determined (after long consultation) to inuade the territories of his enemies, both by sundrie armies, and in diuers places, to the entent that the French people beyng vered within their awne Countrie and peculiar Dominion, should make no rodes nor enterynges into the Duchie of Normandie, the returnyng whereof, was some what suspicious. This deuise for that season, semed both profitable and necessarie, neceſſarie, wherefore, without long delaying of time, he ſent Robert Lorde Willoughby, with a great crue of ſouldiers, to inuade and deſtroy the Countrie about Amias, and John Lorde Talbot, was appointed to beſiege the towne of Depe, and he himſelfe, accompanied with Edmond Duke of Sommerſet, ſet forward into the Duchie of Aniow. The Lorde Willoughby, according to his commiſſion, entered into the Countrie to him appointed, and to the entent that his trauaile ſhould not be eſpyed nor knowen, he ſtraightly forbad and inhibited all maner of fire and burnyng of townes, which is the moſt open and plaine token of warre and inuaſion. By reaſon whereof the poore payſantes and ruſticall people going abroade without feare or ſuſpition of euill, were ouerronne or taken with the horſemen, or they could attaine to any towne, or forcelet: ſo that innumerable people were ſlaine, and taken, or they heard any tidynges of their enemies approchyng. The French men in the garriſons adioynyng, aſtonied at the clamor and crie of the poore people, iſſued out in good order, and manfully ſet on their enemies. The fight was ſore, and the victorie long and doubtfull: But in concluſion, the French men ſeeyng their people in the forefront of the battaile, to be killed without mercie, like men deſperate turned their backes and fearefully fled, the Engliſhe men folowed, and ſlue many in the chaſe, and ſuch as eſcaped the ſworde were robbed and ſpoyled, by Lewes Erle of Saint Paule, which was commyng to ayde the Engliſhe nacion. In this conflict were ſlaine, aboue fiue hundred men of armes, and a greater number taken: ſo the Lord Willoughby, like a victorious Captein, with riche ſpoyle and good priſoners, returned againe to the Citie of Roan. The Dukes of Yorke and Sommerſet, lykewiſe entered into the Duchie of Aniow, and Countie of Mayne, deſtroiyng townes, ſpoilyng the people, and with great pray and profite, repayred again into Normandie. The Duke of Sommerſet, not filled with this gayne, entered into the Marches of Britayn, and tooke by a fierce aſſault, the towne of Gerche, apperteinyng to the Duke of Alaunſon, and ſpoyled and brent the ſame, and after that, departed to Bonzay, where he ſoiourned two monethes, from whence he ſent daily men of warre, which deſtroyed and waſted the Countreys of Aniow, Traonnoys and Chatragonnoys.

The French king in all haſt, ſent the Marſhall of Loyache, with foure thouſand men, to reſiſt the inuaſions of the Duke of Sõmerſet, which Capteyne determined to ſet on the Duke and his people, in the dead tyme of the night. This enterpryce was not ſo ſecrete, but it was reueled to the Duke, which marched forwarde, and met the French men halfe way, and after long fight, by fine force they were manfully diſcomfited, and they ſlue a hundreth perſonnes and mo, and tooke captiues. lxij. whereof the chiefe were the Lord Dauſigny, Sir Lewes de Buell, and all the other almoſt, were Knightes and Eſquiers. After this encounter, the Duke tooke the Towne of Beamot le Vicount, and manned al the fortreſſes on the frontiers of his enemies, and with riche bootyes, and welthie captiues came againe to the Duke of Yorke.

During theſe fortunate chaunces and victories, the Lorde Talbot alſo, the vnweried Chieftain and manly warriour, enuironed the towne of Depe, with depe trenches, and great mountaynes, and did ſet vp vpon the Mount de Boulet, a ſtrong and defenſible Baſtile, at which tyme was Capteyne of the ſame towne, Charles de Maretz, a man of more force in battaile, then polletike

polletike in defence of a siege: for the Englishemen beyng a small number, had to theim deliuered with fayre wordes, and faint strokes, the Castell of Charlemeynyll, and diuerse other fortresses adioynyng to the towne. During the siege, many encounters were had, and many great assaultes geuen, the Englishemen sometime saued, and sometime gayned, but the most losse lighted on the Frenchmen for a while. But of three Capteynes sent forth at one tyme (as you before haue heard) all cannot returne with egall honour, and euen botie. For the Lord Talbot perceiuyng the towne of Depe, to be strongly defended, both with men, vitaile, and ordinaunce, and that he lacked all the fayre furnitures for the accomplishyng of his stout enterprice, deliuered the custodie of the Bastile, with the gouernaunce of the siege, to his Bastard sonne, a valeaunt yong man, and departed to Roan, for ayde, money, and munitions. The French king, was quickly aduertised of the Lord Talbots absence, and of the estate of the Englishe men: wherefore without delay, he meanyng not to lose so great a pray, sent his eldest sonne Lewes Dolphyn of Vien accompanied with the Bastard of Orleaunce, called the Erle of Dumoys, and diuerse other nobles of Fraunce, to the number of .xv. thousand persons, well armed, & no lesse garnished with all thinges necessary for theyr purpose. Three dayes they assayled the Bastile, and so many times they were put back, but poulder fayled in the fortresse, and weapon wherewith to defend, was very scant, so that in conclusion, the Englishe men were vanquished, and the Bastile taken, and in it the Bastard Talbot, Sir William Peytow, and Sir John Repeley, which were shortly after redemed: The other English souldiers seyng the Bastile gayned, stood all day in good order of battaile, and in the night politikely returned to Roan, without losse or dammage. At this assault, the French men say, that they slue two hundreth Englishemen, and denie not, but they lost fiue hundreth persons, and by this meanes, the one nacion lost the Bastile, and the other saued the towne, to the great displeasure of the Lorde Talbot.

While these thinges were a doyng, Phillip Duke of Burgoyn, hauyng an enuious heart, at the glory and fortunate successe of the Englishe people, intendyng to bereue them of one of their assured friendes, called Lewes of Lurenborough Erle of Saint Paule, made sharpe warre vpon his Countreyes, and tooke diuers townes and fortresses from him, so that in conclusion more for feare, then for loue, he vtterly refused his fayth and promise, made to the Duke of Bedford his brother in lawe, and turned to the Frenche part, and became a luke warme enemy to the realme of England. The losse of this friend and necessarie neighbour, not a little grieued king Henry and hys counsaile: Howbeit they made such purueyaunce and prouision, by discrete counsaile, that if he of euill will, would do to them little good, yet he of malice should do to them no great hurt or damage.

Lewes of Lurenborough refuseth y Englishe and returneth to the French.

The Englishe Capteynes beyng in Guyen, hauyng knowledge of the valeaunt doynges of their Countrimen in the realme of Fraunce, determined to do some notable and noble enterprice on the French coastes adioynyng to Aquitain: and so they besieged the strong towne of Tartas, belongyng to the Lorde Delabreth, their olde and auncient enemie. The Capteynes and gouernours of the towne considering their weakenesse, and the force of the Englishe men, tooke this appoyntment with the Englishe Capteynes, that the

the towne should remaine neuter, and for ỹ assurance therof, they deliuered Cadet the sonne of the Lorde Delabreth in pledge, vpon this condition: that if the Lord Delabreth would not assent to their agreement, then he should signifie his refusall, to the Englishe Capteynes, within three monethes nert ensuyng: and he to haue his pledge, and they to do their best. The Frenche king, at the request of the Lordes of Guyen, which were not able to defende themselues, toke this matter in hande, and caused the Lord Delabreth to certifie his disagrement to the Erle of Huntingdon, Lieuetenant for the king of England, in the Duchie of Aquitaine. And to please the great Lordes of Guien, he assembled. lx. thousand men, and came to Tholose, and so to Tartas: to whom the Chieftaynes of the towne, seyng no succours comming, rendered the towne, and Cadet Delabreth, which was left there as a pledge, was deliuered, the French king after the yelding of Tartas, remoued to S. Seuere, a strong towne in Gascoyn, but smally peopled with men of warre, which he toke by force, and slue three hundreth persons, and toke Sir Thomas Rampstone prisoner. After this towne gayned, he with all his power besieged the Citie of Arques, and toke the Bulwarke of the same, which was smally defended, and sone gotten. The inhitauntes of the towne, began sore to be afrayed, and came to the Lorde Mountferrand, Capteine for the king of Englande, requiryng him to haue mercie vpon them, and to render the towne to the French king, vpon some honest couenaunt or composicion. The Capteyne perceiuyng the faint heartes of the Gascoynes, and knowyng that without their ayde, he was not able to resist the puissaunce of the Frenche king, toke an agrement, and departed with all the Englishe crue to Burdeaux, where he found the Erle of Longuile, Capdaw of Buesse, and Sir Thomas Rampston, which was a little before deliuered.

After this, the fortresses of Rioll and Mermandie, yelded them to the French king. Although these townes thus submitted them to him, yet he had them not long, nor made much tarying in the Duchie of Guien, for the Englishe men not onely prohibited the Gascoynes to minister to his armie vitaile, and sustenaunce, but also gat into their handes, and toke such vitailes as were conueyed to him from Tholose and Poyters: So that in maner constrayned with famine and lacke of prouision, he retired his armie againe into Fraunce. After whose departure, the English Captaines recouered again the Citie of Arques, and the other townes by the Frenche king gayned, and tooke prisoner his Lieutenant, called Reignault Guillam the Burgoyen, and many other Gentlemen, and all the meane Souldiours, were eyther slaine or hanged.

While the Frenche king was in Guien, the Lorde Talbot tooke the towne of Couchete, and after marched towarde Gayllardon, which was besieged by the Bastard of Orleaunce Erle of Dumoys: which Erle heeryng of the English mens approchyng, raysed his siege and saued himselfe. A little before this enterprice, the French men had taken the towne of Eureux, by treason of a fisher. Sir Fraunces Arragonoys heeryng of that chaunce, apparelled sire strong men, like rusticall people with sackes and baskets, as carters of corne and vitaile, and sent them to the Castell of Cornill, in the which diuers English men were kept as prisoners: and he with an imbushment of Englishe men lay in a Valey nie to the fortresse. These sire Companions entered into the Castell, vnsuspected and not mistrusted, and straight came to the Chamber of the Capteyne, and layde handes vpon him, geuyng knowlege thereof to their vnbusheinent, which sodainly entered the Castell, and slue and toke all the French men prisoners, and set at libertie al the Englishe men, which thing done, they set the Castell on fire, and departed with great spoyle to the Citie of Roan. Thus the Ladie victorie, sometime smiled on the Englishe part, and sometime on the French syde. Thus one gayned this day, and lost on the next. Thus fortune chaunged, and thus chaunce happened, accordyng to the olde prouerbe, saiyng: in warre is nothing certaine, and victorie is euer doubtfull.

Nowe let vs leaue the Marciall feates, practised betwene the Englishe and French Nacion, in the Region of Fraunce, and speake a little of a smoke that rose in England, which after grew to a great fire and terrible flame, to the destruction of many a noble man. You haue heard before, howe the Duke of Gloucester sore grudged at the prowde doynges of the Cardinall of Winchester, and howe the Cardinall likewise, sore enuied and disdayned at the rule of the Duke of Gloucester, and howe by the meanes of the Duke of Bedford, their malice was appeased, & eche was reconciled to other, in perfit loue & amitie, to al mens outward iudgements. After which concorde made, the Cardinall and the Archebishop of Yorke did many things without the consent of the king or the Duke, beyng (duryng the minoritie of the prince) gouernor and protector of the realme, wherewith the Duke (like a true harted prince) was neyther content nor pleased: and so declared in writyng to the king, certein articles, wherein the Cardinall and the Archebishop had offended, which articles were here to long to reherse, and specially for that they were neyther regarded nor tooke any effect.

A new variance betwene the Duke of Gloucester, and the Bysshop of Winchester.

When the king had read the articles, he committed the hering thereof to his counsayle, whereof the most parte were spirituall persons, so what for feare, and what for fauour the matter was winked at, and dalyed out, and nothing sayde to it: & fayre countenaunce was made to the Duke, as though no displeasure had bene taken, nor no malice borne eyther in heart or in remembraunce agaynst him. But venime will once breake out, and inwarde grudge will sone appere, which was this yere to all men apparaunt: for diuers secret attempts were aduaunced forward this season, agaynst the noble Duke Humfrey of Gloucester, a farre of, which in conclusion came so nere, that they bereft him both of lyfe and lande, as you shall hereafter more manyfestly perceyue. For first this yere, dame Elyanour Cobham, wyfe to the sayde Duke, was accused of treason, for that she by sorcerie and enchaunment, entended to destroy the king, to the entent to aduaunce and promote her husbande to the crowne: vpon thys she was examined in Saint Stephens Chapell, before the Bishop of Canterbury, and there by examination conuict and iudged to doe open penaunce, in three open places, within the Citie of London, and after that adiudged to perpetuall prison in the Isle of Man, vnder the keeping of Sir John Stanley knight. At the same season were arrested as ayders and counsaylers to the sayde Duches, Thomas Southwell priest, and Chanon of saint Stephens in Westminster, John Hum priest, Roger Bolyngbroke, a cunning Nicromancier, and Margery Iourdayne, surnamed the Witch of Eye, to whose charge it was layde, that they at the requeſt of the Duches, had deuiſed an Image of waxe, repꝛeſenting the king, which by their ſoꝛcery, a little and little conſumed, entendyng thereby in concluſion to waſt, and deſtroy the kings perſon, and ſo to bꝛing him to death, foꝛ the which treaſon, they were adiudged to dye, and ſo Margery Joꝛdayne was bꝛent in Smithfield, and Roger Bolyngbꝛoke was dꝛawen and quartered at Tybozne, taking vpon his death, that there was neuer any ſuch thing by them imagined, John Hum had his pardō, and Southwell died in the towꝛe befoꝛe execution: the Duke of Glouceſter toke all things pacíently, and ſayde little.

The counſayle of England, foꝛgat not the late enterpꝛiſe of the french king, done in the Duchie of Guien, wherefoꝛe to foꝛtifie the countrey, leaſt he peraduenture would attempt agayne a like iozney, they ſent thether Syꝛ William Wooduile, with eyght hundꝛed men, to foꝛtefie the frontiers, tyll a greater armie might be aſſembled: And farther made publique pꝛoclamation, that all men which would tranſpoꝛt, oꝛ carp any cozne, cheeſe, oꝛ other vittayle into the parties of Acquitayne, ſhould pay no maner of cuſtome oꝛ tallage, which lycence cauſed that countrey to be well furniſhed of all things neceſſarie and conuenient. About this ſeaſon, the king remembꝛing the valiaunt ſeruice, and noble actes of John Lozde Talbot, created him Erle of Shꝛewſourie, and with a company of thꝛee thouſand men, ſent him agayne into Nozmandie, foꝛ the better tuicion of the ſame, which neyther foꝛgat his duetie, noꝛ foꝛſlowed his buſineſſe, but dayly labozed and houꝛely ſtudied, how to moleſt and dammage his enimies.

John Lozde Talbot created Erle of Shꝛewſbury

In thys yeꝛe dyed in Guyen, the Counteſſe of Comyng, to whome the French king, and alſo the Erle of Armynake pꝛetended to be heiꝛe, in ſo much that the Erle entered into all the landes of the ſayde Lady, as heꝛy inheritour to her of right, and toke homage of the people of the countrey. But to haue a Rowlande to reſiſt an Oliuer: he ſent ſolempne Imbaſſadoꝛs to the king of England, offering him his daughter in mariage, not onely pꝛomiſing him ſiluer hilles, and golden Mountaynes with her, but alſo would be bound to delyuer into the king of Englands hands, all ſuch Caſtels and towones, as he oꝛ his aunceſtoꝛs, deteyned from him, within the whole Duchy of Acquitayn oꝛ Guyen, eyther by conqueſt of his pꝛogenitoꝛs, oꝛ by gift oꝛ deliuery of any French king: offeꝛing farther to ayde the ſame king with money, foꝛ the recouery of other Cities, within the ſayde Duchye, from him and his aunceſters, by the French kings pꝛogenitoꝛs, the Lozde de Albꝛeth, and other Lozdes of Gaſcoyne, vniuſtly kept and wꝛongfully withholden. Thys offer ſeemed both pꝛofitable, and honoꝛable to king Henry and his realme, and ſo the Imbaſſadoꝛs, were both well heard, and louingly entertayned, and in concluſion, with a gentle aunſwere (not without great rewardes) they departed into their countrey: after whome were ſent foꝛ the concluſion of the ſayde mariage into Guyen, Sir Edward Hulle, Syꝛ Robert Roos, and doctoꝛ John Grafton Deane of Saint Seuerines with an honoꝛable company, which (as all Engliſhe Cronographiers affirme) both concluded the mariage, & by pꝛoxie affied the yong Lady. The French king was not ignoꝛant of all theſe concluſions, wherefoꝛe he diſdeyning that the Erle of Armynack, ſhould both vſurpe agaynſt him the Countie of Coming, and alſo ioyne himſelfe with his moꝛtall enemie the king of England: To re-

couer his right, and to punishe his rebell, he sent Lewes his eldest sonne Dolphyn of Vyen, into Couergne with a puissaunt army, which sodainely tooke the Erle of Arminack at the Isle in Jordayne, and his yongest sonne, and both his daughters, and by force obteyned the Countries of Arminack, Lonuergne, Rouergne and Moulleson, beside the Cities of Seuerac and Cadenac, and chased the Bastard of Arminack out of his Countrey, and constituted gouernour of all those seigniories, Sir Theobald de Walpergne, Bailif of Lyon. So by reason of this infortunate chaunce, the mariage concluded was differred, yea, and so long differred, that it neuer tooke effect, as you shall heare more playnely declared.

This yere the Steple of Paules Church in London, was set on fyre by lightning, and lastly quenched by the great labour of many.

Thus while England was vnquieted, and Fraunce sore vexed, by spoile slaughter and burning, all christendome lamented the continuall destruction of so noble a realme, and the effusion of so much christian bloud, wherfore to appease the mortall warre, so long continuyng betweene these two puyssaunt kings, all the princes of christendome so much labored and trauayled, by their Orators and Ambassadors, that the frostie hartes of both the parties were somewhat mollified, and their indurate stomacks greatly asswaged. So there was a great diet appointed, to be kept at the Citie of Tours in Tourayne, where for the king of England appered, William de la Pole Erle of Suffolke, Doctor Adame Molyns, keeper of the kings priuie seale, and Robert Lorde Roos, and diuers other: And for the French king were appointed, Charles Duke of Orleaunce, Lewes de Burbon Erle of Vandosme, and great Master of the French kings houshold, Sir Piers de Brezell Stewarde of Poytou, and Bartram Beaurian, Lorde of Pricignye. There were also sent thether, Ambassadors from the Empire, from Spaine from Denmarke, and from Hungary, to be Mediators betweene these two princes. The assemble was great, but the cost was much greater, in so much that euery parte for the honor of their prince, and praise of their countrie, set forth themselues, as well in fare, as apparell, to the vttermost point and highest prick. Many meetings were had, and many things moued to come to a finall peace, and mutuall concorde. But in conclusion, for many doubtes and great ambiguities, which rose on both parties, a finall concord could not be agreed, but in hope to come to a peace, a certaine truce as well by sea as by lande was concluded by the commissioners for .xviij. monethes, which afterwarde agayne was prolonged to the yere of oure Lorde. 1449. if in the meane season it had not beene violated and broken, as hereafter shall be declared.

A truce for xviij Monethes.

In the treating of thys truce, the Erle of Suffolke, extending his commission to the vttermost, without assent of his associates, imagened in hys phantasie, that the next way to come to a perfite peace, was to moue some mariage betwene the French kings kinswoman, and king Henry his souereigne: and because the French king had no daughter of ripe age, to be coupled in matrimonie with the king his master, he desired to haue the Ladye Margaret, Cosyn to the French king, and daughter to Reyner Duke of Aniow, callyng himselfe king of Sicile, Naples, and Jerusalem, hauing onely the name and style of the same, without any peny profite, or foote of possession. This mariage was made straunge to the Erle a good space, in so much that he repented him of the first motion, but yet lyke a bolde man, entending not to take a foyle in so great a matter, ceassed not still daylie to sollicite and aduaunce forward his cause. The wily frenchmen perceyuing the ardent affection of the Erle, towarde the conclusion of the mariage, declared to him that this mariage was not like to come to conclusion, as he desired, because the king his Master, occupied a great parte of the Duchie of Aniow, and the Citie of Mauns, and the whole Countey of Mayne, apperteyning (as they sayde) to king Reyner, father to the damosell.

The Erle of Suffolke (I can not say) eyther corrupted with bribes, or to much affectionate to this vnprofitable mariage, condiscended and agreed to their motion, that the Duchie of Aniow, and the Countie of Mayne, should be released and deliuered to the king her father, demaunding for her mariage neyther penny nor farthing (as who would say) that this newe affinitie excelled ryches, and surmounted Golde and precious stone. And to the entent that of this truce, might ensue a finall concord, a day of enterueue or meeting was appointed betwene the two kinges, in a place conuenient, betwene Charters and Roan. When these things were concluded, the Erle of Suffolke with his company, thinking to haue brought ioyfull tydinges, to the whole realme of England, departed from Toures, and so by long iorneys arriued at Douer, and came to the king at Westminster, and there openly before the king and his counsayle, declared how he had taken an honorable truce, for the safegarde of Normandy, and the wealth of the realme, out of which truce, he thought, yea, and doubted not, but a perpetuall peace and a finall concorde should shortly proceede and growe out. And much the sooner, for that honorable mariage, that inuincible alliaunce, that godly affinitie, which he had concluded: omitting nothing, which might extoll and set forth the personage of the Ladie, not forgetting any thing of the nobilitie of her kinne, nor of her fathers high stile: as who would say, that she was of suche an excellent bewtie, and of so high a parentage, that almost no king or Emperour was worthie to be her make. Although this mariage pleased well the king, and dyuers of his counsayle, and especially such as were adherents, and fautors to the Erle of Suffolke, yet Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, Protector of the realme, repugned and resisted as muche as in him lay, this newe alliaunce and contriued matrimonie: alleging that it was neyther consonant to the lawe of God nor man, nor honorable to a prince, to infringe and breake a promise or contract, by him made and concluded, for the vtilitie and profite of his realme and people, declaring that the king by his Ambassadors sufficiently instructed and authorised, had concluded and contracted a mariage betwene his highnes, and the daughter of the Erle of Armynack, vpon conditions both to him and his realme, as much profitable as honorable. Which offers and conditions, the sayde Erle sithe his comming out of his captiuitie & thraldome is redy to yelde and performe, saying: that it was more conuenient for a Prince, to mary a wyfe with ryches and friends, then to take a make with nothing, and disherite himselfe and hys realme of olde rightes and auncient seigniories. The Duke was not heard, but the Erles doings were condiscended vnto & allowed. Which fact engendered such a flame, that it neuer went out, till bothe the parties with many other other were consumed and slayne, to the great vnquietnesse of the king and his realme. And for the performaunce of these conclusions, the French king sent the Erle of Vandosme, great master of his house, and the Archebyshop of Reyns, the first peere of Fraunce, and dyuers other into England, which were ioyously receyued, and friendly enterteyned. Which Imbassadors, after instruments on both parties, sealed and deliuered (not vnrewarded) returned into their Countrie. When these things were thus done, the king both for the honour of his Realme, and to assure to himselfe more speciall friendes, he created Lorde John Holland Erle of Huntyngdon, Duke of Exceter, as his father was, and Humfrey Erle of Stafford, was made Duke of Buckingham, and Henry Erle of Warwike, was erected to the tytle of Duke of Warwike, and the Erle of Suffolke, made Marques of Suffolke, which Marques with his wife, and many honorable personages of men and women richely adorned, both with apparell and Jewels, hauing with them many costly Chariots, and gorgeous horselitters, sayled into Fraunce, for the conueyaunce of the nominated Quene, into the realme of England. For king Reyner her father, for all his long stile, had to short a purse, to send his daughter honorably to the king her spouse.

This noble company came to the Citie of Toures in Tourayne, where they were honorably receyued, both of the French king, and of the king of Sicile. Where the Marques of Suffolke, as procurator to king Henry, espoused the sayde Lady, in the Church of saint Martins. At which mariage were present, the father and mother of the bride, the French king himselfe, which was Uncle to the husbande, and the French Quene also, which was Awnte to the wyfe. There were also the Dukes of Orleaunce, of Calaber, of Alaunson, and of Britayne, seauen Erles. xij. Barons. xx. Bishops, beside knightes and gentlemen. There were triumphaunt Justes, costly feastes, and delicate banquets: but all pleasure hath an ende, and euery ioye is not continuall. So that after these high solempnities finished, and these honorable ceremonies ended, the Marques had the Lady Margaret to him deliuered, which in great estate, he conueyed through Normandy to Deepe, and so transported her into Englande, where she landed at Portesmouth, in the Moneth of Aprill. This woman excelled all other, as well in beautie and fauour, as in wyt and pollicie, and was of stomacke and courage, more lyke to a man, then a woman. Sone after her arriuall, she was conueyed to the towne of Southwike in Hamshire, where she with all nupciall ceremonies, was coupled in matrimonie to king Henry the first of that name. After which mariage, she was with great triumph, conueyed to London, and so to Westminster, where vpon the .xxx. day of May, she with all solemnitie therevnto apperteyning, was crowned Queene of this Noble realme of Englande. 1444 / 23

A mariage made betweene the Ladye Margaret daughter to Reyner king of Sicill and Jerusalem, and the King of Englande.

This mariage seemed to many, both infortunate and vnprofitable to the realme of England, and that for many causes. First the king had with her not one pennie, and for the fetchyng of her, the Marques of Suffolke demaunded a whole fiftene in open Parliament: also for her mariage, the Duchie of Iniow, the Citie of Maums, and the whole Countie of Mayne, were deliuered and released to king Reyner her father, which Countries were the very stayes, and backestandes to the Duchie of Normandie. Furthermore for this mariage, the Erle of Arminacke tooke such great displeasure, that he became bitter enemie to the realme of England, and was the chiefe cause, that the Englishmen were expulsed out of the whole Duchie of Aquitain, and lost both the Countries of Gascoyne and Guyen. But most of all it should seme, that God with this matrimonie was not content. For after this spousage, the kinges friendes fell from him, both in England and in Fraunce, the Lordes of his Realme fell in diuision among themselues, the Commons rebelled agaynst their souereigne Lorde, and naturall Prince, fieldes were foughten, many thousandes slaine, and finally the king deposed, and his sonne slaine, and this Queene sent home againe, with as much miserie and sorowe, as she was receyued with pompe and triumph, such is worldly vnstablenesse, and so waueryng is false flatteryng fortune.

Duryng the tyme of this truce, Richard Duke of Yorke, and diuers other Captaynes, repayred into England, both to visite their wiues, children and friends, and also to consult what should be done, if the truce ended.

All soules College. Barnards College.

This yere, as I finde noted by George Lilye, Henry Chicheley Archbishop of Cauntorbury dyed, who in his life time builded two houses, for studentes in the Universitie of Oxford, the one called all Soules College, and the other Barnard College.

And nowe to consult for some good order to be taken for Fraunce, the king called his high Court of Parliament, in the which aboue all thinges, it was concluded, diligently to foresee, that Normandie should be well furnished and strongly defended, before the terme of the truce should be expired: for it was openly knowen, that the French king was redie in all thinges, to make open warre, if no peace or abstinence of warre, were agreed or concluded. For which consideracion, money was graunted, men were appointed, and a great armie gathered together, and the Duke of Sommerset was appointed Regent of Normandie, and the Duke of Yorke thereof discharged.

The Duke of Somerset made Regent of Fraunce.

In which Parliament, to please the people withal, it was enacted, that when wheate was solde for six shillynges. viij. pence the quarter, and Rie for foure shillynges, and Barlie for three shillynges, it should be lawfull to euery man to cary the sayde kindes of corne into the parties beyond the Sea, without licence, so it were not to the kings enemies or rebelles: which Act king Edwarde the fourth for the vtilitie of his people, approued and confirmed.

The Marques of Suffolke is highly fauoured of the Queene.

The Marques of Suffolke, beyng in high fauour with the king, and in no lesse grace with Queene Margaret, for concludyng the marryage betwene them two, somewhat infected with the seede of vainglorie, and thinking that his proceedynges and doynges in Fraunce (duryng the tyme of his legacion) had as well pleased all men, as they pleased himselfe, the seconde day of June, in the first session of this Parliament, before all the Lordes spirituall and temporall, in the higher house assembled, openly, eloquently, and boldely, declared his paine, trauaile and diligence, which he had taken and susteyned of late tyme, in the realme of Fraunce, aswell for the takyng and concludyng a truce or abstinence of warre, betwene the realmes of England and Fraunce, as in makyng of the mariage betwene the king his souereigne Lorde and theirs, and the noble Princes Ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of Sicile and Hierusalem: Openyng also to them, that the sayde truce should expire the first day of Aprill next commyng, except a finall peace or a further further truce were concluded in the meane season: aduisyng them to prouide and foresee all thinges necessary for the warre (as though no concord should succeede, nor agreement could take place) least the French men perceiuyng them vnprouided, would take their aduauntage, and agree neyther to reason nor amitie: saiyng vnto them, that sithe he had admonished the king, & them, accordyng to his dutie and allegeaunce, if any thing quayled, or if daunger ensued, he was thereof innocent and guiltlesse, and had acquited himselfe like a louyng subiect, and a faythfull counsaylor, praiyng the Lordes to haue it in remembraunce. Likewise the morowe after, he with certeyne Lordes, discended into the common house, where he declared agayn all the sayd matters, to the knightes, Citizens, and Burgesses, omittyng nothing that might sound to his glorie, nor openyng any thing which might redound to his dispraise: praiyng the Commons for his discharge, that aswell all his doyngs and procedynges in the kinges affayres beyonde the Sea, as also his aduertisement and counsaile, opened to the Lordes and commons now together assembled, might be by the king and them, enacted and enrolled in the Recordes of the Parliament: Wherevpon the morowe after, William Burley, speaker for the Commons, and all the companie of the neyther house, repayred to the kinges presence, sittyng in his throne, amongest his Lordes in the Parliament Chamber, where the sayde William Burley, by the counsaile of the Commons (whether they did it more for feare then for loue, or were therevnto entised by the Marques friendes, as some men doubted) most humblie commended to the kinges highnesse, the foresayd Marques of Suffolke, and all his actes and notable workes, which he had done, to the pleasure of almightie God, the honour of the king, and the vtilitie of the Realme: as in takyng the truce, concludyng the mariage, and the good admonicion geuen by him in open Parliament, for prouision of warre to be made, duryng the time of truce, least to much trusting of peace, might encourage the Frenche men, the sooner to begin warre and inuasion: beseechyng the kinges highnesse, in the name of the Commons, to imprint in his heart and remembraunce the sayd Marques, and his labors and actes, to his honour and renoume, which should be an example to all other, which the king should call to like seruice, to employ themselues in like endeuor, faythfully and honourably to serue their king and souereigne Lorde: praiyng also the Lordes spiritual and temporal, that they for the considerations before rehersed, woulde vouchsafe to make like petition to the kinges Maiestie, and that all the actes and demeanor of the sayde Marques, might by authoritie of Parliament, be to his honour, and perpetuall fame, in the rolles of the same Parliament, recorded and substancially registred.

At which humble intercession, the Lords, aswell spirituall as temporal, rose from their seates, and on their knees made to the king like request and petition, as they of the commons before were desired: wherevpon the king by the mouth of the Archebishop of Cauntorbury his Chauncelor, made answere, that their requestes were so reasonable and so honourable, that he in no wise could but louyngly accept, & gently allowe the same, saiyng also: that their desyres were to him a singuler pleasure, and an especiall comfort, and that he would from thencefoorth accept and take the sayd Marques to his benigne grace, and especiall fauour, as a person which hath done both true, faythfull, faythfull, and notable seruice to him and to his Realme, to the entent that all men put in like trust, should enforce themselues to do like or better seruice to their souereigne Lorde or Mayster: agreeyng also (accordyng to their requestes and peticions) that the labors, demeanors, diligences, and declaracions of the sayd Marques of Suffolke, and the sayd commendacions and desyres, not onely of the Lordes, but also of the Commons, aswell for the honour of him and his posteritie, as for his acquitall and discharge, should be enacted, and enrolled in the Recordes of the same Parliament, which was so done. This Marques thus gotten vp into fortunes trone, not content with his degree, by the meanes of the Queene was shortly erected to the estate and degree of a Duke, & ruled the king at his pleasure, in somuch that he obteyned the wardeshippes, both of body and landes of the Countesse of Warwike, and of the Ladie Margaret, sole heyre to Iohn Duke of Sommerset, (which Ladie was after mother to king Henry the seuenth) and beside that, caused the king to create Iohn de Foys, sonne to Gaston de Foys, Erle of Longuile, and Capdawe of Buelle, Erle of Kendale: which Iohn had maried his niece, and by his procurement, the king elected into the order of the Garter, the sayd Gaston, and Iohn his sonne, geuyng to the sonne, towardes the maintenaunce of his degre and estate, landes and Castelles in the Duchy of Guien, amountyng to the somme of one thousande poundes by the yere, which landes, name, and stile, the issue and line of the sayd Erle of Kendall at this day haue, and enioy.

The Marques of Suffolke made Duke of Suffolk.

Here a man may beholde, what securitie is in worldly glory, and what constancie is in fortunes implyng: for this Duke of Suffolke, in open Parliament of the Lords praised, of the commons thanked, and into the kings fauour entierly receiued, within foure yeres after, was in the same place, by the commons of the Realme accused of many treasons, misprisions, and offences, done and committed agaynst the king, and the common welth of his realme, and in conclusion, beyng exiled the realme, he was taken vpon the Sea, and made shorter by the head, which chaunce had not happened to him, if he had remembred the counsaile of the Poppyngay, saiyng: when thou thinkest thy selfe in Court most surest, then is it high tyme to get the home to rest.

These thinges beyng in doyng, the French king seyng that the towne of Maunes, and diuers fortresses in Mayne, were not to him deliuered, accordyng to the appoyntment made, gathered together a great number of people, for to recouer the same: whereof the king of England beyng aduertised (least the breche of truce should begin by him) caused the towne to be deliuered, without any force.

A combat betweene a Master and his seruaunt.

This yere an Armorers seruaunt of London, appeled his Master of treason, which offered to be tried by battaile. At the day assigned, the frends of the master, brought him Malmesye and Aqua vite, to comforte him with all, but it was the cause of his and their discomfort: for he poured in so much, that when he came into the place in Smithfelde, where he should fight, both his witte and strength fayled him: and so hee being a tall and hardie personage, ouerladed with hote drinkes, was vanquished of his seruaunt, being but a cowarde and a wretch, whose body was drawen to Tiborne, and there hanged and beheaded.

In which yere was a great insurrection in Norwiche, against the Pri-

of the place, in ſo much that the Citezens kept the gates, againſt the Duke of Norfolke, which came thether to appeaſe the matter: but in concluſion, they opened the gates, and ſubmitted themſelues. The chiefe offenders, were (according to their deſertes) ſtraightly punished, and executed, and the the Maior was diſcharged of his office, and ſir Jhon Clifton was made gouernoure there, till the king had reſtored the Citezens to their auncient lyberties, and franchiſes. This commocion was for certaine newe exactions, which the Prior claymed and toke of the Citezens, contrarie to their auncient freedoms and vſages: but this was not the dewe meane to come to their right and purpoſe, and therefore becauſe they erred and went out of the path, they were by punishment brought againe to a very straight trade, and the right way. In inſurrection in Norwiche.

This yeere Symon Eyre Alderman of London, whoe alſo had beene Maior of the ſame, builded at his owne coſts and charges, the Leaden hall, in the ſaide Citie, and a faire Chapell ioyning to the ſame, chefely to haue the ſame made a ſtore houſe in Sommer, for Wood and Cole to be bought, and there layd vp, and in the winter to be ſolde vnto the poore people at a reaſonable rate, without gaine, the ſtocke beyng ſaued, and he left in ſtocke there one thouſand pounde, which afterward was borowed by king Edward the fourth, and neuer payd againe (as it is ſaid) and ſo that prouiſion decayed.

During the time of this truce or abſtinence of warre, while there was nothing to vexe or trouble the mindes of men within the Realme, a ſodayne miſchiefe, and a long diſcorde, ſprange out, by the meanes of a woman: for king Henry, which raigned at this tyme, was a man of a meeke ſpirite, and of a ſimple witte, preferring peace before warre, reſt before buſineſſe, honeſtie before profite, and quietneſſe before labour. And to the intent, that all men might perceiue, that there coulde be none, more chaſte, more meeke, more holye, nor a better creature: In him raigned chamefaſtneſſe, modeſty, integritie, and pacience to be maruayled at, taking and ſuffering all loſſes, chaunces, diſpleaſures, and ſuch worldly tormentes, in good parte, and wyth a patient maner, as though they had chaunced by his owne faulte, or negligent ouerſight: and he was gouerned of them whome he ſhoulde haue ruled: and brideled of ſuch, whome he ſharpely ſhoulde haue ſpurred: He gaped not for honor, nor thriſted for riches, but ſtudied onelye for the health of hys ſoule: the ſauing whereof, he eſteemed to be the greateſt wiſedome, and the loſſe thereof, the extremeſt folie that coulde be. But on the other parte, the Queene his wife was a woman of a great witte, and yet of no greater wit, then of haute ſtomacke, deſirous of glory, and couetous of honor, and of reaſon, pollicye, counſaill, and other giftes, and talentes of nature, ſhe lacked nothing, nor of diligence, ſtudie, and buſineſſe, ſhe was not vnexpert: but yet ſhe had one pointe of a very woman: for often times, when ſhe was vehement & fully bent in a matter, ſhe was ſodainly like to a wethercock, mutable and turning. This woman perceyning that her huſbande did not frankely rule as he would, but did all thing by the aduiſe and counſayle of Humfrey Duke of Glouceſter, and that he paſſed not much on the auctoritie and gouernaunce of the realme, determined wyth her ſelfe, to take vppon her the rule and regiment, both of the king and his kingdome, and to depriue and remoue out of all rule and auctoritie the ſayde Duke, then called the Lord Protectour

The deſcription of the wife of king Henry.

Protectour of the realme: least men should say and report, that she had neyther wyt nor stomack, which would permit and suffer her husband, being of perfite age and mans estate, like a yong Scholer or innocent Pupile, to be gouerned by the disposition of an other man.

This manly woman, this corageous Queene, ceased not to prosecute forthwith, her inuented imagination and purpose, and practised daylie the furtheraunce of the same. And although this inuention came first of her awne high minde and courage, yet it was furthered and set forward by such as of long time had borne malice to the Duke, for declaring their vntruth as you before haue heard. Which venemous Serpents, and malicious Tigers, perswaded, incensed and exhorted the Quene, to loke well vpon the expenses and reuenewes of the realme, and thereof to call an accompt: affirming plainely that she should euidently perceyue, that the Duke of Gloucester, had not so much aduaunced and preferred the common wealth, and publique vtilitie, as his awne priuate things and peculiar estate. Beside this, Reyner king of Sicile, wrote to his daughter, that she and her husbande should take vpon them the rule and gouernaunce of the realme, and not to be kept vnder, lyke yong wardes and desolate Orphans. The Queene perswaded and encouraged by these meanes, tooke vpon her and her husband, the high power and authoritie ouer the people and subiectes. And although she ioyned her husbande with her in name for a countenaunce, yet she did all, she sayde all, and she bare the whole swinge, as the strong Ore doth, when he is yoked in the plough with a poore sely asse: and first of all she excluded the Duke of Gloucester, from all rule and gouernaunce, not prohibityng suche as she knewe to be his mortall enemies, to inuent and imagine caules and griefes agaynst him and hys: so that by her permission and fauour, dyuers noble men conspired against him, of the which, dyuers writers affirme, the Duke of Suffolke, and the Duke of Buckyngham to be the chiefe, not vnprocured by the Cardinall of Winchester, and the Archebishop of Yorke. Dyuers articles both heynous and odious were layde to hys charge in open counsayle, and in especiall one, that he had caused men adiudged to dye, to be put to other execution, then the law of the land had ordered or assigned: for surely the Duke being very well learned in the law ciuill, detesting malefactors, and punishyng their offences, gat great malice and hatred of such as feared to haue condigne reward for their vngracious actes and mischieuous doyngs. Although the Duke (not without great laude and prayse) sufficiently answered to all things to him obiected, yet because his death was determined, his wisedome little helped, nor his truth small auayled: but of this vnquietnesse of minde, he deliuered himselfe, because he thought neyther of death, nor of condempnation to die: such affiaunce had he in his strong truth, and suche confidence had he in indifferent iustice. But his Capitall enemies and mortall foes, fearing that some tumult or commocion might arise, if a Prince so well beloued of the people, should be openly executed, and put to death, determined to trap and vndoe him, or he thereof should haue knowledge or warning. So for the furtheraunce of their purpose, a parliament was sommoned to be kept at Bury, whether resorted all the peeres of the realme, and amongst them the Duke of Gloucester, which on the second day of the session, was by the Lorde Beamonde then high Constable of Englande, lande, accompanied with the Duke of Buckyngham and other, arrested, apprehended, and put in warde, and all his seruaunts sequestred from him, and xxiij. of the chiefe of his retinue, were sent to diuers prisons, to ỳ great admiration of the common people. The Duke the night after his imprisonment, was found dead in his bed, being the. xxiiij. day of Febꝛuarij, and his bodye shewed to the Lordes and commons, as though he had died of a palsey oꝛ impostume: but all indifferent persons well knewe, that he died of no naturall death, but of some violent foꝛce: some iudged him to be strangled: some affirme that a hote spit was put in at his fundament: other wꝛite, that he was stiffeled oꝛ smoldered betwene two featherbeds. After whose death, none of his seruauntes (although they were arraigned and attainted) were put to death: foꝛ the Duke of Suffolke, when they should haue beene executed, shewed openly their pardon, but this doyng appeased not the grudge of the people, which sayde that the pardon of the seruaunts was no amendes foꝛ murdreing of their master. The dead coꝛps of this Duke was caryed to saint Albons, and there honoꝛably buryed. Thus thys noble Prince, Sonne, bꝛother, and Uncle to kinges, which had valiauntly and politiquely by the space of. xvb. yeares gouerned this realme, and foꝛ his demerites, called the good Duke of Gloucester, was by a bone cast by his enemies, choked and bꝛought to his fatall fine, and last ende. So all men may openly see, that to men in auctheꝛitie, no place, no not the Courte the chiefe refuge of all, noꝛ the dwelling house, noꝛ yet a mans priuie Castell, oꝛ his bed ordeyned foꝛ his quietnesse, is out of the daunger of deaths dart.

The Duke of Gloucester sodainely arrested of treason.

The Duke of Gloucester sodainely murdered.

This Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, descending of the blood royal, was not onely noble and valyant in all his actes and doings, but sage, pollitique, and notably well learned in the Ciuile lawe. And among other his woꝛthy pꝛaises, this followyng is not to be foꝛgotten, which most liuely and plainely declareth him to be both pꝛudent and wise, & to his great laude and pꝛaise is witten and set foꝛth by Sir Thomas Moꝛe knight, in a booke of hys, entituled, a Dialogue concerning heresies and matters of religion, and in the. xiiij. chapter of the same booke, in this wise followyng. In the time of king Henry the sixt (sayeth he) as he roade in Pꝛogresse, there came to the towne of Saint Albons a certayne begger with hys wyfe, and there was walking about the towne begging fiue oꝛ sixe dayes befoꝛe the kinges comming thether, sayeng that he was boꝛne blinde and neuer sawe in all his life, and was warned in his dꝛeame that he should come out of Berwike, where he sayd that he had euer dwelled, to seke Saint Albon, and that he had bene at his Shꝛine, and was not holpen, and therefoꝛe he would go seeke him at some other place: Foꝛ he had heard some saye sence he came, that Saint Albons body should be at Colyn, and in dede such a contention hath there bene. But of truth as I am certainely infoꝛmed (sayth Sir Thomas Moꝛe) he lyeth here at saint Albones, sauing some reliques of him, which they there shewe shꝛyned. But to tell you fooꝛth, when the king was come, and the towne full of people, sodainely this blind man at saint Albones Shꝛyne had his sight, & the same was solempnly rong foꝛ a miracle, and Te deum songen, so that nothing was talked of in all the towne, but this miracle. So happened it then that Duke Humfrey of Gloucester, a man no lesse wise, then also well learned, hauing great ioy to see suche a miracle, called the pooꝛe man vnto vnto him, and first shewyng himselfe ioyous of Gods glorie, so shewed in the getting of his sight, and exhorting him to meekenesse, and to no ascribyng of any part of the worship to himselfe, nor to be prowde of the peoples praise, which would call him a good & a godly man therby, at the last he looked well vpon his eien, & asked whether he could euer see any thing at al in all his life before. And when as well his wife as himselfe affirmed fastly, no, then he looked aduisedly vpon his eyen agayne, and sayde, I beleeue you very well, for me thinketh that ye can not see well yet. Yes Sir quoth he, I thanke God and his holy Martir, I can see now as well as any man: yea can, quod the Duke, what colour is my Gowne? Then anone the begger tolde him. What colour quod he is this mans Gowne? he tolde him also without anye stayeng or stomblyng, and tolde the names of all the colours that coulde be shewed him. And when the Duke sawe that, he bade him walke *Faytour, and made him to be set openly in the stockes: For though he could haue seene sodaynely by miracle the difference betwene dyuers coloures, yet could he not by sight, so sodainely tell the names of all these coloures, except he had knowne them before, no more then he coulde name all the men whome he should sodainely see, thus farre mayster Moore. And thus much for the noble prowesse and vertue, ioyned with lyke Ornamentes of knowledge and learning shyning in this Duke: For the which as before hath appered, he was both loued of the commons, and well spoken of of all men, and no lesse deseruing the same, being called the good Duke of Gloucester: so neyther yet wanted he backbiters and priuie enuyers, as before hath bene expressed.

A false miracle wisely found out.

When the rumor of the Dukes death, was blowen through the realme, many men were sodainely amased for feare: many abhorred and detested the fact, but all men reputed it an abhominable crueltie, and a shamefull tyranny. But the publique wealth of the realme of Englande, by the vnworthy death of this politique prince, sustayned great losse, and ran into ruine, for surely the whole waight and burden of the realme, rested and depended vpon him, as the experience afterward did declare. For after his death, good and sage men fearing themselues, fled out of the flattering court, into whose places entered such, as desiring their awne promocion, set open the gates to newe factions, which could neuer be extinct, till all the seignories beyonde the sea (except Calice and the Marches) were lost, and king Henry in conclusion spoyled of his realme and lyfe. There is an olde sayde sawe, that a man entending to auoyde the smoke, falleth into the fyre: so here, the Quene minding to preserue her husband in honor, and her selfe in authoritie, procured and consented to the death of this noble man, whose only deth brought to passe that thing, which she would most fayne haue eschewed, and tooke from her that Jewell, which she most desired: for if this Duke had lyued, the Duke of Yorke durst not haue made title to the crowne: if this Duke had lyued, the nobles had not conspired agaynst the king, nor yet the commons had not rebelled: if this Duke had lyued, the house of Lancaster had not bene defaced and destroyed, which things happened all contrary, by the destruction of this good man. This is the worldly iudgement, but God knoweth what he had predestinate, & what he had ordeyned before, against whose ordinaunce preuayleth no counsayle, and agaynst whose will auayleth no stryuing.

And

And it is written of this good Duke of Gloucester, that he builded the diuinitie Schole in Oxford, which is a rare pece of worke. And at this time also, William Wanflet a man of great deuocion, wisedome, and iustice, was made Bishop of Winchester, and Chauncelor of England, who to the furtherance of learnyng, buylded Mary Magdalene College in Oxford.

In this .xxvj. yere of the reigne of this king: But in the first yere of the rule of the Queene, I finde nothing done worthie to be reherſed, within the realme of England, but that Richard Duke of Yorke, beyng greatly ayed by his wife, to the chiefe peres and potentates of the Realme, ouer and beſyde his awne progenie and great conſanguinitie, perceiuyng the king to be a ruler not rulyng, and the whole burden of the realme to depende in the ordinaunce of the Queene and the Duke of Suffolke, began ſecretly to breake to his friends of the Nobilitie, and priuatly declared to them, his title and right to the Crowne, and likewiſe did he to certeine wiſe and ſage gouernours and Rulers of diuers Cities and townes: which priuie attempt was ſo pollitikely handled, and ſo ſecretly kept, that his prouiſion was redie, before his purpoſe was openly publiſhed, and his friendes opened themſelues or the contrary part could them eſpie: but in concluſion time reueled truth, and olde hatred openly ſprang out, as you ſhall hereafter both lament and here. 1447 / 26

Duryng theſe doynges, Henry Beaufford, Bishop of Winchester, and called the riche Cardinall, departed out of this worlde, and was buryed at Winchester. This man was ſonne to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, diſcended of an honourable linage, but borne in Baſte, more noble of blood, then notable in learnyng, haute in ſtomake, and highe in countenaunce, riche aboue meaſure of all men, and to fewe liberall, diſdainefull to his kinne, and dreadfull to his louers, preferryng money before friendſhip, many thinges begynnyng, & nothyng perfornyng. His couetouſnes inſaciable, and hope of long life, made him both to forget God, his Prince, and himſelfe, in his latter dayes: For Doctor John Baker his priuie counſaylor, and his Chapleyne, wrote, that he lyng on his death bed, ſayd theſe wordes. Why ſhould I die, hauyng ſo much ryches: if the whole realme would ſaue my lyfe, I am able either by pollicie to get it, or by riches to bie it. Fye, will not death be hyred, nor will money doe nothyng? when my Nephewe of Bedforde died, I thought my ſelfe halfe vp the wheele, but when I ſaw mine other nephew of Gloucester diſceaſed, then I thought my ſelfe able to be equall with kings, & ſo thought to encreaſe my treaſure, in hope to haue worne a triple Crowne. But I ſee nowe the worlde fayleth me, and ſo I am deceyued: prayng you all to pray for me. Of the gettyng of this mans goodes, both by power Legantine, or ſpirituall bribery, I will not ſpeake, but the kepyng of them for his ambicious purpoſe, aſpiryng to aſcend to the Papiſticall Sea, was both great loſſe to his naturall Prince, and native Country: for his hidden riches might well haue holpen the king, and his ſecrete treaſure might haue relieued the Commonaltie, when money was ſcant, and inportunate charges were daply imminent.

The death of Henry Beaufford Bishop of Winchester

The fond and foliſhe talke of the bishop of Winchester

After the death of this Prelate, which was a great ſtay to the king and the realme, the affayres in Fraunce, were neyther well loked to, nor the gouernours of the Countrie were well aduiſed. For an Engliſhe Capteyn, called Sir Fraunces Surrien the Arragonoys, a man for his wit and actiuity, admitted to the order of the Garter, tooke by ſcalyng ſodainly in the night, a Towne on the Frontiers of Normandie, belongyng to the Duke of Britayn, called Fongiers, ſpoilyng the ſame, and killyng the inhabitauntes to the great deſtruction of the people, and more diſpleaſure to the Duke of Britayn, their ſoueraigne Lorde. The Duke beyng thereof aduertiſed, ſent worde to the French king, declaryng to him that in the tyme of truce (in the which, he as his allye and vaſſall was comprehended) he was ſpoyled and bereued of his towne of Fongiers: beſechyng the Frenche king, in that cauſe to ſee a recompence and amendment: Wherevpon he ſent John Harnart his Caruer, and John Colinet one of the Maiſters of his requeſtes to the king of England: and to the Duke of Sommerſet, he diſpatched Peter de Fountaynes Eſquier, and one of the chiefe of his ſtable, to whome by both the Princes, as it was aunſwered, that the fact and enterprice was both done, contrary to their minde, will and knowlege. And for the truce to be kept not onely reſtitucion, but alſo amendes to be made to the Duke of Britayn, a day of dyet and aſſembly was appoynted to be kept at the towne of Louiers. At the tyme appoynted both the parties aſſembled: the French part demaunded amendes with no little recompence: The Engliſh Orators aunſwered, that without offence, nothing by iuſtice ought to be ſatiſfied: affirmyng the doing of Sir Fraunces Surrien, to be his onely act, without the conſent or counſaile, eyther of the king of England, or the Duke of Sommerſet his Lieutenant and Regent. Duryng this dayly communicacion and long delay, certaine Frenchmen, friendes to the Duke of Britayn, deſiryng to be reuenged of the iniurie done to him at Fongiers, and alſo imaginyng howe to do ſome newe diſpleaſure to the Engliſhemen, were aduertiſed by a wagoner of Louiers, that the towne of Pountlarche, was but meanly manned and ſlenderly furniſhed, & the watch was but negligently loked to: with which ſaiynges the Frenchmen beyng ſomewhat encouraged, deuiſed a way how by pollecie to take the towne: ſo the wagoner laded his Wagon, and paſſed forwarde, hauing in his companie two ſtrong barlettes clad like Carpenters, wyth great Ares in their neckes. And for the furtheraunce of their purpoſe, the Lorde of Breſſy with a choſen company of men of Armes, lodged himſelfe in a buſhement nere to the gate of Saint Andrewe. And Captayn Floquet, accompanied with Sir James of Cleremount, and another great companie, priuily lurked vnder a wood toward Louiers. When al things were appoynted, early in the morenyng in the beginning of the moneth of October, the wagoner came to the gate, and called the Porter by name, prayng him to open the gate, that he might paſſe to Roan, and returne againe the ſame night. The Porter (which well knewe the voyce of his cuſtomer) tooke little hede to the other two companions, and ſo opened the one gate, and ſent another felowe of his, to open the formoſt gate. When the Chariot was on the draw Bridge, betweene both the gates, the Chariotmaiſter gaue the Porter money and for the nonce, let one peece fall to the ground, and while the Porter ſtouped to take it vp, the wagoner with his Dagger ſtroke him in at his throte, ſo that he cryed for no helpe, and the two great Lubbers ſlue the other Porters, and with their Ares cut the Axeltree of the Wagon, ſo that the drawe Bridge could not be ſhortly drawen vp. Which thinges done, they made a ſigne to Capteyne Floquet, which without delay or tract of tyme, entered the towne, towne, and slue and tooke the English men, which neyther heard nor thought of any such enterprice: amongest whome the Lorde Fauconbridge, Captein of the sayde towne, was apprehended as a prisoner: by this prette cautele and sleight imposture, was the towne of Pountlarche taken and surprised, which towne was the key and passage ouer the River of Some, from Fraunce to Normandie, beyng distant from Roan, onely foure leagues. Thus wrong was added to wrong, and iniury heaped to iniury, whereby the terme of truce was violated, and mortall warre was renued. But because the taking of this fortresse had a certein colour of breakyng of truce: The Duke of Sommerset by Imbassadors, and not by force of Armes, deuised to recouer again this prette towne, & sent for the restitution of the same, diuers Imbassadors to the French king and his counsaile, which made aunswere againe, that if the Englishemen restored to the Duke of Briteyn, the towne of Fongiers with condigne amendes, for the dammages done and committed within the same, the towne of Pountlarche should againe be rendered and deliuered: for the Frenche king and his counsaile beganne nowe to perceyue and smell, that the affayres of England by the death of the Duke of Gloucester, were lore minished and decayed, and that good counsaile began to waxe faint and decay, and sedicion freshly began to spring and rise: By reason whereof they thought that Normandy might sone be conquered and recouered, and that the Englishe nacion out of that region might easely be expulsed and driuen: wherefore they determined to take the good occasion to them openly offered, and to lose no tyme in so good a Bargaine. Whereupon king Charles diuided his armie into three partes, not doubtyng of victorye, by reason that the fame of the conquest of Pountlarche, was blowen and spread abroad ouer all the Countrie. So after diuers assaultes (not without losse of diuers of his men) he had rendered to him by composicion, the townes of Louiers and Gerbory, whereof William Harper was Captaine. Thus prosperous victorie dayly succedyng to the Frenche kinges armie, he augmentyng hys hoste, determined to get the Towne of Uernoyle in Perche, and gyrde it round about with a strong siege. The inhabitauntes whereof, although with the sodaine chaunce they were somewhat abashed, yet hauyng some succors, and hopyng of more reliefe, toke to them good courage, and manfully defended the towne. But when their ayde taryed longer then they eyther thought or desyred, they were compelled to compound with their enemies, vpon this condicion: that if the siege were not raysed within. xx. dayes, that then they should depart with bagge and baggage, which condicion was accepted: and because no rescues came, the towne, Castell, and the great Tower, were deliuered. The french Historians affirme, the towne to be taken by assault, and the Castell by composicion, but all writers agre, that the frenchmen obteyned it. Thus was warre renued before the full terme of the truce expired, which was the most detestable and vnprofitable chaunce, that eyther could or might haue happened or come to the realme of England. For by this sodaine dammage and losse, without thought arisyng, the Englishe Captaynes were so busied and vnquieted, that with appeasyng dayly rumors within townes, and what with studie how to recouer Castels lost and taken, that they scarce wist what way to take: for while they studied how to kepe and defend one Citie, foure or fiue other, folowyng fortunes chaunce, turned to the Frenche part, and became their enemies. The chiefe cauſe of which reuoltyng and turnyng was this: It was blowen throughout all Fraunce, that the realme of England, after the death of the Duke of Glouceſter, by the ſeuerall faction of Princes, was diuided into two partes, and that William de la Poole, late created Duke of Suffolke, and diuers other, were the occaſion of the death of the ſayd Duke of Glouceſter, which was the very father of the Countrie, and the ſhielde and defence of the poore Commonaltie, and that the forenamed Duke of Suffolke, onely for lucre of money, vexed, oppreſſed, and moleſted the poore people, ſo that mens mindes were not intentiue, nor geuen to outward affayres and forren Conqueſtes, but all their ſtudie was, howe to driue backe and defende domeſticall iniuries, and dayly wronges done at home: by reaſon whereof men of warre were vnpayed, and no armie for reſiſtence was eyther gathered or aſſembled together: which miſchiefes whyle the king (as thinges of the worlde, and of no great moment) did neglect and omit, as he which preferred and extolled godly thinges, aboue all worldly affayres and mortall cures, and thought them moſt to be phantaſied and labored: And while Queene Margaret his wife, in whome the whole rule of the realme conſiſted, beyng a woman of to much credence geuyng to euill and flatteryng counſaylors, that by no meanes after they coulde be eyther ouercome or reſiſted: ſo that by this meanes, the French Nacion knewe in what caſe the ſtate of the realme of England ſtood in, which elated and encouraged their heartes, and daunted the courages of the Normanes and Gaſcoynes, ſo much, that for lacke of ayde and reliefe, they turned to the French part, and forſoke their very ſoueraigne Lorde, the king of England in ſhort ſpace, as you ſhall after here.

A rebellion in Irelande.

It was not enough, the realme of England this ſeaſon thus to be vexed and vnquieted with the buſineſſe of Normandy, but alſo a new rebellyon began in Ireland, to the great diſpleaſure of the king and his counſaill: for repreſſing wherof, Richard Duke of yorke, with a conuenient number of men, was ſent thether, as lieutenant to the king, which not onely appeaſed the fury of the wilde & ſauage people there, but alſo gat him ſuch loue and fauor of the countrey and the inhabitaunts, that their ſincere loue, and friendly affection coulde neuer be ſeparated from him and his lignage, as in the ſequele of this ſtorie you ſhall more plainely perceiue.

Englande looſeth all that was gotten in Fraunce.

The Frenchemen hauing perfite vnderſtanding of the infirmitye and vnreadineſſe of the realme of Englande, diſplayed their Banners, and ſet forth their armies, and in ſhort ſpace gat by yelding, Conſtaunce, Eyſors, Caſtel Gayllarde, Ponteandu mere, ſainct Lo, Feſeampe, Newchaſtle, Ilanſon, Toneque, Manleon argenton, Liſiaux argenton, and diuerſe other townes in Normandy: Likewiſe in Guien was the towne of Mauliſſone rendered to the Erle of Foys. Theſe townes were not yelded voluntarily by the Engliſh ſouldiors, but they were therevnto compelled by the Citezens and the inhabitauntes of the townes, which apparauntly perceiuing, that the great flame of the Engliſh force, was extinct and conſumed, roſe againſt the Capitaines, & other opened the gates to their enimies, or conſtrained them to render vpon a compoſition. By which enforcement was the rich Citie of Roan deliuered: for ſurely the Duke of Somerſet and the lord Talbot Erle of Shrowesbury, had well kept and defended this Citie, if they had bene no more vered with the Citezens, then they were with their enimies. For after the French king had once by his Herault sommoned the citie, the inhabitants not onely sought wayes and inuented fraude, how to betraye the same, but also put on harnesse and rebelled against their Capitaines, menacing the death, and destruction of all the English people. The captaines perceiuing their vntrouth, and trayterous demeanour, retraited themselues into the Castell or Palaice, where by a certaine space with arowes and handgonnes, they sore molested & vexed the vntrue citezens. But when they considered the great puissaunce of the French king, and that they were in dispaire of all aide or relefe, and that their victaile and artillerie beganne sore to minishe, they thought it better to compounde and agree with their enimies, rather then wilfully to be destroyed or die for famine: and so vpon condicion that all they should safely depart to Caen with all their goods and armure, and that certayne townes shoulde be deliuered by a daye, they were permitted to depart: leauing behinde them for hostages, till the saide townes (which were agreed to be rendred) should be deliuered, the Erle of Shrewsburie and the Lorde Butler, son to the Erle of Ormond, which were sent to the Castel of Eureux, because they sore feared the malice of the Citezens of Roan. The Frenchmen following still the steps of victory, & elated with the bruit and fame of getting of Roan, determined, eyther by force or offer to get the towne of Hartflew, & shortly assauted the same, wherof was captain sir Thomas Conelon, a man of a great wit & of no lesse force: which hauing knowlege of the heuy tidings brought from Roan, was therwith nothing abashed, but coragiously set vpon his enimies, & them to their great hurt, manfully repulsed & draue from the walles. The Frenchmen learning wit by this great perill, left their scaling, and deuised dayly, how to batter and breake the walles & fortifications. This siege long continued, to the great losse of both parties. When sir Thomas saw small likelihode of ayd or gayn, but much apparaunce of losse & ieopardy, he toke a conuencion with his enimies, and so departed with all his goods.

After which towne rendred, the fortresse of Hunflew, vpon the same composicion was yeelded. Thus you may perceiue that Fortune is euer without measure, for eyther she to much fauoreth or to much hateth, for beside these townes surrendered in Normandy, the Duke of Britaine recouered againe Fongiers, saint Iohn de Buerne, & diuers other townes. In the meane season, the king of England sent into Normandie with a crue of a M.b.C. men, a baliant Capteyn called Sir Thomas Kiriell: a man of great stomack, if he had had a great army, but his power was to small, eyther to recouer ꝑ which was lost, either to saue that which yet remayned vngotten: but surely in him lacked neither good will nor corage, for with his small number, he recouered againe the townes of Lyseaur, and Valongnes. After which feate, he ioyned himselfe with Sir Henry Norbery, Sir Robert Veere, Mathew Gough, and other Capteynes, so that they were aboue fiue thousand men of valiaunt heartes, and haute courages. After long consultacion, they determined to fight with the French men, which were going to the siege of Cane, but in their iourney, they were encountered at a place called Formigny, betweene Carentyne and Bayeux, by the Erle of Clermont, Lieutenant to the French king, the Steward of Poyton, and the Lord of Rays, Admirall of Fraunce, with six hundreth men of armes, and sixe thousand other, which skirmished with the Englishe men a great season. During which skirmishe, there arryued Arthur Erle of Richmond, highe Constable of Fraunce, James of Lurendzough, Erle of Lauall, with a great number of horsemen, and fresh footmen. After his comming, he and all the Frenchemen set on the Englishmen being faynt and wery with the long skirmishe. This battail was sore fought, but in conclusion the Englishe men were discomfited, and put to flight, and of them slaine aboue foure thousand, and viij. hundreth taken prisoners, whereof Sir Thomas Kiriell, Sir Henry Norbery, and Sir Thomas Dzeue were the chiefe, Sir Robert Ueere and Mathew Gough saued themselues. This was the first foughten fielde, that the French men gat on the Englishe men in many yeres, wherefore I blame them not though they of a little make much, and set forth all, and hide nothing, that may sound to their glory. They declare what number they slue, but they write not howe many of them were slaine or destroyed.

After this victorie obtayned, the French king hearing that the Duke of Somerset was in the towne of Caen, thought that he had nothing done, if he permitted the Duke, still to tarie in Normandy, which by newe ayde and freshe succours might turne the wheele of Fortune into a contrary part, and peraduenture recouer all ỹ hath bene lost, or put the realme of Fraunce in a leopardie: wherefore like a wise prince, entending to preuent thinges imminent and at hande, assembled an armie royall, and in his awne person, hauing in his campe Reyner, called king of Sicile, father to the Quene of Englande, the Dukes of Calaber and Alaunson, the Erles of Clermont, Richemonde, Mayne, Dumoys, Dent Polle, and Dampmartyne, beside many noble Barons and valyaunt knightes, when all things were readie, as opportunitie of time serued: he caused the towne to be enuironed on euery side, assigning to his Capitaynes seuerall places of the towne to be assaulted, and there to prone their manhood. The Erle of Dumoys, with more losse then gaine entered into a bulwarke, and was beaten back. The Englishe men within the towne kept silence, as though they knewe not of their enimies approchyng, but euery man kept his loupe, and euery Capitayne well ouerloked his warde. The French men with querels, morispikes, slynges, and other engines, begaune to assault the walles: but of the Englishe men within, some shot fiercely with long bowes, other cast dartes, and rolled downe great stones and barres of yron: other cast downe Iauelyns, fyrebrandes, hote leade, and blockes with pitch and brimstone, lyke burning fyre flaming: so that neyther courage lacked in the assault, nor manhood, nor policie in the defence: for on the embattlements of the walles were set great folles of timber, so mouing and bnstedfast, that neyther scaling ladder could settle any holde, nor no person that should clime vp, could set any sure footyng. The French king perceyuing that this assault little or naught preuayled him, sent for all his great ordinaunce to Paris, determining neuer to departe, till he had conquered the towne, eyther with swoorde or famine. When the ordinaunce was brought, he daylie shot at the walles, and did some hurt: but to the Castell, which stood on a rock, and in it a dongeon vnhable to be beaten downe, he did no harme at all. In this towne was the Duke of Somerset, his wife and children, but he was not Capitaine, for the Duke of Yorke owner of the towne, by the kings gift, had appointed there his Capitaine taine generall, Sir Dauy Halle, and of the Caſtell, Sir Robert Ueer, and of the Dongeon, ſyr Henry Radford. Daylie the ſhot was great, but more terrible then hurtfull. Dauing one day, a ſtone ſhot into the towne, fell betweene the Duches of Somerſet, and her children, which being amaſed with this chaunce, prayed on her knees her huſband, to haue mercy and compaſſion of his ſmall infants, & that they might be deliuered out of the towne in ſauegarde. The Duke more piteous then hardie, moued with the dolour of his wyfe, and loue of his children, aſſembled the Capitaines and Magiſtrates of the towne, declaryng to them, the power and puyſſaunce of the French king, and their debilitie and weakeneſſe, perſwading them rather to yeeld and render vpon honeſt conditions, then obſtinately to reſiſt, and fooliſhely to periſhe. Sir Dauy Halle, Capitayne of the towne, anſwered to him, ſaiyng: my Lorde, althoughe you be the kings Lieutenaunt generall, within thys countrie and dominion, and may by force of your authoritie, deliuer, ſell or geue, any of the kings townes, to ſuche perſons, eyther friends or enemies, as ſhall pleaſe you: yet I am ſure that you cut your leather to large, to intreate or ſpeake of the rendering of thys towne, apperteynyng to my Lorde and mayſter, Rychard Duke of Yorke, which thereof hath geuen me both the charge and cuſtody, with other of my truſty friends and fellowes, and which with the helpe of almightie God, I ſhall well defende, both agaynſt the Frenche king and all hys puyſſaunce, till the Duke my maſter come to ſuccour me, for of men, money and munitions, I truſt I haue ſufficient. Why ſayd the Duke, am not I here the kings Deputie, repreſenting his perſon, and may commaunde all thinges accordyng to my diſcretion? Yea ſayde the Capitaine, ſo that you geue away no mans right but his, whoſe authoritie you haue for the ſame: as for this towne, I aſſure you, without my Lordes aſſent, you ſhall neyther render nor yeelde, by my conſent or agreement. The Duke was ſore moued with thys ſaying, and ſo departed, and after ſent for the rulers of the towne, and the pooreſt people of the ſame, declaring to them, that their lyues and goodes were in the french kings hands, and if they loked not ſhortly to their ſauegarde, of death they were ſure, and of mercie farre vncertaine: exhorting them to follow his louing monicion, rather then the hardened hart, of their to hardie Capitaine. The people of the towne thus perſwaded (whoſe harts were rather French then Engliſh) beganne to riſe againſt ſyr Dauy, boldely affirming, that if he tooke no compoſition within three dayes, they would open the gates, and let in the French king: and of this opinion were all the common ſouldiours. What ſhould the poore Hare ſaye, when ſhe is enuironned with a hundred houndes, or the ſilly Larke crie, when ſhe is in the middle of a hundred Hawks, but take patience, and ſeeke a way to eſcape? ſo this Capitaine perceyuing, that neyther his wordes ſerued, nor his truth towarde his Maiſter preuayled, bad the Duke of Somerſet doe what he liſt, for he would in no wiſe be named in the compoſition. Then the Duke partly to pleaſe the townes men, but more deſirous to pleaſe the Duches his wyfe, made an agreement with the french king, that he would render the towne, ſo that he and all his, might departe in ſauegarde with all their goodes and ſubſtaunce: which offer, the French king gladly accepted and allowed, knowing that by force, he might lenger haue longed for the ſtrong towne, then to haue poſſeſſed the ſame ſo ſone. After ter this concluſion taken, Syr Dauy Hall, with diuers other of his truſtie friendes departed to Chierburge, and from thence ſayled into Irelande to the Duke of Yorke, making relacion to him of all theſe doings: which thing kindled ſo great a rancour in his harte and ſtomack, that he neuer left perſecuting of the Duke of Somerſet, till he had brought him to his fatall point, and extreme confuſion.

After the obtayning of this ſtrong towne of Caen, the Erle of Clermount beſieged the City of Lyſeur, whereof was Captein Mathew Gough, with three hundreth Engliſhe men. The Capteyne perceiuyng that when Caen was not reſcued, that poore Lyſeur was in diſpayre of all ſuccour, agreed to abandon and deliuer the Citie, ſo that he and his people might depart to Chierburge, hauyng no yron weapon nor armure, but onely theyr goodes, & whyte ſtaues in their handes. After the deliuerance of this towne, the Frenchemen ſtill like good begles, folowyng theyr pray, beſieged the towne of Fallayſe, appertainyng to the Lord Talbot, Erle of Shrewſbury: whereof were Capteynes for the ſayd Erle, Andrew Trollop, and Thomas Cotton ſquiers, which beyng deſperate of ſuccors, and conſideryng the puiſſaunce of their enemies, agreed to deliuer the towne vpon two condicions, the one was, that the Erle their mayſter, which remayned in pledge for certeyne condicions, agreed to be perfourmed at the deliueraunce of Roan, (as you haue heard before) ſhould be diſmiſſed and ſet at libertie: the other, that if they were not reſcued within. xij. dayes, that then they and theirs to depart with armure, and all their goods moueable whether it pleaſed them. After this agreement at the day prefixed, no reſcues came, and ſo the towne was rendered, and incontinent after, the fortreſſe of Dampfordе was deliuered vpon like agreement. For the Frenchmen bragged, that they regarded neyther golde nor ſiluer, but deſired rule, glory and fame: With which lightneſſe, the other townes of Normandie beyng perſwaded, voluntarily rendered themſelues, vaſſalles and ſubiectes to the Frenche nacion.

All Normandie is loſt.

Now reſted Engliſhe, onely the towne of Chierburge, whereof was Capteyn, Thomas Gonuile, which ſurely and valiauntly defended the towne as long as vitaile and munition ſerued: but when theſe two handes were ſpent and conſumed, he deſtitute of all comfort and ayde, vpon a reaſonable compoſicion yelded the towne, & went to Calice, where the Duke of Sommerſet and many Engliſhe men then ſoiourned: lamentyng their loſſe, and deſperate of all recouery. Thus was the riche Duchie of Normandie loſt, the which had continued in the Engliſhe mens poſſeſſion. xxx. yeres, by the conqueſt of king Henry the fift. In the which Duchie were a hundred ſtrõg townes and fortreſſes, able to be kept and holden, beſyde them which were deſtroyed by the warres, and in the ſame was one Archebiſhoprike, and fiue Biſhoprikes. Some ſay, that the Engliſhemen were not of puiſſaunce, eyther to man the townes as they ſhould be, or to inhabite the Countrie, which was the cauſe that they could not kepe it: according to the Frenchmens Adage, which ſayth: A man can not long holde that, which he cannot gryppe. Other ſay, that the Duke of Sommerſet, for his awne peculiar profite, kept not halfe his nũmber of Souldiors, and put their wages in his purſe. Theſe be mens imaginations and coniectures, but ſurely the loſſe of it, was the domeſticall diuiſion within the Realme, euery great man deſiryng rather to be reuenged on his so at home, then on his outward enemie, as you nowe shall manifestly see and perceyue.

For while these conquestes were obteyned in the partes beyond the sea, with swoorde, speare, and target, by the aduersaries of the Englishmen, three mischieuous Captaines, set the people of the realme (as well of the Nobility as of the meane sort) in a ciuile warre and intestine diuision: For among the high Princes and peeres, reigned inward grudge: among the Clergie flatterie, and among the Commonaltie disdaine of lasciuious souereignitie, which the Queene with her Minions, and vnprofitable Counsaylors dayly tooke and vsurped vpon them. Wherefore they (not minding to be more charged, then their backes would beare, and perceiuing that by negligent prouision and improuident pollicie, the affayres and businesse in the partes beyonde the sea, dayly decayed, and more were like to do) began first to make exclamacion agaynst the Duke of Suffolke, affirmyng him, to be the onely cause of the deliuery of Anjow, and Main, the chiefe procurer of the death of the good Duke of Gloucester, the very occasion of ꝑ losse of Normandie, the most swallower vp & consumer of the kings treasure (by reason wherof, the warres in Fraūce were not mainteyned) the expeller from the king of all good & vertuous counsailors, and the bringer in & aduaūcer of vicious persons, common enemies, and apparaunt aduersaries to the publike wealth: So that the Duke was called in euery mans mouth a traytor, a murtherer, a robber of the kinges treasure, and worthy to be put to most cruell punishement: By reason of this exclamacion, the Queene somewhat fearyng the destruction of the Duke, but more the confusion of her selfe, caused the Parliament, before begon at the blacke Friers in London, to be adiourned to Leycester, thinkyng there by force and rigor of the lawe, to subdue and represse all the malice and euill will, conceyued agaynst the Duke and her: at which place fewe of the Nobility would appere, wherefore it was againe adiourned to Westminster, where was a whole companie and a full appearaunce. In the which session, the Commons of the nether house, put vp to the king and the Lordes, many articles of treason, misprision and misdemeanour, agaynst the Duke of Suffolke: the effect whereof, with his aunsweres, hereafter ensueth.

The cōmons exclayme against the Duke of Suffolk.

The parliament adiourned from Westminster to Leycester.

Articles proponed by the commons against the Duke of Suffolke.

1 First, they alleged, that he had trayterously excited, prouoked, and counsayled, John Erle of Dumoys Bastard of Orleaunce, Bertram Lorde Presigny, Willyam Colynet, enemies to the king, and friendes and Ambassadors to Charles, calling himselfe french king, to enter into this realme, and to leuie warre agaynst the king and his realme, to the entent to destroy the king and his friends, & to make John his sonne king of this realme, maryng him to Margaret, sole heire to John Duke of Somerset, pretending and declaring her, to be next heire inheritable to the crowne, for lack of issue of the kings body lawfully begotten.

2 Item, the sayde Duke, being of the kings priuie and neere counsayle, allured by great rewardes, and fayre promises, made by the foresayde Erle of Dumoys, caused the king to deliuer and set at libertie, Charles Duke of Orleaunce, enemie to the king, and the kings noble father, which deliueraunce, was prohibited by expresse wordes, in the last will of the kings most victorious father.

3 Item, that before the departure of the sayde Duke of Orleaunce, the aforenamed aforenamed Duke of Suffolke, traytorously fast cleauing to Charles called the French king, counsayled, prouoked and entised the sayde Duke of Orleaunce, to moue the same king, to make warre agaynst England, both in Fraunce and Normandy: according to which procurement and counsaile, the sayde French king, hath recouered the whole realme of Fraunce, and all the Duchie of Normandie, and taken prisoners the Erle of Shrewesburie, the Lorde Faconbridge, and many other valiaunt Capitaines.

¶ These three articles aforenamed he denied either for fact or thought.

4 Farther, it was alleged, that he being Ambassador for the king of Englande, to Charles calling himselfe French king, promised to Reyner king of Sicile, and to Charles Dangiers his brother, enimies to the king, the release of Angeow, with the deliueraunce of the Countie of Mayne, and the Citie of Maunt or Mauns, without the knowledge of the other Ambassadors, which him accompanied: which promise after his returne, he caused to be performed, to the kings disenheritaunce, and losse irrecuperable, and to the strength of his enemies and feblishement of the Duchy of Normandy.

¶ To this article he aunswered, that hys commission was to conclude, and doe all things according to his discretion, for the obtayning of a peace, and because without deliuerie of those Countries, he perceyued that truce could not be obteyned, he agreed to the release and deliueraunce of them.

5 Also, they surmised that the sayde Duke being in Fraunce in the kings seruice, and one of the priuiest of his counsayle there, traytorously declared and opened to the Capitaines and conduitters of warre, appertayning to the kings enemies, the kings counsayle, purueiaunce of his armies, furniture of his townes, and all other ordinaunces, whereby the kings enimies (enformed by his traiterous information) haue gotten townes and fortresses, and the king by that meane depriued of his enheritaunce.

6 Item, the sayde Duke declared to the Erle of Dumoys, to the Lorde Presigny, and Wylliam Cosynet, Ambassadors for the French king, lyeng in London, the priuities of the kings counsayle, both for the prouision of farther warre, and also for defence of the Duchy of Normandy: by the disclosing whereof, the Frenchmen knowyng the kinges secretes, preuented the tyme, and obtayned their purpose.

7 Item, that the sayde Duke at such tyme as the king sent Ambassadors to the French king, for the entreating of peace, trayterously before their comming to the French Court, certefied king Charles of their commission, auctoritie and instructions, by reason whereof, neyther peace nor amitie succeded, and the kings enheritaunce lost, and by his enemies possessed.

8 Item, the same Duke sayde openly in the Starre chamber, before the Lordes of the counsayle, that he had as high a place in the counsayle house of the French king, as he had there, and was as well trusted there as here, and could remoue from the French king, the priuiest man of his counsayle, if he would.

9 Item, when armies haue bene prepared, and souldiours ready waged, to passe ouer the sea, to resist the kings enemies: the sayde Duke corrupted by rewards of the French king, hath restrayned and stayed the sayde armies to passe any farther.

10 Item, the sayde Duke being Ambassadour for the king, comprised not not in the league as the kinges Alies, neyther the king of Arragon, neither the Duke of Britein, but suffered them to be compryſed on the contrary part, by reaſon whereof, the olde amitie of the king of Aragon, is eſtraunged from this realme, and the Duke of Britein become enemie to the ſame: Gyles his brother the kinges ſure friend, caſt in ſtrong priſon, and there like to ende and finiſhe his dayes.

All theſe obiections he vtterly denied, or faintly auoyded, but none fully excuſed. Diuers other crimes were laide to his charge, as enryching hymſelfe with the kings goods, and landes, gathering together, and making a Monopoly of offices, fees, wards, and fermes, by reaſon wherof, the kings eſtate was greatly myniſhed and decayed, and he and his kin highly exalted and enriched, with many other pointes, which, becauſe they be not notable, nor of great force or ſtrength, I omit and ouerpaſſe.

The Queene which entierly loued the Duke, fearing that ſome commocion and trouble might riſe, if he were let goe vnpuniſhed, cauſed him to be committed to the Towre, where he was kept with as much pleaſure, as he that was at large, and out of all captiuitie. But after that a moneth was expired, ſhe imagening the people to be pacified with this open empriſonment, cauſed him both to be delyuered, and alſo to be reſtored to the kynges fauour and grace, as much as euer he was before that tyme. But thys doing incenſed the furye of the mutable commons, muche more then before: openly denouncing and ſaying, that it was a ſhame to all the Realme, to ſee ſuch a perſon, infected with ſo many miſdeeds, either to rule aboute a Prince or to be had in honor. Of theſe wordes ſtrange dedes, and of this talking, roſe diſpleaſure, which had growne to great miſchief, if pollitique prouiſion had not with all celerity reſiſted the firſt furye: for the commons in ſundrye places of the Realme aſſembled together, gathered great companies, and elected a Captayne, whome they called, Blew berde: but or they had attempted any enterpriſe, their heades were apprehended, and ſo the members ſodainely were diſperſed, without any hurt committed.

The Duke of Suffolke committed to the Towre.

Blew beard a Captaine of rebels.

After this litle rage was aſſwaged, a new Parliament was holden at Leyceſter, whither came the King and the Queene in great eſtate, and wyth them the Duke of Suffolke, as chefe counſailor. The commons of the lower houſe, not forgetting their olde grudge, beſeched the king, that ſuch perſons, as aſſented to the releſe of Angeow, and deliueraunce of Maine, might be extremely puniſhed, and tormented: and to be priuie to this fact, they accuſed, as principall, the Duke of Suffolke, with John Biſhop of Saliſbury, and ſir James Fynes, Lord Say, and diuers other. When king Henrye perceiued that the cõmons were thus ſtomacked & bent, againſt the quenes dearling William Duke of Suffolke, he plainely ſawe that neyther gloſing woulde ſerue, nor diſſimulation coulde appeaſe the continuall clamor of the importunate commons: Wherefore to begin a ſhort pacification in ſo long a broyle: Firſt he ſequeſtred the Lorde Say, beyng threaſorer of England, and other the Dukes adherentes, from their offices, and authoritie, and after banyſhed and put in exile the Duke of Suffolke, for the terme of fyue yeres: meaning by this exile, to appeaſe the furious rage of the outragious people, and that pacified, to reuocate him to his olde eſtate, as the Queenes chefe frend and counſailer. But fortune would not, that he ſhould ſo eſcape,

foꝛ when he was ſhipped in Suffolke, entending to be tranſpoꝛted into Fraunce, he was encountered with a ſhippe of warre, appertayning to the Duke of Exceſter, the Conſtable of the Towꝛe of London, being capitaine of the ſame barke with ſmall fight, entered into the Dukes ſhippe, and perceiuing his perſon preſent, bꝛought him to Douer Rode, & there on the one ſyde of a cocke bote, cauſed his heade to be ſtriken off, & left his body with the heade vpon the ſandes of Douer, which coꝛps was there founde by a Chaplayne of his, & conueied to Wingfelde colledge in Suffolke, and there buryed. This ende had William de la Pole the firſt Duke of Suffolke, as men iudge by Goddes puniſhement: foꝛ aboue all thinges he was noted to be the very oꝛgan, engine, and deuiſer of the deſtruction of Humfrey the good duke of Glouceſter, and ſo the blood of the innocent man was with his doloꝛous death, recompenſed and puniſhed. But the death of this froward perſon, bꝛought not the realme to quiet, noꝛ deliuered it from all inward grudge and inteſtine diuiſion, which to all Realmes is moꝛe peſtiferous and noyſome, then outward warre, dayly famine, oꝛ extreme peſtilence. Foꝛ although Richard Duke of Yoꝛke was in perſon (as the kinges Deputie) in the realm of Ireland, continually reſiant ther: yet his bꝛeath puffed, and his winde blewe dayly, in many partes of this realme. Foꝛ many of the nobilitie, and moꝛe of the meane eſtate, wiſely ponderyng the eſtate and condicion of the Realme, perceiuyng moꝛe loſſe then encreaſe, ruyne then aduauncemente, daylye to enſue: remembꝛyng alſo that Fraunce was conquered, and Noꝛmandye was gayned by the Frenche people in ſhoꝛt ſpace, thought with them ſelues and imagined, that the fault of all theſe miſerable chaunces happened, either becauſe the king was not the true enheritoꝛ to the Crowne, oꝛ that he oꝛ his counſaile were not able of wit, pollecie oꝛ circumſpection, to rule and gouerne ſo noble a Realme, oꝛ ſo famous a Region. Upon this coniecture, the friendes, kinſmen, and allies of the Duke of Yoꝛke, which were of no ſmall number, began to pꝛactiſe the gouernaunce of his title: Infuſyng and puttyng into mens heades ſecretly his right to the Crowne, his politique gouernaunce, his gentle behauiour too all the Iriſhe Nacion, affirmyng, that he which had bꝛought that rude and ſauage nacion to ciuile faſhion, and Engliſh maners, would (if he once ruled in the realme of England) depoſe euill Counſayloꝛs, coꝛrect euill Judges, and reforme all matters amiſſe, and vnamended. And to ſet open the flood gates of theſe deuiſes, it was thought neceſſary, to cauſe ſome great commocion, and ꝑ riſyng of people to be made agaynſt the king: ſo that if they pꝛeuayled, then had the Duke of Yoꝛke and his complices, their appetite and deſyꝛe. And becauſe the Kentiſhemen be impacient in wꝛonges, diſdeynyng of to much oppꝛeſſion, and euer deſirous of newe chaunge, and newe fangleneſſe: The ouerture of this matter was put foꝛth in Kent, and to the entent that it ſhould not be knowen, that the Duke of Yoꝛke oꝛ his friendes were the cauſe of the ſodaine riſyng: A certaine yong man of a goodly ſtature, and pꝛegnant wit, was entyſed to take vpō him the name of John Moꝛtimer, although his name were John Cade, and not foꝛ a ſmall pollicie, thinkyng that by that ſurname, the lyne and lynage of the aſſiſtent houſe of the Erle of Marche, which were no ſmall number, ſhould be to him both adherent and fauourable. This Capteine not only ſuboꝛned by teachers, but alſo enfoꝛced by pꝛiuie Scholemaiſters, aſſembled bled together a great company of tall perſonages: aſſuryng them that their attempt was both honourable to God and the king, and alſo profitable to the common wealth, promiſyng them, that if either by force or pollicy they might once take the king, the Queene, and other their Counſaylors, into their handes and gouernaunce, that they would honourably entreat the king, and ſo sharpely handle his Counſaylors, that neither fiftenes ſhould hereafter be demaunded, nor once any impoſicions or tax ſhould be ſpoken of. Theſe perſwaſions, with many other faire promiſes of libertie (which the common people more affect and deſyre, rather then reaſonable obedience, and due conformitie) ſo animated the Kentiſhe people, that they with their Capteine aboue named, in good order of battaile (not in great number) came to the plain of Blackheath, betweene Eldham and Grenewich. And to the entent that the cauſe of this glorious Captaynes commyng thether, might be ſhadowed from the king and his Counſail, he ſent to him an humble ſupplicacion, with louyng wordes, but with malicious entent: affirmyng his commyng, not to be againſt him, but againſt diuers of his counſaile, louers of themſelues, and oppreſſors of the poore Commonaltie, flatterers to the king, and enemies to his honor, ſuckers of his purſſe, and robbers of his ſubiectes, parciall to their friendes, and extreme to their enemies, for rewardes corrupted, and for indifferencie, nothyng doyng. This prowde Bill, was both of the king, and his Counſaile diſdeinfully taken, and therevpon great conſultacion had, and after long debatyng it was concluded, that ſuch prowde rebelles ſhould rather be ſuppreſſed and tamed, with violence and force, then with fayre wordes or friendly or gentle aunſwere.

John Mortymer ſheweth the cauſe of his rebellion.

Whereupon the king aſſembled a great army, & marched toward them, which had lyen on black Heath, by the ſpace of .vij. dayes. This ſubtill Capitaine named Jack Cade, entending to bring the king farther within the compaſſe of his nette, brake vp his campe, and retyred backeward to the towne of Seuenock in Kent, and there expecting his pray, encamped himſelfe, and made his abode. The Queene, which bare the rule, being of hys retraite well aduertiſed, ſent for Humfrey Staffordе knight, and Wylliam his brother, with many other Gentlemen, to follow the chace of the Kentiſh men, thinking that they had fled, but verily they were deceaued: for at the firſt ſkirmiſhe, both the Staffordes were ſlayne, and all their companie ſhamefully diſcomfited. The kings armie, being at this time come to black Heath, hearing of this diſcomfiture, beganne to grudge and murmoure amongſt themſelues, ſome wiſhing the Duke of Yorke at home, to ayde the Capitayne his Coſyn: Some deſiring the ouerthrow of the king and his counſayle: other openly cryed out on the Queene and her complices. Thys rumour openly ſpoken, and commonly publiſhed, cauſed the king and certaine of his counſayle not ledde by fauour, nor corrupted by rewardes (to the intent to appeaſe the furious rage of the inconſtant multitude) to commit the Lorde Say, Threaſorer of Englande to the Towre of London: and if other againſt whome like diſpleaſure was borne had bene preſent, they had likewiſe bene ſerued. But it was neceſſary that one ſhould ſuffer, rather then all the nobilitie then ſhould periſhe. When the Kentiſhe Capitaine, or the couetous Cade, had thus obtained victorie, and ſlayne the two valyant Staffordes, he appareled himſelfe in their riche armure, and ſo with pompe and glorie returned agayne towarde London: in the which retraite, dyuers vile and vacabond perſons, reſorted to him from Suſſex and Surrey, and from other partes to a great a number. Thus this glorious Capitaine, compaſſed about, and mutroned with a multitude of euill, rude, and ruſticall perſons, came againe to the plaine of Blackheath, and there ſtrongly encamped himſelfe: to whome were ſent by the king, the Archebiſhop of Caunterbury, and Humfrey Duke of Buckyngham, to common with him of his greeues and requeſtes. Theſe Lordes found him ſober in communication, wiſe in diſputyng, arrogant in hart, and ſtiffe in his opinion, and by no wayes poſſible, to be perſwaded to diſſolue his armie, except the king in perſon would come to him, and aſſent to all things which he ſhould require. Theſe Lordes perceyuing the wilfull pertinacie, and manifeſt contumacie of this rebellious Villeyn, departed to the king, declaring to him his ſtoute and preſumpteous requeſtes. The king ſomewhat hearing, and more marking the ſayengs of this outrageous loſell, hauing daylie reporte of the concurſe and acceſſe of people, which continually reſorted to him, doubting as much his familier ſeruaunts, as his vnknowen ſubiectes (which ſpared not to ſpeake, that the Capitaines cauſe was profitable for the common wealth) departed in all haſte to the Caſtell of Kylyngworth in Warwikeſhire, leauing onely behinde him the Lorde Scales to keepe the Towre of London. The Capitaine being aduertiſed of the kings abſence, came firſt into Southwarke, and there lodged at the whyte Hart, prohibyting to all men, murder, rape, or robbery: by which coulour he allured to him the harts of the common people. But after that he entered into London, and cut the ropes of the drawe bridge, ſtriking his ſworde on London ſtone, ſaiyng: now is Mortimer Lorde of this Citie, and rode in euery ſtreete lyke a Lordly Capitayne. And after a flatteryng declaration made to the Mayre of the Citie of his thether comming, he departed againe into Southwarke. And vpon the third day of Julij, he cauſed ſyr James Fynes Lorde Say, a Threaſorer of England, to be brought to the Gylde hall of London, and there to be arrayned: which being before the kings Juſtices put to aunſwere, deſyred to be tryed by his peeres, for the lenger delay of his lyfe. The Capitaine perceiuing his dilatorie ple, by force tooke him from the officers, and brought him to the ſtandard in Chepe, and there cauſed his head to be ſtriken off, and pitched it on a high pole, which was openly borne before him through the ſtreete. And this cruell tyraunt not content with the murder of the Lorde Say, went to Myle ende, and there apprehended ſyr James Cromer, then Shriefe of Kent, and ſonne in lawe to the ſayde Lorde Say, and cauſed him there likewiſe to be hedded, and his head to be fixed on a Pole, and with theſe two heades, thys blooddy Butcher entred into the Citie agayne, and in diſpite cauſed them in euery ſtrete, to kiſſe together.

After this ſhamefull murder, ſucceded open rapyne, and manifeſt robbery in dyuers houſes, within the Citie, and in eſpeciall in the houſe of Philip Malpas, Alderman of London, and diuers other: ouer and beſyde raunſomyng, and finyng of dyuers notable Marchantes, for the tuicion and ſecuritie of their lyues and goodes, as Robert Horne Alderman, which payed fiue hundreth markes, and yet neyther he, nor no other perſon was either of life or ſubſtaunce in a ſuretie or ſauegarde. He alſo put to execucion in Southwarke warke diuers persons, some for enfringyng his rules and preceptes, because he would be sene indifferent, other he tormented of his old acquaintaunce, least they should blase and declare his base birth, and lowsy lynage, disparagyng him from his vsurped surname of Mortimer, for the which, he thought and doubted not, both to haue friendes and fautors, both in London, Kent, and Esser. The wise Maior, and sage Magistrates of the Citie of London, perceiuyng themselues neyther to be sure of goodes, nor of lyfe well warranted, determined with force to repell and expulse this mischieuous heade, and hys vngracious company. And because the Lorde Scales was ordeyned keeper of the Towre of London, with Mathew Gough, the often named Capitaine in Normandie (as you haue heard before) they purposed to make them priuie, both of their entent and enterprise. The Lord Scales promised to them his ayde, with shooting of ordinaunce, and Mathew Gough was by him appointed, to assist the Mayre and the Londoners: because he was both of manhode, and experience greatly renoumed and noysed. So the Capitaynes of the Citie appointed, toke vpon them in the night to keepe the bridge of London, prohibityng the Kentish men eyther to passe or approche. The rebels, which neuer soundly slept, for feare of sodayne chaunces, hearing the bridge to be kept and manned, ran with great haste to open that passage, where betwene both parties was a fierce and cruell encounter. Mathew Gough, more expert in Marciall feates, then the other Chiefetaynes of the Citie, perceyuing the Kentish men, better to stand to their tacling, then his imagination expected, aduised his company no farther to procede toward Southwarke, till the day appered: to the intent, that the Citizens hearing where the place of the ieopardie rested, might occurre their enimies and relieue their friendes and companions. But this counsayle came to small effect: for the multitude of the rebels draue the Citezens from the stoulpes at the bridge foote, to the drawe bridge, and begaune to set fyre in dyuers houses. Alas what sorrowe it was to beholde that miserable chaunce: for some desyring to eschewe the fyre, lept on his enimies weapon, and so died: fearefull women with childzen in their armes, amased and appalled, lept into the riuer: other doubting how to saue themselues betweene fyre, water, and swoorde, were in their houses suffocat and smoldered. Yet the Capteynes nothing regarding these chaunces, fought on the drawe bridge all the night valyauntly, but in conclusion, the rebels gate the drawe bridge, and drowned many, and slue John Sutton Alderman, and Robert Heysande a hardy Citizen, with many other, beside Mathew Gough, a man of great wyt, and of muche experience in feates of chiualrie, the which in continuall warres, had valyauntly serued the king, and his father, in the partes beyonde the sea (as before you haue heard.) But it is often seene, that he which many times hath vanquished his enimies in straunge Countries, and returned againe as a conquerour, hath of his awne nacion afterward bene shamefully murdered, and brought to confusion, as in this skirmishe and bickeryng the sayde Mathewe Gough was. This hard and sore conflict endured on the Bridge till. ix. of the clocke in the morenyng, in doubtfull chaunce, and fortunes balannce: for sometyme the Londoners were bet backe to the stulpes at Saint Magnus corner, and sodainly agayne the rebels were repulsed and driuen backe to the stulpes in Southwarke, so that both partes beyng faynt, werie and fatigate, agreed to deſiſt from fight, and to leaue battayle till the next day, vpon condition: that neyther Londoners ſhould paſſe into Southwarke, nor the Kentiſhe men into London.

After this abſtinence of warre agreed, the luſtie Kentiſhe Capitayne, hoping on more friends, brake vp the gayles of the kings Bench and Marſhalſea, and ſet at libertie a ſwarme of Gallants, both meete for his ſeruice and apt for his enterpriſe. The Archebiſhop of Cauntorbury, beyng then Chauncellor of England, and for his ſuretie lyeng in the Towre of London, called to him the Byſhop of Wyncheſter, which alſo for feare, lurked at Haliwell. Theſe two prelates ſeyng the furie of the Kentiſhe people, by reaſon of their beating back, to be mitigated and miniſhed, paſſed the ryuer of Thames from the Towre, into Southwarke, bringing with them vnder the kings great ſeale, a generall pardon vnto all the offenders: which they cauſed to be openly proclamed and publiſhed. Lorde, howe glad the people were of this pardon (ye more then of the great Jubile of Rome) and how they accepted the ſame, in ſo much that the whole multitude, without bydding farewell to their Capitaine, retired the ſame night, euery man to his awne home, as men amaſed and ſtriken with feare. But John Cade deſperate of ſuccours, which by the friendes of the Duke of Yorke were to him promiſed, and ſeyng his company thus without his knowledge ſodainely departe, miſtruſting the ſequele of the matter, departed ſecretly in habite diſguyſed, into Suſſex: but all his Metamorphoſis or tranſfiguration little preuayled, for after a proclamation made, that whoſoeuer could apprehend the ſayde Jack Cade, ſhould haue for his paine a thouſande Markes, many ſought for hym, but fewe eſpied hym, till one Alexander Iden Eſquire of Kent, founde him in a garden, and there in his defence, manfully ſlue the captife Cade, and brought his dead bodie to London, whoſe head was ſet on London bridge. Thys is the ende of all rebelles, and thys fortune chaunceth euer to traytors. For where men ſtriue agaynſt the ſtreame, their bote neuer commeth to his pretenſed porte.

The miſerable ende of Jacke Cade.

After this commocion, the king himſelfe came into Kent, and there ſat in iudgement vpon the offendors, and if he had not mitigated his iuſtice, with mercie and compaſſion, more then fiue hundred by the rigor of his lawe had bene iuſtely put to execution: but he conſidered both their ſimplicitie and innocencie, and howe they with peruerſe people were ſeduced and deceyued: and ſo puniſhed the ſtubburne heades, and deliuered the ignorant and miſerable people, to the great reioyſing of all his ſubiectes.

During this commocion about London, Rauſe Biſhop of Saliſbury, was by his awne tenaunts and ſeruaunts murdered at Edington, and ſo from thence forth daylie ſucceded murther, ſlaughter, and diſſention. And the cauſe, as ſome write, was for conſenting to the geuing vp of the Duchie of Angeow and Mayne into the handes of the French king.

And about this time Quene Margaret begamme the foundation of the Queenes Colledge in Cambrige.

Theſe variable chaunces in Englande were not vnknowne to the French king, wherfore he making foundation vpon the Engliſh diſcord, determined to get into his poſſeſſion, the Duchie of Aquitayne, while the princes of England were in controuerſie for their titles and ſuperioritie: & therfore

foꝛe lyke a ſpeedy Purueioꝛ, which ſlacketh not time, he ſent the Erles of Ponthieure, & Perigot, with many valyaunt Capitaynes to lay ſiege to the towne of Bergerac ſet vpon the ryuer of Doꝛdone, of which towne was capitayne, John Geddyng, which heering of the yeelding of Roan, and conqueſt of Noꝛmandie, conſidering the puyſſaunce of the French armie, vpon reaſonable conditions rendered the towne: yet all this notwithſtanding, the Loꝛde Cameyſe, ſyꝛ Geoꝛge Seymour, ſyꝛ John Arundell, and other valyaunt Capitaines, which had the gouernaunce of this countrie, manned townes, gathered people, and animated the colde ſtomackes of the fearfull Gaſcones: requiring them to be conſtant in their fidelitie, true to their naturall Pꝛince, and vndoubted ſouereigne Loꝛde, ſending daylie letters to the king of Englande and his counſayle, declaring to him the weakeneſſe of his ſubiectes, and the ſtrength of his enimies, aſſerteyning him foꝛ a ſuretie, that without ſpeedye ayde, and ready ſuccours, the whole Countrey was like to be gotten from his poſſeſſion. Many letters were ſent, and many faire aunſweres were bꝛought, but reliefe neither appered, noꝛ one man of warre was thether ſhipped. By reaſon whereof, the Gaſcoynes perceyuing their enemies at hande, intending as well to deſtroy the countrey, as to ſubdue the people, beganne euery man foꝛ himſelfe, to regarde nothing, but the ſauing of their townes, goodes, and coꝛne: neglecting defence, and fearefull of aſſaultes, leaſt by ſmall reſiſtence, they might receyue moꝛe detriment, then after they could recouer agayne, eyther with great foꝛce, oꝛ much labour. But the Engliſhe men (whoſe natures are not to be faynt hearted, euen at the very ieopardie of death) with all their wits ſtudied, both how to repulſe and conuince their enemies, and to turne away the euill chaunces which they ſawe lykely (if pollicie did not helpe) ſodaynely to fall, and ſhoꝛtly to inſue. But all their pollicies little pꝛeuayled in concluſion, becauſe ſuccours fayled, and foꝛce wanted. Foꝛ after the Frenchmen had the towne of Bergerac to them rendered, the foꝛtreſſes of Jonſac, of Bonefoy, and dyuers other places, wyllingly and freely yeelded themſelues to the French ſubiection. During which time, the Loꝛde Doꝛuall, thirde ſonne to the Loꝛde Delabꝛeth, with a great number of men, as well on hoꝛſback as on foote, departed from Baſas, to conquere and deſtroy the Iſle of Madoce: whereof hearing the Maire of Burdeaux, with a conuenient crewe of men, iſſued out of the Citie, and encountered with his enimies, betweene whome was a harde fight and a deadly battayle: but the French men moꝛe with multitude then with foꝛce, vanquiſhed the Engliſhe men, and killed and tooke pꝛiſoners aboue fiue hundꝛed Engliſh men and Gaſcoynes, but of the frenchmen which were in double number, aboue their aduerſaries (as wꝛyters affirme) there were ſlayne eyght hundꝛed perſons. Foꝛ which cauſe, the Capitaynes followed no farther the chaſe, leaſt the Engliſhe people would agayne returne. Thys ſlaughter of the Engliſhe parte, the French wꝛyters ſet foꝛth with the moſt, but of their awne loſſe they ſpeake not one woꝛde. Such indifferency, is in their Chꝛonographiers. This diſcomfiture ſo amaſed the wits, and daunted the harts of the meane Gaſcons, that they offred many townes to the French parte, befoꝛe the ſame were of them demaunded.

After this, the Baſtard of Orleaunce, Erle of Dumoys, and Longuile, Lieutenaunt generall foꝛ the Frenche king, accompanied with his bꝛother, John Erle of Angulesme, which had bene long prisoner in England, and many valyaunt Capitaynes, and expert men of warre, besieged the Castell of Montgupon, which to them was rendered. After this, the sayde army besieged the fortresse of Blay, standing on the ryuer of Gyzond, which towne is the very key of the porte of Burdeaux, and this towne was besieged both by water and by lande, and fiercely assaulted and manfully defended, and in conclusion by very force, for lack of resistence, conquered and gayned. The Bastarde of Kendale Capitayne of the Castell, seeing the towne lost, vpon certayne conditions deliuered his fortresse, into the possession of the Lorde Lieutenaunt.

After this towne gayned, the fortresses of Bourge & Liburne yelded but not without fiue weekes besiegyng. The wittie Captaynes perceiuyng fortunes fauour was not towardes them, thought it necessary to take the tyme while their good planet reigned. Wherefore to preuent the ayde of the Englishe men, whom they dayly looked for to come to the succor of their people: they appoynted foure armes, to make warre in foure seuerall partes. The Lord Charles Delabreth, accompanied with John Lorde Tartas and Aymon, Lord of Mozuall his sonnes, and the Erle of Foys, and the Viscount Lawtrec his brother, and many noble men of Guyen, layd siege to the towne of Arques, in the which be diuers hote bathes. The Erle of Armynacke extreme enemie to the realme of England, for breakyng the maryage concluded betwene king Henry and his daughter (as before you haue heard) besieged with a great puyssaunce, the strong towne of Rion. The Erle of Penthieur, with many noble barons, besieged the towne of Chastillon in Berigot, and the Erle of Dumoys, enuironed with a great puyssaunce the towne of Fronsacke. The Englishemen within this towne, perceiuyng the great ordinaunce on the Frenche part, and the small prouision on their syde, couenanted with the sayd Erle, that if the towne were not succored, & the French men foughte withal, before the feast of the nativity of S. John Baptist next ensuyng, ỹ then the towne of Fronsacke should be yelded to them, which was the strongest fortresse of all that Country, and the very key of Guien, & their Chamber of Burdeaux: and for performaunce hereof, pledges were deliuered, and writynges autentique sealed. This agrement once blowen through the Countrie, the Citie of Burdeaux and all other townes (except Bayon) made like agreement, and deliuered pledges. So did all the noble men and Gentlemen, which were subiectes and vassalles to the Crowne of England. Alacke, alacke, euery day was lookyng for relefe, and euery houre was gapyng for comfort, but wishyng serued not, nor hopyng nothing helped: for the pestiferous diuision which reigned in England, so inueigled the braynes of the noble men there, that the honour of the Realme was cleerely forgotten, and nothyng earthly, but their priuate phantasies looked on and remembred. Now to conclude, the day appoynted came, but succor looked for came not: so that all the townes of Aquitaine (except Bayon) deliuered their keyes, and became vassalles to the frenche Nation, yet the Citezens of Burdeaux, hopyng of rescues, offered themselues to fight with the Frenchmen, and desyred a day of battaile to be appoynted, which request was to them graunted. But at the day assigned, they beyng in dispayre of all refuge and succor, rendered themselues and the towne, to their aduersaryes, their lyues and goodes goodes reſerued, with licence and ſafeconduite to all perſons which would depart and ſayle into England. When the Cities and townes of Gaſcoyne were ſet in good order, the Erle of Dumoys and Foys, with great preparacion of vittaile, munition, and men, came before the Citie of Bayon, where with mines and battery, they ſo diſmayed the fearefull Inhabitauntes, that neyther the Captaine nor the Souldiours, could kepe them from yeeldyng: ſo by force they deliuered the towne, and their Capteyne as a priſoner, offred a great ſomme of money for the ſauegarde of their liues and goodes. Beſides theſe agreementes taken with townes, diuers noble men made ſeueral compoſicions, as Gaſton de Foys, Capdaw of Buelſz, whom king Henry the fift made Erle of Longuile, and knight of the Garter, whoſe auncestours were euer true to England, which agreed that he, and John de Foys his ſon, whome king Henry the firſt created Erle of Kendale, and made alſo knight of the Garter, ſhould enioy all their landes in Acquitaine, geuen to them by the kinges of England, or by the Dukes of Aquitaine, And becauſe their entent was ſtill to ſerue the king of Englande their ſouereigne Lorde, they agreed, to deliuer into the cuſtodie of the Erle of Foys, their Coſyn, the ſonne and heyre of the ſayd Erle of Kendale, beyng of the age of three yeres, to the entent, that if he at his full age denied to become ſubiect and vaſſall to the French king, or before that tyme deceaſſed, that then after the death of his father, and grandfather, all the ſayde landes ſhould wholy remaine to the next heyre of their blood, eyther Male, or Female, beyng vnder the obeyſaunce of the Frenche king, or his heyres. Many noble men, whoſe hartes were good Engliſhe, made like compoſicions, and ſome came into England, and other went to Calice, and were great officers there: as the Lorde Duras, which was Marſhall there, and Monſire Vantlere, which was there Deputie, vnder the Erle of Warwike (as after ſhall be ſhewed.) Now haue I declared to you, the loſſe of Fraunce, Normandie, and Acquitain: wherefore, hauyng no more cauſe yet to ſpeake of them, I will returne to the great trouble, diſſencion and diuiſion, which long was cloaked, and nowe openly ſet abrode, and burſt out in the realme of England.

You haue heard before, howe the Duke of Yorke, as heyre to Lionell Duke of Clarence, pretended priuily, a title to the Crowne, and howe hys friendes commoned ſecretly with diuers perſons of that matter, and excited them to ſet forward, and aduaunce that part to the vttermoſt: and howe the ſayde Duke was ſent into Ireland, where he was dayly aduertiſed by hys aſſured friendes, of all thinges done in England, and by them knew in what eſtate he ſtoode, both with the Nobilitie, and Commonaltie. Wherefore, he mindyng no lenger to dreame in his waightie matter, nor to kepe ſecrete his right title, returned out of Ireland, and came to London in the Parliament tyme, where he deliberately conſulted, with his eſpeciall friendes: as John Duke of Norffolke, Richarde Erle of Sariſbury, and Lorde Richarde his ſonne, which after was Erle of Warwike, Thomas Courtney, Erle of Deuonſhire, and Edwarde Broke Lorde Cobham, a man of great wit and much experience: requiryng them, both of aduice and counſaile, howe hee might without ſpot of treaſon, or colour of vſurpacion, ſet forth his title, and obteyne his right. 1452 3 E

occaſion and picke ſome quarell to the Duke of Somerſet, which ruled the King, ordered the realme, and moſt might doe with the Queene: Whome the commons, for the loſſe of Normandy, worſe then a Tode or Scorpion hated, diſdained, and abhorred, in ſo much that diuerſe euill ruled perſons, brake his houſe, and ſpoyled his goods, within the blacke Friers of the Cytie of London: which malefactors, according to their deſertes, were iuſtlye executed and puniſhed. For well knewe the Duke of Yorke and his adherentes, that if the Duke of Somerſet ſawe or ſmelled any point of their purpoſed enterpriſe, that hee woulde with ſpeare and ſhielde, with might and mayne, withſtande and repell the ſame, to the extreme point of death, and to their vtter confuſion. Wherefore to abridge his power, and to miniſhe hys auctho[r]itie, they determined to bringe him into the hatred of the people, and into the diſdayne of the Nobylitie. And to be the ſtronger in the ſetting forth of their feate, they, what with rewards and faire promiſes, and what with declaration of great enormyties, committed by the kyngs counſaillors, againſt the common wealth, allected and allured to them, luſtye bachelars, and actyue perſons, of a great number, proteſting and declaring, that they nether ment euill, not thought harme, eyther to the kynges perſon, or to hys dignitie: but that their intent was, for the reuenging of great iniuries done to the publique wealth, and to perſecute and reforme diuers rulers about the kyng, which dayly contrary to right and equitie, vexed and pilled the engliſh people, without reaſon or meaſure: ſo that no man was in ſuretie, eyther of his owne goodes, or ſure of his proper lands, or poſſeſſions. Theſe great enormities, they cauſed to be publiſhed to the intent that their chefe purpoſe ſhoulde not be eſpied, or perceiued.

The Duke of Yorke rebelleth, and claymeth ſyttie to the Crowne.

When the Duke of Yorke had thus framed the entry into hys long entended iorney, he with helpe of his frendes, aſſembled a great armye in the Marches of Wales, publiſhing openly, that the cauſe of his mocion was, for the publique wealth of the realme, and great profite of the commons: which faire tolde tale, allured to him much people, aſwell of the chiualrye, as of the mean ſort. The king much aſtonnied w^th this ſodain commocion, by the aduiſe of his counſail, rayſed a great hoſt, and marched forward toward the Duke: but he being of his approch, credibly aduertiſed, by his eſpials, diuerted from the kings wayes, and toke his iorney towarde London: and hauing knowledge, that he might not be ſuffered with his army, to paſſe through London, he croſſed ouer the Thameſe at Kingſton bridge, and ſo ſet forth towarde Kent, where he knewe that he had both friends, and good willers, and there

Brent heath. on Brentheath, a Mile from Derford, and .x. miles from London, he embattayled himſelfe, and encamped his armye very ſtronglye, both with trenches and artillery. The king being therof aduertiſed, with great diligẽce brought

Black heath. his army to Blackheath, and there pight his tentes. While both the armies lay thus embattayled, the king by the aduiſe of his counſaill, ſent the byſhops of Wincheſter and Elie to the Duke, both to know, what was the cauſe of ſo great a tumult and commocion, and alſo to make a concord, if the requeſtes of the Duke and his company ſemed to them conſonant to reaſon, or profytable to the people. The Duke hearing the meſſage of the two biſhops, eyther doubting the variable chaunce of mortall battaill, or loking for a better occaſion, or a more luckey daye, anſwered the prelates, that his comming

was neyther to dampnifie the king, neyther in honor, nor in person, nor yet any good man, but his intent was to remoue from him certaine euill disposed persons of hys counsayle, which were the bludsuckers of the nobilitie, the pollers of the cleargie, and oppressors of the poze people: amongst whom he chiefly named, Edmound Duke of Sommerset, whome if the king would commit to ward, to answere to such articles as agaynst him in open Parliament should be both proponed and proued, he promised not onely to dissolue hys armie and dispatche his people, but also offred himselfe, like an obedient subiect to come to the kinges presence, and to do him true and faythfull seruice, accordyng to his truth and bounden dutie. When the Messengers were returned with this reasonable aunswere: The king perceiuyng, that without great bloodshed, he could not bridle the Duke of Yorke, nor without war he could not appease the furious rage of the common people, beyng once set on fire, except he folowed their mindes, and graunted their requestes, caused the Duke of Sommerset to be committed to warde, as some say: or to kepe himselfe priuie in his awne house, as other write, till the furye of the people were somewhat asswaged and pacified. Which thing done, the Duke of Yorke the first day of Marche, dissolued his armie, and brake vp his campe, and came to the kinges tent, where beyde his expectacion, and contrary to the promise made by the king, he found the Duke of Sommerset set at large and at libertie, whome the Duke of Yorke boldely accused of treason, of bribrie, oppression, and many other crymes. The Duke of Sommerset not onely made aunswere to the Dukes obiections, but also accused him of high treason towarde the king his souereigne Lorde, affirmyng, that he with his fautors, and complices had consulted together, how to obteyne the Crowne and Scepter of the Realme. By meane of which wordes, the king remoued straight to London, and the Duke of Yorke as prisoner rode before him, and so was kept a while. The king assembled together a great counsail at Westminster, to heere the accusacions of the two Dukes, the one obiectyng to the other, shamefull actes, and detestable crymes. But the Duke of Sommerset, which nowe conceiued in his minde the thing that shortly folowed, incessantly exhorted the Counsaile, that the Duke of Yorke, by compulsion or otherwise might be compelled to confesse his offence, and so beyng attaynted of treason, to be put to execution, and his children to be taken enemies and aduersaries to their native Countrie: to the entent that by the losse of this onely Prince and his sequele, all ciuile warre, and inwarde diuision might ceasse and be repressed: beseechyng almightie God, that so great an enemie to the king and his blood, might neuer escape punishement, nor continue long in life. The Duke of Sommerset set forth this matter the more behemently, because he knewe perfectly, that the Duke of Yorke dayly studied, how to get the Crowne, and obteyne the gouernaunce, and to depose and destroy both the king and him. But the necessitie of destinie cannot by any mans deuise, be eyther letted or interrupted: for many thinges (to common iudgements) derlared the Duke of Yorkes truth and innocencie in this case. First, his free and voluntary commyng to the king, when he with his power was able to encounter with the kinges puissaunce, which was an open token and manifest argument, that he neyther ment treason, nor yet fraude. Secondarily, his humble submission, his reasonable requestes, and profitable peticions for the poore poore commons, were iudged no poyntes of a man, that deſyred ſouereignitie or rule aboue other, which thinges he did onely for a cautele (as afterwarde openly appered.) While the Counſaile treated of ſauyng or loſyng of thys Duke of Yorke, A rumor ſprang throughout London, that Edward Erle of Marche, ſonne and heyre apparaunt to the ſayde Duke, a yong Prince of great wit and much ſtomacke, accompanied with a ſtrong armie of Marchemen, was commyng towarde London, which tydinges ſore aſtonyed the Queene and the whole counſaile. Beſide this, the ſame very day came Ambaſſadors from the heddes and Magiſtrates of the City of Burdeaux, whereof the chiefe were, the Erle of Kendale, and the Lorde Leſpar, which ſignifyed to the Counſaile, that if they would ſend an armie into Gaſcoyn, the Gaſcoynes would reuert and turne againe to the Engliſhe part: aduertiſyng them, that there was in thoſe partes no puyſſaunce or garriſon of Frenche men, to withſtand them, and therefore there was no doubt of the regainyng or reconqueſt: requiryng them with all diligent celeritie, to take ſo fayre a pray ſo openly to them offered, and to minde nothing before the regainyng of ſo fruitfull a Countrie. Theſe two thinges ſore troubled the heades of the kinges counſaile, which leaſt this diſſencion betwene two perſons, might be the let of outward conqueſt, they firſt agreed to ſet the Duke of Yorke at libertie, and permitted him to returne to his fayre Caſtell of Wigmore in the Marches of Wales, where he ſtudyed, both howe to diſpleaſe his enemies, and to obteyne his purpoſe: And ſo by meanes of the abſence of the Duke of Yorke, which was in maner baniſhed the Court, and the Kings preſence, the Duke of Sommerſet roſe vp in high fauour with the king and the Queene, and his worde onely ruled, and his voyce was onely heard.

1453 31 The Counſayle of Englande, not forgetting the offer of the Gaſcons, and that they might nowe haue the Citie of Burdeaux, with the Countrie round about, by offer and requeſt, which with great charge and long warre they could ſcant againe recouer or repoſſeſſe, appointed the noble ſouldiour, and valyaunt Capitayne John Lorde Talbot, and Erle of Shrewſburie, to be Chiefetaine of the armie, which ſhould in all haſte be tranſported and conueyed into Aquitayne. The Lordes of Gaſcoyne, both well pleaſed and glad of their aunſwere, returned into their Countrie, in as ſecret maner as they from thence departed, declaring to their Nation, the Capitaynes and the power, that was to them comming: exhorting euery man to be firme and ſtable to the king of England and his heyres, vnder whoſe liberty and freedome they had proſpered and reioyſed, aboue three hundred yeres, rather then now to fall into the French captiuity: whoſe taxes were vnreaſonable, and whoſe daylie exactions were to them importable.

When all things were ſhipped, and winde and weather ſerued, the Erle of Shrewſbury toke his chaunce, and ſayled into Gaſcoyne, where without reſiſtence, he peaceably arryued in the Iſle of Madre, where he repoſed his armie, being ſcant three thouſand men, and deſtroyed all the Countrey, betwene Burdeaux and Blay, and toke the ſtrong towne and Caſtell of Fronſac, and diuers other townes and fortreſſes. The inhabitaunts of Burdeaux hearing of the Erles arriuall, ſent to hym meſſengers in the darke night, thanking and congratulating him for his thether comming, and alſo requiring him to haſten, and ſpeede his iourney towarde their Citie, enforming him, him, that now the time serued for his purpose: and time not taken, was labor misspent. This auncient Fox, and politique Capitayne loste not one houre, nor spared one minut, till he came before the Citie of Burdeaux. The Citizens glad of his comming, made not the French Capitaynes, which had the gouernaunce of the towne, eyther parties or priuies of their intent: yet some of them would, that the French men, in securitie both of lyues and goodes should departe out of the towne, but their wyll was no will: for the multitude, abhorring the French seruitude, and embracing the Englishe libertie, which they and their auncestors of many yeres had tasted, opened one gate, and let in a great parte of the Englishe armie. The French Capitaines entending to escape secretly by a posterne, were slayne and taken by the Lorde Lesper, and other of the Englishe army. After the regayning of Burdeaux, arriued at Blay the Bastarde of Sommerset, Sir John Talbot Lorde Lisle, by his wyfe sonne to the sayde Erle of Shrewsbury, the Lorde Molyns, the Lordes Haryngton and Cameys, syr John Hayward, Syr John Montgomerie, syr John Vernon with.xxij.C. men with vittayles and munitions. When the Erle of Shrewsbury was thus according to his entent of all things furnished and adorned: first he fortified Burdeaux with English men and vittayle: after that he rode into the Countrey abroad, where he obteyned Cities, & gat townes without stroke or dent of sworde: for the poore and needie people being wery with the oppression of their new Landlords rendered their townes, before they were of them requyred, and beside thys the townes and Cities farre distaunt from Burdeaux, sent messengers to the Erle, promising to him both seruice and obeysaunce. And among other the towne and Castell of Chastillon in Perigot, was to him deliuered by the Frenchmen vpon composition, that they might with their liues safely depart: which towne, the Erle strongly fortified both with men and ordinaunce. The French king lyeng at Towers in Towrayne, being of the Erles actes in Gascoyn credibly enformed, was not a little exasperate and quickned: wherfore he minding to resist the first stormc, & repulse the first surge, assembled a great army to the number of. xxij. thousand men, and entering into Aquitayne came to Lusigneum, and from thence accompanied with the Erle of Ponthyure, the Lordes of saint Seuere and Boucat, marched towarde Calice in Gascoyn, and with fayre promises obteyned the towne. And after that towne gayned, the French king diuided his armie into two parties, whereof the one was gouerned by the Erle of Cleremont, sonne in lawe to King Charles, and heyre to the Duke of Burbon, in the which were. xv. thousand men, in whom consisted the waight and peyse of the whole enterprise. This army he appointed to take the next way toward Burdeaux: the other armie whereof he was Capitayn and leader himselfe, accompanied with the peeres and noble men of his realme, he kept and reteyned still beside Caleys, and sent the two Marshalles of Fraunce with. xviij. C. men of armes, beside Archers, to besiege the towne of Chastilon in Perigot, & in going thether, they gat a fortresse, which they manned, and so departed to Chastilon, which they enuyroned with a strong siege, and cast high trenches, and made deepe diches on euery side: and in a place where their enimies must come, they layde ordinaunce both great and small, whereof so great a number was neuer before seene in Fraunce. The Erle of Shrewesbury hearing of these newes, and perceyuing that he muſt of neceſſitie encounter and fight with two armies, determined with himſelfe, firſt to aſſay the leaſt power and weaker puiſſaunce: wherfore without longer delay, he aſſembled together eyght.C. horſemen, whereof the Lorde Liſle his ſonne, the Lorde Molyns, the Lord Cameus, Syr Edward Hull, ſyr John Haward, and Syr John Vernon were chiefe, and ſo marched forward toward Chaſtylon, appoynting. v. M. foote men vnder the conduyt of the Erle of Kendalle, and the Lorde Leſpar to followe him with all ſpede. In his way he aſſauted the Towre, which the French men had taken, and by force entered, and ſlue all that he found within, and by the way he met fiue hundred Frenchmen, goyng a forragyng, of whome he ſlue the greateſt parte, and chaſed the other to the campe. The french men knowing by theſe good runners away of the Erles approching, with all diligence left the ſiege, and retired in good order into the place which they had trenched, ditched, and fortified with ordenaunce. They within the towne ſeing the ſiege remoued, ſent out worde to the Engliſhe men that the French men fled. The courageous Erle hearing theſe newes, and fearing leaſt through long tarying the birdes might be flowen awaye, not tarying till his footemen were come, ſet forward toward his enimies, which were in minde ſurely to haue fled, as they confeſſed afterward, if the feare of the French kings rebuke, which was not farre of, had not cauſed them to tarie, and yet in this armie were preſent, the Marſhalles and great Maſter of Fraunce, the Erle of Ponthyeure, the Seneſcal of Poythiew, the Lorde Beſſire, and many valyaunt Barons and knights. When the Engliſhe men were come to the place where the French men were encamped, in the which (as Eneas Siluius teſtifieth) were three hundred peeces of Braſſe, beſide diuers other ſmall peces, and ſubtill engines to the Engliſh men vnknowne, and nothing ſuſpected, they lighted all on foote, the Erle of Shrewſburie onely except, which becauſe of his age, rode on a little Hackeny, and fought fiercely with the French men, and gat the entrie of their Campe, and by fine force entered into the ſame. Thys conflict continued in doubtfull iudgement of victorie two long houres: during which fight, the Lords of Montamban and Humadayze, with a great company of French men entered the battayle, and began a newe fielde, and ſodainely the Gonners perceyuing the Engliſh men to approch neere, diſcharged their ordinaunce, and ſlue three hundred perſons, nere to the Erle, who perceyuing the imminent ieopardie, and ſubtile labirynth, in the which he and his people were encloſed and wrapped, diſpiſing his awne ſauegarde, and deſiring the lyfe of his entierly and welbeloued ſonne the Lorde Liſle, willed, aduertiſed, and counſayled him to departe out of the fielde, and to ſaue himſelfe. But when the ſonne had anſwered that it was neyther honeſt nor naturall for him, to leaue his father in the extreme ieopardie of his lyfe, and that he would taſte of that draught, which his father and Parent ſhould aſſay and beginne: The noble Erle and comfortable Capitaine ſayde to him: Oh ſonne, ſonne, I thy father, which onely hath bene the terror and ſcourge to the French people ſo many yeres, which hath ſubuerted ſo many townes, and diſcomfited ſo manye of them in open battayle, and marciall conflict, neyther can here die, for the honour of my Countrey, without great laude and perpetuall fame, nor flie or depart without perpetuall ſhame and continuall infamy. But becauſe this is thy first iourney and enterpryse, neyther thy flyeng shall redounde to thy shame, nor thy death to thy glorie: for as hardie a man wisely flyeth, as a rashe person folishely abideth, therefore the flyeng of me shall be the dishonor, not onely of me and my progenie, but also a discomfiture of all my company: thy departure shall saue thy lyfe, and make thee able another tyme, if I be slayne to reuenge my death, and to do honor to thy prince, and profite to his realme. But nature so wrought in the sonne, that neyther desire of lyfe, nor thought of securitie, could withdraw or pluck him from his naturall father: who considering the constancie of his childe, and the great daunger that they stood in, comforted his souldiours, cheared his Capytaynes, and valiauntly set on his enimies, and slue of them more in number then he had in his company. But his enimies hauing a greater company of men, and more abundaunce of ordinaunce then before had bene sene in a battayle, first shot him through the thighe with a handgonne, and slue his horse, and cowardly killed hym, lyeng on the ground, whome they neuer durst looke in the face, while he stoode on his feete, and with him there dyed manfully his sonne the Lorde Lisle, his bastard sonne Henry Talbot, and syr Edward Hull, elect to the noble order of the Garter, and.xxx. valyaunt personages of the Englishe nacion, and the Lorde Molyns was there taken prisoner with. lx. other. The residew of the Englishe people fled to Burdeaux and other places, whereof in the flight, were slayne, aboue a thousand persons. At this battayle of Chastillon, fought the.xiij. day of Julij, in this yere ended his lyfe John Lorde Talbot, & of his progenie the first Erle of Shrewsburie, after that he with muche fame, more glorie, and most victorie had for his Prince and Countrey, by the space of.xxiiij. yeres and more, valyauntly made warre, and serued the king, in the partes beyonde the sea, whose corps was left on the grounde, and after was found by his friendes, and conueyed to Whitchurch in Shropshyre, where it is intumulate. This man was to the French people a very scourge, and a daylie terror, in so much that as his person was fearefull and terrible to his aduersaries present: so his name and fame was spitefull and dreadfull to the common people absent, in so much that women in Fraunce to feare their yong children, would crie, the Talbot commeth, the Talbot commeth. After this discomfiture, diuers Lordes fled to Burdeaux, but the Erle of Kendall, the Lordes of Montferrant, of Rosayne, and of Dangladas, entered into the Castell of Chastillon, which they by the space of. x. dayes manfully defended, but in conclusion being desperate of all succours rendered the fortresse, and came safe to Burdeaux. After thys towne was yeelded, the townes of Saint Million, Bybourne and all other, which the Erle of Shrewesbury had conquered, rendered themselues to the Frenche obeysaunce, Burdeaux onely except. The which City being the last refuge, and onely consolation of the Englishe people in Gascoyn, the french king in person with all his puyssaunce strongly besieged and daylie assauted, in the which he more lost then gayned: beside thys, the Englishe men issued out, and courageously fought with their enimies: lykewise did the Citezens, which looking for no fauour at the French kings hande, because of their late coniuration agaynst him, manfully defended themselues, and sore noyed and hurt their enimies. But in conclusion both garrisons and the inhabitants oppressed with much penurie, & extreme famine were enforced to render the Citie vpon reaſonable conditions, to them by the French king ſent and offered: the effect whereof was that no offence, before time committed or done by any of the Citezens ſhould hereafter be imputed, or layde to the charge of any of them. Alſo that all Engliſhe men and Gaſcons might ſafely depart into Englande, or to Caleys with all their ſubſtance, and that the Lordes Leſpar Duras, and .xxx. other, ſhould neuer vpon payne of death, be found within any of the french kings dominions, which Lord Leſparre after being taken diſguiſed in Gaſcoyne, was made ſhorter by the head. When this compoſition was agreed and ſealed, the Engliſhe men had their ſhippes and all things neceſſary for their iourney to them deliuered, which, when winde and weather ſerued, were ſhortly tranſported into Englande, in the monyth of October this preſent yere.

The loſſe of the whole Duchy of Aquitaine.

Thus was the Duchy of Acquytaine, which had contynued in the Engliſh poſſeſſion from the yere of our Lorde. M. lb. which is .iii. C. and odde yeres, by the mariage of Elynor, daughter and heyre to Wyllyam Duke of Aquitaine, wife to king Henry the ſeconde, finallye reduced, and brought agayne to the Frenche obedience and ſeruitude. The keping of which duchy was neyther coſtly, nor troubleſome to the Realme of Englande, but both pleſaunt and profitable: for by the ſoueraigne of that country, yong gentlemen learned the experience of warre, & expert men were promoted to many ryche offices, and great liuinges within the ſame. For within that onelie Duchye, are foure Archebiſhoppes. xviii. Biſhoppes. xb. Erledoms, two. C and two Barones, and aboue a Thouſande Cappytaineſhippes and Baylywickes.

A declaracio of the dignities in ỹ Duchie of Aquitaine.

Although this great loſſe chaunced, this yere to the Engliſh nacyon, yet a greater detryment hapned the ſame ſeaſon to the whole flocke of chriſten people. For Mahomet, called the great Turke, beſeged the Citye of Conſtantynople in Greece, wyth an innnmerable number of Turkes, and fiftye daies together gaue to it a continuall aſſault, and on the fourth daye of June, toke it perforce, ſleyng man, woman, and chyldren, except the Emperour Paleologus, and diuers other of the bloode Royall, whome he toke priſoners, and after cauſed them to be beheaded. If I ſhoulde write the deteſtable murder of men, the abhominable and cruell ſlaughter of children, the ſhamefull rauiſhment of women and Virgins, which were perpetrate and done by the vnmercifull Pagans and cruell Turkes, I aſſure you that your eares would abhorre the hering, and your eyes would not abyde the readyng, and therfore I paſſe them ouer.

The birth of prince Edwarde, ſonne to king Henry the ſixt.

In this troublous ſeaſon on the .xiij. day of October, was the Quene delyuered at Weſtmynſter of a fayre ſonne, which was chriſtened and named Edward, and after grew to a goodly and perfite man, as you ſhall here: whoſe mother ſuſteyned not a little ſlaunder and obloquye of the common people, ſayeng that the king was not able to get a childe, and that this was not his ſonne, with many ſlaunderous wordes, to the Queenes diſhonor, which here needeth not to be reherſed. After the birth of this childe, the king highly aduaunced his two brethren, on his mothers ſide. For Edmond he created Erle of Richemond, which was father to king Henry the ſeuenth, and Jaſper he created Erle of Pembroke, which died without iſſue.

The kinges two brethren created erles.

and finall concluſion: domeſticall dyſcorde, and cyuill diſcencion began againe to renewe and aryſe, within the Realme of Englande, for when the care of outwarde hoſtilytie (which kepte the myndes of the Princes, in the realme occupied, & in exercise) was taken away and vaniſhed, deſire of ſo-uereintie & ambicion of preheminence, ſodainely ſprang out ſo farre, that the whole Realme was diuided into two ſeuerall factions, and priuat parts. For kyng Henry, diſcended of the houſe of Lancaſtre, claimyng the croune from kyng Henry the fourth, his graund father, firſt aucthor of this diuiſion: and Richarde Duke of Yorke, as heire to Lionell, the thirde ſonne to kyng Edwarde the thirde, wreſteled for the game, and ſtroue for the wager. By reaſon whereof, the Nobles, aſwell as the common people, were into parts diuided, to the deſtruction of manye a man, and to the great ruyne and decay of this regyon. For whyle the one parte ſtudyed to vanquiſhe and ſuppreſſe the the other, all common wealth was ſet aſyde, and iuſtice & equitie was cleerelye exiled. For the Duke of Yorke, which ſore gaped and more thirſted for the ſuperioritie and preheminence, ſtudied, deuyſed, and practiſed all wayes, and meanes, by the which he myght attayne to hys pretenſed purpoſe, and long hoped deſire. And amongeſt all imaginations, one ſeemed moſt neceſſarye for his purpoſe, which yet againe was to ſtirre and prouoke the malyce of all the people, againſt the Duke of Somerſet, who onely ruled the King, and ordered all things at hys pleaſure and will: Imaginyng, that he beyng made out of the way, his purpoſe ſhoulde ſhortly come to a good concluſion.
Wherefore, to the nobles of the Realme he complayned, & lamented the miſerable ſtate and dayly ruine of this noble countrey: noting and affirming, the Duke of Sommerſet to be the very roote, & cauſe of the ſame, whome he named, and called, an vniuſt man, a miſchieuous perſon, a tirannicall gouernor, and a couetous counſailor: layyng alſo great offences to kyng Henry, ſayyng, that he was a man, neyther of wit, nor ſtomacke, neyther meete to be a king, nor apt to gouerne a common wealth, and therefore it was the dutie of the noble men, and great Princes, not onelye to thinke on this weightie matter, but ſpeedely to prouide a remedy, and to ſet the Realme in an other ſtay. By which complaints, and perſwaſions, the Duke of Yorke, ſo altered the minds of many perſons of highe eſtate, that they liked not the worlde, as it then wa-nered, nor approued the actes of the king or his counſaile. And becauſe that ambicion and auarice was newly entred into their hartes, they ſtudied ſodainly to chaunge all things, and tourne the worlde vpſedowne. When the Duke ſaw mens appetites, and felt well their mindes, he chiefly entertay-ned two Richardes, and both Neuelles, the one of Saliſburye, the other of Werwike beyng Erles, the firſt the father, the ſecond the ſonne. This Erle of Saliſburie was ſecond ſonne to Raufe Neuell, Erle of Weſtmerland, whoſe daughter the Duke of Yorke had maried, and the ſayde Richarde was eſ-pouſed to Lady Alice, the only childe and ſole heire of Thomas Montacute Erle of Saliſburie, ſlaine at the ſiege of Orleaunce (as before I haue declared) of which woman he engendered Richard, John and George: Ry-charde the eldeſt ſonne eſpouſed Anne, the ſiſter and heire of the entire blood to Lorde Henry Beauchampe Erle, and after Duke of Warwike, in whoſe right and tytle he was created and named Erle of Warwike, and not by his awne progeny or parentage. This Richard was not only a man of excellent qualities, but alſo from his youth, by a certaine practiſe or naturall inclination, to ſet himſelfe forwarde with wittie and gentle demeanour, to all perſons of high and of lowe degree, that among all ſortes of people, he obteyned great loue, fauour and credence: which things daylie more and more encreaſed, by his abundant liberalitie, and plentifull houſe keeping, then by his riches, auctoritie, or high parentage: by reaſon of which doings, he was in ſuche fauour and eſtimation amongſt the common people, that they iudged him able to doe all things, and that without him, nothing to be well done. For which cauſes his auctoritie ſhortly ſo faſt increaſed, that which way he bowed, that way ranne the ſtreame, and what parte he aduaunced, that ſide gat the ſuperioritie.

1455 33 The Duke of Sommerſet arreſted of Treaſon.

When the Duke of Yorke had faſtened his Chaine, betwene theſe two ſtrong pillers, he with his friendes, ſo ſeriouſly wrought, and ſo politiquely handled his buſineſſe, that the Duke of Sommerſet was arreſted in the Quenes great Chamber, and ſent to the Towre of London, where he without great ſolempnitie kept a heauie Chriſtmaſſe: againſt whome in open Parliament, were layd diuers & heynous articles of high treaſon, aſwell for the loſſe of Normandie, as for the late miſchaunce which happened in Guien. The king at this tyme was ſicke at Clarendon, and ſo conueyed to London, by reaſon whereof, no finall determination proceded, in this great & waightie cauſe, but it was put in ſuſpence, till the next aſſemble of the high Court of Parliament. Duryng which tyme the king either of his awne minde, or by the Queenes procurement, cauſed the Duke of Sommerſet, to be ſet at libertie: by which doyng, grewe great enuy and diſpleaſure, betwene the king and diuers of his Lordes, and in eſpeciall, betwene the Duke of Yorke and the kinges linage. And to aggrauate more the malice newe begon, the Queene, which then ruled the roſt, and bare the whole rule, cauſed the Duke of Sommerſet to be preferred to the Captainſhip of Calice, wherewith, not onely the Commons, but alſo many of the Nobilitie, were greatly grieued and offended, ſaiyng: that he had loſt Normandie, and ſo would he doe Calice. The Duke of Yorke and his adherentes perceiuyng, that neyther exhortacion ſerued, nor accuſement preuayled againſt the Duke of Sommerſet, determined to reuenge their quarrell, and obteyne their purpoſe, by open warre and Marciall aduenture, and no lenger to ſlepe in ſo waighty a buſineſſe. So he beyng in the Marches of Wales, aſſociate with his ſpeciall friendes, the Erles of Sarliſbury, and Warwike, the Lorde Cobham, and other, aſſembled an army, and gathered a great power, and like warlike perſons, marched toward London. The Londoners, heeryng of ſo great a multitude, commyng toward the Citie, were greatly aſtonied and much abaſhed: for euery perſon conſidered his awne part, that eyther with holdyng with the one ſide, or beyng contrariant to the other, or medlyng with no part, he ſhould incurre indignacion or diſpleaſure. The king beyng credibly enformed, of the great armie commyng toward him, aſſembled an hoſt, intendyng to mete with the Duke in the North part, becauſe he had to many friendes aboute the Citie of London, and for that cauſe with great ſpeede and ſmall lucke, he beyng accompanied with the Dukes of Sommerſet and Buckingham, the Erles of Stafford, Northumberland, and Wilſhire, with the Lorde Clifford, and diuers other Barons, departed out of Weſtminſter, the. xx. day of May, toward toward the towne of Saint Albones: of whose doynges the Duke of Yorke beyng aduertised by his espials, with all his power coasted the Countries, and came to the same towne, the third day next ensuyng. The king heryng of their approchyng, sent to him messengers, straightly chargyng and cõmaundyng him, as an obedient subiect, to kepe the peace, and not as an enemie to his naturall Countrie, to murder and slea his awne Countrimen and proper Nacion. While king Henry, more desyrous of peace than of warre, was sendyng foorth his Orators, at the one ende of the towne: the Erle of Warwike with the Marchemen, entered at the other ende of the towne, and fiercely set on the kinges forwarde, and them shortly discomfited. Then came the Duke of Sommerset, and all the other Lordes with the kinges power, which fought a sore and cruell battaile, in the which many a tall man lost his life: but the Duke of Yorke sent euer fresh men, to succor the werie, and put new men in places of the hurt persons, by which onely pollicie, the kinges armie was ouerthrowne and dispersed, and all the Chieftaynes of the fielde almost slaine and brought to confusion. For there dyed vnder the signe of the Castel, Edmond Duke of Sommerset, who long before was warned to eschew all Castelles, and beside him, lay Henry the second Erle of Northumberlande, Humfrey Erle of Stafford, sonne to the Duke of Buckingham, John Lord Clifford, and. viij. thousand men and more. Humfrey Duke of Buckingham beyng wounded, and James Butler Erle of Wilshire and Ormond, seyng fortunes lowryng chaunce, left the king post alone, and with a great nũber fled away. This was the ende of the first battaile at Saint Albones, which was fought on the Thursday before the feast of Pentecost, beyng the xxiij. day of May. In this .xxxiij. yere of the kinges reigne, the bodyes of the noble men were buried in the Monasterye, and the meane people in other places. This Edmond Duke of Sommerset left behinde him three sonnes, Henry, Edmond, and John, which to the extremitie of death, tooke part with the line of king Henry.

The first battayle at S. Albons.

After this victorie obteyned by the Duke of Yorke and his companions, he remembred that he had oftentymes declared and published abrode, the only cause of his warre to be, for the aduauncement of the publike wealth, and to set the realme in a more commodious estate, and a better condicion. Wherfore, he vsyng all lenitie, mercie, and bounteousnesse, would not once touch or apprehende the body of king Henry, whome he might both haue slaine, and vtterly destroyed, considering that he had him in his warde and gouernance. But with great honour and due reuerence conueyed him to London, and so to Westminster, to the which place was sommoned and appoynted a great assemble of the three estates, commonly called a Parliament, which beganne the. ix. day of July, in the which session, the Duke of Gloucester was openly declared a true Prince, both to the king and the realme. Besyde this it was enacted, that no person should eyther iudge or reporte, any poynt of vntruth, of the Duke of Yorke, the Erles of Sarisbury, and Warwike, for commyng in warlike maner agaynst the king at Saint Albones, considerynge that their attempt and enterprice, was onely to see the kinges person in safegarde and sure keppyng, and to put and aliene from him, the publique oppressors of the common wealth: by whose misgouernaunce, his life might be in hazard, and his authoritie hang in a very small threede. In which Parliament also the

Duke of Yorke was made Protector of the Realme, and the Erle of Sariſbury was appoynted to be Chauncelor, & had the great Seale to him deliuered: and the Erle of Warwike was elected to the office of the Capteyne of Calice, and territories of the ſame. As this deuice was pollitiquely inuented and ſo was the ſequele therof to the firſt aucthors, both honourable and profitable, if fortunes ſhip had ſayled all one way. For by this practice, the rule and regiment of the whole realme, conſiſted onely in the heades and orders of the Duke and the Chauncelor, and all the warlike affayres and buſineſſe, reſted principally in the Erle of Warwike, and ſo among them it was agreed that king Henry ſhould ſtil reigne, in name & dignity, but neyther in dede, nor in aucthoritie: not myndyng eyther to depoſe or deſtroy the ſayde king, leaſt they might ſodainely prouoke and ſtirre the fury and yre of the common people againſt them: which for his holineſſe of life, and abundant clemencie, was of the ſimple ſort much fauoured, and highly eſteemed. After which aucthoritie geuen, theſe three perſons ruled the realme, and did all thinges after their awne diſcrecions (which without battail or manſlaughter, might haue eaſely depriued the ſayde king both of life and land.) And firſt they amoued from the priuie counſaile, all ſuch perſons as the king loued, or the Queene fauored, puttyng in their places men of their ſect and confederacie, & chaunging officers throughout the realme at their will and diſpoſition: ſo that the olde ſpoken prouerbe here tooke place: New Lordes, newe lawes: ſuch lippes, ſuch lettuce. And yet in all their rule, I finde no mencion made of differryng iuſtice, or of their pollyng, or their bribery, as was openly proued by ſuche as gouerned before their time: ſauyng that they toke out of ꝑ Sanctuary of Weſtminſter, John Holland Duke of Exceter, being repugnant to the order taken and concluded, in the laſt Parliament, and conueyed him to Pomfret Caſtell. Which takyng out, was accoumpted an execrable and a dampnable offence, of diuerſe of the ſpiritualtie, and eſpecially of the Abbot of Weſtminſter, and his Monkes, and this is the moſt ſpot that was (as I could read) euer moſt to be caſt in the Dukes fame, duryng his Protectorſhippe, or of his counſayle.

1456 34 But that venemous wourme, that dreadfull Dragon, called diſdaine of ſuperiorite, which hath conſumed the blood of ſo many noble Princes, and deſtroyed the linage of ſo many gouernors, in all Realmes and kingdomes, aſwell Pagan as Chriſtian, could not abſtaine from incenſyng the hartes of Lorde Henry Beaufort, newly come to the Duchie of Sommerſet, by the death of Duke Edmond his father, which at the battaile of Saint Albons, (as you haue hearde before reherſed) loſt his life, and of Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, whoſe ſonne and heyre named Humfrey, Erle of Staffordе, taſted the ſame cup, at the forenamed conflict, and of other Lordes and men of authoritye, fauouryng and folowyng the part of king Henrye, whiche not onely bewayled and had compaſſion of the vnſure condicion, and wauerying eſtate of hys rule and Lordeſhippe, perceiuyng openly, whereunto the cloaked gentleneſſe, and ſubornate faſhion of the Duke of Yorke tended and crept vppe: But alſo thought it neceſſarye and conuenient, to puruey for a remedy, or the miſchiefe happened. Wherefore with open mouthes and fierce courages, they came to Quene Margaret, informing her that it was not honorable, but a repproche and infamy to the king, to haue

one to be a Protector and gouernor of him and his realme, as who woulde say: that he was eyther a childe, which had neede of a Norice to feede him with pappe, or an innocent creature, which must be ruled by a Tutor, alleaging her father, that the Duke of Yorkes onely intent was, vnder the colour of his Protectorship, sodainely to destroy and depose the king, when he least thought of it, and therefore willed her in so quick a mischiefe, to prouide a hastie remedie, if she loued the safegarde of her husbande, or the tuition of her selfe. The Quene hauing a wit, more then the common sort of women haue, and considering the estate of her husband, the condition of her selfe, and the perill of her onelye sonne, thought it necessarye to plucke the swoorde of authoritie out of their handes, which vnder colour of ruling vnder others, desired to be gouernors, and superiors themselues. Wherefore, a great counsaile was called at Grenewich, where the Duke of Yorke was discharged of his Protectorship, & the Erle of Sarisbury also, was dismissed of his office: which malicious mutacion among the Nobilitie, caused sodaine alteracions and seditious commocions to spring and arise in the commonaltie, and in especiall within the Citie of London.

For a yong Merchaunt, which before tyme had bene in diuers Cityes, within the Countrie of Italy, and there prohibited by the Magistrates and rulers, to vse or weare any weapon, eyther inuasyue or defensiue, chalenged an Italian in Chepeside, for wearing of a dagger, confuting him with the lawes of his awne Countrey, which like a colerick knaue and presumpteous person, so disdainefully and with suche tauntes and checkes aunswered the Marchaunt, that he not wylling to suffer so open a reproche, in so publique a streete, and that of so proude a villeyne, toke by force from him his dagger, and with the same a little cut his crowne, and cracked his pate. This Italian in great haste, complayned to the Mayre of this offence, which at the nert Courte, holden at the Guyldhall, by the consent of the whole senate, sent for the offender, and declaryng to him his cryme, commaunded him to warde, whereof diuers other light Marchauntes within the Citie, sore abhorring the Italian nation, for licking the fat from their beardes, and taking from them their accustomed lyuing, by reason that the sayde straungers imported and transported into and out of this realme, all such marchaundises, commodities, and necessaries, as the Englishe men onely were accustomed to doe, assembled together in great plumpes, and by force compelled the Maior to deliuer the prisoner out of Newegate: and yet this multitude, with thys doyng nothing saciate nor appeased, like madde persons and frantique foles, ranne to the seuerall houses of dyuers Venecians, Lucases, and Florentines, and them spoyled, robbed and rifled, without reason or measure. The Mayre perceyuing this great enormitie, assembled a great number of substantiall & graue Citezens, which not without great bloodshed, & mayming of sundrie persons, finally appeased their rage, and caused the people to depart to their houses. The beginner of this commocion, and sodaine vprore, eyther perswaded by his friendes or fearing his chaunce, which for his first fact might sodainely ensue, departed to Westminster, and there regestred himselfe as a sanctuary man. The Quene which ruled all things, hearing of this great riote and vnlawfull misdemeanour, sent the Dukes of Excester and Buckyngham, accompanied with many other noble men to London, with with a commiſſion of oyer and determiner, for the puniſhement of thys outragious offence, and ſeditious crime. When the Maior of the Citie, the two Dukes, and the two chiefe Juſtices, were ſet in Guyldhall for the perſormance of their commiſſion, and began to call the empanels for the enquirie, as the vſe and order is, diuers light witted, and leſſe brayned perſons of the citie, priuely armed them, and by the ringing of Bow bell, thought to aſſemble together a great multitude of their minde and opinion, and ſo by force and might to take from the kepers all ſuch priſoners, as were before apprehended, for the late committed robbery and riot, as they were goyng to their triall or arreignment. But thys great tumult and ſodaine furie was by diſcreete and ſage Citezens a little and little appeaſed, and finally quenched, but in the meane ſeaſon, the Dukes and other commiſſioners, beyng vntruely aduertiſed, that they were in ieopardie of their lyfes, ſodaynely departed from the Guyldhall, and left their inquirie for that day. The Maior on the next day perceyuing how the grudge roſe, called a common counſaile, wherof the number was, one hundred, foure ſcore and odde perſons, and by authoritie of the ſame, ordeyned that all Wardeyns of miſteries ſhould aſſemble their felowſhip in their particuler Halles, where they ſhould exhort them to the obſeruation of the kings peace, and keeping of good order within the Citie: and if they eſpied any man, eyther prone or redie to rayſe a rumour or deſirous of the deliueraunce of ſuch as were accuſed, and in captiue cuſtody, that their names ſhould be ſecretly written, and couertly delyuered to the Lorde Maior: which pollitique doyng, finally ended the outragious doing of the inſolent people, after which appeaſing the commiſſioners returned to the Guyldhall, where many of the robbers were attainted, and after condignely put to execution, beſide diuers great fynes and raunſomes payde, which were ſet vpon many Marchaunts, for winking at theſe doings, or aſſenting to the ſame.

The French nacion, hearyng of this domeſticall diuiſion, and ciuill diſſencion, within the realme of Englande, much deſiryng to be reuenged of old diſpleaſures, and great damages, which they had ſo many yeres borne, and ſuſtayned by the engliſhe people, appointed two Nauies to inuade and deſtroy the townes and portes, adioyning to the riuage of the Sea. The Capitayne of the one armye was William Lorde Pomiers, and of the other, ſir Piers Bzeſſy, a great ruler in Normandy. Theſe two Captaynes, when opportunitie of wether ſerued, ſet vp their ſayles at the mouth of Sayn, & there ſeuered themſelues, the one Weſtward, & the other Eaſtward, which was ſir Peter de Bzeſſy. This luſty captayne ſailyng al the coſt of Suſſex, and Kent, durſt not once take lande, till he arriued in the downes, and there hauing by a certayne eſpial perfite notice, that the towne of Sandwich was neyther peopled, nor fortifyed, becauſe that a little before, the chiefe rulers of the towne, were fromthence departed, for to auoyde the peſtilenciall plague, which ſore there infected, and ſlew the people, entred the hauen, ſpoyled the towne, and after ſuch poore ſtuffe as he there founde, riffled and taken, he fearing an aſſemble of the countrey, ſhortly returned. The Lorde Pomiers likewiſe toke his courſe Weſtwarde, and by night brent certayne houſes in Foulnay, and with a little pillage retired into Brittayn. Theſe two aduentures and fortunate chaunces, which to them in compariſon of their great expences, in their iorneys

But verelye ſome bꝛeade is better to the hungꝛye perſone, then no bꝛeade, and a ſmall gapne of him, which deſireth recouery, is a great pleaſure, and therefoꝛe the French aucthoꝛs make of a litle, much, and yet their much, (all things conſydered) is in effect nothing at all.

The Scottes alſo not degenerating from their olde mutabilitie, noꝛ altering their auncient conditions, from their accuſtomed and vſuall vntruth, entered into Noꝛthumberland, king James the ſecond, then beyng there in perſon, and burned ſmall houſes, & little cotages: but in the very middes of their great enterpꝛiſe, they hearing of the Duke of Yoꝛke, marching toꝛarde them with a great armie, with much paine, and no gaine in all haſte reuerted to their Countrey. Firſt not foꝛgetting, that whyle foꝛreyn enimies inuaded the outwarde partes, and extreme confines of thys troublous realme, a great conflict was attempted betweene the Loꝛde Egremond, and the ſonnes of the Erles of Saliſburie: in the which fray, many pe rſons were ſlayne, and a great number hurt. The Loꝛde Egremond in thys great tumult could not eſcape, but by foꝛce was taken and bꝛought beꝛoꝛe the kinges counſayle, and there the king and the Quene to ſhew themſelues to all perſons indifferent, adiudged him to pay to the Erle of Saliſburie a great ſumme of money, and foꝛ his heynous offence, done agaynſt the kinges lawes, he was committed to the Gayle of Newgate, within the citie of London, out of the which pꝛiſon, by helpe of his fautoꝛs, he ſecretlye eſcaped, and ſodainely departed, to the great veration of the Shꝛieſes of London, at the time being.

Quene Margaret whoſe bꝛeath ruled, and whoſe woꝛd was obeyed aboue the king and his counſayle, wythin the realme of Englande, entending the deſtruction of the Duke of Yoꝛke and his friendes, which deuiſe ſhee thought not meete to be pꝛactiſed neere to the Citie of London, becauſe ſhe well pꝛeceyued the Duke of Yoꝛke to be had in moꝛe eſtimation among the Citezens and commonaltie, then the king her huſband, oꝛ her awne perſon: cauſed the king to make a pꝛogreſſe into Warwikeſhire, foꝛ hys health and recreation, and ſo with Hawking and hunting, came to the Citie of Couentrey, where were diuers wayes ſtudied pꝛiuely, to bꝛing the Queene to her hartes eaſe, and long deſired purpoſe: which was the death and deſtruction of the Duke of Yoꝛke, the Erles of Saliſburie and Warwick. And foꝛ the furniture of thys matter, all theſe thꝛee noble men were ſent foꝛ to Couentre by the kings letters vnder his pꝛiuie ſeale, to which place the foꝛeſayde Loꝛdes, ſuſpecting no treaſon, noꝛ putting diffidence in any creature, obediently reſoꝛted, but in the Serpent lurcking vnder the graſſe, and vnder ſugred ſpeeche, was hid peſtyferous poyſon, ſo that if theſe noble men admoniſhed by their friends, had not ſodaynely departed, theyꝛ lyues had bene ſhoꝛtned, but by ſecret admonicion of their good wyllers (to whom no earthly treaſure is comparable) they auoyded this net, and narowly eſcaped the ſnare, snare, whereupon for the securitie and tuition of their lyues, the Duke of Yorke departed to Wygmore in the Marches of Wales, the Erle of Salisburie resorted to his tayre Castell of Middelham in the Northcountrie, and the Erle of Warwike sayled to the towne of Caleys. Although the bodies of these noble personages were by this seditious and fraudulent meanes a sunder separated as ye haue heard: yet their hartes were knit and coupled in one, neuer forgettyng, but daylie studyeng, both howe to be reuenged of the olde dispites and malicious attempts, agaynst them committed and imagened, and also howe to compasse their purposes, and to get the superioritie and ouer hand aboue their euill wyllers, and apparaunt enemies: for which causes their letters neuer ceased, their messengers neuer slept, nor their purses were at no time shut, what for entertayning of olde friends, and obtayning of newe confederates, till king Henry and his alyes were driuen away, and expelled clerely out of this realme, as after shall appere.

Because you haue bene long troubled with reding of diuers diuisions and seditions win the realme, among the temporalty, I will now a little digresse from my continued purpose, to declare to you an ouerthwart iudgement geuen among the fathers of the spiritualtie agaynst Reynolde Pecocke, then Bishop of Chichester. This man somewhat learned, but better stomacked, began to moue questions, not priuately, but openly in the Uniuersities, concerning the Annates, Peterpence, & other iurisdictions and authorities, apperteinyng to the See of Rome, and not onely put foorth the questions, but declared his minde and opinion in the same: wherefore he was for this cause abiured at Paules Crosse, and all his bookes brent, and he himselfe kept in his awne house, duryng his naturall lyfe. Some say that his opinion was that spirituall persons by Gods law, ought to haue no temporall possessions. Other write, that he sayd, that personall tythes were not due by Gods lawe: But what soeuer the cause was, in suche sorte as before I haue declared, he was vsed. Thus much Hall.

King Henry and his adherentes, perceiuyng that the Duke of Yorke lay still, and made no open apparaunce of assemble or commocion, returned to London, and there called a great counsaile, openly declaring how the French king perceiuyng the realme of England vexed, and troubled with ciuile dissencion, and mutuall discord, was not afeard to sende his Admiralles on the coastes of Kent, and Deuonshire, and there to spoyle townes, burne houses, and murder the Englishe people: which cause also animated the Scottes to make Rodes and incursions, into the confines and Marches of the realme, to the great losse and detrunent of the kinges liege people: which two Nacions were set continually to grieue and vex this his realme of Englande, till they perceyued a perfite concorde, and an vnfayned amitie to be concluded and knit together, betwene him and his consanguinitie, and the other sort of the contrary part and confederacie. And to the entent that he would be the chiefe author of peace, and principall styrrer of this vertuous concorde, he promised so gently to entertaine the Duke of Yorke, and his fautors, that all olde grudges, beyng not onely inwardly forgotten, but also outwardly forgeuen, should be the cause of perpetuall loue, betwene them & their friendes: of which concorde should ensue familiaritie among the Lordes, and concorde among the Commons, which to all vtter enemies shoulde be an inwarde

grudge, and to this realme a great glorie and profite. This deuice was of all men present well taken and adiudged, both honourable to the king, and profitable to his realme. Wherevpon diuers graue and sad persons were sent to the Duke of Yorke, and al other the great estates of the realme, which sence the battaile of Saint Albones neuer met, came, nor commoned together, commaundyng them for reasonable causes, and great considerations, to resort vnto the kinges Palayce, without delay. At this commaundement came to London Richard Duke of Yorke, and Richard Erle of Sarisburie, accompanied with a great number of meniall seruauntes, and friendes, least peraduenture they for lacke of ayde, might haue bene betrapped, or they had knowlege, or were warned. After them came from Calice to London, the Erle of Warwike, whose seruitures were apparailed in red Cotes, embrawdered with white ragged staues. These three Lordes were lodged within the Citie: the Duke, at Baynardes Castell, the Erle of Sarisbury at the Herber, and the Erle of warwike at his place beside the Gray friers. About the same season, with no lesse companie of men, came to the Citie, the yong Duke of Sommerset, the Erle of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whose fathers were slain at S. Albons: and after them resorted the Dukes of Exceter and Buckingham, the Lorde Egremond, and most of all the nobilitie of this realme. The Duke of Yorke and his mates were lodged within the Citie, and the Duke of Sommerset and all his friendes, soiourned without Temple barre, Holborne, and other places of the Suburbes: as who sayde, that as the Jewes disdayned the company of the Samaritans, so the Lancastrians abhorred the familiaritie of the Yorkishe linage. After the commyng of these Lordes to the Citie, the king, the Quene, with all their familie shortly folowed, & were lodged in the Bishoppes Palayce of London. These Lordes had such great companies attendyng on them (for one had fiue hundreth, other had fiue hundreth, and diuers foure hundreth persons in a band) that continuall watch was kept by the Maior and senate of London, aswell by day as by nyght, for the preseruacion of the peace, and continuance of good order. The Lordes which lodged within the Citie, kept a dayly counsaile at the black Friers, within the Citie. The other part soiournyng without the walles, assembled likewise in the Chapter house of Westminster. Thus euery part both studyed his awne profite and aduauncement, and also howe to reuenge thinges done to them, by their foes and aduersaryes. But the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and other vertuous prelates, so exhorted, applyed, and perswaded both the parties (although a great while they were neyther heard, nor regarded) that in conclusion, they brought them to a communication, where after long altercation, aswell of olde iniuries, and newe displeasures, by the one faction, agaynst the other cõmitted, the feare of outward hostilitie, and forein inuasion so mollefyed their indurate heartes, that they outwardly promisyng to forget all olde rancors, and auncient displeasures, sealed and signed writynges, the one euer after to be friend to the other, and altogether to be obedient to the king, and fauorers to his friendes, and enemies to his enemies. This concorde was so ioyfull to the superiors, and so embraced of the common people (who euer beare the burthen when Princes be at controuersy) that for the open apparaunce, and demonstracion of this godly concord, publike Processions were appoynted, to be solempnly celebrate celebrate within the Church of Saint Paule, in the Citie of London, on the day of the Conception of our Ladie, in the Moneth of Marche. At which ſolempne feaſt, the king in habite royall hauyng his Diademe on his heade, kept his eſtate in Proceſſion, before whome went hande in hande, the Duke of Sommerſet, the Erle of Sariſburie, the Duke of Exceſter and the Erle of Warwike, and ſo one of the one faction, and another of the other ſect, and behinde the king the Duke of Yorke led the Queene, with great familiaritie to all mens ſightes: But wo worth diſſimulacion, and falſe flattering countenaunce: fye on double entendement, and cloked adulacion, which hath bene the common ſeruitures in all Palaces, both Emperiall, and Regall, and by their onely peſtiferous venime, and ſecrete malice, hath bene the deſtruction of many a noble man, and the confuſion of a great number of true meanyng and faythfull perſons. But the wiſe man, whiche ſayth: Wo to the that haſt a double heart, meant, that diſſimulacion once eſpyed, ſhould be the arrowe wherewith the diſſembler ſhould be wounded. As by this cloked Pageant, and diſſemblyng Proceſſion, hereafter ſhall plainely be declared. For their bodies were ioyned by hande in hand, whoſe heartes were farre aſunder: their mouthes louingly ſmyled, whoſe courages were enflamed with malice: their wordes were ſwete as ſuger, and their thoughtes were all enuenomed: but all theſe diſſimulyng perſons, taſted the veſſell of wo, as the wiſe man ſayd: and fewe or none of this companie were vnblotted, or vndeſtroyed by this dolorous drinke of diſſimulacion. But this cancard worme and peſtiferous Coccatrice, not onely at this tyme reigned in England, but alſo did much harme in the Court of Fraunce: for Iohn Duke of Alaunſon, which before had bene priſoner, and well enterteyned in the realme of England, and after Captain generall of the warres in Fraunce againſt the Engliſhe men, highly fauoured, and of great eſtimacion in the Frenche kinges houſe, was by ſuch as he moſt truſted, and vſed moſt familiaritie withall, and whom he had greatly promoted, and highly exalted, accuſed of high treaſon, as enemie to his king, and traytor to his Countrie, allegyng that he long before that tyme had conſpired with the Engliſhe men, to cauſe them once againe to recouer the Duchie of Normandie: wherevpon by the order of the lawe, he there ſuffered death very vniuſtly, as diuers Auctheurs affirme, whereof one ſayth: that kinges ſeekyng treaſon, ſhall finde lande, and the deniall of a princes deſyre, was the inuented deſtruction of the innocent Naboth. Well let vs now leaue the cloked colluſion, that remayned in Fraūce, and returne to the open diſſimulacion, which now appered in England.

As fier being encloſed in a ſtraight place, will by force vtter his flame, and as the courſe of water aſtricted and letted, will flow and breſt out in continuaunce of tyme: ſo this cancard Crocodile, and ſubtile ſerpent, could not long lurke in malicious heartes, but in concluſion ſhe muſt (accordyng to her nature appere and ſhewe her ſelfe. For after this apparant concord (accordyng to the very nature of diſſimulacion) diuerſe noble men of birth, but not ſtable of worde, puttyng from them honour, truth, and honeſtie, forgat their oth, and brake their promiſe, and aduaunced forth the Banner of diſpleaſure, and the flagge of malice. So a man may ſee, that ſuch perſons regarde neyther their awne peculiar profite, nor the publique wealth of their natiue Countrie, nor yet paſſe of an othe, or promiſe breakyng, to whome diſ-

corde is pleasant, and dissencion is dilectable. For not long after this dissimuled amitie, a certeine fray, eyther by chaunce, or of a thing prepensed, was made vpon a yoman of the Erles of Warwike, by a seruiture of the kings, in the which the Assaylant was sore hurte, but the Erles man fled. The kings meyniall seruauntes, seing their felow hurt, and the offendor escaped, assembled in great number, and watched the Erle, returnyng from the Counsaile towarde his Barge, and sodainly set on him the yomen with swordes, and the Blacke garde with spittes, and fyre forkes. After long fight and many of the Erles men maymed and wounded, by helpe of his friendes, he toke a Whirry, and so escaped to London: whome the Queene incontinent commaunded to be apprehended, and as a captiue and prisoner, to be sent to the Tower of London, where (if he had bene then taken) he had shortly ended his dayes. By this vnhappy fray, and sodaine chaunce of malice, there arose such dayly and terryble warre, that euery man was in trouble, and no person was in quiet. For after this displeasure done to the Erle, and the Queenes good minde toward him, by his secrete friendes priuily reueled, he with all diligence, tooke his iourney to Warwike, and after into Yorkeshire, where he found the Duke of Yorke, and the Erle of Salisbury, declaryng to them the assault of the Kinges seruauntes, and the pretensed purpose of the fraudulent Queene. After which complaint made, he fearyng least by long absence, he might be deposed or defrauded of his Captainship of Calice, wyth great speede embarked himselfe, and sayled thither, dayly expectyng and lokyng, what waye the Duke of Yorke would take, for atchieuyng his long intended purpose. After whose departure, the Duke of Yorke, and the Erle of Salisbury, somewhat styrred and moued with this double dealyng, began to grudge and murmure: affyrmyng that in the Queene rested nothing but fraude and feminine malice, which rulyng the king at her pleasure and will, studyed nothing so much, as the destruction of the nobilitie, and peeres of the realme. After long consultacion had, it was agreed, that the Erle with a warlike company, should march toward the king, & complaine both to him of the manifest iniury done to his sonne, and also of the vnkinde breache of the swome amitie and late agreement, in which sute, if he did preuaile, he then should not omit the occasion to him geuen, in reuengyng the displeasures to him done, by the Queene and her sinister Counsaylors, which euill and vngodly ordered the subiectes of the whole Realme.

A fray made vpon the Erle of Warwikes seruaunt.

After this deuise made and concluded, the Erle of Salisburye remoued from Middelham castell, accompanied with foure or fiue thousand men, and toke his way through Lancashire, and Shropshire, towarde London. In the meane season the Queene, which was assisted and ruled, by the Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham, hauing the vigilant eie and circumspect braine, of a politique gouernor: imagyned that the Erle of Warwicke had kindeled this fire, and begun this tumult, to the entent (according to his pretensed purpose) to set the Duke of Yorke in the siege royall, and high throne of the realme: For which causes, she beyng a woman of no small wit, nor litle pollecie, conceiuyng in her opinion, that it was no boote to make any farther concord or league with her aduersaries, and hearyng of the Erle of Salisburies setting forwarde, wyth a company of armed men and archers: assembled together a great counsail, to prouide a remedie, for that imminent mischiefe, and

(as in a multitude often times it happeneth, ſo many heades, ſo many wits) ſo dyuers were in opinion, that neyther people nor weapon ſhould be ſtirred, till the Erle approched: doubting whether he came to demaunde warre or peace, or to aſke iuſtice, and to reforme wrong. Other, otherwiſe thought, and were of a contrary opinion, making the foundation of their argument, that the rayſing of people, and aſſemble of Souldiours by him, could ſignifie no peace, nor treatie of concorde: except a man ſhould ſaye, that intreating for fauour with naked ſworde in hande, were an humble ſubmiſſion and a meeke requeſt: which onely conſideration, moued them to ſay, that as force with force, ought to be repelled, ſo he with a great power, or he came into the middeſt of the realme, ſhould of neceſſitie be encountered and (if fortune would ſerue) vtterly deſtroyed. This ſentence toke place, and without delay, Syr James Twichet Lorde Awdeley, becauſe his ſeignorie and power lay in thoſe partes, where the Erle ſhould paſſe, was appointed to meete with him, and to geue him battayle, if he ſawe cauſe or place conuenient, and the Queene followed after. The Lorde Awdeley, according to his commiſſion, aſſembled aboue ten thouſand men, and knowyng by his eſpials, which way the Erle kept, approched neere to him on a faire plaine, called Blore heath, within a myle of the towne of Drayton, in the countye of Salope, commonly called Shropſhire. The Erle perceyuing by the liuerie of the Souldiours, that he was circumuented and likely to be trapped wyth the Queenes power, determined rather there to abide the aduenture with fame and honor, then farther to flie, with loſſe and reproche: and ſo encamped himſelfe all the night, on the ſide of a little brooke, not very brode, but ſomewhat deepe. In the morning early, beyng the day of Saint Tecle, he cauſed his Souldiors to ſhoote their flightes, towarde the Lorde Awdeleys company, which lay on the other ſyde of the ſayd water, and then he and all his company made a ſigne of retraite. The Lord Awdeley, remembryng not onely the truſt that he was put in, but alſo the Queenes terrible commaundement, (which was to bring to her preſence the Erle of Saliſbury, quicke or deade) blew vp his trumpet, and did ſet foorth his vawarde, and ſodainely paſſed the water. The Erle of Saliſbury which knewe the ſleightes and pollicies of warlike aſſayres, ſodainly returned, and ſhortlye encountered with the Lorde Awdeley and his chiefe Captaynes, or the reſidue of his armie coulde paſſe the water. The fight was ſore and dreadfull. The Erle deſiryng the ſauyng of his lyfe, and his aduerſaryes couetyng his deſtruction, fought ſore for the obteinyng of their purpoſe, but in concluſion, the Erles army, as men deſperate of ayde and ſuccor, ſo egerly fought, that they ſlue the Lorde Audeley, and all his Captaynes, and diſcomfited all the remnant of his people. In this battaile were ſlaine. xviij. hundreth perſons, but the greateſt plague lighted on the Cheſſhire men, becauſe one halfe of the ſhire, was on the one part, and the other on the other part, of the which number were ſir Thomas Dutton, ſir John Dunne, & ſir Hugh Venables. But the Erles two ſonnes, the one called ſir John Neuell, and the other ſir Thomas, were ſore wounded, which ſoberly iourneyng into the North Countrie, thinkyng there to repoſe themſelues, were in their iorney apprehended by the Quenes friendes, and conueyed to Cheſter: but their keepers deliuered them ſhortly, or elſe the Marche men had deſtroyed the Gayles. Such fauour had the Commons of

Wales,

Wales, to the Duke of Yorkes band and his affinitie, that they could suffer no wrong to be done, nor euill worde to be spoken of him or his friendes.

Also this yere one named Johannes Fauscius, a Germain, first found out the noble science of Imprintyng in the Citie of Mentz. But Polidore sayth, it was first inuented by one Johannes Euthenlergius, a knight, who also within .xvj. yeres after did inuent the pike which the Printers now vse. Printing.

After this battayle, the Duke of Yorke not only perceyuing that the destruction of him and his friendes was intended (as by this last conflict was apparauntly declared) but also remembring, that al his counsailes and priuie intents, were nowe opened to the king and the Quene, thought it meete neyther longer to dissimule, nor farther to keepe silence: did therefore with a courageous hart, as well for the obteyning of the crowne, as for the tuition and safegard of him & his friendes, determine no longer to sleepe in hys den, but with all diligence to set forth his businesse and auaunce forth his banner. And therefore sending for the Erle of Salisbury his felow and compere in all his doings, counsailes, and fortunes (after long communication had of the Queenes misgouernaunce, and how she without their assent, did all things at her will and pleasure) determined to raise a great armie, and by fine force eyther to die or win their purpose. What should I say, men were assembled, friends were sent for, and a puyssaunt armie was gathered, both of Northren men and Welshmen, which in good order came into the Marches of Wales, adioyning to Shropshire, where they determined eyther to abide their enimies, or to meete them if they marched forward. 1460 38

The king was not ignorant of this assemble, nor yet vnaduertised of the Dukes intent: wherefore to resist the mischiefe at the beginning, he caused commissioners to be made, and sent into euery parte of the realme, where he suspected eyther to haue assured friendes, or indifferent fauorers, for men and money: by reason of which commaundement, a great number was assembled. Many for the loue they bare to the king, but more for the feare that they had of the Queene, whose countenance was so fearefull, and whose looke was so terrible, that to all men, agaynst whome shee tooke a small displeasure, her frowning was their vndoing, and her indignation was their death. The king accompanied with the Dukes of Sommerset & Excester, and other of the lyne of Lancaster, determined cleerely to set on the Duke of Yorke and his confederates, and them by force eyther vtterly to banquishe, or by pollecie to attrap, and bring to confusion, whereupon in hope of good luck, the king with his armie by long marching, came neere to the Duke of Yorke, which was strongly incamped, a little from the towne of Ludlow, neere adioyning to the confines of Wales, to whome not long before, was come his trustie friend Richarde Erle of Warwike, with a great number of expert men in marciall feates, whom he had brought with him from Calice, whereof two were men of approued pollecy, in the warres of Normandie and Guyen, the one called Andrew Trollop, and the other John Blunt. These armies thus lyeng, the one in the bewe and sight of the other, studied all meanes and pollecies, how to take aduauntage eche of other, and how with lesse ieoperdy, the one might set on the other. The Duke perceyuing by reason of his expert Capitaynes, away how he might easely dampnifie and discomfite his enemies, thought no longer to sleepe his purpoſe, but manfully to geue the onſet and ſo with his ſecret friends and Captaines, determined the next morning early to beginne the battayle, and ſet on the king and his armie, or he were readie or in aray. But of this deuiſe ſucceeded nothing, nor of this imagination proceded any effect: For Andrew Trollop and other the Calicians, which were men of great knowlege and of much experience, and had liued by the kings wages, more then a few yeres, perceyuing now ỹ they ſhould fight agaynſt their ſouereine Lorde himſelfe (whoſe friend they eſteemed before that time, the Erle of Warwike euer to haue bene taken and reputed, and not his enemie or deſtroyer) in the dead of the night, before the day of battayle ſecretly departed from the Dukes Campe, & ſubmitted themſelues to the king, admoniſhing him of all things prepared and deuiſed, for his loſſe and deſtruction. If theſe auncient Captaynes were welcome to the king, or if he ioyouſly them receyued, I referre that to all men, which haue reliefe in their deſtreſſe, or haue a ſodaine good chaunce, when they thinke leaſt vpon it. When the Duke of Yorke was aduertiſed of their departing, no maruayle though his ſenſes were moued, and his wittes diſturbed, as a man that ſodainely ryſeth out of a traunce, woteth not what to doe or ſay: For he firſt conſidered the power and auctoritie of the king, and ſawe that Andrew Trollop of his friend was ſodainely tranſformed into the image of his extreme enemie, whoſe force and pollecie, as muche nowe diſcomforted hym, as by the truſt which he put in hym, he was before incouraged: wherefore he euydently perceyuing, that all his counſayle and purpoſe, was by the fore named Andrewe, reueled and diſcloſed thought it better for him and hys to depart in ſurety, then to abide the chaūce, of mutable Fortune, which turneth the wheele at her wyll and pleaſure: wherupon he with his ponger ſonne Edmond Erle of Rutlande, ſecretly departed into Wales, and ſo paſſed into Irelande, where he was with all ioy and honor gladly receyued. The Erle of Marche, ſonne and heire apparant to the foreſayde Duke, accompanied with the Erles of Saliſbury and Warwike, and syr John Wenlock, ſtale away the ſame night, and came into Deuonſhire: where by the meanes of John Dinham Eſquire (which after was high Treaſorer of Englande, in the time of king Henry the. vij.) they bought a ſhip, which roſt. C. r. Markes at Exmouth, and ſayled to Gernſay, and after came to Calice, and were let in at the poſterne, and ioyfully welcomed of their friendes.

The next day in the morning, the king beyng aduertiſed of the departing of the Duke of Yorke and his partakers, cauſed all his horſemen to follow them by euery paſſage, but they were neyther ſeene nor eſpied, as they that folowed made report. The king perceyuing that the Lordes were eſcaped, pardoned all the poore ſouldiours, ſauing certaine kyng leaders, whereof ſome he puniſhed and fined, and ſome he hanged and quartered. After this, he remoued to Ludlowe, and there diſpatched his hoſte, and ſpoyled the towne and the Caſtell, and ſent the Duches of Yorke, with her two ponger ſonnes, to be kept in warde, with the Duches of Buckyngham her ſiſter, where ſhe continued a certayne ſpace. After this, he proclaymed theſe Lordes traytors to him, enemies to their Countrie, and rebels to the Crowne: confiſcating all their landes, goodes and offices, committing the gouernaunce of the North partes, to the Erle of Northumberland, and the Lorde Clifford, as to his truſtie and moſt faithfull friends, and of his towne of Calice, he made Capitaine Henry the newe Duke of Sommerſet: but the olde huſband man ſayeth, that as to haſtie ſowing often time deceaueth, ſo to late, neuer well proueth. For in this buſineſſe, protracting of time onely, hurted and harmed the king and his ſequele. For if he at the beginning, had diſpoſſeſſed his aduerſaries of that refuge and hold, no doubt but that he had eyther tamed or vanquiſhed them, with little labor and ſmall daunger.

The Duke of Sommerſet, reioyſing much in his newe office, elected dyuers hardie and valyant ſouldiours, and with great pompe ſayled toward Calice: and when he thought ſurely to haue entred into the Hauen, the artilerie ſhot ſo fiercely, both out of the towne and Riſebanke, that he ſuffering there a ſore repulſe, was faine to lande at Whitſandbay, and ſent worde to the Capitaynes of the towne, to receyue him as the kings Lieuetenaunt, and ſhewed to them his letters patents, but neyther he nor hys wrytyng was once regarded or loked on: ſo of neceſſitie he reſorted to the Caſtell of Guyſnes, daylie ſkirmiſhing with the garriſon of Calice, more to his loſſe than gaine. After his arriuall, as is aforeſayde, diuers of his Mariners, owyng more good wyll to the Erle of Warwike, than to this yong Duke, conueyed their ſhippes into the Hauen of Calice, and in them diuers of the Erle of Warwickes enemies, as Ianyn Fendill, John Felowe, and dyuers other, and preſented them to the ſayde Erle, which incontinent cauſed their heades to be ſtriken off. Thys daylie conflict, ſtill continuing betweene the Lordes, which ſoiorned at Calice, and the Duke of Sommerſet, lyeng at Guiſnes, no ſmall number of the commonaltie, daylie reſorted to the Erle of Marche and his confederates: by reaſon whereof, although they daylie loſt people, and had ſlaine many, yet their number was reſtored, and the gap euer filled, which was the continuall loſſe, and daylie detriment to the Duke of Sommerſet. Yet he like a valyant Prince, nothing leſſe minding, then for lacke of ayde to be expelled from the great office and renoumed auctoritie, which the king had to him giuen, in the partes beyonde the ſea, ſent letters to the king, and meſſengers to the Queene, deſiring of them ayde and ſuccor, in defence of the quarell and lawfull aſſiſtance. His poſtes were not vnheard, nor hys requeſtes vnprouided. For without delay Richarde Lorde Riuers, and ſyr Anthony Wooduile his valyaunt ſonne, which after was Lorde Scales, accompanied with foure hundred warlike perſons, were appointed to paſſe the Seas, and to be coadiutors to the Duke of Sommerſet. Theſe martiall Capitaynes endeuoring themſelues to the point, for the which they were aſſigned came to the Porte of Sandwiche, and there abode the winde and the weather, which obeyeth neyther king, nor ſerueth Emperour.

The Erles of Marche and Warwike, and other being at Calice, had knowledge of all theſe doings, and ſecret conuenticles: wherfore to preuent the Dukes purpoſe, they ſent John Dinham the valyaunt Eſquire, with a ſmall number of men, but with a multitude of courageous hartes, to the towne of Sandwiche, which ſodainely entred the ſame, and tooke the Lorde Riuers in his bed, and his ſonne alſo: robbing houſes, and ſpoyling ſhippes of great ryches and marchaundiſe, and beſide this, they tooke the principall ſhips of the kings nauy then lyeng at the Port, wel furniſhed with ordinance & artilerie, but not without the fauor of the Mariners, which fauored more the one parte then the other. But although Iohn Vinham, Capitaine of the Lordes parte, was ſore hurt and maymed on his legge, by reaſon whereof he euer after halted, and ſomewhat limped: yet his courage and pollecy was ſo much, that he vanquiſhed his enimies, and brought the ſhippes royall laded with pray and priſoners, to the towne of Calice, and them preſented to the Erle of Marche, not knowyng then that the Lorde Riuers daughter ſhould be the Erles wife, which then had an huſband lyuing, nor thinking that her father for her ſake, ſhould after be deſtroyed. But who can knowe the ſecrets of God, or without him, declare the chaunce that after ſhall enſue.

After this bootie gotten, and good luck obteyned, diuers of the beſt ſhips taken in the hauen of Sandwich, were wel victualled and manned, and with them the Erle of Warwike, tranſkreted and ſayled into Ireland, to common with the Duke of Yorke, of his great affayres and buſineſſe. The weather was ſo fayre, and the winde ſo fauourable to the Erles purpoſe, that within leſſe then. xxx. dayes, he paſſed and repaſſed from Calice to Deueline, and aſſerteyned the Erles of Marche and of Saliſbury, what was the Duke of Yorkes deuiſe and intent, both for his entrie and theirs, into the realme of England. The Erle of Warwike had come to ſhort home to tell theſe tydings, if the Duke of Exceter, which being admirall of the ſea, laye in the weſt Countrie to ſtop the Erles paſſage, might haue had his awne will: but the Capitaines of his Nauie murmoured againſt him, and the Mariners diſprayſed and diſdayned him, glad to heare of the Erle of Warwikes good ſucceſſe, by which occaſion he neyther would nor durſt once meddle or cope with the Erles Nauie.

A Parliament holden at Couentry.

During thys tyme, the king called a Parliament, in the Citie of Couentre, in the which the Duke of Yorke, and all his confederates were attaynted of high treaſon, and their goodes and landes confiſcate and forfeted: and to prohibite their landing in al portes, hauen townes were watched, and the ſea coſtes were garniſhed with Bekons. And ſyr Simon Montfort with a great crew was appointed to keepe the downes, and the fiue Portes, and all men paſſing into Flaundrys, were vpon payne of death prohibited to paſſe by Calice, leaſt the Lordes there ſhould borowe of them any money, as they did preſt of the Marchaunts of the ſtaple. xviij. M. pound late before, which was a great diſpleaſure to the king, and a more corroſey to ỳ Quene. The Lordes lyeng at Calice were not ignorant of all theſe doynges and prouiſions, but dayly were aſſertayned what was done in the kings priuy chamber: wherefore firſt they ſent a companie to Sandwiche, which conquered the towne, and apprehended ſir Simond Mountfort, and brought him with all his Mates to the hauen of Calice, where incontinent he with. xij. of his chiefe felowes, loſt their heades on the ſandes, before Riſebanke. After the kinges nauie gayned, and his Captaines on the arriuall of the Sea taken and deſtroyed, the Lordes lyeng at Calice, hoppng in their friendes within the Realme, determined to paſſe the ſea, and to lande in England. And after they had put the Caſtell and towne of Calice, in ſure and ſafe cuſtodie to their onely vſe, they paſſed the ſea and landed at Sandwiche. And ſo paſſyng through Kent, there came to them the Lorde Cobham, Iohn Guldeforde, William Peche, Robert Horne, and many other gentlemen, which conueyed them to the Citie of London. But the fame of their landyng once knowen, gentlemen repayred, and women resorted out of all the South partes of the Realme: vpon which rumor, Thomas Lorde Scales, a man in great fauor with the king and Queene, accompanied with the Erle of Kendall a Gascoyne, and the Lord Louell, resorted to London, with a great company of armed men: declaryng to the Maior of the Citie, that their repayre onely was to defende, and kepe the Citie, from the spoyle and robbery of such traytors, as the king was credibly informed, would thether make accesse: to whome the Maior aunswered, that he well knewe both his othe, and bounden dutie towarde his souereigne Lorde and Prince, and neded neither of prompter, nor yet of coadiutor, eyther to defende or gouerne the Citie, to him committed in charge. With which aunswere, the Lorde Scales and his associates not a little displeased, entered into the Towre of London, dayly with new inuencions, doyng displeasures and domages to the Citizens of the Citie, whome they sore suspected, rather to fauor then to hate, the Erles of March, and Warwike, and other of their band and affinitie. Which Erles with a great armie came shortly to London, and were of the Maior and Citezens ioyously receyued, to whome resorted the Archbishop of Cantorbury, the Bishops of London, Ely, and Exceter, with many Prelates and religious persons. These Lordes nothing slackyng the purpose, that they came for, dayly consulted and assembled together in the house of the gray Friers within the Citie. And after long debating, and secret consultacion had, it was agreed, that they with theyr whole puissance should marche forward, toward the king: determining eyther by force or fayre meanes, to bring their purpose to a cõclusion. When this counsaile was dissolued, the Erles of Marche & Warwike, Thomas Lord Fauconbridge, Henry Lord Borchier, called Erle of Ewe, with a great nũber of men, which came out of Kent, Esser, Surrey & Sussex, to the number as some writers affirme of.xxv.M. persons departed from London, toward the king, liyng at Couentre, then called the Queenes secrete arbor, leauyng behinde them to kepe the Londoners in their fidelitie, from reuertyng from theyr part the Erle of Sarisbury, the Lorde Cobham, and Sir John Wenlocke: which Lorde Cobham, with certaine Aldermen of the Citie so kept the West syde against the Towre, and Sir John Wenlocke with other, so vigilantly watched the East part toward Saint Katherynes, that no person eyther could issue out, or enter in, to the great displeasure of the Lorde Scales and his companie, which dayly shot their ordenaunce out, and had likewise great ordenaunce shot at them, to the hurt, and no pleasure of both partes. The king not ignorant of all these doynges, assembled a great armie, and accompanied with the Duke of Sommerset, which was lately come from Guisnes, and the Duke of Buckingham, and diuers other great Lordes of his part and faction, came to the towne of Northhampton, where the Queene encouraged her friendes, and promised great rewardes to her helpers: for the king studied nothing but of peace, quiet and solitarie lyfe.

The battaile of Northãpton.

When the kinges hoste was assembled, and that the Queene perceyued that her power was able to matche with the force of her aduersaries, shee caused her armie to issue out of the towne, and to passe the riuer of Sene, and there in the newe fielde, betweene Harsyngton and Sandifforde, the Capitaines strongly enwarked themselues with high bankes, and depe trenches. The Erle of March beyng lustie, and in the flower of his couragious youth, liyng liyng betweene Towceter and Northampton, determined to ſet on the kings armie, without longer protractyng of tyme. And in the night ſeaſon he remoued his campe towarde Northampton, and in marchyng forwarde ſet hys men in good order of battaile, whereof the vawewarde was conducted by the Erle of Warwike, which either by ſtrenght or ſtealth Mauger the Lord Beamond, which kept a ſtraite goyng towarde the kinges campe, entred freſhely, and began the battaile about. vij. of the clocke, the. ix. day of Julye. After whome folowed the Erle of Marche, with the banner of his father. This fight continued in doubtfull iudgement, till the houre of nine, at which tyme the kinges armie was ſcattered, and diſcomfited, and of the ſame ſlain, and drowned in the riuer, fewe leſſe then ten thouſand tall Engliſhe men, and the king himſelfe left alone diſconſolate, was taken and apprehended, as a man borne, and predeſtinate to trouble, miſerie, and calamitie. At this battaile were ſlaine, Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, John Talbot Erle of Shrewesbury, a valiaunt perſon, and not degeneratyng from his noble parent: Thomas Lorde Egremond, John Viſcont Beaumond, and Sir William Lucie, which made great haſt to come to part of the fight, and at his firſt approche was ſtriken in the head with an Axe. Diuers other Gentlemen were ſlaine in this ciuil battaile, whoſe names are not remembred nor publiſhed by any author that I haue read. Beſide theſe dead perſons, many were taken priſoners, becauſe they left their horſes, and diſcended to fight on foote. The Duke of Sommerſet and other, which narowly eſcaped, fled with the Quene and prince Edward, into the Biſhoprike of Durham, in which place they determined to gather a newe armie and power, and if no hope were of recouery, then they agreed to flie into Scotland: there to abide a time of better lucke. The Erles beyng victors in this bloody battaile, conueyed the king that night againe to the towne of Northhampton, and the next day with great ſolemnitie and ſmall comfort, they ſet forwarde the king, and by eaſie iourneys brought him to London the. xvj. day of July, where he was faintly receyued, and feebly welcomed, and was lodged in the Biſhops Palace. After whoſe commyng to the Citie, the Tower of London was deliuered to the Erle of Marche, vpon a certaine compoſicion. But the Lorde Scales, ſuſpectyng the ſequele of the deliuery of the ſame, tooke a Whirry priuily, entendyng to haue fled to the Queene. But he was eſpyed by diuerſe watermen belongyng to the Erle of Warwike, which wayted for his forthcommyng on the Thamys, and ſodainly taken, and ſhortly ſlaine with many dartes and daggers, and his bodie left all bloody and naked at the gate of the Clynke, which after was buryed in the Church adioinyng. Then were dyuers perſons apprehended, and endited of treaſon, whereof ſome were pardoned, and ſome executed: But Thomas Thorpe, ſeconde Baron of the Exchequer, great friend to the houſe of Lancaſter, and extreme enemie to the familie of Yorke, was taken diſguyſed in a Monkes apparell, with a ſhauen crowne, and ſo brought to the Erle of Warwike, which ſent him to the tower of London, where he long remayned. Duryng this trouble was a Parliament ſommoned to begin at Weſtminſter in the moneth of October next folowyng. Before which tyme, Richard Duke of Yorke beyng in Ireland, by ſwift currers, and flyyng poſtes, was aduertiſed of the great victory, gayned by his part at the fielde of Northhampton, and alſo knewe that the king was nowe in cafe to be kept, and ordered at his pleafure and will: Wherefore loſing no tyme, nor ſluggyng one houre, he ſayled from Deuelyn to Cheſter with no ſmall compame, and by long iourneys came to the Citie of London, which he entered the friday next before the feaſt of Saint Edward the Confeſſor, with a ſworde borne naked before him, and tooke his lodgyng in the kinges owne Palace, wherupon the common people babbled, that he ſhould be king, and that king Henry ſhould no longer reigne. During the time of this Parliament, the Duke of Yorke, with a bolde countenaunce, entered into the Chamber of the peeres, and ſate downe in the trone royall vnder the cloth of eſtate (which is the kinges peculier ſeate) and in the preſence aſwell of the Nobilitie, as of the ſpiritualtie (after a pauſe made) ſayde theſe wordes in effect. My ſinguler good Lordes, maruaile not that I approche vnto this throne. For I ſit here as in the place to me by verye iuſtice lawfully belongyng, and here I reſt, as he to whome this Chayre of right apperteyneth, not as he, which requyreth of you fauor, parcialitie, or beatyng, but egall right, friendly indifferencie, and true adminiſtracion of iuſtice: for I beyng the partie grieued, and complaynant, can not miniſter to my ſelfe the Medicine, that ſhould helpe me (as expert Leches and Chirurgians may) except you be to me both faythfull ayders, and alſo true Counſaylers. Nor yet this noble realme, and our naturall Countrie ſhall neuer be vnbuckeled from her dayly feuer, except I (as the principall Phiſition, and you as true and truſty Appothecaryes) conſult together, in makyng of the pocion, and trie out the cleane and pure ſtuffe, from the olde, corrupt and putrifyed drugges. For vndoubtedly, the roote and bottome of this long feſtured canker, is not yet extirpate, nor the feble foundacion of this fallible buyldyng, is not yet eſpyed, which hath bene, and is, the dayly deſtruction of the Nobilitie, and the continuall confuſion of the poore Commonalty of this realme and kingdome. For all you knowe (or ſhould knowe) that the high and mightie Prince king Richard the ſeconde, was the true and vndoubted heyre, to the valiant Conquerour, and renoumed Prince king Edward the thirde, as ſonne and heyre to the hardy knight and couragious Captain, Edward prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitain and Cornewall, eldeſt ſonne to the ſaid king Edward the thirde, which king was not onely in deed, but alſo of all men reputed and taken, as the very true and infallible heyre, to the wiſe and politique prince king Henry the thirde, as ſonne and heyre to king Edward the ſecond, ſonne and heyre to king Edward the firſt, the very heyre and firſt begotten ſonne of the ſayde noble and vertuous prince, king Henry the thirde. Which king Richarde of that name the ſecond, was lawfully and iuſtly poſſeſſed of the Crowne, and Diademe of this Realme and Region, till Henry of Darby, Duke of Lancaſter, and Herforde, ſonne to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaſter, the fourth begotten ſonne, to the ſayde king Edward the thirde, and yonger brother to my noble auncеſter Lyonell Duke of Clarence, the thirde begotten ſonne of the ſayde king Edward, by force and violence, contrary both to the duetie of his allegiaunce, and alſo to his homage, to him both done and ſworne, rayſed warre and battaile, at the Caſtell of Flynt in Northwales againſt the ſayde king Richard, and him apprehended and impriſoned within the Tower of London. kyng on him the name, ſtile, and auctho̅ritie of king & gouerno̅r of the ſame. And not therewith ſatisfied and contented, compaſſed and accompliſhed the death and deſtruction of his naturall p̄ince, and moſt wo̅rthy ſouereigne Lo̅rd, not as a common homicide and butcherly murderer, but as a regicide and deſtroyer of his king. After whoſe piteous death and execrable murder, the right and tytle of the Crowne, and ſuperio̅ritie of this realme, was lawfully reuerted and returned to Roger Mo̅rtimer, Erle of Marche, ſonne and heyre to Lady Philip, the onely childe of the aboue rehearſed Lionell, Duke of Clarence, to which Rogiers daughter called Anne, my moſt dereſt and welbeloued mother, I am the very true and lyneall heyre, which diſcent all you cannot iuſtly gayne ſay, no̅r yet truely denie. Then remember thys, if the tytle be mine, why am I put from it: if I be true heyre to the crowne (as I am in deede) why is my right witholden: if my clayme be good, why haue I not iuſtice: fo̅r ſurely learned men of great ſcience and knowledge, ſay and affirme, that lyneall diſcent, no̅r vſurped poſſeſſion can nothing p̄euayle, if continuall clayme be lawfully made, o̅r openly publiſhed. Fo̅r auoyding of which ſcruple & ambiguity: Edmond Erle of Marche, my moſt welbeloued Uncle, in the time of the firſt Uſurper, in dede, but not by right, called king Henry the fourth by his Coſyns, the Erle of No̅rthumberland, and the Lo̅rde Percy, he being then in captiuitie with Owen Glendo̅re, the rebell in Wales, made his tytle and righteous clayme, to the deſtruction of both the noble perſons. Likewiſe my moſt deereſt Lo̅rde and father, ſo farre ſet fo̅rth that right and tytle, that he loſt his lyfe and wo̅rldly ioye, at the towne of Southampton, mo̅re by power, then indifferent iuſtice. Sithe whoſe death, I comming to my full age, haue neuer deſiſted to purſue my tytle, and require my right, which by meanes of ſiniſter counſaile and iniuſt detention, I can neyther obteyne no̅r recouer. So that of fine fo̅rce, I am compelled to vſe power in ſtede of p̄ayer, and fo̅rce in ſtede of requeſt (not as I ſayde be-fo̅re) fo̅r my p̄iuate emolument and peculiar p̄ofite, but to reſto̅re peace, loue, and quietneſſe to this our naturall region: which euer ſythe the firſt vngodly vſurpation of the fo̅renamed Henry, vntruely called king Henry the fourth, hath bene cleerely baniſhed, and out of the ſame iniuſtly exiled. What murders and manſlaughters hath bene perpetrated and committed within this Countrey, ſythe the beginning of that vngracious vſurpation: what number of noble men haue beene ſlayne, deſtroyed, and executed, ſithe that vnfo̅rtunate day: it is to lamentable and to manifeſt. Fo̅r although Henry of Lancaſter Erle of Derby, tooke vpon him the Scepter and the crowne, and wro̅ngfully beare the name and ſtyle of a king, and was not much tyckled with mine Uncle, the Erle of Marche, at that time being within age: yet was hee neuer in ſuretie of himſelfe, no̅r had, o̅r enioyed any perfite quietneſſe, eyther in minde o̅r in body: fo̅r ſurely a co̅rrupt conſcience feeleth neuer reſt, but looketh when the ſwo̅rde of vengeaunce will diſcend and ſtrike. His ſonne alſo called king Henry the fift, obteyned notable victo̅ries, and immo̅rtall p̄ayſes, fo̅r his noble actes done in the realme of Fraunce: yet God fo̅r the offence of his vntrue parent ſodainely touched him, vnbodying his ſoule in the flower of his youth, and in the glo̅rie of his conqueſt. And although he had a fayre ſonne, and a yong apparant heyre: yet was this O̅rphan ſuche a one, as p̄eachers ſaye, that God threatned to ſende, fo̅r a puniſhment, nishment, to hys vnrulye and vngracious people: saiyng by his prophet Esay: I shall geue you children to be your princes, and infaunts without wisdome, shall haue the gouernaunce of you. The prophet lyed not, if you note all things in an order: For after this Henry the fift (whose fame no man can iustly reprone or deface) succeded his sonne whom all we haue called our naturall prince, and obeyed as his heyre: in whose time and wrongfull reigne, I require you diligently to consider, with what great torments and afflictions God hath whypped and scurged this miserable Isle, yea, with such and so many scourges and plagues, as no nation (the Egyptians onely except) were euer tormented, or afflicted withall. I will not speake of rebellious murders and oppressions, which of late haue bene done, and exercised here among vs: but I will declare and manifest to you how the crowne and glorie of this realme, is by the negligence of this silly man, and his vnwise counsayle, minished, defaced, and dishonored. Is not Normandy, which his father gat, regayned and conquered agayne, by the insolencie of him, and his couetous counsayle? Is not the whole Duchy of Acquitayne by two hundred and odde yeres, peaceably possessed by the kings of this realme, in one yere and a little more, gotten out of our hands and seigniorie? What should I speake of Angeow & Mayne, or the losse of the Isle of Fraunce, with the riche Citie of Paris. Alas it is to apparaunt, neither will I molest you with the recitall of all the perticulers thereof: But nowe in the middes of this affliction, and to make an ende of the same, God of his ineffable goodnesse, looking on this countrey, with his eyes of pitie and mercie, hath sent me in the truth to restore againe his decayed kingdome, to his auncient fame and olde renoume. Whereof here in open parliament, according to my iust and true title, I haue and do take possession of this royal throne, not putting diffidence, but firme hope in Gods grace, that by his deuine ayde, & the assistance of you the peeres of this realme, I shall bewtifie and maintaine the same, to the glorie of hym, honor of my blood, and to the publique wealth, as well of you all here present, as of all the poore commons and subiectes, of thys kingdome and Regiment.

When the Duke had thus ended his Oration, the Lordes sate still lyke Images grauen in the wall, or dumme Gods, neither whispering nor speaking, as though their mouthes had beene sowed vp. The Duke perceyuing none aunswere to be made to his declared purpose, not well content wyth their sober silence, aduised them well to digest and ponder the effect of that which he had sayde, and so neyther fully displeased, nor all pleased, departed to hys lodgyng in the kings Palace.

Whyle he was thus declaryng his tytle in the Chamber of the Peres, there happened a straunge chaunce in the very same time, amongst the commons in the nether house, then there assembled: for a crown which did hang in the middle of the same to garnishe a braunche, to set lights vpon, without touch of any creature or rigor of winde sodainely fell downe, and at the same time also fell downe the crowne, which stoode on the toppe of the Castell of Doner: as a signe and pronostication that the crowne of the realme should be deuided and changed, from one line to another, such was the iudgement of the common people.

The Lordes of the realme, forgate not the Dukes demaunde, nor long protracted protracted the time, to ſee ſome good ende, in ſo waighty a cauſe: wherfore diuers Lordes, as well ſpirituall as temporall, with many graue and ſage perſons of the commonalty daylie aſſembled at the black Friers and other places, to treate and common of this matter, being of no ſmall importaunce. During which time, the Duke of Yorke, although he and the king, were both lodged in the Palace of Weſtminſter, yet for no prayer or interceſſion, he would once viſite or ſee the king, till ſome perfite concluſion were taken, in this great and waighty purpoſe, ſaying and affirming, that he was ſubiect to no man, but onely to God, and he was his Lord and ſuperior, and none other, I will a little ſpace leaue the Lordes conſultyng together, and ſpeake of outward attemptes and forreyn doings.

This ciuill diſcention within the realme of Englande, did much animate and incourage James the ſeconde of that name, king of Scottes, to make warre on the Engliſhe nation, partly for the diſpleaſure which he conceyued for the death of Edmond Duke of Somnerſet hys mothers brother, and partly to ſhew himſelfe amongſt his people, to be both valyaunt and couragious. Thys king James from his firſt rule, beganne to enter into ſuſpition with Wylliam Erle Douglas, a man both of great kinne and more power, euer miſtruſting that he nothing more deſyred, then to deprriue hym from his auctority, and to vſurpe the ſame. This cancard ſuſpicion was ſo rooted in the kings harte, that ſodainely it branched out, in ſo much that the king ſending for the Erle (which truſting on his awne innocencie, humbly came to his preſence) cauſed him ſhamefully to be ſlayne and murdered, with which iniury, his two brethren, Archibald Erle of Murrey, and Hugh Erle of Ormount, not a little pricked and incouraged with the Erles of Angus and Morthone, being all of one line and ſurname, made open warre on the ſaide king James: but in concluſion he preuailed, and ſuppreſſed the great power of the Douglaſſes. And then thinking himſelfe a king, without eyther peere or fere, aſſembled a great armie, and entred into the Marches of Northumberlande, and beſieged the Caſtell of Rorborough, and there cauſed his newe Bumbard lately caſt in Flaunders, called the Lyon and dyuers other peeces to be ſhot againſt the Caſtell, whereof one being weake and ſlender, brake in peeces, and one of the fragmentes ſlue the king, ſtanding amongeſt a great companye of his people, and wounded the Erle of Angus. The Scottes not diſmayed with the death of their king, ſeyng the Caſtell eaſie to be wonne, manfully aſſaulted and with much paine gat it, and the ſame long defended, till Richard Duke of Glouceſter it conquered and deſtroyed. This king James of Queene Mary his wyfe left three ſonnes, James which ſucceeded him, Alexander Duke of Albany, and John. This yong king James, was put vnder the tuition of James Kenede, Biſhop of Saint Andrewes, which during his noneage, ruled the realme to the kings great honor, but more to his awne profite and peculiar gayne: for he made ſumpteous houſes, and builded Colleges, which this yong pupill king James, neyther could, nor was able to do.

his youth, neuer regarded wanton pastyme, nor lasciuious dalliaunce, for his wittes were set, and his industrie onely applied, to recouer agayne hys Princely inheritaunce: So that more plainely then in a Glasse, all men may perceyue that paine often profiteth, and labor commonly auayleth, but ydlenesse sildome, and dalliaunce neuer. To this Charles succeded king Lewys, of that name the.xj. of whose doings you shall heare after: and shall both study and marueile, at the straungenesse of his demeanor, and the craftie policie of his secret compasses. Now I will returne to the great counsayle of the Lordes, celebrate about London, for the Duke of Yorkes claime.

After long arguments made, and deliberate consultation had among the Peeres, Prelates, and commons of the realme: vpon the vigile of all Saintes, it was condescended and agreed, by the three estates, for so much as king Henry had beene taken as king, by the space of .xxxviij. yeres and more, that he should enioy the name and tytle of king, and haue possession of the realme, during his life naturall: And if he eyther died or resigned, or forfeited the same, for infringing any point of this concorde, then the sayde Crowne and auctoritie royall, should immediatly dissende to the Duke of Yorke, if he then lyued, or else to the next heyre of his line or linage, and that the Duke from thencefoorth should be Protector and Regent of the land. Prouided alway, that if the king did closely or apertly studie or go about to breake or alter this agrement, or to compasse or imagine the death or destruction of the sayde Duke or hys bloud, then he to forfeit the crowne, and the Duke of Yorke to take it. These articles with many other, were not onely written, sealed and swoorne by the two parties: but also were enacted in the high court of Parliament. For toy whereof, the king hauing in his company the sayde Duke, rode to the Cathedrall Church of saint Paule, within the Citie of London, and there on the day of all saintes, went solempnly wyth the Diademe on his head in procession, and was lodged a good space after in the Bishops Palace, nere to the sayd Church. And vpon the Saturday next ensuyng, Richard Duke of Yorke, was by the sound of a trumpet, solempnly proclaimed heyre apparaunt to the crowne of Englande, and Protectour of the realme. 1461 39

Articles of agreement betwene king Henrie the first, and Richard Duke of Yorke.

After thys, the Parliament kept at Couentry the laste yere, was declared to be a deuilishe counsayle, and onely celebrate for the destruction of the nobility, and no lawfull Parliament, because they which were returned, were neuer elected, according to the due order of the law, but secretly named by them, which desired more the destruction, then the aduauncement of the publique wealth and common profite. When these agreements were done and enacted, the king dissolued his parliament, which was the laste parliament that euer he ended. Such was the pleasure of almightie God, that king Henry beyng a good and verteous man, which had tasted innumerable aduersities and calamities of the worlde, should be deprined of his terrestriall crowne, to be recompensed with an heauenly garlande, and a ioyfull place: for surely a perfite good man, although he be plagued with a thousande displeasures cannot be but blessed.

The Duke of Yorke well knowyng, that the Queene would spurne and impugne the conclusions, agreed and taken in this Parliament, caused her and her sonne, to be sent for by the king: but she being a manly woman, disdaining to rule and not to be ruled, and thereto counſayled by the Dukes of Exceſter and Sommerſet, not only denyed to come but alſo aſſembled together a great armie, intendyng to take the king by fine force, out of the Lordes handes, and to ſet them to a newe ſchoole. The Protector lyng in London, hauyng perfite knowlege of all theſe doynges: aſſigned the Duke of Norffolke and the Erle of Warwike, his truſtie friendes, to be about the king, and he with the Erles of Saliſbury, and Rutland: with a conuenient companie, departed out of London the ſecond day of December, Northwarde, and ſent to the Erle of Marche his eldeſt ſonne to folowe him with all his power. The Duke by ſmall iourneys came to his Caſtell of Sandall, beſyde Wakefielde on Chriſtmaſſe eue, and there began to aſſemble his tenantes and friendes. The Queene beyng therof aſſerteyned, determined to couple with him while his power was ſmall, and his ayde not come: And ſo hauyng in her companie, the Prince her ſonne, the Dukes of Exceſter and Sommerſet, the Erle of Deuonſhire, the Lorde Cliffорde, the Lorde Roſſe, and in effect all the Lordes of the Northpart, with. xviij. thouſande men, or as ſome write, xvij. thouſand, marched from Yorke to Wakefield, and bad baſe to the Duke, euen before his Caſtell, he hauyng with him not fully fiue thouſand perſons, determined incontinent to iſſue out, and to fight with his enemies, and although ſir Dauy Hall, his olde ſeruaunt and chiefe Counſaylor, aduiſed him to kepe his Caſtell, and to defend the ſame with his ſmall number, till his ſonne the Erle of Marche were come with his power of Marchmen and Welſhe ſoldiors, yet he would not be counſayled, but in a great fury ſayde, a Dauy, Dauy, haſt thou loued me ſo long, and nowe wouldeſt haue me diſhonoured? Thou neuer ſaweſt me kepe fortreſſe when I was Regent in Normandie, when the Dolphyn himſelfe, with his puyſſaunce came to beſiege me, but lyke a man, and not lyke a birde incloſed in a Cage, I iſſued and fought with mine enemyes, to their loſſe euer (I thanke God) and to my honour: If I haue not kept my ſelfe within walles, for feare of a great and ſtrong Prince, nor hid my face from any man liuyng, wouldeſt thou that I for dread of a ſcoldyng woman, whoſe weapon is onely her tongue, and her nayles, ſhould encloſe my ſelfe, and ſhut my gates? Then all men might of me wonder, and all creatures may of me report diſhonour, that a woman hath made me a baſtard, whom no man euer to this day could yet proue a coward: and ſurely my mind is, rather to die with honor, then to liue with ſhame, for of honour commeth fame, and of diſhonour ryſeth infamie: Their great number ſhall not feare my ſpirites, but encourage them, for ſurely I thinke that I haue there, as many friendes as enemies, which at ioinyng, will eyther flie or take my part: Therefore auaunce my Banner, in the name of God and ſaint George, for ſurely I will fight with them, though I ſhould fight alone. The Erle of Saliſbury and other his friendes, ſeyng his courage, reſolued themſelues to his opinion, and ordered their men, and ſet them forth in warlike faſhion, for their moſt aduauntage. The Duke of Sommerſet and other of the Queenes part, knowyng perfectly, that if the Duke gat the victorie, their dayes were miniſhed, and their liuyngs left bare, like men quickned and pricked forwarde, for the ſafegarde of their lyues, and defence of their goodes, determined to abide the chaunce, and to eſpie their moſt aduauntage and ſo appointed the Lorde Cliffорde to lie in the one ſtale, and the Erle of Wilshire in the other, & they themselues kept the maine battaile. The Duke of Yorke with his people, discended downe the hill in good order and array, and was suffered to passe forwarde, towarde the maine battaile: but when he was in the plaine ground, betwene his Castell and the Towne of Wakefielde, he was inuironed on euery syde like a fishe in a Net, or a Deere in a Buckstall: so that he manfully fightyng, was within halfe an houre slaine and deade, and his whole army discomfited, and with him dyed of his trusty friendes, his two bastard Uncles, sir John and sir Hugh Mortimer, sir Davy Hall his chiefe Counsaylor, sir Hugh Hastyngs, sir Thomas Neuel, William and Thomas Aparre, both brethren, and two thousand and eight hundreth other, whereof many were yong Gentlemen, and heyres of great parentage in the South part, whose linages reuenged their deathes, within foure Monethes next and immediately ensuing. In this conflict was wounded and taken prisoner, Richard Erle of Salisbury, syr Richard Lunbrike, Raufe Stanley, John Harow, Capitaine Hauson, and diuers other. While this battaile was in fightyng, a priest called Sir Robert Aspall, Chaplaine and Scholemaister to the yong Erle of Rutland, the second son to the abouenamed Duke of Yorke, scarce of the age of .xij. yeres, a fayre Gentleman, and a maydenly person, perceiuyng that flight was more sauegard, then tarryng, both for him and his Mayster, secretly conueyed the Erle out of the field, by the Lorde Cliffordes bande, towarde the Towne, but or he could enter into a house, he was by the sayde Lorde Clifforde espyed, folowed, and taken and by reason of his apparell, demaunded what he was. The yong Gentleman dismayde, had not a worde to speake, but kneeled on his knees crauyng mercy, and desiryng grace, both with holdyng vp his handes, and makyng a dolorous countenaunce, for his speeche was gone for feare. Saue him sayd his Chapleyn, for he is a Princes sonne, and paraduenture may do you good hereafter. With that worde, the Lorde Clifforde marked him and sayde: by Gods blood, thy father slue mine, and so will I do thee and all thy kinne, and with that worde, strake the Erle to the hart with his Dagger, and bad his Chapleyn beare the Erles mother and brother worde what he had done and sayde. In this act the Lorde Clifforde was accompted a tyraunt, and no gentleman, for the propertie of the Lion, which is a furious and an vnreasonable beast, is to be cruell to them that withstand him, and gentle to such as prostrate or humiliate themselues before him. Yet this cruell Clifforde, not content with this, came to the place where the deade corps of the Duke of Yorke lay, and caused his head to be striken off, and set on it a Crowne of Paper, and so fixed it on a pole, and presented it to the Queene, not lyng farre from the fielde, in great despite and muche derision, saiyng: Madame, your warre is done, here is your kinges raunsome, at which present was much ioy, and great reioysing, but many laughed then, that sore lamented after, as the Queene her selfe, and her sonne: And many were glad then of other mens deathes, not knowyng that their awne were nere at hande, as the Lorde Clifforde, and other.

Wilſhire

The duke of Yorke slaine.

But surely, mans nature is so fraile, that thinges passed be sone forgotten, and mischiefes to come, be not foresene. After this victorie by the Quene and her part obteyned, she caused the Erle of Salisbury, with all the other prisoners, to be sent to Pomfret, and there to be behedded, and sent all their heddes, and the Dukes head of Yorke, to be ſet vpon poles, ouer the gate of the Citie of Yorke, in deſpyte of them, and their linage: whoſe children ſhortly reuenged their fathers quarrell, both to the Queenes extreme perdition, and the vtter vndoyng of her huſband and ſonne. This ende had the valiant Lorde, Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke.

The Erle of March ſo commonly called, but after the death of his father in dede and in right very Duke of Yorke, lyng at Glouceſter, heeryng of the death of his noble father, and louyng brother, and truſty friendes, was wonderfully amaſed, but after comfort geuen to him, by his faythfull friends and ſure allyes, he remoued to Shrewesbury, and other townes vpon the Riuer of Seuerne, declaryng to them the murder of his father, the ieopardie of himſelfe, and the vnſtable ſtate and ruyne of the Realme. The people on the Marches of Wales, which aboue meaſure fauored the linage of the Lorde Mortimer, more gladly offered him their ayde and aſſiſtance, then he it eyther inſtantly requyred, or hartily deſyred, ſo that he had a puyſſaunt armie, to the number of.xxiij.thouſand, redy to go againſt the Queene, and the murderers of his father. But when he was ſettyng forwarde, newes were brought to him, that Jaſper Erle of Penbroke, halfe brother to king Henry, and James Butler, Erle of Ormond and Wilſhire, had aſſembled together a great number, both of Welſhe and Iriſhe people, ſodainly to ſurpriſe and take him and his friendes, and as a captiue to conuey him to the Quene. The Duke of Yorke called Erle of Marche, somewhat ſpurred and quickned with theſe nouelties, retired backe, and met with his enemies in a fayre plaine, neere to Mortimers croſſe, not farre from Herford Eaſt, on Candlemaſſe day in the morning, at which tyme the Sunne (as ſome write) appered to the Erle of Marche like three Sunnes, and ſodainely ioyned all together in one, and that vpon the ſight thereof, he tooke ſuch courage, that he fiercely ſet on his enemyes, and them ſhortly diſcomfited: for which cauſe, men imagined that he gaue the Sunne in his full brightneſſe for his Cogniſaunce or Badge. Of his enemyes were left deade on the ground, three thouſand, and viij. hundreth. The Erles of Penbroke and Wilſhire fled, and Sir Owen Tewther, father to the ſayde Erle of Penbroke, which Owen had maryed king Henryes mother (as you haue heard before) with Dauid Floyde, Morgan ap Reuther, and diuers other were taken and behedded at the Citie of Harfforde. During this ſeaſon the Queene was greatly encouraged with the victory, obteyned late at Wakefielde, partly becauſe the Duke of Yorke, her vtter enemie was rid out of the worlde, and partly, becauſe ſhe perceyued the Lordes of the North Countrie to adhere and cleue to her part and faction: Wherefore with a great multitude of Northren people, ſhe marched toward London, of whoſe approche the Londoners were nothyng glad: For ſome affirmed that ſhe brought that ruſtie companie, to ſpoyle and rob the Citie: other ſayde that ſhe would be reuenged, of ſuch as fauoured the Duke of Yorke. So the poore Citizens hangyng betweene the water and the fire, were much amaſed, but the Magiſtrates and gouernours cauſed great watches to be kept, and good order to be obſerued. The Queene ſtill came forwarde with her Northren people, entendyng to ſubuert and defaict all concluſions and agreementes, enacted and aſſented to, in the laſt Parliament. And ſo after her long iourney, ſhe came to the towne of Saint Albones:

where of the Duke of Norffolke, the Erle of Warwike, and other whom the Duke of Yorke had left to gouerne the king in his ablence, beyng aduertiſed, by the aſſent of the king, gathered together a great hoſt, and ſet forward toward Saint Albons, hauyng the king in theyr company, as the heade and Chieftain of the warre, and ſo not mindyng to deferre the tyme any farther, vpon Shrouetueſday early in the morning, ſet vpon their enemies. Fortune that day ſo fauored the Queene, that her part preuayled, and the Duke & the Erle were diſcomfited, and fled: leauyng the king accompanied with the Lorde Bonuile, and Sir Thomas Kiryell of Kent, which vpon aſſuraunce of his promiſe, tarryed ſtill and fled not, but theyr truſt them deceyued. For after the victorie obteyned, and the king brought to the Queene, they two were deteyned as priſoners, and ſo continued till the kinges departing from that towne. In this battaile were ſlaine .xrriij. hundreth men, and not aboue, of whom no noble man is remembred, ſaue Sir John Gray, which the ſame day was made knight, with .xij. other at the Village of Colney. Happy was the Queene in her two battayles, but vnfortunate was the king in all hys enterpriſes, for where his perſon was preſent, there victorie euer fled from him to the other part, and he commonly was ſubdued and vanquiſhed. When Queene Margaret had thus well ſped, firſt ſhe cauſed the king, to dubbe Prince Edward his ſonne knight, with .xxx. other perſons, which in the morning fought on the Queenes ſyde, againſt his part. After ſhe ſent to the Maior of London, cõmaundyng him without delay, to ſend certaine Cartes, laden with Lenten vitail, for the refreſhing of her and her army. The Mayor, incontinent made proviſion, laded Cartes, and ſent them towarde the Queene. But the moueable Commons, which fauoured not the Queenes part, ſtopped the Cartes at Cripplegate, and boldely ſayd, that their enemies which came to ſpoyle and robbe the Citizens, ſhould neyther be relieued, nor victayled by them. And notwithſtandyng gentle aduertiſement to them geuen, of the miſchiefes which might enſue of their doyngs: yet they remayned ſtill in one obſtinate minde and wilfull will, not permittyng the carryages to paſſe or go forwarde. Duryng which controuerſie, diuerſe of the Northren horſemen came and robbed in the Suburbes of the Citie, and would haue entred at Creplegate, but they by the Commoners were repulſed, and beaten backe, and three of them ſlaine: wherupon the Mayor ſent the Recorder to the kinges Counſaile to Barnet, to excuſe the matter, and the Ducheſſe of Bedford, and the Ladie Scales, with diuers ſad fathers of the Spiritualtie, went to the Queene to mollifie her rancor, and aſſwage her melancoly, which ſhe had conceyued againſt the Citie. At this humble requeſt, the Queene and her Counſaile appoynted certaine Lordes and Knightes, with foure hundreth tall perſons, to ryde to the Citie, and there to viewe, and ſee the demeanor and diſpoſition of the people: and diuers Aldermen were appoynted to mete them at Barnet, and to conuey them to London. But whatſoeuer man purpoſeth, God diſpoſeth: for al theſe deuiſes were ſhortly tranſmuted into an other forme, becauſe true report was brought, not onely to the Citie, but alſo to the Queene, that the Erle of Marche had vanquiſhed the Erles of Penbroke and Wilſhire, and that the Erle of Warwike, in whome reſted the chiefe truſt of that faction, after the laſt conflict had at Saint Albones, had met with the ſayde Erle of Marche at Chippyng Norton, by

Cotteſolde, and that they with both their powers were commyng towarde London. Theſe true tales turned the Queenes purpoſe, and altered all her long deuiſed entents, inſomuch that ſhe little truſtyng Eſſex, and leſſe Kent, but London leaſt of all, with her huſband and ſonne, departed from Saint Albones, into the Northe Countrie, where the roote and foundation of her ayde and refuge onely conſiſted. But at the day of her departyng, ſhe cauſed the heades of the Lorde Bonuile, and Sir Thomas Kiriell, to be cut of, in the preſence of her ſonne, contrary to the minde and promiſe of her huſband, but amongeſt men of warre, fayth or othe, ſeldome is performed.

The Duches of Yorke, ſeyng her huſbande and ſonne ſlayne, and not knowyng what ſhould ſucceede of her eldeſt ſonnes chaunce, ſent her two yonger ſonnes, George and Rychard ouer the ſea, to the Citie of Vtrechte in Almayne: where they were of Philip Duke of Burgoyne well receyued and feaſted, and ſo there they remayned till their brother Edwarde had obteyned the realme, and gotten the regiment. During which time diuers Marchaunts miſtruſting the mutation of the worlde, fled out of the realme, amongſt whome, one Philip Malpas a man of great ryches, ſailyng into Flaunders, was taken by John Columme a French man, and payde foure thouſand Markes for his raunſome. The Erles of Marche and Warwike, hauing perfite knowlege, that the king and Quene with their adherentes, were departed from ſaint Albones, determined firſt to ryde to London, as the chiefe Key and common ſpectacle to the whole realme, thinking there to aſſure themſelues of the Eaſt and Weſt parte of the kingdome, as king Henry and his faction neſteled and ſtrengthened him and his alies, in the Northe partes: meaning to haue a bucklar againſt a ſworde, and a ſouthzene Byll, to counteruayle a Northzen baſtard. And ſo theſe two great Lordes, reſoluyng themſelues vpon thys purpoſe, accompanied with a great number of men of warre, entred the Citie of London, in the firſt weeke of Lent. What ſhould I declare how the Kentiſhmen reſorted: howe the people of Eſſex ſwarmed, and how the Counties adioyning to London, daylie repayred to ſee, ayde, and comfort this luſtie Prince and flower of Chiualrie, as he in whome the hope of their ioy, and the truſt of their quietneſſe onely then conſiſted. Thys wiſe and prudent noble man, perceyuing the moſt parte of the Realme, to him friendly and adherent, minding to take time when time ſerued, called a great counſail both of Lordes ſpirituall and temporall, and to them repeated the tytle, and right that he had to the realme, and dignitie royall: reherſing the articles of the agreement, not only concluded betwene king Henry, and hys Noble father, Rychard Duke of Yorke, by their writings ſigned and ſealed: but alſo corroborated and confirmed by aucthoritie of the high Courte of Parliament: the breaches whereof, he neither forgat, nor omitted vndeclared. After the Lordes had conſidered and weighed his tytle and declaration, they determined by aucthoritie of the ſayde counſayle, for as much as king Henry contrary to his othe, honor and agreement, had violated and infringed the order taken and enacted in the laſt parliament, and alſo becauſe he was inſufficient to rule the realme, and vnprofitable to the common wealth, he was therefore by the aforeſayde aucthoritie, depriued and detected of all kingly honor, and regall ſouereintie. And incontinent, Edwarde Erle of Marche, ſonne and heyre to Richarde Duke of Yorke, was was by the Lordes in the sayde counsayle assembled, named, elected, and admitted, for king and gouernour of the realme: on which day, the people of the Erles parte being in their muster in saint Johns field, and a great number of the substantiall Citezens there assembled to beholde their order: sodainely the Lorde Fawconbridge which tooke the Musters, wisely declared to the multitude, the offences and breaches of the late agreement done and perpetrated by king Henry the first, and demaunded of the people, whether they would haue the sayde king Henry to rule and reigne any longer ouer them: To whome they with a whole voyce, aunswered nay, nay. Then he asked them, if they would serue, loue, and obey the Erle of March, as their earthly prince, and souereigne Lorde. To which question they aunswered, yea, yea, criyng king Edward, with many great showtes and clapping of handes. The Lordes were shortly aduertised of the louing consent which the commons frankely and freely of their free will had geuen, wherupon incontinent, they all with a conuenient number of the most substanciall commons, repaired to Baynardes Castell, making iust and true report to the Erle of their election and admission, and the louing assent of the faythfull commons. The Erle after long pausing, first thanked God of his great grace and benefite, then to him declared and shewed, and the Lordes and commons also, for their hartie fauor, and assured fidelitie, and notwithstanding that like a wise prince, he alleged his insufficiencie for so great a rome and weyghty a burden, as lacke of knowlege, want of experience and diuers other qualities to a gouernour apperteyning: yet in conclusion he beyng perswaded by the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, the bishop of Excester and other Lordes, then being present, graunted to their petition, and toke vpon him the charge, and vpon the nert day, beyng the fourth day of Marche, he as king rode to the Church of Saint Paule, and there offered. And after Tedeum song, with great solempnitie, he was conueyed to Westminster, and there sat in the Hall, with the Scepter royall in his hand, where to all the people which there in great number were assembled, his tytle and claime to the crowne of England was declared by two maner of waies: the first, as sonne & heyre to Duke Richard his father, right enheritor to the same: the second, by auctoritie of Parliament and forfeiture committed by king Henry. Wherupon it was againe demaunded of the commons, if they would admit and take the sayde Erle as their prince and souereigne Lorde, which all with one voyce cryed, yea, yea. Which agreement concluded, he entred into Westminster Church vnder a Canapy, with solempne procession, and there as king offred and after the homages taken of all the nobles there present, he returned by water to London, and was lodged in the Bishops Palace: daylie making prouision to go Northwarde agaynst his aduerse faction and open enemies, and on the morow he was proclaymed king, by the name of king Edwarde the fourth, throughout the Citie. While these things were in doyng in the Southpart, king Henry being in the Northcountrie, thinking because he had slayne the Duke of Yorke, the chiefe Capitayne of the contrary lynage, that he had brought all thing to purpose and conclusion as he would, assembled a great armie, trusting with little paine, and small losse, to destroy the residewe of his enemies, whome he esteemed to be of no force. But he was sore deceyued: for out of the dead stock, sprang a strong and mighty braunch, which

which by no meanes could either be broke, or made fere: which was this king Edward the fourth, which was so beloued and fauored of the people, that no man was spoken of, no person was remembred but onely he: for he was so much estemed, both of the nobility & communalty, for his liberality, clemency, integrity, and courage, that above all other, he was extolled & praised to the very heauen. By reason wherof men of al ages & of all degrees to him daylie repayred, some offering themselues and their men to ieopard their lifes with him, & other plenteously gaue him money, to support his charges and maintaine his war. By reason wherof, he assembled together a puyssant army, to the intent to geue to his enimies a fierce and a sharpe battaile, & so in one day to obtein his purpose, & make an ende of al his trouble. When his army was redy, & al things prepared, he departed out of London the .xij. day of March, and by easy iourneis came to the Castel of Pomfret, where he rested, appointing the Lord Fitzwater to kepe ỳ passage at Ferybridge, with a great number of talle personages. Let no man thinke or yet imagine, ỳ either the counsayle of king Henry, or his vigilāt Quene, either neglected or forgat to know or serch what their enimies did, but they prepared to their power al the men, that they eyther could perswade or allure to their purpose to take their part, And thus thinking themselues furnished, cōmitted the gouernance of the armie to the Duke of Sommerset, the Erle of Northumberland, & the Lorde Clifford, as men desiring to reuenge ỳ death of their parents slain at the first battaile of S. Albons. These noble Captaines, leauing king Henry, his wife & sonne, for their most safegard in ỳ City of Yorke, passed the riuer of Wharfe with all their power, entending to prohibite king Edward to passe ouer the riuer of Ayre, & for the more expedition & explopt of their purpose (after many comparisons made betwene the Erle of Northumberland, and the Lorde Clifford, both being in lusty youth, & of franck courage) the Lord Clifford determined with his light horsemē, to make an assay to such as kept the passage of Ferybridge, & so departed from the great armye on the Saturday before Palmsonday, & early or his enimies were ware, gat the bridge, and slue the kepers of the same, & all such as did withstand him. The Lord Fitzwater hering the noise, sodainly rose out of his bed, and vnarmed, with a Pollax in his hand, thinking that it had bene a fray amongst his men, came down to appese the same, but or he eyther began his tale, or knew what the matter ment, he was slaine, & with him the bastard of Salisbury, brother to the Erle of Warwike, a valiant yong gentleman, & of great audacity. When the Erle of Warwike was informed of this feat, he like a man desperate moūted on his hackney, & came blowing to king Edward, saiyng: syr, I pray God haue mercy of their soules, which in ỳ beginning of your enterprise haue lost their liues, and because I see no succours of the world, I remit the vengeance & punishment to God our creator and redemer, & with that lighted down and slue his horse with his sword, saiyng: let him flie ỳ wil, for surely I will tary with him that wil tary with me. The lusty king Edward, perceiuing the corage of his trustie friend the Erle of Warwike made proclamation that al men, which were afraid to fight, should incontinent depart, & to al them that taried the battaile, he promised great rewards with this addition, that if any Souldiour, which voluntaryly would not abyde, & in or before the conflict flye, or turne his back, that then he that coulde kyll hym, shoulde haue a great rewarde, and double wages.

wages. After this proclamacion ended, the Lorde Fawconbridge, sir Water Blont, Robert Horne wyth the forewarde, passed the ryuer at Castelforde three myles from Ferebridge, entendyng to haue enuyroned, and enclosed the Lorde Clyfforde, and hys company, but they being thereof aduertised, departed in great haste towarde kyng Henryes armye, but they met with some that they looked not for, and were attrapped or they were ware. For the Lorde Clyfforde, eyther for heate or payne, putting of his Gorget, sodaynely wyth an arrowe (as some say) wythout an hedde, was striken into the throte and incontinent rendered his spirite, and the Erle of Westmerlandes brother and all his company almost were there slayne, at a place called Dintingdale, not far from Towton. This ende had he which slew the yong Erle of Rutlande, kneelyng on his knees: whose yong sonne Thomas Cliffforde, was brought vp with a Shepperd, in poore habite, and dissimuled behauiour euer in feare, to publish his linage or degree, till kyng Henry the. vi. obtayned the Crowne, and gatte the diademe: by whome he was restored to hys name and possessions. When this conflict was ended at Ferebridge, the Lorde Fawconbridge, hauing the forewarde, because the Duke of Northfolke was fallen sick, valiauntly vpon Palmsunday in the twylight, set forth his army, and came to Sarton, where he myght apparauntlye perceyue the host of his aduersaryes, which were accompted. lx. M. men, and thereof aduertised kyng Edwarde, whose whole armye, they that knewe it, and payed the wages, affirme to be, xlviij. M. vj. C. and. lx. persons, which incontinent with the Erle of warwike set forward, leauyng the rereward vnder the gouernaunce of Sir John Wenlock, and Syr John Dynham and other. And first of all he made proclamation, that no prisoner should be taken, nor one enemie saued. So the same day about nine of the clock, which was the. xxix. day of Marche, beyng Palmesunday, both the hostes approched in a plaine fielde, betweene Towton and Sarton. When eche parte perceyued other, they made a great showte, and at the same instant time, there fell a small snute or snow, which by violence of the winde was driuen into the faces of them which were of kyng Henries parte, so that their sight was somewhat blemished and minished. The Lord Fawconbridge, which led the forewarde of kyng Edwardes battayle (as before is rehersed) being a man of great pollecie and of much experience in marciall feates, caused euery archer vnder his standard, to shoote one flight (which before he caused them to prouide) and then made them to stand still. The Northren men feeling the shot, but by reason of the Snowe, not well bewyng the distaunce betwene them and their enimies, like hardy men shot their sheafe arrowes as fast as they might, but all their shot was lost, and their labor vaine, for they came not nere the Southren men, by. xl. Taylors yardes. When their shot was almost spent, the Lorde Fawconbridge marched forwarde with his archers, which not onely shot their whole sheues, but also gathered the arrowes of their enimies, and let a great parte of them flie agaynst their awne Maisters, and another part they let stande on the ground, which sore noyed the legges of the owners, when the battail ioyned. The Erle of Northumberland, and Andrew Trollop, which were chiefetaynes of kyng Henries Vawgard, seyng their shot not to preuayle, hasted forward to ioyne with their enimies: you may be sure the other parte nothing slacked, but valyauntly fought with their enimies.

This

This battaile was ſore foughten, for hope of lyfe was ſet on ſide on euery parte, and taking of priſoners was proclaimed as a great offence, by reaſon wherof euery man determined, eyther to conquere or to die in the field. This deadly battayle and bloudy conflict, continued ten houres in doubtfull victorie. The one part ſometime flowing, and ſometime ebbing, but in concluſion king Edwarde ſo courageouſly comforted his men, refreſhing the werie, and helping the wounded, that the other part was diſcomfited and ouercome and like men amaſed fled toward Tadcaſter bridge to ſaue themſelues: but in the meane way there is a little brooke called Cock, not very broad, but of a great deepeneſſe, in the which, what for haſte of eſcaping, and what for feare of folowers, a great number were drent and drowned, in ſo much that the common people there affirme, that men alyue paſſed the ryuer vpon deade carcaſſes, & that the great riuer of Warfe, which is the great ſewer of that brooke, & of all the water comming from Towton, was coloured with blood.

The battaile of Towton or Sherborne.

The chaſe continued all night, and the moſt parte of the next daye, and euer the Northren men, when they ſawe or perceyued any aduauntage, returned againe and fought with their enemies, to the great loſſe of both parties. For in thys three dayes were ſlayne (as they that knew it wrote) on both partes xxxvj. M. viij. C. lx. and. xvj. perſons, all Engliſhe men and of one Nation, whereof the chiefe were the Erles of Northumberland and Weſtmerland, and the Lorde Dakers, the Lorde Welles, ſyr John Neuel, Andrew Trolop, Robert Horne, and many other knightes and Eſquiers, and the Erle of Deuonſhire taken priſoner, but the Dukes of Sommerſet and Exceſter fled from the field and ſaued themſelues. This conflict was in maner vnnaturall, for in it the ſonne fought againſt the father, the brother againſt the brother, the Nephew againſt the Uncle, and the tenaunt againſt hys Lorde, which ſlaughter did ſore and much weaken the puyſſance of thys realme, conſidering that theſe dead men, when they were liuyng had force ynough to reſiſt the greateſt princes power of all Europe: But alſo gaue a courage to outward enimies, and forreyn Potentates, to inuade and make warre in this realme, which thing was not vnlikely to haue enſued, if eyther Lewys the french king had beneat this time quiet in his realme, or James king of Scottes had bene of age and Maiſter of himſelfe, yet thanked be God, for although the gate of a conqueſt were opened, yet it was ſhut againe or it was eſpyed.

A great ſlaughter of Engliſhmen.

After this great victorie, king Edwarde rode to Yorke, where he was with all ſolempnitie receyued: and firſt he cauſed the heades of his father, the Erle of Saliſbury, and other his friendes to be taken from the gates, and to be buried with their bodyes. And there he cauſed the Erle of Deuonſhire and three other to be behedded, and ſet their heades in the ſame places. After that, he ſent out men on light horſes, to eſpie in what part king Henry lurked, which heering of the diſcomfiture and loſſe of his friendes, departed incontinent with his wyfe and ſonne, to the towne of Barwike, and leauing the Duke of Sommerſet there, came to the kinges Court of Scotland, requiring of him and his counſaile, ayde, ſuccour, reliefe and comfort. The yong king hauing compaſſion on the miſerable fate and great miſchance of this ſorowfull man, not onely comforted him with fayre wordes and friendly promiſes, but alſo aſſigned to him a competent pencion to liue on, during the

the time of hys abode within the Realme of Scotland. King Henry conſiderynge the great humanitie, ſhewed to him by the Scottiſh king, in whome onely nowe conſiſted the whole hope and eſpeciall truſt of his ayde and ſuccour, thought to binde the ſayde king with ſome great benefite to his parte, and for ỳ cauſe deliuered to him the towne of Barwike vpon Twede: which towne the Scottes manye yeres had deſired, but yet they neyther by force nor fayre promiſes, could obteyne their deſire or purpoſe before that time. Some wryters affirme that he not voluntarily, but conſtreyned by neceſſitie, rendered the ſame towne, or elſe he coulde not be permitted once to enter, or haue any ſuccour in the realme of Scotlande. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was: after king James had taken poſſeſſion of the towne, he friendly entertayned and faythfully ſupported the part and faction of king Henry, and concluded a mariage betwene his ſiſter and the yong prince of Wales, which mariage, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, enemie to Quene Margarets father, labored much to breake and interrupt: but by the conſent of both the friends the matrimony was agreed, but it was neuer ſolempniſed, as after you ſhal heare. When king Henry was ſomewhat ſetteled in the realme of Scotland, he ſent his wyfe and hys ſonne into Fraunce, to king Reynet her father, truſting by his ayde and ſuccour to aſſemble a great armie, and once agayne to poſſeſſe his realme and dignitie, and he in the meane ſeaſon determined to make his abode in Scotlande, to ſee and eſpie, what waye his friendes in Englande woulde ſtudie or inuent for his reſtitution and aduauncement. But whether it were his deſtinie or his follie, he ſo imprudently demeaned himſelfe, that within ſhort ſpace, he came into the handes of his mortall enimies. Quene Margaret thus being in Fraunce, did obteyne and impetrate of the yong French king, that all fautors and louers of her huſband and the Lancaſtreall bande, might ſafely and ſurely haue reſorte into any part of the realme of Fraunce, prohibityng all other of the contrary faction, any acceſſe or repaire into that Countrie.

King Henry the ſixt deliuered the towne of Barwike into the handes of Iames king of Scotlande.

Thus you haue heard the variable chaunce and lamentable hiſtory of king Henry the ſixt, which had reigned ouer this realme .xxxviij. yeres and odde Monethes, which the tenth yere after his depoſicion, was agayne erected to his throne and eſtate royall, as after ſhall be declared. Now leauing kyng Henry with the Princes of his faction, conſultyng together in Scotland, and Queene Margaret his wyfe gathering men together in Fraunce, I will returne to the actes of king Edwarde.

After this great victory by King Edward obteyned at the battaile of Towton, as afore sayde, he returned lyke a triumphant Conquerour, with great pompe into the Citie of London, where, the fourth day of Marche. 1460. by sound of Trumpet he was proclaymed king of this Realme, and the .xxix. day of June next folowing, he was at Westminster with all solempnitie crowned, and annoynted king, by the name of king Edward the fourth.

And in this yere he called his high court of Parliament, whereby the estate of the Realme was wholy set in good order, and specially such thinges as appertayned to the common wealth, which before were to much neglected and decayed. During the tyme of this ciuill and intestine warre, he caused all statutes and ordinaunces made by king Henry the first, (which eyther touched his title or his profite) to be adnihilate and frustrate. In the which Parliament the Erle of Orford farre striken in age, and the Lorde Awbrey Veer his sonne and heyre, whether it were for malice of their enemies, or they were suspected, or had offended the king, they both, and diuerse of their counsaylors, were attainted and put to execution, which caused John Erle of Orford euer after to rebell. And afterwarde he created his two yonger brethren Dukes, that is to say: Lorde George, Duke of Clarence, Lorde Richard, Duke of Gloucester, and Lord John Neuell brother to Richard Erle of Warwike, he first made Lorde Mountacute, and afterwardes created him Marques Mountacute. Beside this, Henry Bourchier, brother to Thomas Archebishop of Cauntorbury, was created Erle of Essex, and William Lorde Fawconbridge, was made Erle of Kent. To this Lord Henry Bourchier beyng a noble man in martiall actes, highly approued and renoumed, Richarde Duke of Yorke, long before this tyme, had geuen his sister Elizabeth in mariage: Hauyng a firme hope, and a sure confidence, that he and his generation should be a perpetuall ayde to the Duke and his sequele, aswell in prosperitie as aduersitie, associate together in all chaunces of fortune, which trust he did not defraude, as afterward appered to this king Edward the fourth, sonne to the sayde Duke Richard, which for his assured fidelitie, made him Erle of Essex: to the ende that both he the father, and his sonne should euer be to him, both an ayde and a bulwarke. This Erle Henry, begat of Ladie Elizabeth his wife, foure sonnes, William, Thomas, John, and Henry, and one daughter named Isabell, which liued but a small season. In the which sonnes, in compassyng and bringyng great thinges to passe, there lacked no industrie, nor prouidence: and they were hardye, strong, and couragious: But in Lorde William, the eldest sonne of Henry, all these vertues were surely planted and ingrauen: Which William espoused Ladie Anne Woodwile, discended of an highe parentage, whose mother Jaquet was daughter to Peter of Lurenborough, Erle of Saint Paule, by whom he had Lorde Henry afterwarde Erle of Eſſex, and Cicile, and Iſabell, which dyed vnmaryed: Cicile was maryed, to Walter Lord Ferrers of Chartley. But nowe to returne to the purpoſe.

Ye haue heard before in the. xxxviij. yere of the reigne of king Henry the ſixt, that the Lordes borowed of the Marchantes of the Staple. xviij. thouſand pound, the which money the Staplers did nowe ſue for vnto king Edwarde to be repayed vnto them, for that they ſayde they diſburſſed the ſame in his affayres: But their ſute was finally regarded, and ſhortly after they were willed to ſilence and to demaunde it no more.

And this yere in the ende of September, the king ſent the Erle of Kent and other into Britayn, who ſhortly after wonne the Iſle of Conquet.

When all theſe chaunces thus luckily happened to king Edwarde, and all thinges in maner were framed as he would haue them: Henry Duke of Sommerſet, ſir Raufe Percie, & diuers other, beyng in diſpayre, and out of hope of all good chaūce, that might happen to king Henry the ſixt came humbly & ſubmitted themſelues, whome he gently enterteined & louingly receyued. Of which dede, the duke ſhortly repented him, & ſo did ſome of the other.

The duke of Sommerſet and ſir Raufe Percy ſubmit thēſelues vnto king Edward the fourth.

All this ſeaſon was king Henry the ſixt in Scotland, which to haue the more ayde and comfort of the Scottiſhe king, he deliuered vnto him the towne of Barwike, (as you before haue hearde) which had bene continually in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh men, from the tyme of king Edward the firſt, which with hardie courage, manfull aſſaultes, and ſlaughter of many thouſandes of Scottes, valiantly conquered the ſame. This ſame ſeaſon alſo, Queene Margaret beyng in Fraunce, by the meanes of her father & friends found ſuch friendſhip at the French kings hands, that ſhe obteyned a crue of fiue hundreth Frenchmen, which was but a ſmall number for her purpoſe, and yet a greater number then her huſband or ſhe were able to enterteyne in wages, of their awne Coffers. She thus beyng accompanyed, with theſe boaſtyng Frenchemen, of whome ſyr Piers Bracy, a Britayne knight was Capitaine, ſet vp her ſayles, and with a proſperous winde arryued in Scotland, where ſhe and her company were welcome to her huſband and ſonne. Then the Queene and her company thinkyng to doe ſome great enterpriſe, ſayled towarde New Caſtell, and landed at Tinmouth. But whether ſhee were afrayed of her awne ſhadowe, or that the Frenchemen caſt to many doubtes, the truth is, that the whole army returned to their Shippes, and a tempeſt roſe ſo ſodainly, that if ſhe had not taken a ſmall Caruel, and arriued ſafe at Barwike: ſhe had neuer vered king Edward after, as ſhe did with a new inuaſion, nor yet ſhe had not liued all her olde age in miſery, wretchednes, & calamity, as ſhe did, leſyng both her huſband, her ſonne, her realme, and her honor. And although at that tyme fortune was ſo fauorable to her, yet her companie were with ſtormie blaſtes driuen on the ſhore before Bamborough Caſtell, where they ſet theyr ſhippes on fyre, and cowardly fled to an Iſland, called holy Iſland, where they were ſo aſſayled by the baſtard Ogle, an Eſquier called John Manners, with other of king Edwardes retinue, that many of them were ſlaine, and almoſt foure hundreth taken priſoners, and put to raunſome. But the Captain Bracy more coward then corageous, happened by chaunce of a fiſherman, and ſo came to Barwike to Queene

Margaret his Miſtres: whether ſhe gaue him thankes or no, I doubt, but ſure I am, he none deſerued, yet ſhe made him Capiteyn of Alnewike Caſtel, which he with his freſhe men kept till they were reſcued. This chaunce little amaſed the Queene, nor in any thing abated her haut courage. For incontinently ſhe obteyned a great compante of Scottes, and other of her friendes and ſo bringyng her huſband with her, and leauyng her ſonne called Prince Edward, in the towne of Barwike, entred Northumberland, and tooke the Caſtell of Bambrough, and ſtuffed it with Scottes, and made therof Capitaine ſyr Raufe Grey, and came forwarde towarde the Biſhoprike of Durham. When the Duke of Sommerſet heard theſe newes, he without delay refuſed king Edward, and rode in poſte to his kinſman king Henry the firſt: verifiyng the olde prouerbe: kinne will creepe where it may not go: Refuſyng the ſurety of his eſtate, which king Edward did promiſe him, for the vncertaine gaine which he hoped to get, by ſupportyng king Henry: with him fled alſo ſyr Raufe Percye, and many other of the kinges friendes, but many mo followed him, for couetouſneſſe of ſpoyle and rapyne: inſomuche that the puyſſaunce of king Henry, was thought to be of as muche force, as the ſtrength & armie of his enemy king Edward. The which armie was iudged to be the greater, becauſe he ſpoyled, & burned townes, and deſtroyed fieldes whereſoeuer he came. King Edward (as you coulde not blame him) was with theſe doyngs nothing content: wherefore like a wiſe Prince, intending to ſtop the gut of king Henryes power, or it made any further iſſue: prepared all munitions, conuenient for the warre, rig ed and apparailed a great nauye of ſhippes, of which ſome were victayled at Lyn, and ſome at Hull, and they were furniſhed with Souldiors. When his army by the ſea was thus warlikely ſet forward: he ſent the Lorde Montacute (whome both for his hardineſſe and ſage conduite in marciall affayres, he much truſted and beleued) into Northumberland, there to rayſe the people to withſtande his enemies. And after this, he in his royall perſon, accompanied with his brethren, and a great part of the nobilitie of his Realme, not without a great and puyſſaunt armie, marched towarde his enemyes, and came to the Citie of Yorke, ſendyng a great quantitie of his faythfull ſubiectes, to the ayde of the Lorde Montacute, leaſt paraduenture he geuyng to much confidence to the men of the Biſhoprike and Northumberlande, might by them be deceyued and ſurpriſed. The Lorde Montacute, forgat not the office of a good Capitaine, and beyng well furniſhed with ſuch as he knewe would neyther flye backwarde, nor ſtande ſtill lookyng on, thought no lenger to tract the tyme, but with a baliant courage marched forwarde towarde his enemies, and encountered with the Lorde Hungerford, the Lorde Roos, ſyr Raufe Percye, and diuers other, at a place called Hegely Moore. Where ſodainly the ſayde Lordes, in maner without ſtroke ſtrikyng fled, and onely ſyr Raufe Percy abode, and was there manfully ſlain, with diuers other, ſaiyng, when he was diyng: I haue ſaued the birde in my boſome: meanyng that he had kept, both his promiſe and othe to king Henry the firſt. The Lorde Montacute ſeyng fortune thus proſperouſly leadyng his fayle, was aduaunced with hardie courage towarde his enemies, and then in paſſyng forwarde, he had by his eſpialles perfect intelligence, that king Henry with all his power, was encamped in a fayre plaine called Linels, on the water of Dowill in Exhamſhire.

ſhire. It was no neede to bid him haſte haſte, as he that thought not to leeſe the occaſion to him ſo manifeſtly geuen, & therfore in good order of battaile, he manfully ſet on his enemies in their awne campe, which like deſperate perſons, with no ſmall courage receiued him. There was a ſore fought field, and no partie by a long tract, could get any aduauntage of the other, till at the laſt, the Lorde Montacute crying on his men to do valiauntly, entred by plaine force the battaile of his enemies, and brake their array, which like men amaſed, fled hether and thether, deſperate of all ſuccor. In which flight and chaſe, were taken Henry Duke of Sommerſet, which before was reconciled to king Edward, the Lorde Roos, the Lorde Molyns, the Lorde Hungerford, ſyr Thomas Wentworth, ſyr Thomas Huſe, ſyr John Finderne, and many other. King Henry was this day the beſt horſeman of his company: for he fled ſo faſt that no man could ouertake him, and yet he was ſo nere purſued, that certaine of his Henchmen and folowers were taken, theyr horſes beyng trapped in blew veluet: wherof one of them had on his head, the ſaid king Henryes Helmet. Some ſay his high Cap of eſtate, called Abococket, garniſhed with two riche Crownes, which was preſented to king Edward, at Yorke the fourth day of May. The Duke of Sommerſet, was incontinently for his great mutabilitie and lightneſſe, behedded at Exham, the other Lordes and knightes were had to Newe Caſtell, and there after a little reſpite, were likewiſe put to execution. Beſyde theſe perſons, diuers other to the number of. xxb. were executed at Yorke, and in other places: whereby other fautors of king Henryes partie, ſhould be out of all truſt of all victory, conſideryng that theyr Capitaines had hopped hedleſſe. From this battaile eſcaped king Henry the firſt, ſyr Humfrey Neuell, William Taylboys, calling himſelfe Erle of Kent, ſyr Raufe Grey, and Richard Tunſtall, and dyuers other, which beyng in feare of takyng, hid themſelues and lurked in dennes and holes ſecretly. They were not ſo cloſely hid, but they were eſpyed: For the Erle of Kent was taken in a cloſe place in Riddeſdale, and brought to New caſtell, and there with an Axe loſt his head. Sir humfrey Neuell after long lurkyng in a Caue, was taken in Holdernelle, and at Yorke behedded. Thus euery man almoſt that eſcaped, was after taken and ſcorged: ſo that it ſhould ſeeme that God had ordeyned all ſuch perſons as rebelled agaynſt king Edward, to haue in concluſion, death for there rewarde.

The duke of Sommerſet behedded.

After this battaill called Exham fielde, king Edwarde came to the cytie of Dureſme, to the intent to be more neerer to his enemies, if they would make any farther attempt: and ſent from thence in Northumberlande the Erle of Warwicke, the Lorde Montacute, the Lordes, Fawconbridge and Scrope, and diuers other, to recouer ſuch Caſtels and fortreſſes as his enemies, there helde, and wyth force defended. Theſe Lordes firſt beſieged the caſtel of Alnewike, which ſir Piers Bracy and the Frenchmen, by force and ſtrong hande kept, & in no wiſe woulde yelde, ſending for ayde to the Scots, wherevpon ſir George Douglas, Erle of Angus, with. xiij. M. men well choſen, in the day time reſcued the Frenchmen out of the caſtell, the Engliſhmen looking on, which thought it much better to haue the caſtel, without loſſe of their men, then to leeſe both the caſtel and their men, conſidering the power of the Scottes, and their ſmall number: and ſo they entred the caſtell and manned it, and after the ſayde lordes, beſieged the caſtel of Dunſtanbrough, and by force tooke it, and John Goys, seruaunt to the Duke of Sommerset cappytaine of the sayde castle, was taken and brought to Yorke: where, wyth a Hatchet he was behedded. These Lordes also tooke by force, the strong Castle of Bamberough, & in it sir Raufe Gray, which was before sworne to king Edwarde, for the which periurie to both the Princes, he was disgraded of the high order of knighthoode at Lancastre, by cuttyng of his guylt spurres, rentyng his Cote of armes, and breaking his swoorde ouer his hed: and finally, there his body was shortned, by the length of his hed.

The disgrading of a knight.

After this victory, king Edwarde returned to Yorke, where, in despite of the Erle of Northumberlande, which then lurked in the realme of Scotlande, he created syr John Neuell, Lorde Montacute, Erle of Northumberlande, and in reproofe of Jasper Erle of Penbroke, he created William Lord Herbert Erle of the same place: but after when by mediation of friends the Erle of Northumberlande, was reconciled to his fauor, he restored hym fully to his possessions, name, and dignitie: and not intending therby to dimynish the honor of his friend, he preferred sir John Neuel, to the stile of Marques, Mountacute, & so by that meanes, he was in estate and degree higher, then the Erle of Warwicke his elder brother, but in power, pollecie, and possessions, farre baser and lower.

Although king Edwarde might now thinke, all things to be in a good case, and himselfe also to be of puissance sufficient against all his enimyes, (for that he had obtayned so great a victory:) yet did he prouide with all dyligence, that neyther king Henry, nor Queene Margaret his wife, shoulde by any meanes remayne in Englande: least the sight, with the perswasions of them, and especially, with olde friendes and alies, might alter and chaunge the mindes, and also wynne the hartes of the mutable commonaltie. Wherefore he edifyed bulwarkes, and builded fortresses on euerie side and parte of his realme, where might be any place apt and meete, for an armie to arriue or take lande. Beside this, he wrote to all them in the South partes of his realme, that in no wyse they shoulde receiue the sayde Queene, nor any thing should helpe or minister to her: and if any did presume or attempt, priuatly or openly, to infringe his wil and cõmaundement, the offendors should be taken as his aduersaries, and punished as his vtter enemyes. And on that part that marcheth vpon Scotlande, he layde watches and espyalles, that no person shoulde go out of the realme, to king Henry and his company: which then lay soiorning in Scotlande. But whatsoeuer ieoperdy or perill myght be construed or deemed, to haue ensued by the meanes of kyng Henrye: all such doubtes, were now shortly resolued and determined, and all feare of his doings were clerely put vnder and extinct. For he himselfe, whether he were past all feare, or was not well stablished in his perfite minde, or coulde not long keepe himselfe secret, in a disguised apparell, boldely entred into Englande. He was no soner entred, but he was knowen and taken of one Cantlowe, and brought towarde the king, whome the Erle of Warwicke met on the way, by the kings commaundement, and brought him through London, to the towre, and there he was layde in sure holde. Queene Margaret hys wife hearing of the captiuitie of hir husband, mistrusting the chaunce of her sonne, all desolate and comfortlesse, departed out of Scotlande, and sayled into Fraunce, where she remayned with Duke Reyner her Father, till shee toke her infortunate iorney into Englande agayne: where she lost both husbande and sonne, and also all her welth, honor, and worthy felicitye. The new Duke of Sommerset & his brother John, sailed into Flaunders, where they also lyued in great miserye, till Duke Charles, because he was of their kinne, and discended of the house of Lancastre by his mother, succored them with a small pencion, which to them was a great comfort. The Erle of Penbrooke went from countrye to country, not alwayes at his hartes ease, nor in securitie of lyfe, or surety of lyuing. Such an vnstable and blynde goddesse is fortune: for when he that sitteth highest on the wheele falleth to the ground all that be vnderneth fall also, and can neyther haue ayde nor helpe of her, nor yet of themselues.

After the taking of king Henry the.vj. and the departing of his wife, this Realme was in more quietnesse, and tranquilytie, because that men of the contrary part and faction, durst not once attempt nor yet mooue any new tumult or conspiracie, considering that both the hed was fallen, and the chiefe members fled, and banquished. Wherefore king Edwarde, beyng cleerely out of doubt, of all hostilitye and daunger, set all his minde the whole foure yeres folowing, for both amending things preiudiciall to the common welth and also for stablishing of things, meete and necessarye, for the people of hys Realme and dominion. And first of all, folowing the olde auncient adage which sayeth, that the husbandman ought first to taste off the newe growen fruite: he destributed the possessions, of such as tooke part with king Henry the.vj. to his souldiors and capitaynes, which he thought had well deserued it. And beside, he left no poynt of lyberalitie vnshewed, by the which hee might allure to him, the beneuolence and louyng heartes of his peoples: and in especiall to his nobilitie, he gaue both large and precious giftes and rewardes. And because that he would gladly haue the loue of all men, aswell noble as ignoble, aswell of riche as of poore, he shewed himselfe more familier, both with the Nobilitie & the Commonalty, then (as some men thought) was conuenient eyther for his estate, or for his honor: which gentlenesse and friendly familiaritie he euer after vsed. The lawes of the realme, in part he reformed, and in part he newely augmented. The coyne both of Gold & of Siluer, which yet at this day is currant, he newly deuised and deuided: For the Golde he named Royals, and Nobles, and the Siluer he called Grotes, and halfe grotes. After this he caused open Proclamation to be published, that all persons which were adherent to his aduersaryes part, and woulde leaue their armure, and submit themselues wholy to his grace and mercye, should be clerely remitted, pardoned, and released: and they that obstinately would so refuse, should haue such paynes, as by the lawe to suche transgressors was assigned and appointed. What profite this gentle entertaynyng of his people brought him to, and what good will and fired heartes of the people, he obteyned by this kinde and friendly handlyng, all men may easely coniecture. For onely by the fauor and ayde of the people, euer after in all his warres, he was a victor and a conqueror: so that all enterprises afterwarde agaynst him attempted, had eyther euill successe, or were soone refelled, as afterward you shall perceyue. When he had brought his realme into thys estate, he surely thinkyng, and no lesse trustyng, but that he was set in the sure stall, stable throne, and vnmoueable Chayre of the crowne of his realme

King Edwarde the fourth deuised & names of the coynes

and kingdome, was not onely desyrous of himselfe, beyng a prince of haute courage, yong, lustie, and sanguine of complexion, to haue a wyfe, but was also dayly solicited, requyred, and mocioned of the peeres and nobilitie of the realme, to ioyne with such a Make, as should be both to his honour, and contentacion, and also for the securitie and establishment of the royall succession, and continuance of his progenie, in his newe possessed Countrie, and late recouered kingdome. Wherevpon like a wise and circumspect Prince, very desyrous of a Quene, but more thirstyng for such a Make, by the ayde of whose parentes, allyes, and confederates: he beyng ioyned with them in perfect affinitie, might little or nothyng doubt the attemptes of his aduersarie king Henry, nor yet the malice of his secret friendes and priuie fautors. This matter (as it was of great waight and importaunce) hangyng long in consultacion: Amongest other it was moued, to sende to Iames the thirde king of Scottes, for the obteinyng of the fayre Ladie Margaret his sister, to the entent, that on that syde, king Henry his aduersarye, should be destitute of all ayde, refuge, succor, and comfort: but whether it were for a priuie sickenesse, or an open impediment, to him and his Counsaile declared, or by them spyed, this mocion banished, and tooke no farther effect. Then (as many men haue sayde, and fewe or none haue written) it was farther consulted, that the Ladie Elizabeth, sister & heyre apparant, to Done Henry king of Castell (which afterward was his heyre in deede, and maryed to Done Fernando, king of Iragon) was a maryage for him most conuenient, and them that should lineally succeede him, considering that if he might obteyne the kingdome of Castell, of the which his great Grandmother was one of the heyres, as daughter to Done Peter, late king of Castell, (by the valiaunt knight, Edward Prince of Wales, restored to his Seigniorie, Realme, and kingdome) then were he in case, not only able to defend himselfe and his realme of England, agaynst all foreyn enemies, and bitter inuasions, but also he should be of puyssance sufficient to inuade, and likely to recouer the Duchie of Guien, yea and whole Acquitain, beyng his awne true and lawfull inheritaunce, with the ayde onely of the Castillians, putting the Englishe men to little trauaile and lesse charge. This mocion thus set forwarde, seemed highly to redounde, both to the honor of the king, and the high aduauncement of, the estate of the Realme: Consideryng the high parentage of the woman. And this mariage agreed vpon (which semeth more likely to be intreated of then cõcluded.) The Erle of Warwike was sent into Spain, well instructed, & no lesse accõpanied for the cõclusion of the said mariage. But who so wil diligently consider, the youth and appetite of king Edward, & the tender age & minority of this noble Damosell: may euidently perceyue, ỹ it was neyther decent nor conuenient for him nor his realme, to abide and tarie the maturitie and decent full age of this noble princes, nor that he being a prince, wel cherished, of lusty courage, and apt to generation, would or could liue sole & vnmaried without a wyfe, till she were of age, meete and conuenient for his bed. For it appereth on her goodly Sepulture, in the Citie of Granado (where she is buried) and also dyuers famous and notable Historiographers, both of Spain and other regions write and affirme, that she changed this transitorie lyfe, in the yere of our Lord. 1506. being fiftie yeres of age, one moneth lacking. By which report she should be borne in the yere of our Lord. 1456.

And

And when the Erle of Warwike was sent for the mariage of king Edward, in the beginning of the thirde yere of his reigne, the yere of our Lord was 1463. so that then she was fire and not fully seuen yeres, at which time king Edward had fully accomplished. xiiij. yeres and more. The treaty of which mariage although it be not vnpossible, yet for the causes aforesayde, it seemeth not a little vnlikely. But admit that this mariage was mooued, as it peraduenture might be, and that the Erle of Warwike sayled into Spaine (as he did not in deede) of lykelihood his legation was frustrate, and came to none effect: but sure it is that the same yere, he came to king Lewys the xj. then being French king, liyng at Tours, and with great honor was there receyued, and honorably enterteyned: of whome, for king Edward his mayster, he demaunded to haue in mariage the Lady Bona, daughter to Lewys Duke of Sauoy, and sister to the Lady Carlot then French Quene, being then in the French court. This mariage seemed pollitiquely deuised, and of an high imagination to be inuented, if you will well consider the state and condition of king Edwards affayres, which at this time had king Henry the first in safe custodie, in the strong Tower of London, and the most parte of his adherentes, he had as he thought, eyther ouerthrowne or destroyed, Quene Margaret onely except, and Prince Edward her sonne, which were then soiorneyng at Angiers with olde Duke Reyner of Aniow her father, wryting himselfe king of Naples, Scicile, and Jerusalem, hauing as much profites of the letters of his glorious stile, as rentes and reuennes out of the sayde large and riche Realmes and dominions (because the king of Arragon tooke the profites of the same, and would make no accompt thereof to Duke Reyner.) King Edward therefore thought it necessary to haue affinitie in Fraunce, and especially by the Queenes sister: trusting that by the sayde Mariage, Queene Margaret whome the same Queene Carlot little or nothing regarded, although her father was called a king & she a Quene, and none of both hauing subiectes, profites nor dominions, should haue no ayde, succour, nor any comfort of the French king, nor of none of his friends nor alies, wherefore Quene Carlot much desirous to aduance her bloud and progenie, and especially to so great a prince as king Edward was, obteyned both the good will of the king her husband, and also of her sister, so that the matrimony on that side was cleerely assented to, and the Erle of Dampmartine appointed with other to sayle into Englande, for the cleere finishing of the same. After these things thus concluded, the Erle of Warwike was dismissed and highly rewarded, and for the great and noble courage that was in him, he obteyned such fauor of the king, the Queene, and the Nobles of Fraunce, that when he fled out of England, he was there honorably receyued, friendly mainteyned, and louingly succoured, as you shall perceyue hereafter.

The mariage concluded for King Edward the fourth.

But now consider the old prouerbe to be true that saith: that mariage is destiny. For during the time ỳ the Erle of Warwike was thus in Fraunce, and had concluded a mariage for king Edward: The king being on hunting in the Forest of Wychwood beside Stonystratford, came for his recreation to the manor of Grafton, where the Duches of Bedford soiorned, then wife to Syr Richard Wooduile, Lorde Ryuers, on whome then was attending a daughter of hers, called dame Elizabeth Grey, wydow of syr John Grey knight, knight, slaine at the battayle of Saint Albons, by the power of king Edward. This wydow hauing a sute to the king, eyther to be restored by him to some thing taken from her, or requiring him of pittie, to haue some augmentation to her liuing, found such grace in the kings eyes, that he not onely fauored her sute, but much more phantasied her person, for she was a woman more of formall countenaunce, then of excellent bewtie, but yet of such bewtie and fauour, that with her sober demeanour, louely loking, & feminine smiling, (neyther to wanton nor to humble) beside her tongue so eloquent, and her wit so pregnant, she was able to rauishe the minde of a meane person, when she allured and made subiect to her, the hart of so great a king. After that king Edward had well considered all the liniaments of her body and the wise and womanly demeanour that he sawe in her, he determined first to attempt, if he might prouoke her to be his souereigne Ladye, promising her many giftes and fayre rewardes, affirming farther, that if she would therevnto condiscend, she might so fortune of his paramour and Concubine, to be chaunged to his wyfe and lawfull bedfelow: which demaunde she so wisely, and with so couert speeche aunswered and repugned, affirming that as she was for his honour farre vnable to be his spouse and bedfelowe: So for her owne poore honestie, she was to good to be eyther is Concubine or souereigne Ladie: that where he was a little before heated with the dart of Cupydo, he was now set all on a hote burning fire, what for the confidence that he had in her perfite constancie, and the trust that he had in her constant chastitie, and without any farther deliberation, he determined with himselfe clerely to mary with her, after that asking counsaile of them, which he knewe neyther would, nor once durst impugne his concluded purpose.

King Edward falleth in loue with the Duches of Wedwydes daughter, and after marieth her.

But the Duches of Yorke his mother letted it as much as in her lay, alleging a precontract made by him with the lady Lucy, and diuers other lettes: all which doubtes were resolued, and all things made clere and all cauillations auoyded. And so priuily in a morning he maryed her at Grafton, where he first phantasied her visage.

And in the next yeere after, shee was with great solempnitye crowned Queene at Westminster the .xxj. day of May. Her father also was created Erle Riuers, and made high Constable of Englande: her brother Lord Antony, was maried to the sole heire of Thomas Lord Scales, and by her hee was Lorde Scales. Syr Thomas Grey, sonne to Syr John Grey, the Queenes first husbande, was created Marques Dorset, and maryed to Cicelie, heire to the Lorde Bonuile. Albeit this mariage, at the first apparance was very pleasaunt to the king, but more ioyous to the Queene, and profitable to her blood, which were so highly exalted, yea, and so sodainly promoted, that all the nobilitie, more maruayled then allowed, this sodayne rising. Yet who so will marke the sequele of this Story, shall manifestly perceiue, what murther, what mysery, and what trouble ensued by reason of this mariage, for it cannot be denied, but for this mariage king Edwarde was expulsed the Realme, and durst not abyde: And for this mariage was the Erle of Warwicke, and his brother miserably slayne: By this mariage were king Edwardes two sonnes declared bastardes, and in conclusion priued of their liues: And finally by this mariage, the Queenes blood was confounded and in a maner vtterly destroyed.

Incommodities that ryng of king Edwardes mariage.

The

The French king and his Quene were not a little discontent (as I can not blame them) to haue their sister first demaunded, and then graunted, and in conclusion reiected and apparauntly mocked, without any cause reasonable. Wherefore shortly to appese her dolor, they maried her to John Galience, Duke of Millayne, where she lyued in great felicitie. But when the Erle of Warwike had perfite knowledge by the letters of his trusty friends, that king Edward had gotten him a newe wyfe, and that all that he had done with king Lewys in his ambassade for the contoyning of this newe affinitie, was both frustrate and vaine, he was earnestly moued and sore chafed with the chaunce, and thought it necessarie that king Edwarde should be deposed from his crowne and royall dignitie, as an inconstaunt Prince, not worthy of suche a kingly office. All men for the most part agree, that this mariage was the onely cause, why the Erle of Warwike bare grudge, and made warre on king Edward. Other affirme that there were other causes, which added to this, made the fyre to flame, which before was but a little smoke. For after that king Edwarde had obteyned his kingdome (as it was then thought) by the only helpe and meane of the Erle of Warwike, he beganne to suspect, yea, and to doubt him, fearing least he being in such authority and estimation of the people, as he well might worke him pleasure or displeasure, when he therevnto were minded, wherefore he thought it conuenient a little, & a little to pluck away and minishe the power and authoritie, which he and his predecessors had geuē to the Erle, to the entent that he then might doe at his pleasure, both at home and in outwarde parties, without feare or dread, without check or taunt, whatsoeuer to his awne mind seemed most conuenient. By thys a man may see that often it chaunceth, that friends for one good turne will not render another, nor yet remember a great gratuitie and benefite in time of necessity to them shewed and exhibited: But for kindnesse they shewe vnkindnesse, and for great benefites receyued, with great displeasure they doe recompence. Of this the Erle of Warwike was nothing ignorant, which although he looked for better thankes and greater benefites at king Edwards handes: yet he thought it best to dissimule the matter tyll such a tyme were come, as he might finde the king without strength, and then to imbrayd him with the pleasure that he had done for him. And farther it erreth not from the truth that king Edward did attempt a thing once in the Erles house, which was much against the Erles honesty (whether he would haue deflowred his daughter or his Neece, the certaintie was not for both their honors openly knowne) but surely such a thing was attempted by king Edward. But whether the iniurie that the Erle thought he had taken at king Edwardes handes, or the disdayne of authoritie that the Erle had vnder the king, was the cause of dissolution of their amitie and league, truth it is, that the priuy intentions in their harts brake into so many small peeces, that England, Fraunce, and Flaunders, could neuer ioyne them agayne, during their naturall lyues.

The displeasure betweene king Edwarde the fourth, and the Erle of Warwike.

The Erle of Warwike being thus mooued, inflamed, and set agaynst the king, least in hys furie, hys purpose might be eyspyed and brought to nought, determined hymselfe, couertly dissimulyng, so long to suffer all such wrongs and iniuries, as were to him done, tyll he might spie a time conuenient, and a worlde after hys awne appetite, for the setting foorth of his enterprise, terprise, and accomplishyng of hys purpose: wherupon he sayled into Englande, and with reuerence saluted the king, as he was wont to doe, and declared hys Ambassade & the exployt of the same, without any spot of grudge to be perceyued, as thoughe he were ignorannt of the newe matrimonie. And when he had taried in the Court a certaine space, more for to shew that he was the same person, and of the same good minde toward the king, as he was before the time of his Ambassade, then for any great affection that he bare, eyther to the king or to the Queene, he obteyned lycence of the king to depart to his Castell of Warwike, both for his helth and recreation, whether with great honour he was accompanied with diuers of the kings familier seruitors, as though none inwarde grudge or couert dissimulation had bene hidden betwene them, where he remayned tyll all his priuie imaginations were made open, and all hys enterprises were readie to be set forward. And in the ende of thys yere, that is to say, the .xj. daye of Februarie, the Quene was delyuered of a yong and fayre Lady, named Elizabeth, which afterward was wyfe to the noble Prince king Henry the seauenth, and mother to king Henry the eyght.

The birth of the Lady Elizabeth wife to king Henry the seuenth and mother to king Henry the eyght.

When king Edward had reigned thys, full the terme of fiue yeres, not all in pleasure, nor yet so in displeasure, but eyther by pollicie or friendship, he euer was superiour, and had the vpper hande of his enemies: He daylie studied and applyed hys whole minde with all labor and diligence to obteyne the loue, fauour, and amitie of outward princes. First to haue a Rowlande for an Olyuer, for the French king whome he knew not to be his friend, by reason of the refusall of his Quenes sister, he procured an amity with Henrie, king of Castell, and John king of Arragon. At the concluding of which amitie he graunted lycence and libertie for certayne cotsolde Sheepe to be transported into the Countrie of Spayne (as people report) which haue so there multiplyed and encreased, that it hath turned the commoditie of Englande muche to the Spanishe profite, and to no small hynderaunce of the lucre and gayne which was before times in Englande, raysed of Wolle and fell. Beside this to haue an amitie with his next neighbor the king of Scots, he wyncking at the towne of Barwyke, was content to take a truce for fiftene yeres.

King Edward lycenced a certaine number of Sheepe to be transported into Spaine.

But Lorde what happie chaunce and good luck had king Edward, for beside these newe friendes and confederates (of the which, some were more farther off, then he could call to for helpe with a Whistell, when he stoode in most daunger and distresse) Fortune beside all his expectation prouided him euen at his elbowe, a brother in lawe, a perpetuall ally and friendly neyghbour: which offered allyance and new amitie, if he had eyther refused or missed, surely of all his other supposed friends, for al their league, in his extreme necessitie, had cleerely left him without comfort. This happie chaunce came by this occasion. In this same season was Lorde and Prince in Flaunders, Brabant and Zelande, and other the lowe Countries there about, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, a man as he was of great age and yeres, so was he had in muche honor, great estimation and high reuerence amongst all kings and Princes in his dayes: which Duke as you haue heard before, was enemie mortall to king Henry the sixt. This Duke had onely one sonne legitimate, called Charles Erle of Charoloys, a man of such haute courage and audacitie,

cie, as fewe or none was in his time: For how he discomfited king Lewys the.xj. then the French king at the battayle of Montleherrie, the Frenchmen hath not yet forgotten. The lande of Luke also hath in freshe memorie his sore scourge and cruell plague. This Erle Charles was at thys time a widower, hauing only a sole daughter, & no sonne, wherfore both by his father and himselfe and the companions of the order of the golden fleece, being of their counsayle, it was thought not onely expedient but much more necessarie, that he should take a wyfe, yea and in such a place, as they might by that matrimony haue both alliaunce and ayde against all their outward enemies, and especially agaynst the French king, whome they knew daylie to wayte, and watch lyke a Serpent, how he by fraude might swalow or catch them or their possessions: vpon which communication it was declared by certain, there being present, that king Edwarde of Englande had a fayre Virgin to his sister, called Lady Margaret, a Lady of excellent bewtie, whose good qualities, beside the giftes of nature, grace and fortune, were so seriously set forth to Duke Philip, and the Erle of Charoloys his sonne, that both the father and the childe iudged that mariage to be the most meetest matrimony in Christendome, not onely for the excellent vertues imprinted in the person of the noble Virgin, but also for the great profite, allyaunce and continuall friendship that should growe and rise betwene the realme of England, and the Dukes landes.

After this mariage was fully resolued vpon, the Duke appoynted his bastard sonne Lord Antony, commonly called the bastard of Burgoyn, chiefe Ambassador for this purpose: a man of great wit, courage, valiantnesse and liberalitie, which beyng richly furnished of plate, and apparell, necessary for his estate, hauyng in his companie gentlemen and other expert in all feates of chiualry, and martiall prowesse, to the number of foure hundreth horses, (as the Brabanders write) tooke his ship, and with prosperous winde arriued in England, where he was of the Nobilitie receyued, and with all honorable entertainement conueyed to the kinges presence, which like a Prince, that knewe what apperteyned to his degree, louyngly welcomed, and familiarly embraced him, and other Nobles that came with him. And after his Commission seene, and his message declared, the king gaue to him a gentle aunswere for that tyme, and so the Ambassadors departed to their lodgyng, where they kept a great houshold, and made triumphant cheare. You may thinke that king Edward was not so vnwise, nor yet so vnpurueyed of counsaile, to forsake this benificiall alliaunce, thus frankely to him profered and graunted, but that he and all his counsaile endeuoured themselues to bryng the same to passe (the Erle of Warwike onely except) which bearyng his partie fauour to the French king by euill reportes, did as much as in him lay to hinder this mariage and affinitie, of whose good will the Erle Charles was well enformed.

Anthony the Bastarde sonne of Philip Duke of Burgoyne.

But for all his opinion at a certain day, the king sent for the Ambassadors, and there declared to them how he gladly did both accept & graunt their louyng request & demaund, promising them in the word of a prince, ỹ he would be duryng his lyfe friend to the friendes of the Duke and the Erle, and enemie to their aduersaryes and enemies, which wordes much pleased the Burgonions. After this he caused the Ladie Margaret his sister to be sent for, which beyng richly apparelled, accompanied with a great multitude of Ladies and gentlewomen, entered into the kinges great Chamber with so sober a demeanour, so fayre a visage, so louyng a countenance, and so princely a port, that she was estemed for her personage and qualities, both of the Burgonions and other, not to be vnworthy to matche in matrimonie, with the greatest Prince of the worlde. And after the king, she and the Imbassadors, had commoned a good tract of tyme, the Lorde Anthonie Bastard of Burgondie, contracted openly the sayd Lady Margaret, for and in the name of his brother the Erle Charles, and there in the name of the Duke his father, and the Erle his brother, he presented to the Ladie Margaret a riche and a costly Jewell, which she ioyously receyued with great thankes geuen, both to her father in law, and her newe contracted husband.

A mariage concluded betweene Charles the son of Philip Duke of Burgoyne and Ladye Margaret sister to king Edward the fourth.

After this mariage thus concluded and contracted. The Bastard of Burgoyne, a man of a haute courage, chalenged Anthonie Lorde Scales, brother to the Queene, a man both egall in hart and valiauntnesse with the Bastard, to fight with him both on foote and on horseback, the Lord Scales gladly receyued his demaunde, and promised him on the othe of a Gentleman, to aunswere him in the field at the daye appoynted: Like chalenges were made by other Burgonions, to the gentlemen of England, which were not refused. The king entendyng to see this martiall sport, and valiant chalenge performed, caused listes royall for the Champions, and costly Galleryes for Ladyes to looke on, to be newly erected in West Smithfield in London. And at the daye by the king assigned, the two Lordes entred within the Listes well mounted, richely trapped, and curiously armed. On which day they ranne together certaine courses with sharpe Speres, and so departed with egall honor. The next day, they entred the fielde, the Bastarde sittyng on a baye courser, beyng somewhat dimme of sight, and the Lord Scales had a graye courser, on whose shaffron was a long and a sharpe pyke of steele. When these two valiaunt persons coped together at the Tornay, the Lorde Scales horse by chaunce or by custome, thrust his pike into the nosethrilles of the horse of the Bastard, so that for very paine he mounted so high, that he fell on the one syde with his mayster, and the Lorde Scales roade rounde aboute him, with his sworde shakyng in his hande, till the king commaunded the Marshall to helpe vp the Bastard, which openly sayd, I cannot holde by the Clondes, for though my horse fayled me, surely I will not fayle my counterpanion. And when he was remounted, he made a countenaunce to assaile his aduersary, but the king eyther fauouryng his brothers honour then gotten, or mistrustyng the shame which might come to the Bastrad, if he were againe foyled, caused the Heraulde to crie, Lo[illegible], and euery man to depart. The Morowe after, the two noble men came into the fielde on foote, with two Polaxes, and there fought valiauntly like two corragious Champions, but at the last, the poynt of the Axe of the Lorde Scales happened to enter into the sight of the helmet of the Bastard, and by fine force might haue plucked him on his knees, the king sodainly cast downe his warder, and then the Marshalles them seuered. The Bastard not content with this chaunce, very desirous to be reuenged, trustyng on his cunnyng at the Polaxe (the which feate he had greatly exercised, and therein had a great experiment) required the king of iustice, that he might performe his enterprice: the Lord Scales

not refuſed it. The king ſayde he would aſke counſaile, and ſo callyng to him the Conſtable, and Martiall, with the officers of Armes, after long conſultacion had, and lawes of armes reherſed, it was declared to the Baſtarde for a ſentence diffinitiue, by the Duke of Clarence, then Conſtable of England, and the Duke of Norffolke Erle Marſhall, that if he would proſecute farther hys attempted chalenge, he muſt by the lawe of Armes be deliuered to hys aduerſary in the the ſame caſe and lyke condicion, as he was when he was taken from hym, that is to ſaye, the poynt of the Lorde Scales Are to be fixed in the ſight of his helme, as depe as it was when they were ſeuere. The Baſtarde heeryng this iudgement, doubted much the ſequele, if hee ſhould ſo proceede againe, wherefore he was contented to relinquiſhe his chalenge, rather then to abyde the hazarde of his diſhonour. Other Chalenges were done, and valiauntlye atchieued by the Engliſhe men, which I paſſe ouer. When all theſe couragious actes were thus wyth ioye accomplyſhed, ſorowfull tidynges were brought to the Baſtard, that Duke Philip his father was paſſed this tranſitorie lyfe, of which tidynges he was not a little ſorowfull, and therevpon takyng hys leaue of king Edward and his ſiſter, the newe Duches of Burgoyne, liberally rewarded with Plate and Jewelles, with all celeritie he returned to the newe Duke Charles his Nephew, accompting to him what exployt he had made in his Ambaſſade & meſſage, which anſwere was to the great contentacion and accompliſhement of the deſyre of the ſayde Duke, and thereof moſt hartily thanked the Lady for her conſent, as for the thing that he moſt deſyred, not forgettyng to gratifie king Edward for his preferment and furtheraunce in his louyng requeſt.

Now to returne to Charles Duke of Burgoyn, which with great victory, and triumph, returned from the conqueſt of the land of Luke to Bruſeles, he not forgetting the contract, which his baſtard brother the Lorde Anthony had made in his name, wyth the noble Princeſſe Lady Margaret, ſiſter to Edwarde King of Englande, deuiſed alwayes howe he might with all honor and royalty, haue her receyued into his countrey. And firſt he wrote to the king of Englande, to ſende her ouer the ſea with all dilygence, accordyng to the pact and league betwene them concluded, which being nothing ſlacke, and eſpecially in ſuch a cauſe, as ſo highly magnifyed his blood, prepared ſhippes and all things neceſſarye, for the honorable conduite of her and her company, and ſo accompanied with the Dukes of Exceſter, and Southfolke, and their wifes, being both her ſiſters, and a great company of Lords, and Ladies, and other to the number of fiue hundred horſſes, and in the beginnyng of June departed out of London to Douer, and ſo ſayled to Sclute, where ſhee and her company were receyued, and from thence conueyed to Bruges, where mariage was celebrate and Solempnized. 1467 7

After the departure of this Lady Margaret. Sir Thomas Cooke late Mayor of London, which before had bene accuſed of treaſon by a ſeruaunt of the Lorde Wenlockes, called hawkins, and at the requeſt of the ſaide Ladye Margaret, was ſuffered vpon ſuretie to go at large, was nowe areſted, and ſent to the Tower, and his goods ſeaſed by the Lorde Riuers, then treaſorer of Englande, and his wife put out of his houſe, and ſhe was committed to the charge of the Mayor, where ſhe laye a great while after. And after the sayde syr Thomas was brought from the Tower to the Guildhall and there arreigned of treason, and was quit by sondry enquestes, and yet after was committed to the Counter in Bredstrete, and from thence to the kings bench in Southwarke, where he lay vntill his friendes did agree with Sir John Brandon, then keper of the sayde prison, to take him home to his place, where to his great charge he remayned prisoner long after. In which time he lost great riches, and two places, the one in the country, the other in London, besides a great value of Jewelles, Plate, and money, with sondry riche merchaundises, as cloth of Gold, Syluer, Veluet, Satten, and other silkes. And finally after many persecutions, and losses, he was compelled by a fyne set vpon him for misprision of treason to paye vnto the king eyght thousande pounde, and so set a large. But shortly after he was newlye troubled by the Queene, who demaunded of him of euery thousande pounde that he paide to the king for his fine, one hundreth marke that was due to her, for the which he was compelled also to agree, to his exceeding charges, beside his great and long veracion.

But now let vs returne to the Historye of the Erle of Warwicke, who at his returne from beyonde the sea, for the continuall grudge that lurked in his stomacke, towarde king Edwarde, ye must thinke that of very necessitye it would at length eyther burst the vessell, and by some meanes issue out, as it did now euen at this tyme: he beyng at his towne of Warwicke, accompanied with his two brethren the Marques Mountacute, and the Archebishop of Yorke, framed communication to make them mery and to passe foorth the time two or three dayes, at the last hauyng occasion to speake of the king and his doings and procedings, he then first moued and excited them by all waies possible to helpe and ayde, and to restore king Henry the first, to the Crowne and royall dignitie againe.

And after the Erle of Warwicke had vttered a number of flattering and glosing wordes, the Archebishop consented vnto him, but the Lorde Marques could by no meanes be reduced to take any part against king Edwarde, till the Erle had both promised him great rewardes and high promocions, and also assured him of the ayde, and power of the greatest Princes of the Realme. Euen as the Marques vnwillingly, and in maner constrayned, gaue his consent, to this vnhappy coniuration, at the intisement and procuring of the Erle, so wyth a faynt harte, and lesse courage, he alwayes shewed himselfe enemy to king Edwarde, except in his last day: which luke warme hearte, and double dissimulation, was both the destruction of him, and hys brethren. The Erle of Warwicke beyng a man of a great wit, farre castyng and many things foreseing, eyther perceyued by other, or had perfite knowledge of himselfe, that the Duke of Clarence, bare not the best will to kyng Edward his brother, (as he did not in deede) thought first to proue him a far off, as it were in a probleme, and after to open to him (if he saw him flexible to his purpose) the secret imaginations of his stomake: thinkyng that if he might by pollicie, or promise, allure the Duke to his partie, that king Edward should be destitute, of one of his best Hawkes, when he had most neede to make a flight. So at tyme and place conuenient, the Erle began to complayne to the Duke, of the ingratitude and doublenesse of king Edward, saiyng that he had neither handled him like a friend, nor kept promise with him,

according as the estate of a Prince required. The Erle had not halfe tolde his tale, but the Duke in a great fury answered, why my Lorde, thinke you to haue him kind to you, that is vnkind, yea, and vnnaturall to me beyng his owne brother, thinke you that friendship will make him keepe promise where neyther nature nor kindred, in any wise can prouoke, or moue him, to fauour his owne bloode? Thinke you that he will exalte and promote his Cosin or Allie, which little careth for the fall or confusion, of his owne line and lynage? This you know well enough, that the heyre of the Lorde Scales he hath maried to his wiues brother, the heyre also of the Lorde Bonuile and Harrington, he hath geuen to his wiues sonne, & the heire of the Lord Hungerford, he hath graunted to the Lord Hastings: three mariages more meter for his two brethren and kynne, then for such new foundlings, as he hath bestowed them on. But by sweete Saint George I sweare, if my brother of Gloucester wouldе ioyne with me, we wouldе make him knowe, that wee were all three one mans sonnes, of one mother, and one linage discended which shouldе be more preferred and promoted, then straunges of his wyfes bloode.

When the Erle of Warwicke had harde the Dukes wordes, he had that which he both sore thursted, and lusted for, and then began boldly to disclose to the Duke, his intent and purpose, euen at the full, requiring him to take parte with him, and to be one of the attempted confederacy. And least the Duke might thinke, that the matter was lightly, and vncircumspectly begun, he declared to him, how warily, howe secretly, how speedilye all things concerning this purpose, had beene compassed, studied, and foreseene, requiring him in so great, and vrgent a cause both to take paine and trauayle, and also to study with all circumspection and foreseyng, how these things thus begun might be brought to a certayne and finall conclusion. And the rather to woyn the Dukes hart, the Erle beside diuers and manye fayre promises made to the Duke, offered hym his eldest daughter (beyng of ripe age, and elegant stature) in mariage with the halfedele of his wiues inheritaunce. The Duke at the perswasion and request of the Erle, promised to doe all thinges which he wouldе or coulde, in any manner require, or desyre. After that the Duke and the Erle had long consulted, conceiuyng their straunge and daungerous affayres, they fyrst determined to sayle to Calice, of the which towne the Erle was chiefe captaine, where his wife and two daughters then soiorned, whome to visite, the Duke of Clarence beyng in amoures had no small affection. But the Erle continually remembryng the purpose that he was set on, thought to begyn and set forwarde the same, before his departure: wherefore he appointed his brethren the Archbishop, and the Marques that they shouldе by some meane in his absence, stirre vp some newe Commotion or Rebellion, in the Countie of Yorke, and other places, nere thereabouts, so that this ciuill warre should seeme to all men, to haue begun without hys assent or knowledge, he being in the partes beyonde the Sea.

When all these thinges were thus determined, and in graue counsaile allowed, the Erle and the Duke sayled directly to Calice, where they were solempnlye receyued, and ioyfullye interteyned of the Countesse, and of her two daughters. And after that the Duke had sworne on the Sacrament to kepe his promise and pact inuiolate, made and concluded with the Erle of Warwike, he maried the Ladie Isabel, eldest daughter to the sayde Erle, in our Ladie Church at Calice, with great pompe & solempnity. After which mariage so solemnized, the Duke & the Erle consulted sadly together, by what meanes they should continue the warre, (which as it was by them appoynted) was quickly and within fewe dayes begon in Yorkeshire, not without great rumor and disturbance, of all quietnesse in that Countrie.

A comotion.

The mother of this pernicious commocion, was vncharitie, or very impietie, for there was in the Citie of Yorke, an olde and a riche Hospitall, dedicated vnto saint Leonard, in the which Almosehouse the poore and indigent people were harbored and refreshed, and the sick and impotent persons were comforted and healed. For this good purpose and charitable intent, all the whole prouince of Yorke, gaue yerely to this Hospitall certeine measures of corne, in maner as an oblacion of the first fruites of their newe grayne, thinkyng theyr gyft geuen to so good a place, and for so good a purpose, should be to them meritorious, and before God acceptable. Certaine euill disposed persons, of the Erle of Warwikes faction, entendyng to set a broyle in the Countrie, perswaded a great number of husbandmen, to refuse and denie to geue any thing to the sayde Hospitall, affirmyng and saiyng, that the corne that was geuen to that good intent, was not expended on the poore people, but the Maister of the Hospitall ware riche with such almose, & his priestes ware fat, and the poore people lay leane without succor or comfort. And not content with these saiyngs, they fell to doyngs, for when the Proctors of the Hospitall, accordyng to theyr vsage went about the Countrie, to gather the accustomed corne, they were sore beaten, wounded, and very euill intreated. Good men lamented this vngodly demeanor, and the peruerse people much at it reioyced, and tooke such a courage, that they kept secret conuenticles, and priuie communications, insomuche that within fewe dayes, they had made such a confederacie together, that there were assembled to the number of. xx. thousand men, euen redie prest to set on the Citie of Yorke. When the fame of this commocion and great assemble, came to the eares of the Citizens of Yorke, they were first greatly abashed: but leauyng all feare asyde, they were in a great doubt and vncerteinty, whether it were best for them to issue out of theyr walles, and to geue battaile to the rebelles, or to keepe theyr Citie, and repulse the violence of theyr enemies, by the manfull defendyng of theyr walles and portes. But the Lorde Marques Mountacute, gouernor and president of that Countrie for the king, did shortly put the Citizens out of all feare and suspicion of inuasion, for he takyng spedie counsaile, considering the opportunitie of the tyme, with a small number of men, but well chosen, encountered the rebelles before the gates of Yorke: where after a long conflict, he tooke Robert Hylderne theyr Capitaine, and before them commaunded his heade there to be smitten off, and then he caused all his souldiors (because it was darke, to enter into the Citie of Yorke) and after theyr long labor to refreshe them.

Robert Hylderne a rebell beheaded.

Here is to be marueyled why the Marques thus put to death, the Captayne and ruler of the people, stirred and raysed vp by him, and the felowes of his coniuration and conspiracy. Some saye he did it to the intent, that he would seme fautlesse and innocent of all hys brothers doings and priuie imaginations: But other affirme and saye, that he for all his promise made to his brother, was then fully determined to take part with king Edwarde, with whome (as it shall after appere) he in small space entred into great grace and high fauour. The people beyng nothing abashed at the death of their Capitayne, but rather the more eger and fierce, by fayre and gentle speeche and craftie perswasions: founde the meanes to get to them Henry, sonne and heire to the Lorde Fitz Hugh, and Sir Henry Neuell, sonne and heire to the Lorde Latimer, the one being Nephew, and the other Cosyn Germaine to the Erle of Warwike. Although that these yong Gentlemen, bare the names of Capitaynes, yet they had a Tutor and gouernour called Sir John Conyers a man of suche courage and valiauntnesse, as fewe was in his dayes, in the North partes. And first considering that they could not get Yorke for want of ordinaunce and artilerie, which they did lack in deede, they determined with all speede to marche toward London, intending by the way to rayse suche a phantasie in the peoples hartes, that they should thinke that king Edwarde was neyther a iust Prince to God, nor profitable to the common welth of the realme.

Sir John Coniers a chiefe Capteyne of the rebelles.

When king Edward (to whome all the doings of the Erle of Warwike and the Duke his brother were manifest) was by diuers letters sent to hym, certefied that the great armie of the Northren men, were with al spede comming toward London. Therfore in great haste he sent to William Lord Herbert, whom within two yeres before, he had created Erle of Penbroke, that he should wythout delay encounter with the Northrenmen, with the extremitie of al his power. The Erle of Penbroke, commonly called the Lord Herbert, was not a little ioyous of the kings letters, partly to deserue the kings liberalitie, which of a meane gentleman, had promoted him to the estate of an Erle, partly for the malice that he bare to the Erle of Warwike, beyng the sole obstacle (as he thought) why he obteyned not the Wardship of the Lorde Bonuiles daughter and heire, for his eldest sonne. Wherupon he beyng accompanied with his brother Sir Richard Herbert, a valyaunt knight, and aboue fyre or seauen thousand Welshmen well furnished, marched forward to encounter with the Northren men. And to assist and furnish him with archers, was appointed Humffrey Lorde Stafforde of Southwike (named, but not created) Erle of Deuonshire, by the king in hope that he valyantly would serue him in that iorney, and with him he had eight hundred archers. When these two Lords were met at Cottishold, they made diligent inquiry to here where the Northren men were, and so by their espials they were asserteyned, that they were passing towarde Northampton, wherupon the Lorde Stafforde, and Sir Richard Herbert with two thousand well horsed Welshmen, sayde: they would go bewe and see the demeanour and number of the Northren men, and so vnder a woodes side, they couertly espied them passe forward, and sodainely set on the rereward: but the Northren men with such agillitie so quickly turned about, that in a moment of an houre the Welshmen were cleane discomfited and scattered, and many taken, and the remnaunt returned to the armie with small gaine.

King Edward being nothing abashed of thys small chaunce, sent good wordes to the Erle of Penbroke, encouragyng and bydding hym to be of good chere, promising him not al only ayde in short time, but also he himselfe in person royall, would folow him with all his puyssaunce and power. The Yorkeſhire men beyng glad of this ſmall victory, were well cooled and went no farther Southward, but tooke there way toward Warwike, looking for ayde of the Erle, which was lately come from Caleis, with the Duke of Clarence his ſonne in lawe, and was gathering and rayſing of men, to ſuccour his friends and kinſfolke. The king likewiſe aſſembled people on euerie ſide, to ayde and aſſiſt the Erle of Penbroke and his company. But before or any part receyued comfort or ſuccour, from his friend or partaker, both the armies met by chaunce, in a fayre playne, nere to a towne called Hedgecot, three myle from Banbery, wherein be three hils, not in equall diſtaunce, nor yet in equall quantitie, but lyng in maner, although not fully triangle: the Welſhmen gat firſt the Weſt hill, hoping to haue recouered the Eaſt hill: which if they had obteyned, the victorie had bene theirs, as their vnwiſe prophesiers promiſed them before. The Northren men incamped themſelues on the South hill. The Erle of Penbroke and the Lorde Staffordе of Southwike, were lodged at Banbery the day before ꝑ field, which was S. Iames day, and there the Erle of Penbroke, put the Lord Stafford out of an Inne wherein he delighted much to be, for the loue of a damoſell that dwelled in the houſe: contrarie to their mutuall agreement by them taken, which was, that whoſoeuer obteyned firſt a lodging, ſhould not be deceyued nor remoued. After many great wordes and crakes, had betweene theſe two Cappytaynes, the Lorde Staffordе of Southwyke, in great deſpite departed with his whole company and band of archers, leauing the Erle of Penbroke almoſt deſolate in the towne, which with all diligence returned to hys hoſte, lyeng in the field vnpurueyed of archers, abiding ſuch fortune as God would ſende and prouyde. Sir Henry Neuell ſonne to the Lorde Latimer, tooke with him certaine light horſemen, and ſkirmiſhed with the Welſhmen in the euening, euen before their campe, where he did diuers valyaunt feates of armes, but a little to hardy, he went ſo farre forward that he was taken & yeelded, and yet cruelly ſlayne: which vnmercifull act, the Welſhmen ſore rued the next day or night. For the Northren men being inflamed and not a little diſcontented, with the death of thys noble man, in the morning valyauntly ſet on the Welſhmen, and by force of archers cauſed them quickly to deſende the hill into the valey, where both the hoſtes fought. The Erle of Penbroke behaued himſelfe like a hardy Knight, and an expert Capitaine, but his brother ſyr Richard Herbert ſo valiauntly acquited himſelfe, that with his Pollax in his hande (as his enemies did afterward report) he twiſe by fine force paſſed through the battaile of his aduerſaries, & without any mortall wound returned. If euery one of his felowes and companions in armes, had done but halfe the actes, which he that day by his noble prowes achiued, the Northren men had obteyned neyther ſafetie nor victorie.

Banbery field.

Beſide this, beholde the mutabilitie of fortune, When the Welſhemen were at the very poynt, to haue obteyned the victorie (the Northren men beyng in maner diſcomfited) John Clappam Eſquire, ſeruaunt to the Erle of Warwike, mounted by the ſyde of the Eaſt hill, accompanied onely with fiue C. men gathered of all the raſcall of the towne of Northampton & other Villages about, hauyng borne before them the ſtandard of the Erle, with the white Beare, cryng a Warwike a Warwike. The Welſhmen thinking that the Erle of Warwike had come on them with all his puyſſaunce, ſodainly as men amased fled: the Northren men them pursued and slue without mercy, for the cruelties that they had shewed to the Lorde Latymers sonne. So that of the Welshemen there were slaine aboue fiue thousand, besyde them that were fled and taken.

men

A great slaughter of Welshemen.

The Erle of Penbroke, syr Richard Harbert his brother, and diuers Gentlemen were taken, and brought to Banbery to be behedded, much lamentacion, and no lesse entreatie was made to saue the lyfe of Syr Richard Herbert, both for his goodly personage, which excelled all men there, and also for the noble chiualrie, that he had shewed in the fieldes the day of the battaile, insomuch that his brother the Erle, when he should lay downe his head on the blocke to suffer, sayde to sir John Coniers, and Clappam: Maisters, let me die, for I am olde, but saue my brother, which is yong, lustie, and hardie, mete and apt to serue the greatest prince of Christendome. But syr John Coniers and Clappam, remembryng the death of the yong knight syr Henry Neuell, cosyn to the Erle of Warwike, could not heare on that syde but caused the Erle and his brother, with diuers other Gentlemen, to the number of ten, to be there behedded. The Northamptonshyre men, with diuers of the Northren men by them procured, in this fury made them a Capitaine, and called him Robin of Riddisdale, and sodainly came to the mannor of Grafton, where the Erle Riuers, father to the Queene then lay, whome they loued not, and there by force toke the sayd Erle, and syr John his sonne, and brought them to Northampton, and there without iudgement stroke off theyr heddes, whose bodies were solempnly interred in the blacke Friers at Northampton. When king Edward was aduertised of these vnfortunate chaunces, he wrote in al haste to the Shyriefes of Sommersetshyre, and Deuonshyre, that if they could by any meane take the Lord Stafford of Southwike, that they vpon paine of theyr lyues, shoulde without delay put him in execution, which accordyngly to the kinges commaundement, after long inquirie and serche made, found him hid in a village in Brentmarche, called where he was taken and brought to Bridgewater, and there cut shorter by the head. This was the order, maner, and ende of Hedgecot field, commonly called Banberie fielde, foughten the morow after Saint James day, in the. viij. yere of king Edwarde the fourth, the which battaile euer synce hath bene, and yet is a continual grudge betwene the Northren men, and the Welshemen. After this battaile the Northren men resorted towarde Warwike, where the Erle had gathered a great multitude of people, which Erle gaue high commendacions to syr John Coniers, and other Capitaines of the North much reioysyng, that they had obteyned so glorious a victory, requiryng them to continue as they had begon. The king likewise sore thyrstyng to recouer his losse late susteyned, and desyrous to bee reuenged of the deathes and murders of his Lordes and friendes, marched toward Warwike with a great armie, and euer as he went forward his company encreased, because he commaunded it to be noysed and published to the common people, that his onely intent was to destroy, and vtterly to confound the vnhappy stock of such pernicious persons as would disturbe and bring in thraldome, the quiet commons and peaceable people. The Erle of Warwike had by his espials perfect knowledge how the king with his armie was bent toward him, and sent in all haste possible to the Duke of Clarence (which was not farre from him with a great power) requiryng him that both their hostes might ioyne in one, for as farre as he could imagine, the tyme of battail was very neere. The Duke heeryng these newes, in good order of battaile, came and incamped himselfe with the Erles host. When all things were redie prepared to fight: by the meanes of friends, a meane was found how to common of peace, for the which letters were written from eche parte to the other, declaryng their griefes and the very bottomes of theyr stomackes: Heraldes spared no horsefleshe in ridyng betwene the king and the Erle, nor in returnyng from the Erle to the king: The king conceiuyng a certeine hope of peace in his owne imagination, toke both lesse heede to himselfe, and also lesse feared the outward attemptes of his enemies, thinkyng, and trustyng truely that all things were at a good poynt, and should be well pacifyed. All the kinges doyngs were by espyals declared to the Erle of Warwike, which like a wise and pollitique Capitaine entendyng not to leese so great an aduauntage to him geuen, but trustyng to bring all his purposes to a finall ende and determination, by onely obteinyng this enterprise: in the dead of the night, with a chosen companie of men of warre, as secretly as was possible set on the kinges fielde, killyng them that kept the watche, and or the king were ware (for he thought of nothing lesse then of that chaunce that happened) at a place called Wolney, foure mile from Warwike, he was taken prisoner, and brought to the Castell of Warwike. And to the entent that the kinges friendes might not knowe where he was, nor what was chaunced of him, he caused him by secrete iourneys in the night to be conueyed to Middelham Castell in Yorkeshire, and there to be kept vnder the custodie of the Archebishop of Yorke his brother, and other his trustie friendes, which enterteyned the king, like his estate, and serued him like a Prince. But there was no place so far off, but that the takyng of the king was shortly knowen, which newes made many men to feare, and greatly to dread, and many to wonder and lament the chaunce.

King Edwarde the fourth taken prisoner by the Erle of Warwike.

King Edward beyng thus in captiuitie, spake euer fayre to the Archebishop, and to the other kepers (but whether he corrupted them with money or fayre promises) he had libertie diuers dayes to go on huntyng, and one day, on a plain there met with him syr William Stanley, syr Thomas of Borough and diuers other of his friendes, with such a great band of men, that neither his kepers would, nor once durst moue him to returne to prison againe.

King Edwarde scapeth out of prison.

Thus as you haue heard was king Edward deliuered: Some say that he was set at large by the Erles consent and commaundement, as who say I had him in my keeping, and might haue destroyed him, but yet of mine owne freewill and gentlenesse, without pact or raunsome, I am contented to set him at libertie and to deliuer him. This doing might seeme to be some countenaunce of truth, if the Erle after this had left of from prosecuting the warre by him newlye begon: But for a truth this good chaunce hapned to king Edward, by the yll luck of king Henry, for surely by this yll fortune a man may plainely coniecture, that the extreme poynt of decay of his house and estate was apparauntly at hande, consydering that neyther by mannes pollicie, nor by worldly riches his vnhappie predestinate chaunce could not be put by, such was Gods pleasure, for if you consider how that the Erle of Warwike and his friendes, onely to the intent to ayde, conserue and defend

king Henry the firſt haue diſpended their ſubſtances, aduentured their liues, and taken paynes intollerable, hauing a ſure determination, fixed in their mindes, that as long as king Edwarde lyued, that king Henryes faction ſhould neuer proſper, and yet now when he was by the Erle taken priſoner and in captiuitie, he by fortune eſcaped, or was wilfully deliuered. By thys you may plainely perceyue, that the luck of king Henry was infortunate, and that all that was done for him, and in his quarell, euer redouned to his miſfortune and detriment, euer noting thys, that when thinges contriued and imagined come to an vnlucky ſucceſſe, all the ſenſes of our bodyes are there by anger, feare, or madneſſe rauiſhed, & in maner diſtract from themſelues. But to returne to the purpoſe.

When king Edward had eſcaped the handes of his enemies, he went ſtraight to Yorke, where he was with great honor receyued of the Citezens and there taried two dayes to prepare ſome ſmall armie, to accompany him in his iorney, but when he perceyued that he could haue no hoſte meete and conuenient to paſſe to London, thorough the middeſt of his enemies (as he was appointed to doe) he returned from Yorke to Lancaſter, where he found the Lorde Haſtings his Chamberlayne well accompanied. He then with the ayde of the Lorde Haſtinges, and ſuch other as drewe to him, beyng well furniſhed, with ſpedy iorneys, came ſafe to his Citie of London.

When the Erle of Warwicke and the Duke of Clarence, had knowledge howe the king by treaſon of them that they put in truſt, was eſcaped their hands, and that in one moment of time, all their long ſtudies and forecaſtes were brought to none effect or concluſion, they waxed angrie, and chafed without meaſure, & by and by calling together all their chiefe friends began to conſult agayne of newe, and to enquire the ſtate of their enemies, to the intent that they might make a beginning of a new warre, which they coniectured to haue taken an ende when the king was brought into captiuitie. The mindes of theſe Princes were much ſatiſfied, and their courage greatly kindled, by reaſon that a great number of men hauing more pleaſure in diſcord then in concord, louing better ſtrife then vnitie, offered themſelues to begin newe warre of their awne deſire and requeſt. King Edward tooke euen lyke ſtudie for the warres as his enemies did, minding eyther to bring them to conformitie or reaſon, by dent of ſworde, or elſe by power of battaile vtterly to deſtroy and erſtirpate them and their affinitie, to the intent that all men might lead a more quiet lyfe, and liue in more ſafetie and reſt: for Churches and Temples were euery where robbed and ſpoiled, houſes burnt, and men ſlaine in euery place, all the realme was repleniſhed with blood, ſlaughter, ſorrow, and lamentation. Cornefields were deſtroyed, Cities & townes were made deſolate and languiſhed with famine and dearth, beſide many other things, which happen by the crueltie and furie of warre and rebellion. This tumult and trouble in the common wealth of thys realme ſore vexed and troubled many, but in eſpeciall the nobilitie much lamented and pitied the ſtate of the communalty, which with all diligence rode betwene the king, the Erle and the Duke to reconcile them eche to other, and exhorted them rather to deſerue the loue of all men, by keeping of peace and vnitie, then by fighting and vnnaturall warre to deſtroy the realme, and winne the hatred and malice of all the nation: The auctoritie firſt of the Nobilitie of the realme, realme, and secondarily their charitable motion, so mitigated the mindes, both of the king, the Duke and the Erle, that eche gaue fayth to other to go and come, safely without ieopardy. In which promise the Duke and the Erle hauing perfect trust and confidence, came both to London, accompanied with to small a number of men, in comparison to the great daunger that they were in. And at Westminster, the king, the Duke and the Erle had a long communication together, for some ende to be taken or made betweene them: But they fell at such great words with such imbrayding and casting in the teeth of olde benefites shewed, or of olde vnthankfulnesse receyued, that in a great furie, without any conclusion they departed, the king to Canterburie, and the Duke and the Erle to Warwike, where the Erle of Warwike prepared a newe hoste to ryse in Lyncolnshire, and made thereof Capitaine Syr Robert Welles, sonne to Richard Lorde Welles, an expert man in armes, and very pollitique in warre.

These newes sodainely brought to the king, did not a little vexe and tickle hym, because he euer feruently hoped that his aduersaries woulde rather come to some honest conditions of concorde, then so rashly and so sodainely to renue the warre. And the more rumor that was spread (contrary to his expectation) of thys newe begon battayle, the sooner he gathered together an hoste for the resistance of the same, and out of hande he sent to Richarde Lorde Welles, wylling him vpon the sight of his letters with all haste to repayre vnto him, which oftentimes he had excused by sickenesse and debilitie of hys body. But when that excuse serued not, he thinking to purge hymselfe sufficiently before the kings presence, toke with him Sir Thomas Dymock, which had maried his sister, & so together came to London. When he was come vp, hys friendes certified hym that the king was with hym highly discontented. Wherefore for very feare, he with his brother in lawe tooke Sentuarie at Westminster, entending there to abide till the Princes pre were somewhat assuaged & mitigate. King Edward which thought to pacifie all thys busie tumult, without any farther bloudshed, promysing both those persons their pardons, caused them vpon his promise to come out of Sentuary to his presence, and calling to him the Lord Welles, wylled him to write to Syr Robert his sonne to leaue of the warre, and not to take the Erles parte. And in the meane season, he with his armie went forward toward his enemies, hauing with him the Lorde Welles, and Syr Thomas Dymock, and being not paste two dayes iorney from Stamford, where his enemies had pitched their fielde, had perfect knowledge that Syr Robert Welles nothing mooued with hys fathers letters, still kept his campe, abyding the king and his power. The king hauing high indignation at his presumption, and minding to be reuenged in parte, contrary to his fayth and promise caused the Lorde Welles, father to the sayde Sir Robert, and syr Thomas Dymock, to be beheded there, to the terrible example of other, which shall put their confidence in the promise of a Prince. When syr Robert Welles harde that the king dyd so here, and that hys father and syr Thomas Dymock were beheded, he stode first in a great perplexitie, studying whether he should geue battayle or no, because it was both perillous and doubtfull to fight with so great an armie, before the Erle of Warwike with hys power were assembled, but yet hauing a yong and a lustie courage, and with manly manly boldneſſe ſtirred and pricked forward, he ſet on his enemies.

The battayle was ſore fought on both partes, and many a man ſlayne, and in concluſion, whyle Syr Robert was exhorting and prouoking his men to tarie, which were in maner diſcomfited, and readie to flye, he was enuyron-ned and beſet about wyth his enemies, and ſo was taken, and with him ſyr Thomas Delaund knight, and many mo. After hys taking, the Lyncoln-ſhire men amaſed, threwe away their coates, the lighter to runne away and flye, and therefore thys battayle is yet there called Loſcote field. The king glad of this victorie, commaunded out of hand ſyr Robert Welles and diuers other, to be put to execution in the ſame place. The ſame was, that at thys battayle were ſlaine ten thouſand men at the leaſt. Loſcots field.

The Erle of Warwike lay at this tyme at his Caſtell of Warwike, and was commyng with a houge hoſt the nert day towarde his armie in Lyn-colneſhire, but when he harde ſay that they had fought ſoner then he thought eyther they could or would, and that his partie was ouerthrowne and van-quiſhed: Although he might nowe be diſcouraged, yet he thought it neceſſa-rie to diſſimule the caſe, becauſe oftentymes in battaile, vaine thinges be re-garded before true, and to the entent to comfort certaine of his companie (be-yng in diſpayre and redie to flie) both in word and dede, he gathered together and prepared a new hoſte, and with all the ſtudie and induſtrie that he could practiſe or vſe, he imagined how to compaſſe Thomas Lord Stanley, which had maried his ſiſter, that he might be one of the confederacie and conura-tion: which thing when he could not bring to paſſe, for the Lorde Stanley had aunſwered him plainely, that he would neuer make warre againſt king Edward, he thought to ſpend no lenger tyme in waſte, and miſtruſtyng that he was not able to meete with his enemies, he with the Duke of Clarence his ſonne in lawe, departed to Erceſter, and there tarying a fewe dayes, and perceyuing that all thinges lacked, which were apte and neceſſarie for the warre, determiend to ſayle to king Lewys the French king, to renewe the familier acquaintaunce, which he had wyth him, when he was there of Am-baſſade for the mariage of king Edward as you haue heard, hauyng a ſure confidence and hope, eyther to haue a great ayde of the French king, or elſe to incenſe him earneſtly to make battayle againſt king Edward. And reſting vpon thys opinion, they hyred ſhippes at Dartmouth in Deuonſhyre, well armed, and at all points trimmed and decked. And when wind and weather ſerued them, the Duke and the Erle with their wyues, and a great number of ſeruaunts plucked vp the ſayles, and toke their way firſt toward Caleys where the Erle of Warwike was chiefe Capitayne, and thought there to haue left hys wyfe and daughters, tyll he had returned out of Fraunce.

This ſodaine departyng of king Edwardes aduerſaries, did not onely bere and bite him at the very ſtomacke, but alſo did kindle and quicken him to looke the more diligently to his affayres and buſineſſe, and eſpecially, be-cauſe that the abſence of the Erle of Warwike, made the common people dai-ly more and more to long and be deſyrous to haue the ſight of him, and pre-ſently to beholde his perſonage. For they iudged that the Sunne was clere-ly taken from the world, when he was abſent: In ſuch highe eſtimacion a-mong the people, was his name, that neither no one man, they had in ſo much honor, neyther no one perſon they ſo much prayſed, or to the Clowdes ſo 1466 :9

highly extolled. What shall I say? His onely name sounded in euery song, in the mouth of the cõmon people, and his person was repzesented with great reuerẽce, when publique playes, oz open triumphes should be shewed, oz set fozth abzode in the stretes: which hartie fauoz, was the apparaunt occasion why his faction and companie within a fewe dayes, merueylously increased and augmented. Foz the which cause, the king was vexed with a double mischiefe, foz he doubted much, whome he should most feare of two, eyther the familiar enemies abydyng at home, oz the outwarde foes, lingryng beyond the sea: but chiefely he pzouided to withstand the Erle of Warwikes landing. And first he wzote to Charles Duke of Burgoyn, which had maried the Ladie Margaret his sister, to helpe that ỳ Erle noz his companie, should haue neyther ayde noz refuge in any part of his, noz his friendes territozies, oz Dominions. These tidyngs were ioyfull to the Duke of Burgoyn, as to him which (accozdyng to the olde pzouerbe) hated the Erle of Warwike, wozse then ỳ curre dog, oz serpent: partly, because he was the ouerthzower and confounder of the house of Lancaster, of the which the Erle was lineally discended, by the Duchesse his mother, partly because the Erle had suche high offices, and was so renowmed in Englande, that king Edwarde the Dukes bzother in lawe, might not do liberally all thinges in his Realme, as he himselfe would (which the Duke estemed to be a great bondage.) And partly, because the Erle withstood with all his power and might, the conclusion of the mariage, betwene the kinges sister and the sayd Duke: But the chiefe rancoz was, because the Erle of Warwike fauoured the French king, whom the Duke loued not, foz at his last beyng in Fraunce, he pzomised the French king to be friend to his friendes, and vtter enemie to his foes and aduersaryes. This rooted hatred, and cankard malice, which the Duke bare to the Erle, caused him to attempt mo displeasures, and to inuent mo mischiefes against the Erle, then eyther king Edward could imagin, oz was of the Duke requyzed, as you shall plainly perceyue, by the sequele of this Histozye.

Now let vs speake of the Erle of Warwikes doynges. The Erle as you haue heard befoze, sayled from Dartmouth towarde Calice, where he was Captaine generall, and with a pzosperous winde came befoze the towne, in which fozstresse was deputie foz the Erle, the Lozde Vawclere a Gascoyne, besyde dyuers of the Erle of Warwikes seruauntes, which bare great offices and auctho̊zities in the towne. This Vawclere, whether he did it by dissimulacion, oz bearyng his good minde to king Edward (as by the sequele hereof I doubt whether he did oz no) In steede of receiuyng of his maister with triumphe, he bent and discharged agaynst him, diuers peeces of ozdinaunce, sendyng him wozde, that he should there take no lande. This nauye thus lyng befoze Calice at anker, the Duches of Clarence was there delyuered of a fayze sonne, which childe the Erles Deputie vnneth would suffer to be chzistened within the towne, noz without great entreatie, would permit two wagons of wine to be conueyed abozde to the Ladies lyng in the hauen. This was a great rygoz and extremitie, foz the seruant to vse against the maister, oz the inferioz to vse agaynst the superioz, foz the Erle hoped, and nothing lesse mistrusted, then to be assured and purueyed in that place: But he was faine to keepe the Seas, without comfozt oz ayde of any of his seruauntes.

uauntes. The king of England was quickly aduertiſed of the refuſall that Monſire de Uawclere made to his Capitaine the Erle of Warwike, which manfull doyng, ſo much pleaſed the king, that incontinent he made him chiefe Captain of ỹ towne of Calice, by his letters patents, which were ſent to him out of hand, and therof diſcharged clerely the Erle, as a traytor, and a rebell. Duke Charles of Burgoyne, lyng at Saint Homers (which would nedes haue an owre in the Erle of Warwikes boate) beyng aduertiſed alſo of Mõſire de Uawcleres refuſall made of his maiſter, ſent to him his truſtie ſeruaunt, Philip de Comines (which wrote all theſe doynges in a Chronicle) and gaue to him yerely a thouſande Crownes in pencion, (a ſmall reward God wote, for ſo high a ſeruice, as vntruely to kepe his maiſter from his office) praiyng and requiryng him, to continue in truth and fidelitie towarde king Edwarde, as he had ſhewed and begon. The Meſſenger found him ſo towarde, and of ſuch conformitie, that he was content to ſwere in his preſence, truely to take king Edwardes part agaynſt all men, and onely to his vſe to keepe and defend the ſtrong towne of Calice. But the ſayde Philip de Commines ſore miſtruſted Monſire de Uawclere, becauſe he ſent worde to the Erle of Warwike priuily, lyng at Whitſandbay, ỹ if he landed he ſhould be taken and loſt, for all England (as he ſayde) tooke part againſt him, the Duke of Burgoyne and all the Inhabitantes of the towne, were his enemyes, the Lord Duras the kinges Marſhall, and all the retinue of the garriſon were his aduerſaryes: ſo that for a finall concluſion, his only ſauegard and comfort, were to withdrawe him and his companie into Fraunce, where he knewe he ſhould be highly receyued, and better welcomed, and as for the towne of Calice, he ſhould take no thought, for the ſayde Monſire de Uawclere promiſed thereof to make him a good reconyng, when time and opportunitie ſhould ſerue. This counſaile was profitable to the Erle of Warwike, but not to the king of England, and leſſe pleaſant to the Duke of Burgoyn: which Princes might very well thinke both the office of the Capitainſhip of Calice, and the pencion of the thouſand Crownes (if it were payed) on ſuch a deepe diſſembler, to be euill employed.

Philip Comines the writter of this Hiſtorie.

The Erle of Warwicke as he was both before his departure oute of Englande, determined, and alſo now by Monſire de Uawclere, newly counſayled and aduiſed, with his nauie ſayled towarde Normandye, and in the meane way, robbed, ſpoyled, and toke many riche ſhips of the Duke of Burgoyns countries, (which ſore netteled the Duke, and cauſed him to prepare a ſtrong, and a great armie on the ſea, to take the Erle priſoner, as he returned homewarde) and at the laſt with all his nauie, and ſpoyle, he tooke lande at Deepe in Normandye, where the gouernor of the countrey for the French king, friendly welcomed him, and louingly entertayned him, certifiyng king Lewys of his landing and arriuall.

King Lewys a great ſeaſon before, had ſo much maruayled at the publique fame, and common renoume, of the noble actes, and high prowes, of the Erle of Warwicke, and he thought nothing might more pleaſauntly happen, or chaunce towarde him, then to haue a cauſe, or occaſion to hym miniſtered, whereby he might doe the Erle ſome profite or pleaſure. Which long luſt according to his deſire, was nowe lykely to take effect, to his contentation, and the Erles great commodity: wherefore beyng ioyous of his landyng in

Fraunce, he sent vnto him certayne Princes, which declared to him on the kings behalfe, that as the king had long tyme sought wayes, and meanes, howe to doe him pleasure, ayde, and comfort: So seyng that nowe the tyme was come, that the Erle had necessitie of all those things, he assured hym that he would neyther forget him, nor yet desist to doe for him anye thing, which might be consonant to his request and friendly desire, requiring him with the Duke his sonne in law, to take paine to come to his Castell of Amboys, set on the Riuer of Leyre, affirming that they should neither lose their labor, nor thinke their iorney to haue euill successe in the conclusion.

When Duke Charles knewe that the Erle was landed in Normandy, he sent in all haste a Post to King Lewys, with whome he was then ioyned in a league, requiring him neyther to helpe with men nor money, the Erle of Warwicke, nor the Duke of Clarence, open enemies to King Edwarde, his fellow, friend, and brother in lawe, and his perpetuall alye, and trusty confederate, adding therto sharpe words, and threates, if he woulde in any case, be to them a refuge or succor.

The French king did not only contempne his prowd wordes, and laughed at his threatnyng, and bolde braggyng, but soberly aunswered, that without breaking of any league, or treatie, he lawfully might and woulde helpe his friendes: Of which number, he affirmed the Erle of Warwicke to bee one, which thing if he did, he sayde, it shoulde be neyther cost, charge, nor burthen to the Duke of one blancke. When the Duke had certifyed the king of Englande of this aunswere, he was sodainely in a dompe, and began earnestly, to imagyne and consyder who were his friendes, and who were his foes, apprehended some, whom he thought guiltie, and began with them to question, who were friendes to his enemyes, and of their coniuration (which was the occasion that many fearyng themselues, fled vnto Sanctuary) and manye trustyng the kinges pardon, submitted and yeelded themselues to the kings clemency. Amongst whome, John Marques Montacute, humbly yeelded himselfe, and vowed to be euer true to the kyng (as he had done before tyme) whome he with much humanity and fayre wordes, did receiue and entertaine, to the intent to draw and allure the hartes of other men, to ioyne and knit with him, against all hostility and vtter enemies.

Whyle these things were thus treated in Englande, the Erle of Warwicke and the Duke of Clarence, rode wyth great pompe toward Amboyse, where the Frenche king laye, and by the way, the people gathered together, and in great number flocked, to see and beholde, the person and visage of hym of whose valiaunt actes, and wonderfull doynges, their eares had manye times bene fylled and replenished. When he came to the kings presence, hee was with all kindnesse of curtesie and humanity receyued and welcomed. To whome by long tract of tyme, he declared the causes, and considerations of his commyng into Fraunce. King Lewys aswell hauing nowe delectation, with the presence of his friende, as he was accustomed to reioyce and be ioyous, when he hard eyther laude or prayse of him in his absence, promised him hys power, his ryches, and all things that he might, or coulde doe, to helpe hym in his trouble, and to refresh him in his aduersitie.

When Queene Margaret, which soiorned with Duke Reyner her father, called king of Sicile. &c. Harde tell of the Erle of Warwicke and the

Duke

Duke of Clarence, had abandoned Englande, and were come to the French Court, hoping of newe comfort, with all diligence came to Amboyse, wyth her onely sonne Prince Edwarde, and with her, came Jasper Erle of Penbrooke, & John Erle of Oxenforde, which after diuers long imprisonments, lately escaped, fledde out of Englande into Fraunce, and came by fortune to this assemble. After that they had long commoned, and debated diuers matters, concerning their suretie and wealth, they determined by meane of the french king, to conclude a league and a treatie betwene them. And first to begyn with all, for the more sure foundacion of the new amitie, Edward prince of Wales, wedded Anne seconde daughter to the Erle of Warwicke, which Lady came with her mother into Fraunce. This mariage semed very straunge to wisemen, considering that the Erle of warwicke, had first disherited the father, and then to cause his sonne to mary wyth one of his daughters, whose syster the Duke of Clarence before had maried, which was euer extreme enemye to the house of Lancaster: wherevpon they deuined that the mariage of the Prince, shoulde euer be a blot in the Dukes eie, or the mariage of the Duke, a mote in the eye of the Prince, eche of them lookyng to be exalted, when the Erle on him smyled, and eche of them againe thinking to be ouerthrowne, when the Erle of him lowred. After this mariage, the Duke & the Erle toke a solempne othe, that they should neuer leaue the warre, vntill such tyme as king Henry the first, or the Prince his sonne, were restored to the full possession and Diademe of the realme, and that the Queene and the Prince, should depute and appoynt the Duke and the Erle, to be gouernors and conseruators, of the publique welth, till such tyme as the Prince were come to mans estate, and of habilitie, meete and conuenient, to take vpon him so high a charge, and so great a burden. There were many other condicyons concluded, which both reason, and the weightinesse of so great a businesse, required to be set forwarde.

Whyle these Lordes were thus in the French Courte, there landed at Calice a damosell, belonging to the Duches of Clarence, (as she sayd) which made Monsire de Vauclere beleue, that she was sent from king Edwarde to the Erle of Warwicke, with a playne ouerture and declaracion of peace. Of the which tidyngs, Vauclere was very glad for the Erles sake, whome he thought (by this peace) to be restored to all his olde possessions, romes, and dignities. But he was sore by this damosell deceiued for her message (as it after proued) was the beginning of the Erles confusion. For she perswaded the Duke of Clarence, that it was neyther naturall, nor honorable to him eyther to condiscende or take parte against the house of Yorke, (of which he was lineally discended) and to set vp agayne the house of Lancastre, which linage of the house of Yorke, was not onely by the whole Parliament of the realme declared to be the very and indubitate heires of the kingdome, but also kyng Henry the first and his blood affirmed the same, and therevpon made a composicion, which of recorde appereth. Furthermore she declared, that the mariage of the Erles daughter with prince Edwarde, was for none other cause but to make the Prince king, and clerely to extinguish all the house of Yorke, of whome the Duke himselfe was one, and next heire to the Crowne, after his eldest brother, and his children. These reasons, and the mariage of the Prince to the Erles daughter, so sancke in the Dukes stomacke, that he promised mised at his returne, not to be so extreme an enemy to his brother, as he was taken for, which promise afterwarde he did not forget. With this aunswere the damosell departed into Englande, the Erle of Warwicke thereof beyng clerely ignorannt.

When the league was concluded (as you before haue heard) the French king lent them ships, money, and men, and that they might the surer sayle into Englande, he appointed the Bastard of Burgoyn Admirall of Fraunce with a great Nauie, to defend them agaynst the armie of the Duke of Burgoyne, which was stronger then both the French kings Nauie, or the English fleete. King Reyner did also help his daughter to hys small power, with men, and municions of warre. When this armie (which was not small) was gathered and come together to Harflete, at the mouth of the riuer of Seyne, abyding winde and weather. The Erle of Warwike receyued letters out of Englande, that men so much daylie and hourely desired and wished for hys arrynall and returne, that almost all men were in harnesse, looking for hys landing: wherefore he was requyred to make haste, yea, haste more then haste, although he brought no succor with hym. For he was farther assured, that assoone as he had once taken lande, there should meete him many thousandes (as after it prooued in deede) to doe him what seruice or pleasure they could or might: When the Erle had receyued these letters, he not a little regarding suche an offer, and so many great benefites to hym euen at hande apparauntly proffered, fully determined with the Duke, and the Erles of Orenford and Penbroke (because Queene Margaret and her sonne, were not fully yet furnished for suche a iorney) to go before with parte of the Nauie, and part of the armie, and to attempt the first brunt of fortune and chaunce, which if it well succeeded, then should Queene Margaret and her sonne, wyth the residue of the Nauie and people followe into Englande. The Erle of Warwike thinking this weightie matter, not worthy to be lingered, but to be applyed with all diligence possible, taking his leaue of the French king Lewys, geuing him no small thankes, both on the behalfe of king Henry, and also for his awne part, and so being dismissed, came where his Nauie laye at Anker, commaunding his men to go on ship borde, minding to take his course toward England.

The Duke of Burgoyne which was not content that the Erle of Warwike and hys company was succoured and ayded of the French king against his brother in lawe, king Edwarde of Englande, to withstande that armie, and to take the Erle of Warwike prisoner, if it were possible. He prepared suche a great Nauie, as lightly hath not bene sene before, gathered in maner of all Nations, which armie lay at the mouth of Seyne, readie to fight with the Erle of Warwike, when he should set out of his harborow.

See the worke of God, the same night before the Erle departed, there rose suche a sodayne winde and a terrible tempest, that the Dukes shippes were scattered one from another, some drowned, some weather driuen into Scotlande, so that two of them were not in companie together in one place. In the morning next following, the weather wared fayre, and the winde prosperous, wherevpon in hope of a bone voyage, the Erle and his company hoysed vp their sayle, and with good speede landed at Dartmouth in Deuonshire, from which place he passed into Fraunce, almost the first Moneth last past.

Before this time the Duke of Burgoyne Charles, which more hated the Erle of Warwike, and enuied his prosperie, then he loued king Edward, sauing for hys ayde that he trusted of in time of necessitie, wrote to King Edwarde, both of the doings of the Erle of Warwike in Fraunce, and of hys armie and power, & also certefied him by his trustie seruauntes of the place, where the Erle purposed with all is people to take lande, King Edwarde passed little on the matter, trusting to much to the moueable commons of hys Realme, and without any armye layde, eyther to kepe the Erle from landing, eyther to encounter with him at the first arriual, to the intent that his friends should not drawe in heapes to him for his strength, left all purueyaunce for defence alone, and rode on huntyng, hawking, and vsing all maner of pastimes, with Ladyes and Damosels, for his disport and solace that could be imagined or inuented. When the Erle of Warwike had taken land, he made a proclamation in the name of king Henry the first vpon high paynes, commaunding and charging all men apt, or able to beare armoure, to prepare themselues to fight agaynst Edward Duke of Yorke, which contrary to all right, iustice, and lawe, had vntruely vsurped the crowne and imperiall dignitie of this realme. It is almost incredible to thinke how sone the fame of the Erles landing was blowen ouer, thorow all the whole realme, and how many thousand men of warre, at the very first tydings of his landing, were sodainely assembled and set forwarde to welcome him. When he was thus, according to hys desire, fully furnished on euery side wyth his kindred and friendes, he tooke his way toward London, where he iudged and faythfully beleeued, to finde more open friends then priuie enemies.

When king Edward knew of the Erles landing, and of the great repayre of the people, that to him incessantly without intermission did resorte, he then began to thinke on hys businesse, and studied howe to finde a remedie for a mischiefe (but this was to late.) And first he wrote to the Duke of Burgoyne, requyring him to haue a vigylant eye to the sea, and so to see the streames kept and scoured with hys Nauie, that the Erle neyther shoulde nor might returne agayne into Fraunce, if he should be againe propulsed out of the realme. And as for the doings in England he bade let him alone, for he was both of puyssaunce and abilitie, sufficient to ouercome and defende al his enemies and rebels, wythin his awne realme and countrie. Thys saiyng little or nothing pleased the Duke of Burgoynes messengers, for they thought that it had beene much more profitable to king Edward to haue circumspectly forsene afore, and prouided to stop his landing, then now sodainly to abyde the fortune of battayle, which is euer doubtfull and vncertaine. King Edwarde accompanied wyth the Duke of Gloucester hys brother, the Lorde Hastings hys Chamberleyn, which had maried the Erles sister, and yet was euer true to the King hys Mayster, and the Lorde Scales brother to the Quene, sent out Curriers to all hys trustie friendes, for the furniture of able persons, meete for the warre & conuenient for the defence of his awne royall person, entending if he might by any pollicie, or subtill engine to circumuent or trap the Erle of Warwike, knowing perfitely that if he had once maistred the chiefe Belwether, the flock would sone be disperced.

Of them that were sent for, fewe in effect came, but the greatest heddes wincked and sayde they could not, but they ment they would not come. King

Edward beyng in perplexitie, and in diffidence of rayſyng any army, wyth ſuch truſtie friendes as he had departed into Lincolneſhire, conſultyng what was beſt to be done, but ſodainly or he was fully determined on any certaine purpoſe, newes were brought to him, that all the townes, and all the Countrie adiouyng was in great roze, and made fiers and ſang ſonges, cryng, King Henry, King Henry, a Warwike, a Warwike: King Edwarde was much abaſhed with theſe newe tidynges, and moze and moze his eſpials and Meſſengers declared and accompted to him, that all the Realme was by, and by open Proclamation commaunded to make warre againſt him, as enemy to king Henry and the Realme: wherefoze his neere friendes aduiſed and admoniſhed him to flie ouer the ſea to the Duke of Burgoyn, his brother in lawe, there to tary tyll God and foztune ſhoulde ſende him better lucke and chaunce, he beyng ſomewhat ruled by his counſail, but much moze quickned by hauyng knowlege, that ſome of the Erle of Warwikes power, was within halfe a dayes iourney, and leſſe of his tayle, with all haſt poſſible paſſed the waſhes (in greater ieopardie then it beſemed a Prince to be in) and came to the towne of Lynne, where he founde an Engliſh ſhip and two Hulkes of Holland redy (as foztune woulde) to make ſayle and take theyr iourney, wherebpon beyng in a maruaylous agonye, and doubtyng the mutabilitie of the townes men, takyng no farther leyſure foz his ſure ſuccoz and ſauegard, with his brother the Duke of Glouceſter, the Lozde Scales, and diuers other his truſtie friendes entred into the ſhip, without bagge or baggage, without cloth ſacke, or male, and perchaunce with a great purſſe and little treaſure, foz he noz his had no leyſure to prouide, accozdyng to their degrees and eſtates. Thus the king beyng accompanied with one ſmall ſhip of his awne, and two Hulkes, and. viij. oz. viij. hundzeth perſonnes with him hauyng no prouiſion, and but ſmall ſtoze of money, ſayled towarde Holland. At which time the Eaſterlynges were moztall enemies, aſwell to the Engliſhmen, as to the French nacion, and had done the laſt yeres paſt much preiudice and domage to the Engliſhe marchauntes, both in taking and ſpoilynge of Shippes.

And as the king with ſayle and ower was makyng his courſe as faſt as he could poſſible, the Eaſterlynges, which had many Shippes of warre on the ſea, him eſpyed (accozdyng to the olde prouerbe) one yll commeth neuer alone, and with. viij. oz. viij. gallant Shippes, began to chaſe the king and his companie. The kinges Ship was good with ſayle, and ſo much gat of the Eaſterlynges, that ſhe came on the coaſt of Holland, and ſo diſcended lower, before a towne in Holland called Alquemare, and there caſt Ancker as nere the Towne as was poſſible, becauſe they coulde not enter the Hauen at an ebbyng water. The Eaſterlynges alſo approched the Engliſhe ſhip as nere as their great ſhippes could come at the lowe water, entendyng at the flood to haue obteyned theyr pray, and ſo they were likely to do, if Monſire de Gronture, gouernour foz Duke Charles in Holland had not at that ſeaſon bene perſonally preſent in thoſe parties.

O what a miſerable chaunce and ſtraunge lucke was this to happen ſo ſodainly to a king, and in eſpeciall to ſuch a king, as by his awne valiantneſſe and prowelle had ouercome his foes, and deſtroyed his enempes in moze then fiue or ſixe great and moztall battayles. Firſt to be perſecuted, exiled, and erpulſed his awne Realme and kingdome, by his awne ſeruaunts, ſubiectes, and kinſmen. Secondarily, beyng deſtitute of all helpe and comfort, flyeng to his onely friend and brother in law Duke Charles, for refuge and ſuccor, to be chaſed on the ſea by his mortall enemyes and deadly foes, and like to be taken priſoner, and brought into captiuitie, which thing, if it had happened (as God would that it ſhould not) he had lien long vnraunſomed, (king Henry beyng reſtored to his priſtinate eſtate and dignitie royall) or elſe he had died priſoner in great wretchednelle and miſery. Theſe ſower ſawces he taſted as a penaunce for his wanton liuyng, and negligent ouerſeyng of thinges, that he might well haue foreſeene and preuented, but his minde was ſo geuen to paſtyme, daliaunce, and ſenſuall pleaſure, that he forgat the olde adage, ſaiyng in tyme of peace, prouide for war, and in the tyme of war, prouide for peace, which thing if he eyther had well remembred, or pollitikely prouided for, he had not bene chaſed and erpulſed his Realme within. xj. dayes as he was in deede.

and

King Edward thus liyng at Ancker in great feare of the Eaſterlynges, was by great chaunce comforted and relieued, or he wiſt howe, for the ſame tyme lay in the towne of Alquemare the Lorde Gronture, chiefe gouernour of Holland for Duke Charles of Burgoyne, which beyng incontinent aduertiſed of the kinges arriuall, and alſo of the great ieopardie that he was in, prohibited firſt the Eaſterlynges in no wiſe on paine of death, to intermit or meddle with any Engliſhe men, which were both the Dukes friendes and allyes: which commaundement ſo vexed and troubled the Eaſterlyngs, makyng ſure reconyng to haue had theyr pray and pryſe, a king, a Duke, dyuers Barons, and riche gentlemen, that they cryed out of God, rayled and curſſed the Duke and his officer, and in a rage hoyſed vp theyr ſayles, and without more expectacion of good lucke, departed home to theyr Countrey. The Lorde Gronture came aborde the ſhip where king Edward was, and him honourably ſaluted, and required him to come to lande, offryng him his ſeruice with all pleaſures that he coulde do or imagine to be done. The king him hartily thanked, and was well reuiued and comforted with his wordes, and ſo he with all his company were ſet on lande, and well refreſhed. The Lorde Gronture like a noble man, conſideryng in what poore eſtate and neceſſitie the king and his people were in, miniſtred to them abundantly all thinges conuenient and neceſſary, accordyng to euery mans eſtate and degree, at the Dukes charge and coſt. And after they had bene well refreſhed, and newly apparayled, he conducted them to the Hage, a riche towne in Holland where they arriued on the Churche holy day, not long after Michaelmaſſe. The Lord Gronture, of all this aduenture wrote to the Duke hys Mayſter, which thereat, was at the firſt ſo abaſhed and amaſed, to ſee the Erle of Warwike, whome he hated more then a Crocodile, to haue the vpper hande of his brother, that he had rather heard of king Edwardes death, then of his diſcomfiture, and in eſpecially by the Erle of Warwike, whom he more feared and diſdayned, then any one man liuyng, yet he willed the Lorde Gronture, to ſee him and his companie well entertayned at the Hage, tyll he ſent for them.

Now let all Engliſhe men conſider (as before is reherſed) what profite, what commoditie, & what helpe in diſtreſſe, the mariage of the Ladie Margaret, garet, king Edwardes wife, sister to the Duke Charles, did to him in hys extreeme necessitie: and but by that meane vncurable extremitie, for his allyes and confederates in Castell and Arragon, were to farre from him, either spedily to flie to, or shortly to come fro with any ayde or armie. The Frenche king was his extreeme enemie, and friend to king Henry, for whose cause, in the king of Scottes (for all the league betweene them) he did put little confidence and lesse trust. The Stedes and all Eastland were with him at open warre, and yet by this mariage, God prouided him a place to flie too, both for refuge and for relefe.

When the fame was spred of king Edwardes flyng, innumerable people resorted to the Erle of Warwike to take his part, but all king Edwardes trustie friendes went to diuers Sentuaryes, dayly lookyng and hourely harkenyng, to heere of his helth and prosperous returne, who afterward serued him manfully and truely. Amongest other, Queene Elizabeth his wife, almost desperate of all comfort, tooke Sentuarie at Westminster, and there in great penury forsaken of all her friendes, was deliuered of a faire sonne called Edwarde, which was with small pompe, like a poore mans childe christened and baptised, the Godfathers beyng the Abbot & Prior of Westminster, and the Godmother, the Ladie Scrope.

Prince Edward the son of king Edwarde the fourth, borne in the Sentuarie of Westminster.

The Kentishemen this season, whose wittes be euer moueable at the chaunge of Princes, came to the Suburbes of London, and spoyled houses, robbed berehouses, & by the counsaile of sir Geoffrey Gates, and other Sentuary men, they brake vp the kinges Benche, and deliuered prisoners, and at the last fell at Radclefe, Lynehouse, and saint Katheryns, to burnyng of houses, slaughter of people, and rauishyng of women: which small sparcle had growen to a great flame, if the Erle of Warwicke with a great power had not sodainly quenched it, and punished the offenders: which benefite by hym done, caused him much more to be praised and accepted among the Commons than he was before. When he had setled and put an order in all thinges, according as he thought most conuenient. Upon the, xii. day of October he rode to the Tower of London, which was to him without resistance deliuered, and there tooke king Henry the first out of the warde, where he before was kept, and brought him into the kinges lodgyng, and there was serued, according to his degree. And the. xxv. day of the sayd moneth, the Duke of Clarence accompanied with the Erles of Warwike, Shrewesbury, and the Lord Stanley, and other Lords and Gentlemen, some for feare, and some for loue, and some onely to gase at the wauerying worlde, resorted with a great companie to the Tower of London, and from thence with great pompe brought king Henry the first apparayled in a long Gowne of blewe Ueluet, through the high streetes of London, to the Cathedrall Churche of Saint Paule, the people on the right hande and on the left hande, reioisyng and cryng, God saue the king, as though all thing had succeeded as they would haue it, and when he had offered as kinges vse to do, he was conueyed to the pallace of the Bishop of London, and there kept his household like a king.

The Kentish men rebell.

King Henry the first thus againe recouerying (by the meanes onely of the Erle of Warwike) his Crowne and dignitie royall, began newely to reigne, likely within short space to fall againe, and to tast more of his accustomed captiuitie, and vsuall miserie. This ill chaunce and misfortune, by many mens mens opinions happened to him, because he was a man of no great wit, such as men commonly call an innocent man, neyther a foole, neyther very wise, whose studie alwayes was more to excell other, in Godly liuyng and vertuous example, then in worldly regiment, or temporall dominion, insomuche, that in comparison to the study and delectacion that he had to vertue and godlinesse, he little regarded, all worldly power and temporall aucthoritie: But his enemies ascribed all this to his cowarde stomack, affirmyng that he was a man apt to no purpose, nor meete for any enterprise, were it neuer so small: But whoso euer dispyseth or disprayseth, that which the comon people allow and maruayle at, is often taken of them for a mad and vndiscreete person, but notwithstanding the vulgar opinion, he that foloweth, & embraceth the contrary, doth proue both sad and wise (verifiyng Salomons Prouerbe) the wisedome of this worlde, is foolishenesse before God. Other there be that ascribe his infortunitie, only to the stroke and punishement of God, affirming that the Kingdome, which Henry the fourth his Grandfather wrongfully gat, and vniustly possessed agaynst king Richard the seconde and his heyres, could not by very deuine iustice, long continue in that iniurious stocke: And that therefore God by his diuine prouidence, punished the offence of the Grandfather, in the sonnes sonne.

A parliamẽt called by king Henry ỹ first wherein king Edwarde is declared a traytor.

When king Henry had thus obteyned agayne, the possession and dominion of the realme, he called his high Court of Parliament to beginne the .xxvj. day of November at Westminster, in the which king Edward was declared a Traytor to his Countrie, and vsurpor of the realme, because he had vniustly taken on him, the crowne and Scepter, and all hys goods were confiscate and adiudged forfayt: and lyke sentence was geuen agaynst all his partakers and friendes. And beside this, it was there enacted that extreme punishment should be done without delay ouer such persons, as for his his cause were taken or apprehended, and were eyther in captiuitie, or went at large vpon trust of their sureties, amongst whome Lorde John Typtoft, Erle of of Worcester Lieutenaunt for king Edward in Irelande, exercising there more extreme crueltie (as the fame went) then princely pittie, or charitable compassion, and in especiall on two infantes, beyng sonnes to the Erle of Desmond, was eyther for treason to hym layed or malice agaynst hym conceyued, atteynted and behedded. Beside thys, all estatutes made by king Edwarde were cleerely reuoked, abrogated, and made frustrate. The Crownes of the Realmes of Englande and Fraunce, was by the authoritie of the same Parliament entayled to king Henry the first, and the heyres Males of hys body lawfully begotten, and for default of such heyre Male of his body begotten, then the sayde crownes and dignities were entayled to George Duke of Clarence, and to the heyres Males of his body lawfully engendred, and farther the sayde Duke was by aucthoritie aforesayde enabled to be nert heyre to hys father, Richard Duke of Yorke, and to take by discent from hym all hys landes, dignities, and preheminences, as though he had bene his eldest sonne and heyre, at the time of his death. Jasper Erle of Penbroke, and John Erle of Orenford, and diuers other by king Edward attaynted, were restored to their olde names, possessions, and auncient dignities (kepe them euen as long as they might.) Beside thys, the Erle of Warwike as one to whome the common welth was much beholdyng, was made made ruler and gouernor of the realme, with whom as felow and companion was associated, George Duke of Clarence hys sonne in lawe. So that by these meanes the whole estate, both of the realme, and the publique welth of the same, were newly altred and chaunged. To thys parliament came the Lorde Marques Montacute, excusing hymselfe that onely for feare of death, he declyned to king Edwards part, which excuse was so accepted that he obteyned hys pardon, which after was the destruction of hym and hys brother: For if he had manfully and boldly taken king Edwards part, surely he being an open enemie, had much lesse hurted, then being a fayned & coloured friend: for suche things as we see before our eyes, we be well ware off, and seldome things before knowne, doe vs any hurt.

Queene Margaret, after that the Erle of Warwicke was sayled into Englande, euer forecasting and doubting the chaunce that might happen, did neuer cease to pray to God, to send victorie to her friends and confederates: which when she knewe by her husbandes letters to be obteyned, shee with Prince Edwarde her sonne and her trayne, entred their shippes, to take their voyage into Englande: but the Wynter was so sore, the weather so stormy, and the winde so contrary, that she was fayne to take lande againe, and deferre her iorney tyll another season. Her enemies sayde, that it was Gods iust prouision, that she which had bene the occasion of so many battayles, and of so much manslaughter in Englande should neuer returne thether agayne, to doe more mischiefe. Her friendes on the other side, sayd that she was kept away, and her iorney empeched by Sorcerers and Necromanciers: thus as mens imaginations ranne, so their tongues clacked.

In thys season Jasper Erle of Penbroke, went into Wales, to visite hys Countie of Penbroke, where he founde Lorde Henry, sonne to his brother Edmond Erle of Richmond, hauing not fully ten yeres of his age complete, which was kept in maner like a captiue: but well and honorably educated, and in all kind of ciuilitie brought vp, by the Lady Harbert, late wife to Wylliam Erle of Penbroke, behedded at Banbery, as you before haue heard, This Lorde Henry was he, that after king Richard, brother to king Edward, was vanquished and ouerthrowne, obteyned the crowne and regalitie of thys realme, whome we ought to beleue, to be sent from God, and of him onely to be prouided a king, for to extinguishe both the factions and partes, of king Henry the sixt, and of king Edwarde the fourth (which had almost brought the Nobilitie of thys realme to a finall destruction, and an vtter decay.) And thys Jasper Erle of Penbroke as aforesayd tooke this child being hys Nephew, out of the custodie of the Ladie Harbert, and at hys returne brought the same childe to London, to king Henry the sixt, whome when the king had a good space by himselfe, secretly beholden and marked, both hys wyt and hys lykely towardnesse, he sayed to such princes, as were then with him: Loe, surely this is he, to whome both we and our aduersaries leauing the possession of al things, shal hereafter geue rome and place. So this good man shewed before, the chaunce that should happen, that this Erle Henry so ordeyned by God, should in time to come (as he did in deede) haue and enioy the kingdome, and the whole rule of the realme.

This was king Henry the seuenth.

As I haue shewed to you before, what things were done in Englande after that king Henry had obteyned the new possession of hys olde kingdome, thinking thinking surely to haue possessed and enioyed the same lenger season then eyther he did, or could by his aduersaries be permitted or suffered to doe: so must I of necessitie declare vnto you, what great perplexitie, what sodaine trouble, and what great store of immaginations, the landing of king Edward in Friseland, brought to and encombered with all, Charles Duke of Burgoyne: and how deceitfully for his awne aduauntage he dissimuled, first with king Edward, and after with his partie aduerse, and how that he openly denied ayde to king Edward, when he priuily ministered great and large succours to him and his. I thinke you would not, that these things should be forgotten: And first call to your remembraunce, howe that Duke Charles had before this (as you haue heard) great intelligence or conference wyth Monsire de Uawclere, as he list himselfe to be called, eyther chiefe Captaine of Caleys, or else deputie Capitayne to the Erle of Warwike, which had promised to him by the Duke, a pencion yerely of a thousand Crownes, to the intent to stand still true to king Edward, and to relinquishe king Henry, but in especiall to abandon the Erle of Warwike. The Duke although that he had small confidence, but rather great diffidence in the othe and promyse of Monsire de Uawclere: thought it necessarie to knowe in what case Caleys stoode, and what alterations were there, because it was his nerte neighbor (for that time Bulleyn, and Bullenoys, and all Artoys, were in the handes of Duke Charles) as a pledge deliuered to hys father, as is before rehersed. Wherefore in all haste (before he sent for king Edwarde or spake with him) he sent his trustie counsayler Philip de Comines Lorde of Argenton, accompanied with two gentlemen to Caleis, which two gentlemen fauored more the partie of Lancaster then of Yorke. The Lorde of Argenton met with the people of the Countrey of Bullenoys, flyng from euery parte lyke wylde Dere: for the Erle of Warwike had now lately sent to Caleys, foure hundred Archers on horseback, which forrayed and spoyled all the Countrie of Bullenoys. The Dukes messengers, which had not sene so sodaine a chaunge of worldly things, durst not kepe on their iorney, but the same night taried at Turnoham, and sent to Monsire de Uawclere for a safe conduyt, and also wrote to the Duke of the feare that they were in. The Duke sent worde to Philip de Comines, that he and his with all spede, should passe towarde Caleis, and if they there were taken, he would shortly for a raunsome, buye or redeeme them agayne. For he passed little eyther of the payne of his seruaunt, or of his charge and expence, so that his purpose might be serued. When this word was brought to the messengers at Turnhan, at the same tyme they receyued a letter from Monsire de Uawclere, wyth louing wordes and gracious termes, declaring that they might safely come, and freely depart, as before they were liberally accustomed: so that sir Philip and his companions came to Caleis, wythout any meeting or solempne entertaintment contrary to the olde fashion that he had seene. When they entred into the towne, they might percepue euery man did weare the Erle of Warwikes badge, and on euery doze were set white Crosses, and ragged staues, with rimes and poesies, which purported the French king, and the Erle of Warwike were all one. These things seemed very straunge, and nothing pleasaunt to the Burgonions. The Lorde Uawclere sent for them to dinner the next day being well accompanied, and did weare on hys

Cap,

Cap, a whyte ragged ſtaffe of Golde enampled, and ſo did many other, and he that could haue it neyther of Golde nor of Siluer, had it of ſilke or cloth. Thys badge was taken vp within one quarter of an houre, after the newes came out of Englande: ſuche is the mutation of the common people, lyke a reede with euery winde bowing and bending. While theſe Burgonions lay thus in Caleys, they had knowledge that the Erle of Warwike had prepared foure thouſande valyaunt men, to make frontier warre on the Dukes Countries, whereof by poſte they certified the Duke, which ſo fumed and ſmoked at the matter, that he wiſt neyther well what to doe, nor of whome to aſke comfortable or wholeſome counſayle. For warre he was compelled to haue with the French king, which had taken from him certayne townes: and if he ſuccoured king Edwarde, he was ſure that with the Erle of Warwike, he ſhould haue no peace: and if he left king Edward his confederate and allye, in the time of hys tribulation, deſtitute of ayde and ſuccour, all the worlde of him might ſpeake ſhame, vnfaythfulneſſe and diſhonor. When the Duke had well aduiſed thys matter, he wrote to hys meſſengers, that they ſhould require to haue the league made betweene the two realmes, kept and obſerued, with dyuers other prpiuy inſtructions. Philip de Comines, beyng wiſe and well learned, declared to the counſayle of Caleys, that the Duke hys Maiſter not a little marueyled why the Engliſhe men ſhould ouer runne, and deſtroy his Countries, hauing a league ſo ſure, ſo ſtrong, and with ſo many wordes of efficacie enforced, lately made betweene the two Countries, their territories and dominions, affirming that the mutation of the Prince, is no diſſolution of the league: For although the princes be named, as chiefe contractors in euery treatie and amitie concluded, yet the Countries are bounden, and the ſubiectes ſhall make recompence, if anye thing be altred wrongfully out of his courſe. And the rather to obteine their deſire, they cauſed all the Marchauntes goodes of Englande, beyng in the Dukes Countries, to be attached for the redreſſe of the ſpoyle, that the Engliſhe men had done in the Dukes Countrie. Which ſore greeued the Marchaunts, and much hindered their voyages: beſide thys, the Marchauntes of the Staple of Calice, wrote to the king, and to the Erle of Warwike: how, if their wolle and fell at Calice, were not ſolde and vttered, as it was wont to be (the greateſt parte whereof, was bought by the Dukes ſubiectes and Vaſſals for readie money) the Souldiours of the garriſon, ſhould lack their wages, the king ſhould not be payde his cuſtome, and the Marchaunt in concluſion ſhoulde ſtande in aduenture both of loſſe of ſtock and credence. Theſe perſwaſions mollified the Erle of Warwikes minde, and eſpecially, becauſe the king had no great ſtore of money to furniſhe Caleys withall, which ſtore if he had had, ſurely the Duke of Burgoyne for al the league, had bene a little diſturbed, and greeuouſly moleſted. But conſidering that all thinges were not correſpondent at thys time to the Erles appetite: he was content that it ſhoulde be thus condeſcended and agreed, that the alyaunce made betweene the realme of Englande and the Dukes dominions, ſhoulde ſtill remayne inuiolated, ſauyng in the ſteede of Edwarde, ſhould be put for the king, this name Henry. This concluſion thus brought to an ende, came (euen as a man would wiſhe) to paſſe, for the Duke of Burgoyns purpoſe, for at this ſame time, the French king had wonne from him, the fayre towne of Amias, and saint Quintines, so that if the Duke should haue had warre both with Fraunce and Englande, he had bene lykely to haue bene shortly a poore Duke, or else vtterly vndone and brought to destruction. And to pacifie and please the Erle of Warwike, whome he neuer loued and lesse fauored: he wrote louingly to hym, declaring that as he was lineally descended, and naturally procreated of the noble stocke and familie of Lancaster, by his Graundmother, being daughter to the high and mightie Prince Iohn of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster: so was he by nature bound, and by aliance enforced to maintaine and defende the sayde noble house and linage, during his lyfe, as euer he hath done, both in worde and deede, agaynst all maner of persons and estates: furthermore, promising to beare hys good hart, louing minde, and friendly fauor, to king Henry the first and his sequele, before all other Princes and Potentates, wyth many other flattering termes and glosing wordes: which fayre promises, I thinke neyther the Duke himselfe inwardly minded, nor yet the Erle outwardly beleued.

Nowe to returne to king Edwarde, beyng in the Duke of Burgoyns lande, which, although he were out of his countrey, yet did he neuer dispayre but had a firme hope, to haue a iust and ready occasion to him geuen, howe to obtayne his kingdome, and dominion, and that in short space. For partlye, he hoped of a great helpe, of his brother in lawe, the Duke of Burgoyn, and partlye he was dayly solicited, by the letters, and messages of men of his faction in England, to returne with all speede, promisyng him company and comfort. Many other there were which eyther for feare of the rigor of the lawe, which they had offended, or else disdaynyng that the worlde was so altered: or else beyng brought into king Edwardes fauor, had hope to exercyse their pollyng roomes, as they did before his flyng out of Englād, dayly came to him from Englande, and prouoked him more and more, to take his iorney homewarde. King Edwarde in maner rauished with their golden promises, came to the Duke of Burgoyn, to the towne of Saint Poll, and there declared to him what great intelligence he had in the realme of Englande, and what assured friendes he had in the same, requiryng him to ayde him wyth speede, as his onely trust, and sole hope of relefe was in him, beyng not onelie his brother in law, but eche beyng companion of others order: for the king wore the golden Fleece, & the Duke wore the Garter. The Duke of Sommerset, which was colin germayne remoued to the Duke of Burgoyn, and brought vp and had a pencion in the Dukes house. (For surely the Duke of Burgoyn loued better the house of Lancastre, then the house of Yorke) sore labored to the contrary, affirming that it was both vngodlye, and vnnaturall, to exalte and set vp a straunger, hauing no ryght, and to depose and deprsyue his naturall kinsman, hauyng a iust title descended to hym, from the king his father, and the king his Grandfather, from his sceptre and regalitie. Duke Charles was in a great perplexitie, not knowyng well what to say, whether consanguinitie should preuayle more, or affinitie, or nature before fauor, not willing if he might, to displease any of both the partyes. But because the war was ouert at his nose, with the French kyng: he concluded openly (but intendyng another thing secretly) to ayde the Duke of Sommerset, and other that were with him, takyng of them certayne promises, for thinges to be done against the Erle of Warwicke: when they should espie their tyme, most apt and conuenient: The Duke of Sommerset ioyous of these newes, sailed into Englande, and made report to king Henry. King Edwarde was present, and hearde all this determination, which brought him into a great heauinesse and a deepe perplexitie: howbeit he was priuily aduertised by a friende, that these cloked dissimulations, were onely for this cause, that Duke Charles woulde in no wise, haue warre with both the realmes at once, and further, if the saide Duke were put to the worse, or vanquished by the French king, then he were not able, neyther to ayde, nor to succor king Edwarde. Wherefore to blind withall the French king, which sore desired, that the Duke might haue warre with England: for then he knewe that his enterprise, were more then halfe gotten. The Duke declared openlye, that he woulde in no wyse minister any succors to king Edwarde, streightly charging and commaunding, vpon payne of the hart, that no man shoulde once passe the sea with him, or in his armie. But all this proclamacion notwithstanding when the Duke sawe that king Edwarde, vpon hope of his friends, woulde needes repaire into Englande agayne (he hauyng compassion of his vnfortunate chaunce) caused priuily to be deliuered to him fiftie. M. Florence, of the crosse of Saint Andrew, and further caused foure great shippes to be appointed for him, in the hauen of Vere in Zelande, which is free for all men to come to, and the Duke hyred farther for him. xiiij. shippes, of the Esterlinges, well appointed, and for the more suretie, tooke bond of them to serue him truelye, till hee were landed in Englande, and. xb. dayes after. Of which returnyng, the Easterlinges were glad, trusting that by that meane, if he obtained againe the possession of the realme, they shoulde the soner come to a concorde and a peace, and to the restitution of their liberties, and franchises, which they claimed to haue within England. The Duke of Burgoyn as men reported, cared not much on whose side the victory fell, sauyng for paiment of his money. For he would oft say, that he was friend to both parts, and eche part was friendly to him.

This present yere saith he, Sixtus, the fourth of that name, Bishop of Rome, beyng enformed by James the third king of Scotlande, that the Scottish Bishops had no Metropolitan within his realme of Scotlande, for at that tyme, and long before, the Archebishop of Yorke was Metropolitan and primate of Scotlande. And nowe saith he, forasmuch as there are in a maner continuall warres betweene England and Scotlande, or else Ciuile warres in their seuerall realmes, by reason wherof his Clergie coulde not resort nor haue free accesse in causes and matters of religyon, to conferre with their Primate, & Metropolitan, that therefore the Pope woulde assigne him a Metropolitan within his owne realme and dominion: And the saide Sixtus appointed the Bishop of Saint Andrewes to be Metropolitan of Scotlande, and so the Archbishoppe of Yorke lost hys iurisdiction in the realme of Scotlande, wherewithall George Neuill, then beyng Archbishop of Yorke was not a little offended, for he had vnder his obedience. xii. King Edwardes landing.

King Edwarde hauing nowe in a readinesse onely, two thousande men of warre, beside mariners, in the spring of the yere, sayled into England, and came on the coast of Yorkeshire, to a place called Rauenspur, and there setting all his men on lande, he consulted with his Captains, to knowe to what place, they shoulde first for succor resort vnto: for he imagined that no waye coulde be for him sure, hauing so small a company of souldiours.

After long debating, it was concluded, that diuers persons hauing light horses, should skoure the countrey on euery side, to see if by any perswasions, they might allure the hartes of the rusticall and vplandishe people, to take king Edwards part, and to weare harnesse in his quarell: which with al diligence, folowed their commission. It seemeth somewhat to leane to the truth, that king Edwarde beyng a wise and circumspect Prince, woulde not haue beene so foolish hardy, as to enter Englande with halfe a handefull of men of warre, except he had beene sure of speedy succor and faithfull friendship: In which argument there is no doubt, but that the Duke of Clarence and he, were secretly agreed before, and that the Marques Montacute, had secretly procured his fauor, of which priuy signes, and cloked workings, open tokens, and manifest doynges, afterwarde appeered. The light Horsemen, which were sent about, after they had felt the minds and entents, of the rude people (as much as they might) they retourned to king Edwarde the nexte daye, making relacion that all the townes round about, were permanent and stiffe on the part of king Henry, & could not be remoued: and that it was but a folly farther to solicite or attempt them, considering that when they were moued and exhorted to be true to king Edwarde, not one man durst speake for feare of the Erle of Warwicke.

Which aunswere, when king Edwarde had perfectly digested, of very necessitie he chaunged his purpose: for where before his clayme was to be restored to the Crowne and kingdome of England, nowe he caused it to be published, that he onely claymed the Duchie of Yorke, to the entent that in requiryng nothing, but that which was both iust and honest, he might obteyne the more fauor of the common people. It was almost incredible to see what effect this newe imaginacion (although it were but fayned) forced and tooke vpon the first openyng (such a power hath Iustice euen amongest all men) when it was blowen abrode that king Edwardes desyre was not for the kingdome, but onely requyred his iust patrimonie and inheritaunce of the Duchie of Yorke. By reason whereof, all men moued with mercy and compassion, began out of hande either to fauor him, or else not to resist him, so that he might obteyne his Duchie of Yorke. When he had found these meanes to pacifie mens mindes, and to reconcile their hartes, he determined to take his iourney toward Yorke, and so went to Beuerley. The Erle of Warwike which then lay in Warwikeshire, beyng informed that king Edwarde was landed, and goyng toward Yorke, with all haste wrote to the Marques Mountacute his brother, which had lyen at the Castell of Pomfret all the

laſt winter, with a great company of Souldiours, geuing him warnyng and aduertiſyng him in what perill theyr whole affayres ſtoode in, if their enemy ſhould obteyne the poſſeſſion, or enter into the Citie of Yorke, willyng and commaundyng him to ſet on king Edwarde with all expedicion, and bid him battaile, or elſe to kepe the paſſage, that he ſhould paſſe no farther, till he himſelfe had gathered a greater hoſt, which with all diligence, he was aſſemblyng to come and ioyne with his brother the Marques. And becauſe that the Erle knew not by what way his enemies would take their iourney, he wrote to all the townes of Yorkeſhire, and to the Citie alſo, commaundyng all men on the kinges behalfe, to be redie in harneſſe, and to ſhut their gates againſt the kinges enemyes. King Edwarde without any wordes ſpoken to him, came peaceably nere to Yorke, of whoſe commyng, when the Citizens were certified, without delay they armed themſelues, and came to defend the Gates, ſendyng to him two of the chiefeſt Aldermen of the Citie, which earneſtly admoniſhed him on their behalfe to come not one foote nerer, nor raſhely to enter into ſo great a ieopardie, conſideryng that they were fully determined, and bent to compell him to retract with dent of ſworde. King Edward well marking their meſſage, was not a little troubled and vnquieted in his minde, and driuen to ſeeke the furtheſt poynt of his witte, for he had both two miſchieuous and perillous chaunces, euen before his eies, which were hard to be auoyded, one was, if he ſhoulde go backe againe, he feared leaſt the rurall and common people for couetouſneſſe of pray, and ſpoyle, would fall on him, as one that fled away for feare and dread. The other was, if he ſhould proceede any farther in his iourney, then might the Citizens of Yorke iſſue out with all their power, and ſodainly circumuent him, and take him: wherefore he determined to ſet forward, neyther with armour nor with weapon, but with lowly wordes, and gentle entreatynges, requiring moſt hartily the meſſengers that were ſent, to the Citizens, that he came neyther to demaund the realme of England, nor the ſuperioritie of the ſame, but onely the Duchy of Yorke, his olde enheritance, the which Duchy, if he might by theyr meanes recouer, he would neuer let paſſe out of his memorie their friendſhip and gentlenelle. And ſo with fayre wordes and flatteryng ſpeche he diſmiſſed the Meſſengers, and with good ſpede he and his folowed ſo quickly after, that they were almoſt at the gates as ſone as the Meſſengers. The Citizens heering his good anſwere, that he ment nor intended nothing preiudicial to king Henry, nor his royall auctoritie, were much mittigated and cooled, and began to common with him from their walles, willyng him to conuey himſelfe into ſome other place without delay, which if he did they aſſured him, that he ſhould haue neyther hurt nor damnage, but he gently ſpeakyng to all men, and eſpecially to ſuch as were Aldermen, whome he called worſhipfull, and by their proper names them ſaluted, after many fayre promiſes to them made exhorted and deſired them that by their fauourable friendſhip, he might enter into his awne towne, of the which he had both his name and title. And thus all the whole day was conſumed in doubtfull communication. The Citizens partly wonne by his fayre wordes, and partly by hope of his large promiſes, fell to this pact and conuention, that king Edward would ſweare to entertain his Citizens of Yorke after a gentle ſort and faſhion, and hereafter to be obedient, and faythfull to all king Henryes commaundementes and preceptes, that that then they would receyue him into their Citie, and ayde and comfort him with money. King Edward (whom the Citizens called only Duke of Yorke) beyng glad of this fortunate chaunce, the next morning entred in at the gate where the Maior and Aldermen stoode redie to receyue him, and there they ministred vnto him a solempne othe, which he tooke vpon the holy Gospels, which was to obserue the two Articles aboue mencioned and agreed vpon, when it was farre vnlike, that he eyther entended or purposed to obserue any of them, which plainely afterwarde was to all men manifest, euidently perceiuyng, that he tooke no more studie or diligence for any one earthly thing, then he did to persecute King Henrie, and to spoyle him of his kingdome. So it is dayly seene that aswell Princes, as men of lesser reputacion, led by blinde auarice, and deuilishe ambicion, forgettyng the scruple of conscience, and the ende of all honestie, vse to take an othe by the immortall God, which they know perfectly shal be broken & violate hereafter, before the othe be first made or sworne: yet these persons (as examples thereof be not very straunge to finde) at one time or other be worthily scourged for their periury, insomuch oftentimes that the blot of such offence of the parentes is punished in the sequele and posteritie as shall appere hereafter in the lyfe of Richard the thirde.

obedience to king Henry the first.

When King Edward had appesed the Citizens, and that their fury was past, he entred into the Citie, and clerely forgetting his othe, he first set a garrison of Souldiours in the towne, to the entent that nothing should be moued agaynst him by the Citizens, and after he gathered a great host by reason of his money. When all thing was redie, accordyng as he desyred, because he was informed that his enemyes did make no great preparacion to resist him, he thought it necessary therefore, with the more speede and diligence to make haste toward London: and as it were for the nonce, he left the right way toward Pomfret, where the Marques Montacute with his armie lay and tooke the way on the right hande, not fully foure myle from the campe of his enemyes. And when he saw that they made no stirryng, nor once shewed themselues in sight, he returned into the common high way again, a little beyond their campe, and came safely to the towne of Nottyngham, where came to him sir William Parre, sir Thomas a Borough, sir Thomas Montgomerye, and diuers other of his assured friendes with their aydes, which caused him at the first commyng to make Proclamacion in his awne name king Edward the fourth, boldely saiyng to him, that they would serue no man but a king. This Proclamacion cast a great shame and dolor into the heartes of the Citizens of Yorke, for that they might apparantly perceyue, that they were seduced, and for their good will vnhonestly (if it might be sayd) deluded and mocked. But when the fame was blowen abrode, that king Edward, without any detriment was in safetie come to Nottyngham, Princes and noble men on all sydes began to fall to him, firmely beleuyng, that either the Marques Montacute, beryng fauor to king Edwarde, would not once with him encounter, or that he was afrayde to set on or to geue battaile, knowyng not to what part his Souldiours would incline. But whatsoeuer the occasion was, the most part thought it more for the securitie and auantage of themselues, to take part and ioyne with king Edwarde, beyng at all poyntes furnished with men of warre, rather then to cleue to King Henry, and to be al-

wayes in ieopardy both of life and land. King Edward (as you can not blame him) beyng with these good fortunes encouraged, and with his armie furnished at all pointes, came to his towne of Leycester, and there heeryng that the Erle of Warwike, accompanied with John Erle of Oxford, were together at Warwike with a great power, and were both determined to set on him, hee pollitiquely imaginyng to preuent their inuencion, determined in great haste to remoue his whole armie, hopyng surely, either to geue them battaile, either to allure and bring to his syde his brother George Duke of Clarence, and to common with him in some priuie place, before he came to his confederates: least paraduenture he should be by them trapped and compassed, knowyng that the Duke was in nothing constant.

In this very season, to tell you how the Erle of Warwike was displeased, and grudged against his brother the Marques, for letting king Edward passe, it were to long to write: for where he himselfe had pollitiquely prouided and foreseene all things, the Marques neuertheless where the power of their enemies first began together, neuer moued foote, nor made resistance as he was commaunded, but beside this, suffered them with so smal a number of Souldiours, before his eyes, and in his open sight, without any battaile to passe by: wherefore the Erle considering that king Edward did dayly encrease his power (as a runnyng ryuer by goyng more and more augmenteth) thought it most necessary for him, to geue him battaile with spede, and therevpon he called together his armie, and in all hast sent for the Duke of Clarence to ioyne with him, which had gathered and assembled together a great hoste about London. But when he perceyued that the Duke lingered, and did all thinges negligently, as though he were in doubt of war or peace, he then began somewhat to suspect that ỳ Duke was of his brethren corrupted and lately chaunged, and therefore without delay marched forwarde towarde Couentrie, to the entent to set on his enemies. In the meane season, king Edward came to Warwike, where he found al the people departed, and from thence with all diligence aduaunced his power toward Couentrie, and in a plaine by the Citie he pitched his fielde. And the next day after that he came thether, his men were set forwarde, and marshalled in arraye, and he valiauntly bade the Erle battaile: which mistrustyng that he should be deceyued by the Duke of Clarence (as he was in deede) kept himselfe close within the walles. And yet he had perfect worde that the Duke of Clarence came forwarde towarde him with a great armie, king Edwarde beyng also thereof informed, raysed his campe, and made towarde the Duke. And least that there might be thought some fraude to be cloked betwene them, the king set his battayles in an order, as though he would fight without any lenger delay, the Duke did likewise. When eche hoste was in sight of other, Richard Duke of Gloucester, brother to them both, as though he had bene made Arbitrer betwene them, first rode to the Duke, and with him commoned very secretly: from him he came to king Edward, and with like secretnesse so vsed him, that in conclusion no vnnaturall warre, but brotherly friendship was concluded and proclaymed, and then leauyng all armour and weapon aside, both the brethren louingly embraced, and familiarly commoned together. It was no maruaile that the Duke of Clarence, with so small perswasion, and lesse exhorting, turned from the Erle of Warwikes parte, for as you haue haue heard before, this marchandice was labored and concluded by a Damsell when the Duke was in the Frenche Court, to the Erles vtter confusion.

After this king Edward caused to be proclaimed, that the Duke and all that came with hym, should be taken as hys true frendes, wythout fraude or yll suspicion. But this notwithstanding, it seemeth that God did neyther forgeue nor forget to punishe the Duke wyth condigne punishment, for violatyng and breakyng his othe solempnely, and aduisedly taken and made to the Erle of Warwike, for God not many yeres after, suffred him lyke a periured person to die a cruell and a straunge death. Periurie is punished by almightie God.

Then was it concluded amongst the three brethren to attempt the Erle of Warwicke, if by any fayre meanes he might be reconciled or by any promise wonne to their parte: To whome the Duke of Clarence sent dyuers of his secret frendes, first to excuse him of the act that he had done, secondarily to require hym to take some good ende, nowe whyle he myght wyth king Edwarde.

When the Erle had hard patiently the Dukes message, Lorde, how he detested and accursed him, cryng out on him, that he contrary to hys othe, promise, and fidelitie, had shamefully turned hys face from hys confederates and alies: But to the Dukes Messengers he gaue none other aunswere but thys, that he had liefer be alwayes lyke himselfe, than lyke a false and a periured Duke, and that he was fully determined neuer to leaue warre till eyther he had lost his awne naturall lyfe, or vtterly extinguished and put vnder hys foes and enemies. The Erle of Warwike a man of great courage.

From thence king Edward thus being furnyshed of a strong hoste, went wythout any maner of diffidence or mistrust toward London (where after it was knowen that the Duke of Clarence was come to hys brethren, and that all they came together in one knot to the Citie, such a feare rose sodainly amongst the Citizens, that they were driuen to their wits ende, not knowyng eyther what to doe or to say, but at the last very feare compelled them to take king Edwardes parte. The selfesame season, the Erle of Warwike sent Letters to king Henry, to the Duke of Sommerset, the Archebyshop of Yorke, and other of hys counsayle, that they should keepe the Citie from their enemies handes, by the space of two or three dayes after the comming of their enemies, and that he shortly would be at hande, wyth a puyssaunt armie. They as they were commaunded defended the Citie strongly, but it was to small purpose, for the Citizens in the same time began earnestly to consult, what part they should folow for their most indempnitie: and in conclusion, when they considered that king Henry was such an innocent person, as of hymselfe was not most apt to rule and gouerne the publique welth of the realme. And that on the other side, king Edward by no other mens teachyng, but onely by hys awne pollicy and wyt could order the realme and gouerne the kingdome. And farther that king Edwarde was such a person as was able both to defende himselfe and also all hys, from iniurie and hostilitie: wherevpon all men were glad to leane to him, and to take hys parte, wherefore they concluded to receyue him into the Citie: which determination being blowen abrode (as the nature of the people is euer to delight in nouelties) the commonaltie could not be compelled by no commaundement to tarie at home, but ranne in heapes out of the City to meete him, and saluted him him as their king and ſouereigne Lorde. When the Duke of Sommerſet and other of king Henries friendes ſawe the worlde thus ſodaynly chaunged, euery man fled, and in haſte ſhifted for himſelfe, leauing king Henry alone, as an hoſt that ſhould be ſacrificed, in the Biſhops Palace of London, adioyning to Paules Church, not knowyng of whome, nor what counſayle to aſke, as he which with trouble and aduerſitie was clerely dulled, in which place he was by king Edward taken, and agayne committed to priſon.

King Henry the firſt again taken and committed to priſon.

Thys was a ſodayne chaunge, for the ſame daye the Archebyſhop of Yorke to the intent that the people might more firmely ſtick on hys ſyde, cauſed hym to ryde about London, appareled in a gowne of blew Veluet, with a great companie cryng king Henry, king Henry (which ſight as much pleaſed the Citizens, as a fyre paynted on the wall warmed the olde woman) not knowyng that or night, his triumphing ſhould be turned to tremblyng, and his ſolempnitie conuerted into mourning, ſuch chaunce was to him prouided.

King Edwarde returned to London agayne the .xj. daye of Apryll, fiue Moneths after that he had ſayled into Flaundyrs, and firſt calling before him a great aſſemble of people, highly commended the fidelitie of the Citizens, which they conſtauntly bare vnto hym, rendring to the Aldermen moſt hartie thankes for that, that they had kept, and cauſed the people to continue, and be permanent in their good mindes and loyaltie towarde hym, blaming farther and rebuking as well Marchaunt ſtraungers as Engliſhe men, whom he knewe to haue preſted, and lent money to king Henry, for the arraiyng and ſetting forth of a new armie agaynſt him. But when he had grieuouſly with terrible wordes declared to them their ſeditious cryme and trayterous offence, he bade them be of good comfort, and to expell all feare, for he releaſed to them both the puniſhment of their bodyes and loſſe of goodes, and graunted to them pardon for their faultes and offences, by which gentle meane, he reconciled to hym the hartes of the whole multitude, obteyning that by fayre and louing wordes, which he coulde not haue achieued wyth ſharpe ſtrokes, and bloudy woundes.

The wiſedome of king Edwarde.

The Erle of Warwike pondering that the gayne of the whole battayle ſtoode in making haſt, with all diligence folowed hys enemies, hoping (that if they were let neuer ſo little, with any ſtop or tarying by the waye) to fight wyth them before they ſhoulde come to London: the which he thought, ſhoulde be muche to hys aduauntage, conſideryng that he perfectly knewe the Cytie to be deſtitute of men of warre for defence, and to haue no maner of munitions, to ſet on the walles or Towres, ſo that they were not able to abide a ſiege, and for that cauſe, euer they enclined to the victorious and ſtronger part. But when he folowyng his enemies, had paſſed a great part of his iourney, he was informed that king Edwarde peaceably was entred into London, and had taken, and ſent king Henry to priſon againe: which things deepely conſidered, he ſaw that all cauillacions of neceſſitie, were now brought to this ende, that they muſt be committed to the hazard and chaunce of one battaile, wherefore, he reſted with his armie, at the towne of Saint Albons, partly to refreſh his Souldiours, and partly to take counſaile what was beſt to do. In the Erles armie were John Duke of Exceſter, Edmond Erle of Sommerſet, John Erle of Orenford, and John Marques Montacute, whome the Erle his brother well knewe, not to bee well minded (but ſore agaynſt his ſtomacke) to take part with theſe Lordes, and therfore ſtode in a doubt, whether he at this time, might truſt him or no, but the brotherly loue betwene them, waſhed away and diminiſhed all ſuſpicion: But whatſoeuer opinion the Erle conceyued of him or any other, the Erle as a man paſt all feare, determined couragiouſly to ſet on his enemyes. And from Saint Albones, he remoued to a village in the meane way, betwene London and Saint Albones, called Barnet, beyng ten mile diſtant from both the townes. This towne ſtandeth on an hill, on whoſe top is a faire plain for two armies to ioyne together. On the one part of this plaine, the Erle of Warwicke pitched his fielde, tarying for his enemies. The rumor of the Erles commyng, was ſpred in an inſtant ouer all London, which quickned king Edwarde not a little: wherefore with all ſpeede he adioyned to that hoſte, that he brought with him firſt to London, a company of picked, and choſen perſons, ſtrong, yong, and mete for all aſſayes, beſyde other new aydes, that were then come to him: Harneſſe, weapons, horſe, and all other engines and inſtrumentes mete for the warre, he neyther forgat nor ſlackly furniſhed. What ſhall I ſay more, he determined clerely to ſpende all his riches, yea, and all that he could imagine vpon the chaunce of this battaile: Firmely beleuyng, that this conflict ſhould knit vp the knot of all his labor, and bring him to quietneſſe. So with a puyſſaunt armie, he marched forwarde, and to put his people in vre, that they might be the more redie to fight, whenſoeuer they ſhould encounter with their enemies, he deuided them in foure partes, and he brought with him alſo king Henry the ſixt. On Eaſter eue at after noone he came to Barnet, and there not farre from his enemyes, he encamped his armie, and leaſt his enemies ſhould compell him to fight that night, he enuironed his campe with newe fortifications, and trenches, for tarying that night was to him a ſinguler profite, and to his enemies a great dammage, conſidering the lenger he taryed, the more people came to his ayde. Thus both the armies lodged that night on the plaine, but not out of their harneſſe, for their tentes were ſo nere together, in the which, what for neying of horſes, & talkyng of men, none of both the hoſtes could that night take any reſt or quietneſſe. At the breaking of the day, the Erle of Warwicke ſet his men in array, in this maner: in the right wing he ſet the Marques Montacute, and the Erle of Orenford, with certaine horſemen, and he with the Duke of Exceſter, tooke the left wing, and in the middeſt betwene both, he ſet Archers, and to them hee appoynted the Duke of Sommerſet to be Capitaine. And when he had ſet his men in an order, he encouraged his men to fight, with many comfortable wordes, willyng them to ſtriue with a good and fierce courage, and to remember that they fight, not onely for the libertie of the Countrie, agaynſt a tirant, which wrongfully and againſt all right, had inuaded and ſubdued this realme, but that they fight in the quarell of a true & vndoubted king, againſt a cruell man, and a tirannous vſurper, in the cauſe of a Godly, and a pitifull Prince, agaynſt an abhominable manqueller, and bloodie butcher: In which cauſe beyng ſo good, ſo godly, and ſo iuſt, God of very iuſtice muſt needes be their ſhielde and defence.

Barnet fielde.

King Edwarde likewiſe ordred his battayles. In the forewarde he ſet the Duke of Glouceſter, the middleward, he himſelfe with the Duke of Clarence hauyng with them king Henrye, did rule and gouern, the Lorde Haſtynges tynges led the reward, and beſides theſe three battayles, he kept a company of freſh men in ſtore, which did him great pleaſure, and this done, he encoraged his men, ſaiyng: that their aduerſaries were onelye Traitors to the realme, ſpoylers of the poore commonalty, and people deſtitute of all grace, good fortune, and good liuyng. Which miſcheuous perſons, if they ſhoulde preuayle through the faintneſſe of your heartes, all you gentlemen and richmen, were in ieoperdye of your lyues, all meane men in doubt of robbing and ſpoyling, and all inferior perſons in hazard of perpetuall bondage and ſeruitude.

When the day began to ſpring, the trumpets blewe vp corragiouſly, and the battaile fierſly began, Archers firſt ſhot, and bill men folowed them. King Edward hauing ỳ greater number of men, valiantly ſet on his enemies. The Erle on the other ſide, remembring his auncient fame and renoume, manfullye withſtode him. This battaile on both ſides was ſore fought, and manye ſlayne, in whoſe roomes ſucceeded euer freſh, and freſh men. In the meane ſeaſon, while all men were together by the eares, euer loking to which way fortune woulde encline. The Erle of Warwicke after long fight, wiſely did perceyue his men to be ouer preſſed, with the multitude of his aduerſaries: wherfore he cauſed new men to relieue them that fought in the forward, by reaſon of which ſuccors, king Edwards part gaue a little backe (which was the cauſe that ſome lokers on, and no fighters, galloped to London, ſaiyng: that the Erle had wonne the fielde) which thing when king Edwarde dyd perceiue, he with all diligence ſent freſh men to their ſuccors.

If ỳ battail were fierce & deadly before, now it was crueller, more bloody, more feruent, and firy, & yet they had fought from morning almoſt to noone, without any parte getting auauntage of other. King Edwarde beyng wery of ſo long a conflict, & willing to ſee an ende, cauſed a great crew of freſh men (which he had for this onely pollicye, kept all day in ſtore) to ſet on their enemies: but although the Erle ſawe theſe newe ſuccors, of freſhe men to enter the battayll, beyng nothing a fraide, but hoping of the victory (knowyng perfitly that there was all king Edwardes power) comforted his men beyng wery, charply quickning, and earneſtly deſiring them with hardy ſtomackes, to bere out this laſt and finall brunt of the battaill, and that the fielde was euen at an ende. But when his ſouldiers beyng ſore wounded, weried wyth ſo long a conflict, did geue litle regarde to his wordes, he beyng a man of a mind inuincible, ruſhed into the middeſt of his enemies, where as he (aduentured ſo farre from his owne company, to kill and ſlay his aduerſaries, that hee coulde not be reſcued) was in the middeſt of his enemies, ſtricken downe and ſlayne. The Marques Mountacute, thinking to ſuccor his brother, which he ſaw was in great ieoperdy, and yet in hope to obtayne the victory, was likewiſe ouerthrowne and ſlain. After the Erle was dead, his part fled, and many were taken, but not one man of name, nor of nobilitie.

Some authors write, that this battaile was fought ſo neere hand that king Edwarde was conſtrayned to fight his owne perſon, and fought as ſore as any man of his partie, and that the Erle of Warwicke, which was wont euer to ride on horſebacke, from place to place, from ranke to ranke, comforting his men, was now adviſed by the Marques his brother, to relinquiſhe his horſe, & trie the extremitie by handie ſtrokes, which if he had bene on his horſebacke,

The death of the Erle of Warwicke.

This ende had Richarde Nevell, Erle of Warwicke, whose stoute stomacke, and inuincible corage, after so many straunge fortunes, and perilous chaunces, by him escaped, caused death before he came to any olde age priuily to stele on him, and with his darte to take from him all worldlye affections: but death did one thing, that lyfe could not, for by death he hadde rest, peace, and quietnesse, which his lyfe euer abhorred, and could not suffer nor abide. On both partes were slaine at this battaile, more than ten. M. men. Of prisoners, the number could not be certainely knowne: On the kings part were slaine syr Humfrey Burchier, sonne to the Lord Barnes, else no man of estimacion. The occasion of this great slaughter was, because that where king Edwarde was wont, after the battaile obtayned, to crye: saue the commons, and kil the Captaynes, now he spared them not, because they not only so highly fauored the Erle of Warwicke, but also because they came with the Erle, against him in battaile. After this field ended, the Duke of Sommerset, with Iohn Erle of Oxenforde, were in all poste haste, flying towarde Scotlande, but fearyng the ieoperdies, that might chaunce in so long a iorneye, altered their purpose, and turned into Wales, to Iasper Erle of Penbrooke, euerye man fledde whether his minde serued hym. The Duke of Exceter wyth much difficultye, escaped into Westmynster disguised, and there tooke Sentuarye.

King Edwarde after this victorye, although he wanne it not wythout great effusiō of blood, aswell on his owne part, as the part of his enemies was greatly reioyced, & comforted: and after the maner of a victorious conquerer leadyng with him king Henrye like a captyue, in most triumphant maner, on Easter day at after noone, made his entry solempnly into the City of London, and at the Church of saint Paule, offered his standerd, and rendred to almightie God, for his great victory, most humble and hartie thankes. The dead bodies of the Erle, and the Marques, were brought to London in a coffin, and before they shoulde be buried, by the space of three dayes, they lay open visaged, in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule, to the intent that all men might euidently perceiue, that they vnfaynedlye were dead, least peraduenture the common people hereafter, heeryng of some dissimulyng person, to take on him the name of the Erle of warwicke, thinking him to be liuyng, might stirre a new sedicion, and rebellion.

The common people sayde, that the king was not so ioconde, nor so ioyous, for the destruction of the Erle, but he was more sorowfull, for the death of the Marques, whome both he knewe, and it appered to other, to be inwardelye his faythfull friende. For whose onelye sake, hee caused both their bodyes, to bee wyth their Auncesters, solempnlie buried at the Priory of Bisham.

In the meane season, Queene Margaret hauing knowledge, that all thinges in Englande, were nowe altered and brought into trouble & broyle, by reason of king Edwardes late returne into the realme: gathering together no small company of hardy, and valiaunt souldiours, determined with al hast and diligence, with Prince Edwarde her sonne, to sayle into Englande, but yet once agayne (such was her destinie) beyng letted for lacke of prosperous wind, and encombered with to much & rigorous tempest, a day after the faire faire as the common prouerbe saieth, landed at the Porte of Weimouth, in Dorset shire. When she had passed the sea and taken lande, it was to her declared, how that king Edwarde had gotten agayne the Garlande, and that king Henry her husbande, was desolately left post a lone, and taken prisoner, how the Erle of Warwicke and his brother were both slaine, and deade, and all their armie destroyed, scattered, or taken, and in conclusion, that her parte had susteined, the most bitter plague, and scorge, considering both the chaūce and the tyme, that in many yeres before, had beene reade or seene. When she harde of these miserable chaunces, and misfortunes, so sodainely one in anothers necke, to haue taken their effect, she like a woman all dismaied for feare fell to the grounde, her harte was pierced with sorowe, her spethe was in a maner passed, all her spirites were tormented with Melancholy. The calamitie and misery of her tyme, she detested, and abhorred her vnstable and contrariant fortune, she stedfastlye blamed and accused her painefull labor, her care of minde, turned into infelicitie she much lamented, and bewailed the euill fate and destinie of her husbande, which imminentlye before her eyes shee sawe to approch, she accused, reproued, and reuiled, and in conclusion, her senses were so vexed, and she so afflicted, and cast into such an agony, that she preferred death before life, rather desiring soner to die, then longer to liue, and peraduenture for this cause, that her enterior eye sawe priuily, it gaue to her a secrete monicion of the great calamities, and aduersities, which then did hang ouer her head, and were likely incontinent to fall and succeede, which other persons, neither loked for, nor regarded.

The Quene taketh heauily the death of the Erle of Warwike and the misfortuns of her husbands.

This Quene Margaret might well consider and thinke, that these euill aduentures chaunced to her for the most part, for the vnworthy death of Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, Uncle to her husbande: Of the which mischaunce, although she were not the very occasion and prouoker, yet she greatly offended in that she consented theretoo, and did not saue hys lyfe, when she ruling all other, might conueniently haue stayed and letted it. For surely he beyng a lyue, and hauing the moderation and gouernaunce of the common welth, king Henry had neuer wauered in so many hasardes, and ieopardies of hys lyfe as he did. I would desire of God that all men would in egall Balance ponder and indifferently consider the causes of these misfortunes and euill chaunces, the which being eleuate in auctoritie, doe meete and measure, iustice and iniury, right and wrong, by high power, blinde auctoritie, and vnbridled will.

But nowe to the purpose, when Quene Margaret sawe, that to bid battayle was to no purpose, and in maner in dispaire of the welth of her selfe, and her sonne: she with the Prince and her company, departed to a Sentuarie there by called Beaulieu in Hamshyre (where was a Monasterie of Monkes, of the order of Cisterciens) and registred her selfe and hers, as persons there priuileged. When it was knowne that shee was landed, Edmond Duke of Sommerset wyth Lord John hys brother, Thomas Courtney Erle of Deuonshire, the which before euer toke the contrary part, whose sodaine chaunging, shortly turned to hys owne confusion, Jasper Erle of Penbroke, John Lorde Wenlocke (a man made onely by king Edwarde) and John Longstrother, Prior of saint Johns in Englande, came in great haste to Beaulieu, and presented themselues to the Queene. Although that she were almost drowned in sorrow and plunged in payne, yet when she saw and beheld these noble and princely personages to resorte vnto her presence, she was somewhat comforted and greatly reuiued.

And first, least it should be layed to her charge, that she had done any thing misaduisedly: shee declared and shewed the cause, why she could not come to them in tyme, as she gladly would haue done, and for what purpose and intent, she had then taken the priuilege of Sentuarie: Beseeching them all to studie, and prouide with all diligence, for the welth and conseruation of her onely Jewell the Prince her sonne, and where for thys tyme, she dispaired to doe anye thing by force of armes, that might be to her profite, she thought it most conuenient for her (if the time of yere and her enemies did not let or stop her) to sayle againe into Fraunce, and there to tarie till God would sende her better luck.

After that the Duke and other with comfortable wordes, somewhat had eased the dolorus harte of thys vnfortunate Queene: the sayde Duke began wyth a long processe to enter communication of warre to be renewed, and wyth all haste possible, and extreme diligence, least their company by tarying might be diminished, and king Edwardes power encreased and augmented, considering that all thys time, he had no army gathered together, for so much that at the laste battayle, the very strength of his chiefe souldiours, was weakened: And that notwithstanding, that fortune shone on hym in obteyning the victorie agaynst the Erle of Warwike, yet now it was not lykely that he should obteyne againe a lyke victorie: affirming farther, that the more number of the nobilitie, bare toward king Henry her husbande, their good minds and fired hartes, and would helpe him both wyth men and money. And of hys awne free wyll, if she would take vpon her, the name of Capitayne agaynst her enemies, as she before that often tymes had enterprised: he offred a great power of able men, at hys awne expence and charge, promising that the two Erles should assure her of a farre greater number of valyaunt and expert warriers, then she would esteeme. And when he had shewed that, the victorie was now (if they liste) in their handes, he merily required them all, to be of hardie harte and good cheere, and because the matter required great expedition, he thought it not necessarie farther to reason the cause of battaile, but determined out of hande how the battayle should be geuen and ordered.

The Quene whose minde gaue her, that thys motion, should come to no good conclusion, aunswered: that she could well allowe thys sentence, if she thought that there might happen no great losse to some other, then the losse of her awne lyfe. But she suspected that whyle they would helpe things that they most phantasyed and affected, the lyfe of Prince Edward her sonne, in whome, all the whole hope of that familie stoode and remayned, should be in perill and ieopardy: and therfore she either thought it necessary to deferre the battayle till another time, or else to conueye her sonne into Fraunce agayne, there to lye sure and secret, till the chaunce of the first battayle were tryed and assayed. And no maruayle, although the naturall mother, muche minded and studied for the sauegarde and tuition of the life of her sonne, pondering that nert her husband, whome she reputed for cleene vndone, and vterly cast away, she had nothing more to be beloued, nothing more derer, nor nothing to be made more off.

Thus this prudent and politique Quene required the Chiefteynes expert in martiall feates, that they ſhould before hande conſider with themſelues, diſcretely and aduiſedly of theſe thinges by her firſt moued, and after that done, if they thought it conuenient to geue battaile, ſhe would to there agreement with all her heart be conformable: But there was no longer diſputacion of the matter, for the Duke ſayde that there was no neede to waſte any more wordes, for all they were determined (while their liues laſted) ſtill to kepe warre againſt their enemies, and therefore that thing which wyth great counſaile and deliberacion is concluded, ought to be aduaunced and ſet forward with a whole conſent and agrement.

Thus euery man together clerely bent and encouraged to the battaile, gathered his power by himſelfe. The Duke throughout all his dominions, rayſed a choſen companie of men of warre: likewiſe did the Erle of Deuonſhire, the Erle of Penbroke, who went into Wales to his Erledome, to prepare his people with all diligence. The Queene, at the laſt was brought into this hope of good fortune, that ſhe ſayd, well be it, and ſo as the Duke had aduiſed her, ſhe with her companie departed to Bathe, entendyng there to make her abode, till more of her affinitie were together aſſembled. But whether ſoeuer ſhe went, fewe or none had therof knowledge, miſtruſtyng leaſt her counſail ſhould by ſome Carytale, be publiſhed and opened to her aduerſaryes, before ſhe came to the place appoynted.

When king Edward knew that Quene Margaret was landed in England, & that the Duke of Somerſet with her complices had prepared a newe armie, out of hand he diſpatched certaine Currors on light horſes, into euery part to ſee what number his enemies were, and what way they entended to take. The Spyes, accordyng to their inſtructions, ſearched and ſought the partes by Weſt, and made relation diligently at their returne, what they had knowen and ſeene. The king beyng in a great agonie, becauſe he knewe not what way his enemyes tooke, determined, ſurely to encounter them at ſome one place before they came to London. And vpon this concluſion, with ſuch an armie as he had gotten about London, he ſet forward into Oxfordſhire, and there ſeekyng a place apt and meete to pitche his tentes, was conducted to Abyndon, where he encamped himſelfe, commaundyng all men appoynted for the warre, with all diligence to folowe him to that place. All the kinges hoſte there beyng aſſembled and gathered into one companie, newes were brought to him, that his enemies were come to Bathe, and there did ſoiorne and tary purpoſely to augment and encreaſe their number of ſuch as daily to them did reſorte: wherefore the king without delaye remoued ſtraight to Marleborough, beyng diſtant from Bathe .xv. miles, makyng haſt and great diligence, if by any poſſibilitie he might to geue them battaile before they returned into Wales, whether he thought (as they entended in dede) that they would take their iourney to ioyne themſelfe with the Erle of Penbroke, which had gathered a great hoſte in thoſe parties.

When the Queene knewe that king Edward was come ſo nere to her, ſhe taried not long at Bathe, but remoued in great haſt to Briſtow: and ſent out certeine horſemen, to eſpie whether ſhe might ſafely paſſe ouer the riuer of Seuerne by Glouceſter into Wales, whether ſhe determined firſt to go to augment her armie, and then without any delay, with ſpere and ſhielde, cou-

ragiously to set on her enemyes, wheresoeuer they would abyde. They that were sent, returned to her agayne, declaryng that the towne of Glouceſter was vnder the obeysance of Richard Duke of Glouceſter, the Kinges bro-ther, and that although they had solicited the Lord Beauchampe of Powike, which lay there in the Castell, and had the rule of the towne, and the townes men first by rewardes, after by manacing, eyther to take their part, or peace-ably to suffer her to passe ouer their bridge, they were therewithall, neither once moued, nor once would speake comfortably to the Messengers. When she hard these newes, she shortly departed from Bristow with her armie, to a proper towne on Seuerne syde, called Tewkesbury, leauyng Glouceſter vn-assaulted, least peraduenture she might there spend her tyme with much losse and little gaine, but in her passage towarde Tewkesbury, the Lorde Beau-champe tooke from her rereward more ordinance then she might haue well spared, which did to her no small preiudice. When the Queene was come to Tewkesbury, and knew that King Edward folowed her with his horsemen at the very backe, she was sore abashed, and wonderfully amased, and deter-mined in her selfe, to flie into Wales, to Jaspar Erle of Penbrooke: But the Duke of Sommerset, willyng in no wise to flie backward, for doubtes that he cased might chaunce by the way, determined there to tary, to take suche fortune as God would sende, and beyng fixed in a fayre Parke, adioinyng to the towne, he pitched hys fielde agaynst the will and consent of many o-ther Capitaines, which would that he should haue drawne aside, for a while till the Erle of Penbroke with his armie were with him associate, but his wil serued for his reason, and so the chaunce folowed. The Duke of Sommer-set entendyng to abyde the battaile, like a politike warriour, trenched hys campe rounde about of such an altitude, and so strongly, that his enemyes by no meanes easily could make any entry, and farther perceiuyng that his part could neuer escape without battaile, determined there to see the finall ende of his good or yll chaunce: wherfore he marshalled his hoste in this maner: he and the Lorde John of Sommerset his brother led the forewarde: The mid-dle warde was gouerned by the Prince, vnder the conduyte of the Lorde of Saint Johns, and Lorde Wenlocke (whome King Edwarde had highly be-fore preferred, and promoted to the degree of a baron.) The rereward was put in the rule of the Erle of Deuonshire.

The battaile of Tewkes-burie.

When all these battayles were thus ordered and placed, the Queene and her sonne Prince Edwarde rode about the field, encouragyng their soul-diors, promisyng to them (if they did shew themselues valiaunt against their enemyes) great rewardes and high promocions, innumerable gaine of the the spoyle, and bootye of their aduersaries, and aboue all other fame and re-noume through the whole Realme.

King Edward likewise which the day before was come within a mile of Tewkesbury, put his brother the Duke of Glouceſter in the forewarde, and himselfe in the middleward, the Lorde Marques, and the Lorde Hastyngs led the reregard. The Duke of Glouceſter, which lacked no pollicy, valiantly with his battayle assaulted the trenche of the Queenes Campe, whome the Duke of Somerset with no lesse courage defended, the Duke of Glouceſter for a very politique purpose, with all his men reculed backe. The Duke of Sommerset, perceiuyng that: lyke a Knight more couragious then circum-

ſpect, came out of his trenche with his whole battaile, and folowed the chaſe, not doubtyng but the prince and the Lorde Wenlocke, with the middleward had folowed iuſt at his backe. But whether the Lorde Wenlocke diſſimuled the matter for king Edwardes ſake, or whether his hart ſerued him not, ſtill he ſtoode lookyng on. The Duke of Gloucester takyng the aduauntage that he aduentured for, turned againe face to face, to the Duke of Sommerſets battaile, which (nothyng leſſe thinkyng on, then of the returne) were within a ſmall ſeaſon shamefully diſcomfited. The Duke of Sommerſet ſeeyng hys vnfortunate chaunce, returned to the middleward, where he ſeeyng the Lord Wenlocke ſtandyng ſtill, after he had reuiled him, and called him Traytor, with his Axe ſtrake the braynes out of his head. The Duke of Gloucester entred the trenche, and after him the king, where after no long conflict, the Queenes part went almoſt all to wracke, for the moſt part were ſlaine. Some fled for ſuccor in the thicke of the Parke, ſome into the Monaſtary, ſome into other places. The Queene was found in her Chariot almoſt dead for ſorow, the Prince was apprehended and kept cloſe by ſir Richard Crofts: the Duke of Sommerſet, and the Lorde Prior of Saint Johns, were by force taken priſoners, and many other alſo. In the field and chaſe were ſlain Lorde John of Sommerſet, the Erle of Deuonſhire, ſir John Delues, ſyr Edward Hampden, ſir Robert Wychingham, and ſir John Lewkenor, and three thouſand other.

A terrible ſtroke.

After the field ended, king Edward made a Proclamation, that who ſo euer could bring Prince Edward to him aliue or dead, ſhould haue an annuitie of an hundred pound during his life, and the Princes lyke to be ſaued. Sir Richard Croftes, a wiſe and a valiant knight, nothing miſtruſtyng the kings former promiſe, brought forth his priſoner prince Edward, beyng a goodly feminine, and a well featured yong Gentleman, whom when king Edward had well aduiſed, he demaunded of him, howe he durſt ſo preſumptuouſly enter into his realme with banner diſplayed. The prince beyng bold of ſtomack, and of a good courage, anſwered ſaiyng, to recouer my fathers kingdome and enheritage, from his father and grandfather to him, and from him, after him, to me lineally diſcended. At theſe wordes king Edward ſayde nothing, but with his hand thruſt him from him, (or as ſome ſay, ſtroke him with his gauntlet) whom incontinent, they ꝑ ſtoode about, which were George Duke of Clarence, Richard Duke of Gloucester, Thomas Marques Dorſet, and William Lord Haſtyngs, ſodainly ſtroke & cruelly murthered him. The bitterneſſe of which murder, ſome of the doers, after in their latter dayes taſted and aſſayed by the very rod of Juſtice and puniſhment of God. His bodye was homely enterred with the other ſimple corſes, in the Church of the Monaſtery of blacke Monkes in Tewkeſbury. This was the laſt ciuile battaile that was fought in king Edwardes dayes, which was foughten the thirde day of May, then beyng Saturday. And on the Monday next enſuyng was Edmond Duke of Sommerſet, John Longſtrother Prior of ſaint Johns, ſyr Garuays Clifton, ſyr Thomas Treſſham, and .xij. other knightes, and Gentlemen beheaded in the Market place of Tewkeſbury.

Queene Margaret brought priſoner to London.

Queene Margaret lyke a priſoner was brought to London, where ſhee remayned till king Reyner her father raunſomed her wyth money, which ſumme (as the French writers affirme) he borowed of king Lewys the .xi.

and because he was not of power nor abilitie to repay so great a duty, he solde to the French king and hys heyres the kingdomes of Naples, and both the Scicilies, with the Countie of Prouynce, which is the very tytle that king Charles the seauenth made, when he conquered the realme of Naples. After the raunsome payde, she was conueyed into Fraunce with small honor, which with so great triumph & honorable enterteynment, was with pompe aboue all pride, receyued into thys Realme. xxviij. yeres before. And where in the beginning of her tyme, she lyued lyke a Queene, in the middle she ruled lyke an Empresse, toward the ende she was vexed with trouble, neuer quyet nor in peace, and in her very extreme age she passed her dayes in Fraunce, more lyke death then lyfe, languishing and mourning in continuall sorowe, not so much for her selfe and her husbande, whose ages were almost consumed and worne, but for the losse of prince Edward her sonne (whome she and her husbande thought to leaue, both ouerlyuer of their progeny, and also of their kingdome) to whome in thys lyfe nothing could be eyther more displeasaunt or grieuous.

Thomas Neuill Bastard to the Lorde Fawconbridge rebellety.

After thys battayle, king Edwarde rendred to God hys most humble thankes, and with good diligence returned toward London, for he was enformed how one Thomas Neuel, Bastard sonne to Thomas Lorde Fauconbridge the valyaunt Capitayne, a man of no lesse courage then audacitie (who for hys euyll conditions was such an apt person, that a more meeter could not be chosen to set all the world in a broyle, and to put the estate of the realme in an yll hazarde) had of newe begon a great commocion. Thys Bastarde was before thys time appoynted by the Erle of Warwike to be Viceadmyrall of the sea, and had in charge so to keepe the passage betwene Douer and Calice, that none which either fauored king Edward or his friends should escape vntaken or vndrowned. And when by the death of the Erle of Warwike, he was brought into pouertie, he robbed both on the Sea and the lande, as well hys enemies as also his friendes: By reason where of he gat together a great Nauie of shippes, and spoyled on euery side, and at the laste tooke lande in Kent, and gathered together a great company of Kentish men, suche as were most meete for hys purpose, and so marched toward London, where the Esser men hauyng wylde whay wormes in their heades, ioyned them wyth him, sauing that their comming and quarell was to deliuer out of captiuity king Henry the sixt and to bring him to his wife, but whatsoeuer their outward wordes were, their inward cogitations were onely hope of spoyle, & desyre to rob and pill. For the Bastard himselfe assaulted the drawbridge of London, and a Capitayne of his called Spisyng scaled Algate with the Esser men, harnessed in their wyfes Cheesecloutes, which assaults were deadly geuen, and manfully resisted, in so much that on both partes many were slayne and hurt, but at the last the Citizens put back the rebelles, and slue and wounded a great number of them, and draue the Bastard from all hys pray to hys shippes, lyyng at Radclyffe, which hauing a good and prosperous winde, made sayle with all haste, and roued on the Sea, as before he was accustomed.

Thys stirring, although it were but little to thinke on at the first, yet if it had begon not long afore, it had brought all king Edwards businesse into a doubtfull difference: for king Edwarde in these his last battayles was twise more then fortunate for that, that he at sundry and seuerall times (and not all at one time) was persecuted and inuaded of hys enemies: for surely, at the time when the Erle of Warwike with hys pitched armie was comming towarde London, if Queene Margaret with her company had taken lande (which enterprise she thrise in great ieopardy corragiously attempted.) Then if she had set on behinde, whyle the Erle of Warwike gaue the onset before both at one moment, or if Edmond Duke of Sommerset had not geuen battayle at Tewkesburie, before Jasper Erle of Penbroke was come with hys trayne, or if Bastard Fawconbridge had vered the Londoners euen at that time: One or the other of these two things should consequently haue followed, that king Edward must of necessitie once againe flie out of the realme, or else with shame and rebuke yeelde hymselfe, eyther to slaughter or captiuitie: But as in all meane chaunces and small gaynes, good luck is desired and prayed, so much more in battayle, is good fortune to be most made off, and chiefely to be aduaunced.

Now to returne to Bastard Fawconbridge, wauering hether & thether in the doubtfull surges of the Sea, as sure of hys lyfe on the water as on the lande, which eyther thinking that no man would see hun, or that all men were blinde, and could not espie him (and especially in so secret a place) came into the open hauen of Southampton, and there tooke lande, where he was not long vntaken, but shortlier beheaded.

When Jasper Erle of Penbroke was credibly asserteyned that Quene Margaret had lost the battayle at Tewkesbury, and that there was no more trust of any comfort or relefe to be had for the part of poore king Henry, he wyth such men of warre as he was bringing to his confederates, returned back out of the way to the towne of Chepstow, where he tarying, bewayling and lamenting, that haste to much hasted, and that vnpurueyed and blinde wyll had at the finall conclusion, not onely destroyed and brought to naught all king Henries estate, ryches and preheminence, but farther had left all his friendes readie to tosse the waues of fortune, and to seeke their lyuing where they might safely get them, beganne to thinke and prouide what waye was best to take.

Roger Vaughan sodainly taken and beheaded

King Edwarde at thys season, not beyng out of feare of the Erle of Penbroke, sent priuily into Wales, Roger Vaughan, a man there both strog of people and of friendes, to the intent by some guyle or engyne sodainely to trap and surprise the Erle: but he hauing intelligence of certaine friendes, how that the watch was priuily layde for him, sodainely in the same towne, tooke Roger Vaughan, and without delay stroke of his head, so Roger Vaughan, by Gods prouidence, receyued the death hymselfe, which he by deceyt prepared for the other.

The Erle in good haste departed thence to Penbroke, whome incontinent Morgan Thomas, by king Edwards commaundement so strongly besieged, and so enuironed his Castell with a ditche and a trench, that he could not lightly flie or escape thence: but he was after eyght dayes deliuered, and the siege raysed by his faythfull and trusty friends Dauid Thomas, brother to the foresayde Morgan, and from thence conueyed to Tynbye, a Hauen towne in Wales, where he getting conuenient shippes for to transport him and his ouer the Sea into Fraunce, with his Nephew Lorde Henry Erle

of Richemond, and a fewe of his familiers toke ship, and by fortunes leading landed in Britaine.

After his arriuall, he first went to Duke Fraunces of Britayne, and him reuerently saluted, expounding to him the cause, the case, and the necessitie of their thether comming, committing the lyues, the goods, and al the chaunces both of him and his Nephew, wholy to the Dukes discretion and ordynaunce. The Duke receyued both the Erles with all benignitie, and shewed to them no lesse honor, fauor, and humanitie, with suche entertainment as if they had bene his naturall brethren, and geuing to them his fayth, that being with him, they should sustayne no maner of wrong, nor no iniurie should be to them by any creature offred: assuryng them, that they might within hys dominions, at all times, and in all places, go in safe and good suretie. The Erle of Penbroke with the erle of Richmond flie into Britaine.

When King Edwarde had appeased, by the meanes afore rehersed, his kingdome and people, to the intent that there shoulde insurge hereafter, no newe commocion within the realme againe: he made a iorney into Kent, and there sat in iudgement on such, as in the last tumulteous businesse, tooke part with bastard Fauconbridge, where many were, (not vnworthy) straightlye punished and raunsomed, which businesse once perfourmed, to the entent that all men might see apparantlye, that vndoubted peace was come into the realme, and that all feare of exterior hostilitie, was banished, and exiled for euer: Poore King Henry the first, a litle before deprined of his Realme, and Emperiall Crowne, was nowe in the Tower of London, spoyled of his life, and al worldly felicity, by Richard Duke of Gloucester (as the constant fame ranne) which, to the entent that king Edwarde his brother shoulde be cleere out of all secret suspicion, of sodayne inuasion, murthered the sayde king with a Dagger. But whosoeuer was the manqueller of this good man, it shal appeere, that both the murtherer, and the consenter, had condigne and not vndeserued punishment, for their bloodye stroke, and butcherly act: and beecause they had nowe no enemies risen, on whome they might reuenge themselues, as you shall hereafter perceiue, they exercised their crueltie, against their owne selues, and with their proper blood, imbrued and polluted their owne handes, and members. King Henry the first slaine in the tower.

The dead corps of king Henry, with billes and gleues pompeously (if you call that a funerall pompe) was conuayed from the Tower, to the church of Saint Paule, and there layed on the Beere, where it laye the space of one whole daye, and the next daye, without Priest or Clarke, Torch or Taper, singyng or saiyng, it was conuayed to the Monastery of Cherteley, beyng distant from London. xv. mile, and there was buried, but after he was remoued to Windsore, and there in a new vawte, newlye buried. This Kyng Henry reigned full. xxxviij. yeres, and xvij. dayes, and after that he repossessed his kingdome fiue monethes, and so he lyued in all. xlix. yeres and three monethes, hauyng by his wyfe one onelye sonne, called Edwarde Prince of Wales.

Kyng Henry was of stature goodlye, of body slender, to which proporcion, all other members were correspondent: his face beautifull, in the which continually was resident, the bountie of minde, with which he was inwardly endued. He did abhorre of his owne nature, all the vices, as well of the bodie, as of the soule, and from his very infancie, he was of honest conuersacion The discription of king Henry the first.

and pure integritie, no knower of euill, and a keeper of all goodneſſe: a deſpiſer of all things, which be wont to cauſe, the myndes of mortal men to ſlide, fall, or appaire. Beſide this, patience was ſo rooted in his hart, that of all the iniuries to him committed, (which were no ſmall number) hee neuer asked vengeaunce nor punishment, but for that rendred to almighty God, his hartie thankes, thinking that by his trouble, and aduerſitie, his ſinnes were to him forgotten, and forgiuen. What ſhall I ſaie, that this good, this gentle, this meeke, this ſober, and wiſeman, did declare and affirme, that theſe myſchiefes, and miſeries, partly came to him for his owne offence, and partly for the heping of ſinne vpon ſinne, wretchedly by his auncetors and forefathers: wherfore, he litle or nothing eſtemed, or in any wiſe did torment or vexe himſelfe, what ſo euer dignitie, what honor, what ſtate of lyfe, what childe, what friende he had loſt, or miſſed, but if it did but ſounde an offence towarde God, he loked on that, and not without repentaunce, and both mourned and ſorowed for it: This king Henry was of a liberall mind, & eſpecially, to ſuch as loued good learning, and them whom he ſaw profite in any vertuous ſcience, he hartilye fauored and imbraced: wherefore he firſt holpe his owne yong ſcholers, to attaine to diſcipline, and for them he founded a ſolempne ſchoole at Eton, a towne nexte vnto Wyndſore, in the which he hath ſtabliſhed, an honeſt Colege of ſad Prieſtes, with a great numbre of Children which be there, of his coſt frankly, and freely taught, the rudiments and rules of Grammer.

Beſide this, he edified a Princely College, in the Vniuerſitye of Cambrige, called the kings College, for the further erudicion, of ſuch as were brought vp in Eton, which at this day ſo floriſheth, in all kindes, as well of literature,

But nowe to returne to king Edward, which was releeued of the moſt part, of his pricking feare, and inwarde ſuſpicion, to the intent that no print, or ſhadowe, ſhoulde remayne of the aduerſe faction, in his realme. He dilygently inquired, and ſearched out, all the fragmentes and leauings, of his enemies part, intending to erpreſſe, and vtterly to extinguiſhe them. And firſt to begyn with all, he ſent George Neuell, brother to the Erle of Warwicke, and Archbyſhope of Yorke, vnder a ſtrong conduite, to the Caſtle of Guiſnes there to be kept in extreme captiuitie, where he long continued, and at the laſt by frienſhip deliuered: which of very penſiueneſſe and grudge of minde, ſhortly after deceaſſed, whom Laurence Bathe, and after him Thomas Rotheram, in the See of Yorke, did ordinarily ſucceede. Beſyde this, John Erle of Oxenford, which after Barnet field, both manfully gat, & valiauntly kept, Saint Michaels Mount in Cornewall: eyther for lacke of ayde, or perſwaded by his friendes, gaue vp the Mount, and yelded himſelfe to king Edward (his life onely ſaued) which to him was graunted: but to be out of all doubtfull imaginacions, king Edward ſent him ouer the ſea, to the Caſtell of Hammes, where, by the ſpace of .xij. yeres, he was in ſtrong priſon, miſerably kept, and diligently looked to. Many other beſyde theſe, in diuers partes of the realme, beyng very little or nothing ſuſpected: were either cõmitted to priſon, or grieuouſly fined and tared. Beſyde this, leaſt his neighbors Countrie, might be an harborough, or receptacle of his foes and aduerſaries, he concluded a newe league, with James the thirde king of Scots, for the terme of .xx. yeres. And yet, whatsoeuer he thought in his imagination, for all his busie deuises, and politique forecastynges: his minde and phantasie, was not clerely exhonorate and dispatched, of all feare and inward trouble: For tidynges were brought to him, that the Erles of Penbroke and Richemond, were arriued in Britayn: and there of the Duke, highly cherished and entertayned.

The Erle of Richmond & Penbroke arriued in Britayn.

This thing nipped king Edward hardly at the very stomack, as though his minde casting some euill to come after: did signifie before, that the Erle of Richemond, should once attaine to the Crowne and diademe of the realme: which mischiefe, when he had well digested, he secretly sent wise and close Messengers to the Duke of Britayne, the which should not sticke, to promise the Duke great and sumptuous rewardes, (knowyng that meede maye thinges corrupteth) so that he would deliuer, both the Erles into their handes and possession. The Duke gladly heard them that were sent, but when he knewe the two Erles to be a pray, of such a great value, he determined not to deliuer them, but rather to entertaine them with him more diligently, then they were accustomed. The Duke answered the Ambassadors, that it stoode not with his honor, nor he would not deliuer the two Erles, to whom he was bound and obliged, by his fayth and promise: but this he promised to doe for the kinges pleasure, that they should be kept, and with such vigilant persons continually watched, that the king should haue no maner of cause, once to thinke, that they could or should attempt any thing, that might sounde, either to his displeasure or preiudice. When the Messengers sawe, that they could not obteyne that which they desired, like wise men held themselues contented with that, which by the Duke was offered, and so returned into Englande. The king wrote to the Duke of Britayn, louyngly requiryng him, to accomplishe with all spede, that which he of his awne motion offered, promisyng him not onely, men and great rewardes, but freely to rewarde him wyth a full hande, and a well stuffed purse. The Duke perceiuyng the swete gaine, which rose to him, by the abode of the two Englishe Erles, in his Countrie: least they for any cause, should abandon his Dominions, and seeke succors in some other forayn Region, caused the one to be seperated from the other: and remoued from them such Englishe men, as were dayly on them attendant, and came with them into Britayn, and in their places appoynted Britons, to be their seruitors, to minister, and continually to attende and waite on them.

When king Edward had thus pollitiquely (as he thought) compassed the Duke of Britayn: he thinkyng nothing lesse, then to take a dammage at the Duke of Burgoynes hande, yea, and such a dammage, as by all similitude, was both like, continually to grieue the realme of England: and further to be an occasion, of a common stoppe, and puttyng backe of the commodities, growen within this realme, to be transported into outward partes, North, East warde, was yet eftsones brought into a newe doubt and perplexitie. For the declaration whereof, you must vnderstand, that Lewys the Frenche king, had a brother called Charles, which was not the wisest, nor yet a man of the greatest experience: and of a certaine curtisie, loued better to haue other men to rule him, then he to take vpon him to rule other. And although that the king at this tyme had no sonne, nor other brother, but him, his open

heyre apparant: he little fauored, and leſſe loued him, nothing geuyng him of his good will, for his part and portion, of his fathers landes, but that to the which he was compelled by his counſaile, and that he gaue him this Moneth, in the next Moneth, he would by flattery, or by threatnyng, by warre or corruption of his brothers ſeruauntes, obteyne and bring to his handes, and poſſeſſion againe. For firſt he gaue him the Duchie of Berry, and after that whole Normandie, whereof in no long time, he bereft him the poſſeſſion, regiment, and title, without any cauſe geuen, on the partie of yong Charles. And when the ſayde Charles, had afterward departed with the Countries of Brye, and Champaigne, by a fraudulent feate: King Lewys cauſed him to relinquiſhe the ſame, and to take for his parentage, the Duchie of Guien, and ſo was called and named the Duke of Guyen. This euill entreatyng of the Duke of Guyen, by the Frenche King his brother, cauſed diuers other princes, of no ſmall puyſſaunce, to fauor, ayde, and ſuccor the ſayde Duke, of the which the chiefe were, Charles Duke of Burgoyne, Fraunces Duke of Britteyn, and Lewys Erle of Saint Poll, Conſtable of Fraunce. This Duke of Guyen, by the ſollicityng of his adherentes, ſore labored to haue in maryage, the ſole daughter and onely heyre, of Charles Duke of Burgoyne, by whom he hoped to be Lord and ſouereigne, of all Duke Charles inheritaunce. To the further aunce of this mariage, holpe with all his power, the Duke of Britteyn, as who ſayd, that it ſhould be onely his acte. The Conſtable of Fraunce on the other part, thought that he alone, was able to compaſſe this mariage, and to haue onely the thankes of the Duke of Guyen. The French King did all that he coulde, to let and ſtop this mariage: for if his brother had obteined the yong Lady with all her poſſeſſions, then he ſaw wel enough, that ỹ Duke of Guien, beyng ioyned with the Duke of Britteyn, ſhould be ſtrong enough, or at the leaſt of puiſſance to encomber the French king and his children. But king Edward of England, ſore ſmoked, when he heard firſt tell of this mariage, & not without a cauſe: For he conſidered, that the Frenche King had no heyre male, but one weake boy, and that the Duke of Guyen, was likely to weare the crowne of Fraunce, after his brother or nephewe. And if this mariage ſhould proceede, all Burgoyn, Brabant, Holland, Zeland, Flaunders, and all the lowe Countries, where the Engliſhe men for the moſt part, made their martes, and vttered there their marchandice, ſhould be united and annexed to the Crowne of Fraunce, and in the handes of the olde and auncient enemies of the realme: For ſo had poore England, and little Calice, beene continually in the daunger of their enemies, almoſt with them enuironed round about. Theſe thinges conſidered, king Edward and his Counſaile, tooke the matter in great earneſt, and ſeriouſly wrote to Duke Charles, that if he would conclude any mariage in Fraunce, to the hurt and preiudice of the realme of Englande: that he ſhoulde knowe that he had, not onely broken his league and amitie, but alſo finde, that he had beene better to haue diſſimuled, with the beſt friend that he had, then priuily without reaſon, to haue iuggled with the realme of England. The Duke of Burgoyne made reaſonable aunſweres, and honeſt excuſes, but the Counſaile of England, in no wiſe would geue credite thereto: euer ſurmiſyng that the mariage ſhoulde take effect. And certainly at this ſeaſon, the Engliſh men had rather haue taken part, with the French King then with the Duke of Burgoyne: if it had not bene onely, to empeche and ſtop this mariage, ſo much the Engliſhmen diſdayned, to haue the houſe of Burgoin, conioyned and vnited to the crowne of Fraunce. But the Duke of Burgoyn dalied, and diſſimuled with all parties, in this matter, geuyng them fayre wordes, and makyng large promiſes, by the which he firſt deceyued other, and in concluſion himſelfe. He promiſed his daughter, to Nicholas Duke of Calaber, with whom, he had rather haue had her buried, then bedded. Duke Philbert of Sauoy, had an outward anſwere aſſuredly, when nothing was ſo minded inwardly. Maximilian Duke of Iuſtriche, and after king of Romaynes, ſonne to the Emperour Frederick, could neuer obteyne duryng the lyfe of Duke Charles, but onely gloſyng and paynted promiſes, but all wordes, writings and promiſes, what ſoeuer they were, clerely ſet aſyde, he was ſurely fixed and determined (as Comines his Counſaylor doth write) that no maryage as long as he liued, ſhould ſort to any effect, at the leaſt by his conſent. Nowe let vs leaue the Duke of Burgoyne about hys affayres for a whyle, and returne to king Edwarde: which in the. xiij. yere of hys reigne called hys high Court of parliament, at his Palace of Weſtminſter, in the which, all lawes and ordinaunces, made by hym before that day were corroborated and confirmed: and ſuche Lawes made by him, as king Henry the firſt, had cauſed to be abrogated and adnichilated, he agayne renuued and remued. He made farther lawes as well for the confiſcation of the goodes of the rebelles to his perſon, as alſo for the reſtoring of ſuche as fled out of the realme, for the quarell and occaſion: which by his aduerſaries, as traytors to their king and Country, a little before were of high treaſon attaynted, and to death condempned. Toward hys charges of late ſuſteyned, a competent ſomme of money was demaunded, and frankely graunted: and in concluſion, all inward grudges and open diſcordes, the which had of long continued, in the hartes of the Nobilitie, which now were very fewe (the more part being conſumed in the warres) he cleerely extirped, and brought to vnitie and concorde. King Edwarde holpe to this agreement, as much as in him lay: And to the intent that other men ſhould forget iniuries to them done, and put away all rancor and malice: followyng hys good and godly example, he clerely pardoned almoſt all offences, and all men then being within the realme, he frankly diſcharged, although they had taken part with his aduerſaries agaynſt hym, of all high treaſons and crimes. A generall pardon.

Whyle king Edwarde was thus ſetting an order, and pacifiyng of all things, which were out of square: Charles Duke of Burgoyne, whoſe ſpirite was neuer in quiet, deſyring as well to amplifie, and enlarge his territories and dominions, lying on the ſyde of the ryuer of Ryne, towarde high Burgoyne, as alſo to recouer agayne Amias and other townes, which the French king more by fraude, than by feates of warre, had from him wrongfully vſurped: and further aboue all things, couetyng to haue the Frenche king to haue ſome great ſhame, loſſe, or hinderaunce, could not inuent no one waye ſo apt and meete for his imagined purpoſe, as to entiſe and perſwade the king of Englande by his Ambaſſadors, to make warre vpon the ſayde king and hys Countrie: for the recouering of his olde right and auncient tytle in the ſame, by the French king and his father, agaynſt all right and equitie, witholden and deteyned. King Edward began a little to harken on that ſide, not ſo much for to helpe the Duke of Burgoyne (to whome he was much bounde, for his ayde in the time of hys exile, as you before haue heard) as for to be reuenged of king Lewys, whom he reputed for his mortall enemie. Firſt for ayding the Erle of Warwike and hys complices againſt him: ſecondarily, for the long maintayning and foſtering of Queene Margaret, and her ſonne Prince Edward (whome for a farther affinitie, he made Godfather to hys ſonne Charles the Dolphyn) within hys Countryes and dominions. Wherupon, when he had conſulted with the Nobilitie & the chiefe and ſage perſons of ỹ realme (which in maner haue a certain naturall inclination to make warre in Fraunce, eyther for hope of great ſpoyle and gayne, or of a certayne priuie canker engendred in the hartes of their forefathers, in time long paſt, and after by lyneall ſucceſſion deſcended into the ſtomacks of their Nephewes) he aunſwered the Dukes meſſenger, that in the beginning of the yere, he would land at Calice with ſuch a puyſſaunt army, that the french king ſhould well perceyue that he lacked neyther men, nor ỹ hys men lacked ſtomacks, both for to reuenge their ſouereignes quarel, & alſo to recouer his right. And for a truth, at thys ſeaſon there was mortall warre betweene king Lewys and the Duke of Burgoyne: And more lykely to fall betweene hym and other, for king Lewys of nature was hard of ſpeech, and churliſhe in anſwere, froward and vngentle as wel to his friends as to his foes. By reaſon whereof many great men within the realme of Fraunce, not content with hys groſſe rudeneſſe, and rude diſſimulation began to haue intelligence, and to cleue to the Duke of Burgoyne, amongſt whome was Lewys of Lurenborough, Erle of Saint Paule, and Conſtable of Fraunce, which being confedered wyth the Duke and other noble men, determined ſo to vexe & ſcurge king Lewys with ſome plague, by the which eyther he ſhould be tranſformed into a man, clere altered from hys olde qualities, or elſe ſhould be in ieoperdie both of loſſe of life and realme, for it was determined that Fraunce ſhould be ſet on and aſſaulted both with outward enemies, and inward diſſimulers. All theſe things the Duke of Burgoyne with King Edward, did communicate, to the intent the ſooner to allure and prouoke him, to enterpriſe the warre, according to hys deſire. Theſe things as tokens of victorie before, encouraged King Edward, and enforced him in maner to make warre on Fraunce, and ſo with all expedition prepared all things neceſſarie, both for water and lande. And becauſe no ſmall ſumme of money was ſufficient for ſo great a charge, and that the money the yere before to him auaunced by the realme, was conſumed in his houſhold, and other neceſſarie affayres, he conceyued a newe deuiſe in hys imagination, by the which engine he might couertly perſwade and entiſe hys riche friends to geue and graunt him ſome conuenient ſumme of money toward his great charges, and incredible coſts, which thing if they did not wyllingly aſſent to, he then would impute to them much vnkindneſſe, wherupon he cauſed hys officers to bring to him the moſt ryche perſons, one after another, and to them he explaned the cauſe, and the purpoſe, and the neceſſitie of the warre begon, and the faintneſſe and weakeneſſe of hys treaſure, and the great importunate lack of money, hartily requiring them for the loue and affection that alwaies they had borne to him, being their naturall Prince, of their awne gratuitie and freewyll to geue to him ſome aide of money, for maintenaunce of hys warre and armie: what ſhould

ſhould I ſaye more? Thys inuention came to thys effect, that ſome calling to their remembraunce, the benefites of hym receyued, ſome wyth ſhame, ſome wyth feare moued and encouraged, gaue to hym liberally both of their ſubſtaunce and treaſure, which wythout grudge he could not haue otherwiſe obteyned. But here I will not let paſſe a prette concept that happened in this gathering, in the which you ſhall not onely note the humilitie of a king, but more the phantaſie of a woman. King Edward had called before him a Wydow, much abounding in ſubſtaunce, and no leſſe growen in yeres, of whom he merily demaunded what ſhee gladly would geue him towarde hys great charges? By my truth quoth ſhe, for thy louely countenance thou ſhalt haue euen. xx. pound, the king looking ſcarce for the halfe of that ſumme, thanked her and louingly kyſt her, whether the flauor of his breath did ſo comfort her ſtomack, or ſhe eſtemed the kiſſe of a king, ſo precious a iewell, ſhee ſwore incontinently that he ſhould haue. xx. pounde more, which ſhe with the ſame will payde that ſhe offered it. The king wylling to ſhewe that thys benefite was to him much acceptable, and not worthy to be put in oblition, called this graunt of money a beneuolence, notwithſtãding that many with grudge and maleuolence gaue great ſummes toward that new found beneuolence. But the vſing of ſuche gentle faſhions toward them, with friendly prayer of their aſſiſtance in his neceſſitie, ſo tempted them that they could no otherwiſe doe, but frankely and freely yeelde and geue hym a reaſonable ayde.

A mery note.

A beneuolẽce

And here I finde noted that Doctor Woodlarke, Prouoſt of the kings College in Cambridge, did at this time builde Katheryn Hall in Cambridge.

When all things conuenient for ſuch an enterpriſe were in a readineſſe. king Edwarde with his armye went to Douer, where he founde fiue hundred ſhippes and Hoyes, readie to tranſport him and his armie ouer the ſea. And ſo he himſelfe with his nobilitie warlikely accompanied, paſſed ouer betweene Douer and Calice, the fourth day of July, and landed at Calice wyth great triumph, his armie, horſes, and munitions of warre ſcarce paſſed ouer in. xx. dayes (whome the French men bragged ſhoulde haue beene taken if they had well conſidered the chaunce before, as they knew it after.) When king Edwarde with all his armye royall, was without any trouble landed, and in ſuertie, he cauſed euery man according to his degree, to be ordered and lodged. This armie by the writing of Comines, was the fayreſt and the ſtrongeſt armie that paſſed out of Englande into Fraunce manye yeres before, for the men were ſo well armed, and ſo ſurely in all things appointed, and prouided, that the French nacion were not onely amaſed to behold them, but much more prayſed them, and there order. In this armye, were. xv. C. men of armes, well horſed, of the which the moſt part were barded and richlye trapped, after the moſt Galiarde faſhion, hauing manye horſes decked in one ſuyte. There were farther. xv. M. Archers, bearyng bowes & arrowes, of the which a great part were on horſeback. There were alſo, a great number of fightyng men, and other, aſwell to ſet vp tents & Pauilions (where of the Engliſhmen had great plenty) as to ſerue their artilary & to encloſe their campe, or other wiſe to labor. And in all this army there was not one page.

King Edward paſſeth ouer with an armie into Fraunce.

A great armye.

The king of Englande was at his arriuall highlye diſpleaſed with the Duke of Burgoyn, which in the worde of a Prince, promiſed him to meete him at his landyng with two. M. men of armes, and light horſemen, beſyde

a great number of Launceknights, and Halberders, and that he would haue begonne the warre three moneths before the kings tranſporting, the more to vere and greeue the French king, and to cauſe him to ſeeke his wittes. The Duke of Burgoyn at this ſeaſon, laye at ſeege before the ſtrong towne of Nuyce, with a puiſſant army, againſt whome were of Nuyce aſſembled the Emperor Frederike, and almoſt the whole Empire, for the reſcue of the towne, to whome the king of Englande ſent the Lorde Scales in poſt, requiryng him to leaue his voyde ſeege before the ſtrong towne of Nuyce, and to returne in all haſte with his people and armie to make warre in Fraunce, according to his promiſe, and othe, declaryng farther that the time paſſed and the Sommer woulde be loſt, with this charge the Lord Scales departed in all haſte toward the Duke, whom we will leaue, ridyng towarde Nuyce for a while.

O Fraunce, Fraunce, how much art thou bound to laude and prayſe thy Sauior, for thy deliueraunce, in the time of thy affliction. For if God had not permitted the cancared hart of the Duke, to be indurate, nor his weake brain to be vered, nor yet his ambicious affection to be enflamed, ſo that he with all his power had ioyned with the army of Englande on the one ſide, hauing on the other ſide, the Duke of Britaine with his power: Theſe three princes had bene like to haue made Fraunce, either to bow, or to breake.

King Edward ſendeth a letter of defiaunce vnto the French king.

Before king Edwarde departed from Douer, he ſent to the Frenche king an officer of armes (whome Comines vntruelye calleth Garter borne in Normandy, for the roome of Gartier was neuer geuen to no ſtraunger) which herault deliuered to the French king with all dewe reuerence, a letter of defiaunce, both for the ſtile and the penning excellently endited, which the Frenchmen woulde ſcant beleue to be framed by an Engliſhman. The letter required the French king, to render to the king of Englande, the realme of Fraunce to him of right, and by lineall enheritance, appertaining, and belonging, to the intent that he might put agayne the church, the Nobilitie, and the commons, into their auncient eſtates, and liberties, and to diſburden, and exonerate them of the great charges, trauayles, & labors, that they nowe were in. And in caſe that he did refuſe ſo to doe, then he dyd proteſt the harme that ſhoulde enſue, in the forme and maner, that in ſuch a caſe is requiſite, and accuſtomed to be done. King Lewys red the letter ſecretly to himſelfe, and after all alone in a great ſtudy withdrew himſelfe into his warderobe, and ſending for the Engliſh Herault, ſayde to him, ſyr, I knowe, and well wot, that the king of Englande your maiſter, is neither deſcended in theſe partes of his owne free motion, nor yet of vs required, but onely entiſed and prouoked by the Duke of Burgoyn, & ſomewhat enforſed by the commons of his realme. But nowe you may ſee that the ſeaſon of the yere paſſeth, and the Duke of Burgoyn is in poore eſtate, returning from Nuyce all moſt diſcomforted. The Conſtable alſo, with whome the king your ſouereigne Lorde, I am ſure hath ſome intelligence, for fauour that your mayſter hath maried hys Neece, is not ſo ſure a friend as he is taken for, and if all the worlde knewe how I haue promoted him, and what I haue done for him, they would litle thinke, that he would ſo vntruely handle me as he doth, for I aſſure you, he is a deepe diſſimuler, and in continuall diſſimulation entendeth to lead his lyfe, entertayning all men for his awne profite. And although the king your maiſter maiſter be vnſure of all his other promiſes, yet of one thing he ſhall be ſure, that is, he ſhall be euer diſſimuled withall, & therfore I ſaye to you, and not to your maiſter, that he were better haue a peace with an olde enemie, then the promiſes and familiaritie of a newe diſſimuling friend, which peace moſt pleaſeth God, and is the thing that I moſt doe deſyre. When he had ſayde, he gaue to the Herault three hundred Crownes, promiſing him a thouſande crownes, if any good appointment came to paſſe. The Herault being more couetous of the crownes, then ſecret, according to the dutie of his office, promiſed to doe all things that in him laye, not doubting but that the king hys maiſter would be conformable to any reaſonable offer, aduyſing the French king (after king Edwarde were once landed) to ſend hym a Herault, to fetch a ſauecondupt and paſport, for ſuch as ſhould labor and trauayle in that treatie. And that the ſayde Herault ſhould firſt reſort to the Lord Standley, or to the Lorde Haward, for the conducting of him to the kinges preſence, when the Herault ſhould departe, the king gaue him a peece of Crimoſen Ueluet of.xxx. yardes long, commaunding and ſtraightly chargmg, that no man ſhould be ſo hardie once to commen with hym, but to let him paſſe in all gentle faſhion. When the Herault was gone, king Lewys calling to hym. viij. or. viij. of his familiers, cauſed the letter to be red, of the which he was but a little afrayd and leſſe abaſhed, conſidering the Engliſh Herault had ſhewed him playnely how to enter into the port of the treatie, and in maner howe to gayne and conquer the fortreſſe, of which information he was not a little ioyous, and wiſely and ſecretly according to the ſame, when he ſaw his time, he proſecuted his purpoſe. In this very ſeaſon, the Lorde Scales came to the Duke of Burgoyne before Nuyce, accompting to hym his meſſage, as he was commaunded. The Duke of Burgoyne, beyng ſo ſore ſet to conquer the towne of Nuyce, aunſwered the Lorde Scales, that his honor was loſt, and ſhame ſhould be ſpoken of him through all chriſtendome, if he ſhoulde raiſe his fielde and breake his ſiege, but he hoped ſhortly to gayne the towne, and then with triumphant victorie, to come to ayde king Edwarde with hys whole army: with this aunſwere the Lorde Scales departed, which onely aunſwere was commen without any other augmentation, to all ſuch as king Edward ſent, to haue the Duke to kepe hys promiſe. What a foly was thys in Duke Charles, to beſiege a towne impregnable, euen at the ſame time when the Engliſhe men at his requeſt had paſſed the ſea, which thing all the time of his regiment, he had both trauayled in, and ſore required, and neuer could compaſſe till thys ſeaſon, and alſo all things beyng well diſpoſed for his purpoſe, both in Britayne & in other places, except he more regarded to conquere a newe towne, then to defend all hys olde poſſeſſions and ſeigniories. But ſhortly after by the Byſhop of Romes aucthoritie, he left Nuyce vnconquered, but leeſing a great number of hys people, and the remnaunt he ſent into Lorayne and Barroys, there to lye and trouble Duke Reyner of Lorayn, which a little before had defied him, lyng before Nuyce. And he himſelfe wyth a ſmall company came to king Edwarde before Calice, wyth whome king Edwarde at the firſt comming began ſomewhat to be grieued, laiyng to hys charge that at hys mocion, requeſt, and deſyre, he with all hys armie had paſſed the Seas onely to the intent wyth mortall warre, to plague and ſcourge the prowde realme of Fraunce. And that he leauing all things

(which should molest or trouble the French king) a part, applyed hymselfe to matters of Lorayne, and externe Nations, more then to reuenge the open iniuries to hym done by hys neighbour the French king. The Duke excused hymselfe wyth ieoparding the losse of hys honor, if he had returned from Nuyce, and also that of necessitie, he was compelled to leaue his armie in Lorayne, to be reuenged ouer Duke Reyner, which had him before Nuyce with spitefull wordes and rayling termes defied and detested: affirming farther, that nowe in the beginning with a small companye, a great enterprise might be gayned. In proufe whereof he delyuered to the king letters of credence, sent from the Constable of Fraunce, which wylled the king to geue credite and perfite fayth to the Duke, in making relacion of such secrets as were to him geuen in charge to declare to the kinges awne person. First he shewed that although the Constable had promised to the king and the Duke, to render vp to them the towne of Saint Quintines, yet it had not come to so good effect, if it had bene yeelded, the Duke beyng in Germany, as it now shall, the king and the Duke being both personally present, at the deliuerance. Wherefore he exhorted the king to set forwarde, and to display hys Banner, and to set forth his standard. And so by hys motion, the king accompanyed wyth the Duke, hys armye departed out of Calice, and passed by Boleyne to Perone, where the Englishe men thought themselues of the Duke, more lyke enemies then friendes to be enterteyned, for at the gates entred but a fewe that were appointed, the remnant lodged in the fieldes, better purueyed of their awne, then of the Dukes prouision.

The king of England thinking surely that the Constable ment all truth, and the sooner enduced to that credence, because the Constable was great Uncle to the Quene hys wyfe, where in very deede, he nothing lesse minded then trouth, remoued hys Campe from Peron, the Duke of Burgoyne beyng in hys armye, and marched towarde Saint Quintines: certayne Englishe men ranne before the towne, against whose comming they thought that the belles should haue bene rong, and the gates set open. But when they approched the towne, the artillarie began to shote, and they of the towne came out both on foote and horseback, and skirmished with the Englishe men, of which two or three were slayne. This welcome seemed verye straunge to king Edward, pondering together yester dayes promise, and thys dayes doing. The Duke would not that the king should desist from his purpose, because the towne was not yeelded at the sight of a handfull of people, which thing he sayde, although the Constable would gladly haue done, at the first, yet he woulde haue a couler to doe it, as though it shoulde appere that he did it by very compulsion and force: and therefore if the king woulde make but semblance to besiege the towne, he would warrant, that incontinent it should be rendred. The king of England perceyuing that he was deluded in his first enterprise, thought it more surer to heare the fayre wordes of the Constable, and the Duke, then to geue credite to their vntrue and deceytfull doings. The Englishe men returned to their campe, verie yll content, murmuring against the Constable, calling him Traytor, periured and vntrue Gentleman. Beside thys anger, there came the next day another corsey, that smarted a little sorer, for Duke Charles of Burgoyne, by whose meanes king Edward had taken vpon him thys warre, either perceyued that all the

Constables

Constables promises were but faire sunne shinyng, sweetely spoken, and sowerly performed, or else he sawe that he himselfe lacked men or money, to proceede farther with king Edward in his iorney: tooke his leaue sodainely of the king of Englande, saiyng that he must needes visite, and see his armie in Berroys, promising shortly with all puyssaunce to returne agayne to the great aduantage and commoditie of them both, and so in haste departed.

This departyng was both displeasant and straunge to the king of England, considery̆ng that in hope to haue the Duke his continuall felow in armes, and to haue his counsaile in the order of his people (which of late had not frequented the warre of Fraunce, nor yet perfectly knewe the force, the agilitie and the maner of the frenche nacion) had passed the Seas, rayled hys standard, and by the Dukes procurement entred into the lande of his enemies, and nowe to be left alone without guyde or leader, without ayde or succor, in the middle of his foes, he could no lesse thinke, but that the Duke neyther vsed him like a Prince, nor yet kept his promise like a true man, which vnstable & dissimuling working, caused, yea, & rather enforced king Edward both to thinke that he neuer thought, and to do that he neuer entended to doe. The Englishe men sore murmured agaynst the Constable, & no lesse against the Duke, sauyng they determined neuer to geue confidence to ỳ Constables wordes, and greatly doubted, whether they might geue any credite to the Dukes promise. Thus lay the Englishe men in the fieldes, when the colde nightes began to wax long, without any gaine of conquest, which caused the common people, which be not alwayes content with hardnesse, rather to desire to turne homeward, then to procede any dayes iourney forwarde. The French king which was both wilie and wittie (and especially for his awne purpose) knewe by his espials, the vntrue refusall made by the Constable, the vnfriendly departyng of the Duke of Burgoyn, and the dayly murmuryng of the Englishe men, agaynst them both: wherefore he thought now, that it was very expedient, to folow the counsaile of the Englishe Herault, in sendyng for a safeconduite, for metyng of Ambassadors, to common of a treatie, if it might be well compassed. But yet to auoyde all doubtes, he rayled an armie, and the more he perceyued the power of his enemies to encrease, the more he studyed how by power to resist them, and ouer that armie he made Capitaine, Monsire Robert de Estoteuile, a baliant man, whome, he sent into Arthoys, to defende the frontiers there, agaynst the king of Englandes entrie and inuasions: and he himselfe taryed still at Senlis. The frenche king beyng thus priuily desirous of peace, although he outwardly shewed the countenaunce of Mars: meanyng quietnesse, and settyng forth warre, caused a barlet to be suborned, in a cote armure of Fraunce (which for haste, was made of a Trompet banner) because king Lewys was not much desirous, nor greatly passed on honour, and seldome had in his Court, eyther officer of Armes or Trompet: which barlet was wel encouraged, and no lesse instructed, howe to do his message (which was deliuered to him in writyng) both with a bolde countenaunce, and a sober demeanure. This counterfeite Herault, although he was but a barlet in dede, was both wittie and well spoken, and so rode in sad maner, nere to the Englishe armie, and there put on his cote of Armes. The Englishe outscourers perceiuyng by his cote, that he was an officer of Armes, gently saluted him, and enquired of him, whether his iourney lay: he sadly answered, that his message was from the French king, to the king of Englande. Then was he conueyed to the tent, where the Lord Hayward, and the Lord Stanley, with other were at dinner, where he was highly enterteyned, and no lesse welcomed. And after dinner, he was brought before the king, in whose presence, with a bolde audacitie, and no fearefull speche, he declared first his credence, because he was an officer of Armes, (to whome, credite by the law of all nations ought to be geuen) and secondarily, he published the thinges, to him geuen in charge and commaundement, saiyng.

Right high and mightie Prince, if your excellent wisedome did perfectly knowe: what inward affection, and feruent desyre, the king my Mayster hath alwayes had, to haue a perfect peace, a sure vnitie, betweene your noble person, and your Realme, and his honourable personage, and his Dominions, you would (and for truthes sake) should confesse & say, that neuer Christian Prince, more thirsted for an amitie, to the entent that the subiects of both the Realmes, quietly liuyng vnder two Princes, confederate and combined together, in an indissoluble confederacie and league, may mutually embrace eche other in their heartes, and frequent eche others Princes, territories, and Dominions, with their Marchandises and wares: And finally, the one to liue with the other, as friend with friend, and brother with brother, in continuall loue, rest, and tranquilitie. And for his part he doth affirme and saye, that sith he receyued first the Crowne of his kingdome, he neuer attempted nor yet once imagined, any warre, or thing preiudiciall towarde your royall person, your realme, or your people. If you peraduenture will say, that he supported, and mainteyned the Erle of Warwicke, agaynst your Maiestie, he surely that doth and will denie: For he ayded him agaynst the Duke of Burgoyn, whom, he knewe not onely to be his extreme enemy, but also to lay in waite, both by sea and lande, eyther to take him, or vtterly to destroye him. Which Duke of Burgoyne, onely for his awne cause, hath excited and sollicited your highnesse, to come ouer the troublous Seas, to the entent to cause (yea, in maner to compell) the king my maister, to condescend to suche treatie and appoyntment, as should be to his onely profite, and neyther to your honour, nor yet to your gaine. For if he and such other, as dayly flattered him for their peculiar profites, (as he had many in dede, that dayly sucked at his elbow) had once obteyned the thing, that they breathed for, all your affayres were put in oblition, and left at large for them, or their assistance, euen as they be at this day. Hath not the Duke of Burgoyne caused you, first to come into Fraunce: after to set forwarde your armie, and in conclusion, for lacke of his promise, to leese the fayre season of the yere, and to lye in the fieldes in Winter? Which warre if it continue, shall neyther be profitable to you, nor yet to your nobilitie: And finally to both the Realmes, and especially to Marchant men, shall bring both miserie, pouertie, and calamitie. Came the Duke of Burgoyn from Nuce to Calice, onely to visite you? Rode he all that poste haste, onely to blinde you? Returned he backe into Lozeyn againe for any cause, but onely to leaue you desolate, and to abandon you? Did he or the Constable kepe any one promise with you? Why do you then beleue, and yet still trust them, in whom you neuer founde fayth nor fidelitie? But if God will it so ordaine, that you and my Mayster, may ioyne in a league and amitie, tie, I dare both say and swere, that the fine steele neuer cleued faster to the Idamant stone, than he will sticke and claspe with you, both in welth and wo, in prosperitie and aduersitie: And if it shall please you, to harken to any reasonable treatie, I beyng a poore man, shall on ieopardie of my lyfe (which is my chiefest treasure) vndertake, that this communication shall sort, and come to such an effect, that both you and your Nobilitie, shall be glad and reioyce, and your Commons shall be contented and pleased, and they that haue deceyued you, shall be both abashed and ashamed: Most humbly beseechyng your highnesse, if your pleasure shall encline this waye, that I may haue a sure safeconduyte, for one hundred horses, for such personages as the king my Mayster shall sende to you, with farther intimation of his minde & purpose. And if your pleasure shall be, to haue the communication in any place, indifferent betweene both armies, then I shall warrant you, a like safeconduit for your men, as you do send for ours.

When he had accomplished his message and instructions, the kyng of England and his counsaill, highly commended his audacitie, his tongue, and his soberneſſe, geuyng to him in rewarde, a faire guylt cuppe, with a hundred aungelles: deliuering him a safeconduit, according to his requeſt, and demaunde, with the which, he with speede departed, hauyng with him an English Herault, to bryng a like safeconduite, from the French king. After both the Princes had diligently consulted on this matter, and that the safeconduites, were deliuered on both partes. The Ambassadors mette at a village beside Amias, where were sent by the king of Englande, the Lorde Hawarde, sir Thomas Sentliger, Doctor Morton, after Chaunceler of Englande, and Cardinall. For the French king were sent, the Bastard of Burbon Admirall of Fraunce, the Lorde of saint Pierre, the Bysshop of Eureux called Heberge.

It may of some be not a litle maruailed at, why the French king thus labored, and sought for peace, and did make so humble, and large offers as he did: But if they consider in what case, the realme of Fraunce stoode in at that tyme, hauyng the king of England, the Duke of Burgoyn, the Duke of Britaine, their enemies, and all furnished to set vpon them at one instaunt: They may say, that the French king was both wise and circumspect, to humble himselfe for auantage, or else if God had not holpen: the realme of Fraūce had beene troubled, and tossed in great ieoperdie, and daungerous extremitye. The Ambassadors met at the place appoynted, the English men demaūded, the whole realme of Fraunce, or at the least Normandie, and whole Aquitaine, the allegations were well proued by the Englishmen, and politiquely defended by the French men, so that with argumentes, without conclusion the day passed, and the Commissioners departed, and made relation to their Maisters. The French king and his counsaill, woulde in no wyse consent, that the king of Englande, shoulde haue anye part, or parcell of lande, within the realme of Fraunce: but rather fully determined, to put himselfe, & his whole realme in hazarde, and aduenture: so loth, yea more aferde, then loth, he was to haue the Engilshmen, to be his next neighbors. The Cōmissioners at the next meting, concluded & agreed vpon certaine articles, which were by both the Princes, accepted and allowed. It was couenanted and agreed, that the French king shoulde pay to the king of Englande without delaye

laye. lxxv. M. Crownes of the sunne, & yerely fiftie M. Crownes to be payd at London, duryng king Edwardes life. And farther it was agreed, that Charles the Dolphin, shoulde marry the Lady Elizabeth, eldest daughter to king Edwarde, and they two to haue for the maintenaunce of their estates, the whole Duchy of Guyen, or else fiftie Thousande Crownes, yerely to bee paid within the towre of London, by the space of .ix. yeres: and at the ende of the sayde terme, the Dolphin and his Dolphines, peaceably to enioye the whole Duchie of Guyen, and of that charge the French king against the king of Englande, then to be cleerely exonerate. And further, it was agreed and appointed, that the two Princes, both for the encrease of loue, and for the continuaunce of amitye shoulde enteruew eche other, in some place most expedient, and mete, for so great a purpose: and after their metyng eche of them to take a corporall othe, in presence of the other. This peace to endure .ix. yeres betweene both the realmes, and inuiolably to obserue and kepe all thinges, concluded, agreed, and appoynted. And on the king of Englandes part, were comprised as alyes in the league, the Dukes of Burgoyne, and Britteyne, if they woulde assent. And that after the whole summe aforesayde, was to king Edwarde payed: he shoulde leaue in hostage the Lorde Haward, and sir John Cheyney maister of his horses, till he with all his armie, was passed ouer the sea. This peace much reioyced the French king, to whome, nothing could be either more pleasaunt, or more acceptable, then to haue the Englishe men in short space (how shortly he cared not) clerely auoyded, and transported out of his Realme: imaginyng euer that by their tarying, they would so like the wholesome and sweete ayre of his fruitfull Countrie, that a great number would be continually sicke and vered till they returned: wherefore, to rid them with all hastie speede, he borowed the saide summe of. lxxv. M. Crownes, of euery man that might lend a porcion.

King Edward likewise, although he was of puyssaunce strong enough, to atchieue a great enterprise on his enemies, and farther encouraged, because he was renowned for the famous actes, by him before time brought to passe, in so many battayles: Desiring also, rather to haue warre, with the Frenche nacion beyng the olde and auncient enemie, to the Englishe name and blood: yet when he called to his remembrance, that the ciuil warre had so consumed and wasted his substaunce and treasure, that if vrgent necessitye should requyre, he were of scant abilitie to furnishe and set forth a newarmy: knowyng his treasurie at home, to be so voyde and faynt, that it was not able long to wage his Souldiors, thought it both reasonable and profitable, to obey to necessitie, and to abstaine from battaile, seyng both honourable offers was to him offered, and agreementes of auauntage to him mocioned: Considerying chiefely beside all this, that neyther the Duke of Burgoyne, nor the Constable of Fraunce, did, nor would obserue or performe the promises by them made and sworne. Wherevpon he and the most of his counsaile agreed to this conclusion and concorde. But the Duke of Gloucester and other, to whome the Frenche nacion, was more odious then a tode, whose swordes thyrsted for Frenche blood, detested, abhorred, and cryed out on this peace, saiyng: that all their trauaile, paine, and expences, were to their shame lost and employed, and nothing gayned, but a continuall mocke, and dayly derision of the French king, and all his Minions. This imagination toke effect

without delay, for a Gentleman of the Frenche kinges Chamber, after the peace was concluded, did demaund of an Englishe man, how many battailes king Edward had vanquished, and he aunswered nine: wherein he himselfe personally had bene. A great honor sayd the Frenche man: But I pray you, quod he, smilyng: how many hath he lost? the English man perceiuyng what he ment, sayd: one which you by pollicie and by no strength haue caused him to leese. Well sayd the French man, you may ponder in a payre of Ballance, the gaine of the nine gotten battayles, and the rebuke of this one in this maner lost: for I tell you, that we haue this saiyng, the force of England hath, and doth surmount the force of Fraunce: but the engenious wit of the French men, excell the dull braynes of Englishemen. For in all battayles you haue bene the gayners, but in leagues and treaties, our wittes haue made you losers: so that you maye content your selues, with the losse in treaties, for the spoyle that you gat in warres and battailes. This communication was reported to the French king, which priuily sent for the English man (as saith Hall) to supper, and not onely made him good cheere, but also gaue him a thousand Crownes, to prayse the peace, and to helpe to maintaine the same: yet neuertheless, he beyng not a little moued with these bragges, declared all the communication to the Duke of Glocester, which sware, that he would neuer haue set foote out of England, if he had not thought to haue made the Frenchemen, once to haue assayed the strength and puissaunce of the English men: But whatsoeuer he thought, all thinges were transformed into another kinde, then he could imagine.

The Duke of Burgoyne beyng enformed, that there was a peace entreating betwene the two kings: came in no small hast from Lurenborough onelye accompanyed wyth sixtene horses, into the king of Englandes lodging, whereof the king being not a litle abashed, seyng both his sodaine commyng, and his fierce countenaunce, like one that woulde rather bite than whyne, demaunded of him the cause, of his so sodaine commyng. The Duke sharpely aunswered, to knowe whether he had, eyther entred into any communication, or onely had absolutely concluded a peace, betwene the French king and him. king Edward declared, how that for sondry, and diuerse great and vrgent causes, touching aswell the vniuersall publique wealth, of the whole Christianitie as their owne priuate commoditie, and the quietnesse of their realmes, he and the French king had concluded a peace and amitie, for terme of. ix. yeres, in the which were compriſed, as felowes and friendes, both he and the Duke of Britayne, requiring him to condiscende, and agree to the same. Oh Lorde, quoth the Duke of Burgoyn, haue you thus done in deede? haue you passed the seas, entered into Fraunce, and without killing of a poore flie, or burnyng of a siely shepe cote, haue taken a shamefull truce: did your noble auncester, king Edwarde the thirde, euer make armie into Fraunce (as he made many) in the which he did none either gayne victory in battaile, or profite in conquering, Cities, Townes, Countries. That victorious Prince, as dere kinne to mee, as to you king Henry the fift, I meane whose blood you haue, eyther rightfully or wrongfullye, God knoweth, extirpate and destroyed, with a small puissaunce entred into Fraunce, conquered whole Normandy, and not alonly conquered it, but peaceably kept it, and neuer woulde either common, or agree to anye league, till he had the whole

realme of Fraunce offered him, and was thereof made Regent and heire apparant, & you without any thing doyng, or any honor, or profit gainyng, haue condiscended to a peace, both as honorable, and as profitable to you, as a Pescode, and not so holesome as a Pomegranat: think you that I eyther moued you, or once entised you, to take this iorney for my peculiar aduauntage, or commodity (which of my power am able, to reuenge mine owne causes, without helpe of other) but onely to haue you recouer, your olde rightes, and possessions, which were from you both vniustlye, and wrongfullye withholden. And to the entent that you shall know, that I haue no neede of your ayde, I will neyther enter into your league, nor take truce with the French king, till you be passed the sea, and haue bene there three monethes. When Duke Charles had sayde, he furiously threw downe his Chayre, and would haue departed. But the king him stayed and sayde: Brother Charles, sith you haue spoken at leysure, what you would, you must and shall heere again what you would not: And first, as concernyng our entrie into Fraunce, no man liuyng knoweth that occasion, neither so well, nor hath cause halfe so wel to remember it as you: For if you be not to forgetfull, ye remember howe the Frenche king for all your power, tooke from you the faire towne of Amias, and the strong Pile of Saint Quintines, with diuers other townes, which you neither durst, nor yet were able, either to rescue or defende. Sith which time, how he hath plagued you, how he hath taken from you your friendes, yea, of your priuie Chamber, and secret counsaile (by whom all your secretes be to him reueled and made open) you knowe or haue better cause to remember, and not to forget them. And when you determined, to besiege the towre of Neuse, you thought your selfe, in a great doubt, whether you should leese more at home, by your absence (the Frenche king dreamyng, and waityng like a Fox for his pray) or else gaine more in Germanie, by your power and presence, and to kepe the Wolfe from the folde, that is the French king, from your Castels and Dominions, was the chiefe and principall cause, why you so faire prayed me, and so sore laboured and entised me to passe ouer the sea, promisyng Mountaynes of Golde, which turned into snowe, and wasted into water, boastyng that ye would send horsemen and footemen, and yet thewyng neither Lackey nor Page. If we had made our enterprise for our selfe solye, and in our awne quarell, thinke you that we would haue tarryed your commyng? Nay, nay, you should haue well knowne, if we had entended a conquest, that we would haue so strongly inuaded, and set on the Realme of Fraunce, that your Countries of Flaunders, and Brabant, should haue had cause enough to wonder at, trustyng that, that which wee had gotten, we would haue kept aswell as any of our auncestours haue done: But because the very occasion of the warre was yours, and that you did not prosecute the same, the French king, which neuer offended me nor my subiectes (except in mainteinyng the Erle of Warwicke, for the displeasure that you bare him agaynst me) offred me, beyng destitute of all your succor and ayde, both honorable and honest condicions of peace, which offers I was in maner enforced by very reason to accept, and so haue concluded a truce, which God willyng I will both kepe and obserue. God send you ioy, quod the Duke, and sodainly tooke his horse, and rode againe to Lurenborough. After this day the king and the Duke, neuer loued, and neuer sawe eche other, such is the ende

of vntruſtineſſe and promiſe breakyng.

The Conſtable of Fraunce, fearing leſt that by this concluſion he might be reputed of the French king vntrue, as he had well deſerued it: Wherefore he ſent his confeſſor to king Edwarde, with letters of credence, requiring him hartely little to regarde the French kings wordes, and leſſe to truſt to his promiſe, affirming that the French king would no lenger kepe promiſe then king Edward were on that ſide of the ſea: and rather then he ſhould agree with the French king, for a ſmall ſumme of money, he offred to lend him fiftie thouſand crownes, with many other faire profers. The king of England made anſwere that the truce was concluded, and that he would nothing chaunge, concerning the matter, and that if he had kept promiſe wyth hym, he would not haue made that appointment nor agreement.

Then was the Conſtable in maner on all ſides in diſpayre, but yet he wrote to the French king by his meſſengers, beſeeching hym to geue no credite or beliefe to any tale tolde or fayned agaynſt hym, without heering hys aunſwere, affirming that the king had alwayes knowne hys truth and fidelitie towarde the crowne of Fraunce, and ſo ſhould he ſtill finde him tyll his dying daye, promiſing and warranting him, if that it ſhould ſtande with hys pleaſure, that he would ſo compaſſe the Duke of Burgoyne, that they two ſhould vtterly deſtroy the king of Englande and his armie or they returned.

The Counſaylers of the French king made aunſwere, that their maiſter and the king of England were ioyned and confedered in a ſure amitie: wherfore they would in no wiſe knowe or condiſcend to any thing that might be eyther preiudiciall, or once ſounde to the detriment of the Engliſh men: But they ſayde, that the king their maiſter much truſted the Conſtable, and that for his ſake he would talke with them in his priuie Chamber. The French king before their entrie into his chamber, cauſed the Lorde of Countay ſeruaunt to the Duke of Burgoyne, accompanied with the Lorde of Argenton, one of his priuie counſayle, to ſtand ſecretly behinde a ſeeling or a hanging in his chamber, and he himſelfe ſat in a Chayre, directly before that place, ſo that whatſouer were purpoſed to him, they ſtanding behinde the cloth, might eaſely ſee and here the ſame. Lewys de Creuell and his felow entred into the kings Chamber of nothing thinking leſſe then of the ſpirites encloſed: they declared what payne their maiſter had taken for the French kinges ſake, to ſend, mooue, and entiſe the Duke of Burgoyne to leaue, and cleerely to forſake the king of Englande, which Duke they founde in ſuche a rage and furie againſt the Engliſhe men, that at their requeſt, he was not onely vtterly determined to forſake and refuſe their amitie, but alſo would ſende out aduenturers and Launceknightes, to rob and ſpoyle them in their returning. And in ſpeaking theſe wordes (thinking ſurely much to pleaſe the king) the ſaide Lewys counterfeyted the faſhion and geſture of the Duke of Burgoyn, and began to ſtampe with his foote on the ground, and beate with hys fiſt on the table, ſwearing by Saint George that the king of Englande was not extracted of any noble houſe, but was a pomans ſonne, and that when he was not worth one halfpenny, he was reſtored to hys kingdome, and made king onely by his ayde, reproouing and reuiling him with ſuch yll wordes, and ſo ſhamefull termes, that all the hearers abhorred it. The French king ſayning that he was thicke of hearing, cauſed him to reherſe his ſayyng a-

gayne, which so counterfeyted the very gesture of the Dukes angrie countenaunce and roring voyce, that no man hath seene a better counterfayture or Player in any Comedie or Tragedie. The Lorde of Contay was sore displeased to see hys maister made a resting stock, but he kept all these things secret, tyll his returne to his master.

When the Pagiaunt was played, the king bad the messengers of the Constable, to haue him commended to hys brother their maister, and to declare to him that as newes rose and grewe, he would there of aduertise hym, and so gaue them licence to departe to their maister, who thought himselfe now to be in great suretie of his estate, when in deede he was neuer so nere his fall and perdition: Esteeming the Duke of Burgoyne to be hys assured friend, which hated him more then a Panyme, or a Turke, accompting also the French king to haue no yll suspicion in him, which neyther trusted nor yet beleued any worde, writing or message that was eyther written or sent from him: Such ende hath all dissimulation, such fruite springeth of double dealing and craftie conueying: for if eyther the Constable had bene saythfull to the king his maister, as of bounden duetie and allegeaunce he ought to be, or else had kept his promise, made to the king of Englande and Duke of Burgoyne, and had not dalyed and dissimuled with them, he had surely in his extremitie beene ayded, succoured and comforted of one of these three at the lest, where now he was of all three forsaken, and yet not forsaken, but sought for, looked for, and watched for, not for his profite or promotion, but for his vndoing and destruction: Now let vs leaue of the Constable, and returne to the conclusion of the peace.

When all thinges were appointed, written and established, the peace was proclaymed in both the campes, and the king of Englande, the soner to consumate the amitie by othe as it was agreed, came within halfe a league of Amias, where the French king was, which to the entent to obtayne the more fauor of the Englishmen, sent into their armie a hundred Cartes loden with Wyne, the best that might begotten. And farther, because the English men resorted to the towne of Amyas, both for their pastime and busines, he ordayned at the verye entrie of the gate of the towne, two great and long tables, to be set on euerye side of the streate, where the Englishmen shoulde passe, and euerye table was abundantly furnished with all sortes of delycate vyand, and especially of such as woulde prouoke an appetite to drinke, there lacked no wine of no sorte, seruitours were readye to serue and minister all things necessary. And farther to accompany and familiarly to entertayne the Englishe nation, at euery table were appointed fiue or sixe gentlemen, of the best companyons of the whole countrey, not onely to see them serued wythout lacking, but also to drinke and make good cheere, and keepe company with them, and euer as they entred into the towne, they were taken by the bridles, and in maner enforced to drinke, wheresoeuer they came, they payde no money, but were set scot free, which there lasted three or foure dayes, to the French kings cost, and in conclusion to hys no small vnquieting. For one day they entred into the towne of Amyas .ix. M. Englishe men well armed, so that no Frenche man durst once forbid them to enter. Their occasion of entring into the towne was onely to refreshe them, and to buy things necessary for their businesses and affayres. When the French king was there of enformed, enformed, he was somewhat vered and more amased, fearing either the losse of his towne or hurt of his people: he sent to the English Capitaines requiring them to withdraw their souldyers to their campe, the Capitaynes performed the kings desire, as much as in them lay, but if they sent out twenty, ten came back agayne, and brought more company with them. The French king sent Monsier de Gupe, Marchall of Fraunce, and other into the towne to see the Englishemens behauiour, they found some drinking, some singing, and some sleeping, so that they might perceyue, that they ment neyther deceyt nor vntruth: yet the French king which of hys nature was very suspicious, & especially towarde the Englishe men, came to the gate of Ampas, strongly accompanied, and caused three hundred men of armes to be kept secretly in their Capitaynes houses, and other company he set on the Portall, where the English men entred, a small number God wot, to haue resisted the great companye of Englishe men, if they had eyther intended any thing towarde the French king or his towne. The king of England was priuilie enformed of the French kings doubtfull imagination and vntrue suspition: wherefore he sent worde to him, that he should make a proclamation, that no Englishe man should enter into the towne vpon a paine. The French king made aunswere, that it neyther stood wyth hys honor, nor yet with any princely humanitie, that he should forbid his friends (as he called them) to take their pleasure in hys towne, but if it might please the king of Englande, to appoint certayne of the yomen of hys crowne, to stande at the gate, and to appoint, not onely who should enter, but also the number of them, he thought that this moderation should be both suretie and pleasure to both the parties. Which request the king of Englande wyth quick speede caused to be performed, to the great quietnesse of the French king and his counsayle, casting farther perilles then reason required.

You haue still in your remembrance, how an article of the treatie was, that the two princes should enterview, and meete in a place by both parties to be appointed. The king of Englande appointed the Lorde Haward, and syr Thomas Sentliger, and a Herault: for the French king were assigned the Lorde Bonchace, and the Lorde of Argenton. When they had vewed the ryuer, they agreed the most conuenient and surest place to be at Picquegny, on the water of Some three leagues fro Ampas. The towne standeth lowe, and the ryuer passeth through. On that syde the French king should come, the Countrie fayre and open, and so likewise the other part was very pleasaunt: but toward the riuer there was a calwsye of two arrow shots in length, which was enuironned with marches, surely it was a daungerous passage to conuey a prince in a straunge realme, by such a strayte, if the French men had ment any fraude, but verily the king of Englande had so great a trust and confidence in the honor and promise of the French king and his nobilitie, that he would vpon their assuraunce haue aduentured farther then thys, if his wyll might haue beene performed. Then it was concluded by these foure cõmissioners, that a large bridge should be made ouer the ryuer of Some, in the middle of which bridge was made a great strõg grate of timber, like to the grate where the Lyons be kept, the holes of which grate did extende into no longer quantitie, then that a man might easely put through hys arme, which bridge was made and couered wyth bordes, onely to keepe of the weather, that vnder the couerture, there might stande twelue persons on euery side of the grate, which extended from the one side of the bridge, euen directly to the other, so that there was no way for one prince to come to the other (as was in the grate, where John Duke of Burgoyn was slayne) and ouer the ryuer was onely one ferie Bote. When the bridge and all other things necessary were ended and performed for so great a purpose, and well and diligently vewed on both the sides, there were appointed twelue noble personages to be attendant on euery prince to the barres, and foure Englishe men were assigned to stand with the French men on the bridge, to see their doing and behauiour, and likewise foure French men were limitted to the English men for that same cause and pollicie. At the day appointed, which was the .xxij. day of August, eche king approched the riuer syde with his armie, so that eth armie might see other. The Frenchmen say and write, that the armie of the Englishe men was greater and much fairer then their battayle, but they excuse it (in thys case as they doe in all other) saiyng that the fourth parte of their armie was lacking, you may alow their excuse if it please you. When the token of meeting by the shot of the Artillerie was knowen, the French king with twelue noble men entred the bridge, and came to the closure, with whome was John Duke of Burbon, and the Cardinall hys brother, a prelate more meete for a Ladies Carpet, then for an Ecclesiasticall Pulpet, and ten other, amongst whom the Lord of Argenton was in like apparell, as the French king ware, for so was hys pleasure that day to haue him adourned. The king of England came all a long the causey that I haue spoken of well accompanied that he seemed well to be a king, and with hym was hys brother the Duke of Clarence, the Erle of Northumberland, the Bishop of Ely his Chauncelour, the Lorde Hastinges his Chamberlayne, and eyght other Lordes. King Edward and foure other were appareled in cloth of Golde frised, hauing on his bonet of black Ueluet a Floure deluce of Golde, set with very riche and orient stones, he was a goodly, fayre, and a bewtifull Prince, beginning a little to grow in flesche, and when he approched neere the grate, he tooke of his Cap, and made a lowe and solempne obeysance: the French king made to him an humble reuerence, but after his fashion somewhat homely. King Lewys embraced king Edward through the barriers saiyng: Cosyn you be right hartely welcome into these parties, assuring you that there is no man in the world that I haue more desired to see and speak with, then with you, and now lauded be almightie God, we be here met together for a good and godly purpose, whereof I doubt not, but that we shall haue cause to reioyse. The king of England him thanked and aunswered to hys wordes so soberly, so grauely, and so princely, that the French men there at not a little mused.

In eterview betwene the king of England and the French king.

The Chauncelour of England made there a solempne oration, in laude and prayse of peace, concluding on a prophecie, that sayde that at Pycquegny should be concluded a peace, both honorable and profitable to the realmes of England and Fraunce. The Chaunceler opened the letters of both their agreements to the treatie, demaunding of them if they therewith were contented, they aunswered yea, then eche Prince layd his right hand on the Misall, and hys left hande on the holy Crosse, and tooke there a solempne othe, to obserue and keepe the treatie of the truce for .ix. yeres concluded betweene them, them, wyth all their confederates and alies compzised, mencioned and specified in the same, and farther to accomplish the mariage of their childzen, with all things thereon depending, accozding as it was agreed and concluded betwene their ambassadozs: when the othe was taken and swozne, the French king sayde merily to king Edwarde, bzother if you will take payne to come to Parys, you shall be feasted and entertayned wyth Ladies, and I shall appoint you the Cardinall of Burbon foz your confessoz, which shall gladly assoyle you of such sinnes, if any be committed. The king of Englande tooke these wozds pleasauntly and thankefully, foz he was enfozmed that the Cardinall was a good companion, and a Chaplayne meete foz suche a dalyng pastyme. When this communication was merily ended, the French king intending to shewe himselfe like a maister amongst his seruaunts, made all his companye to dzawe backe from him, meaning to common with the king of Englande secretly, the Englishe men withdzew them without any commaundement, then the two kinges commoned alone secretly, I thinke not to the profite of the Constable of Fraunce. The French king demaunded of king Edwarde, whether the Duke of Burgoyne would accept the truce, king Edward aunswered that he would once agayne make an offer, and then vpon the refusall, he woulde referre and repozt the truth to him. Then king Lewys began to speake of the Duke of Bzitayne, whome he would fayne haue excepted out of the league. To whom the king of England answered: Bzother I require you to moue no warre to the Duke of Bzitayne, foz on my fidelity, in the time of my neede and aduersitie, I neuer found a mozе friendlye, sure and stedfast louer then he.

Then king Lewys called his company againe, and with most lowly and amiable cõmendations, toke his leaue of ỹ king of England, speking certain friendly wozdes to euery Englishman. King Edward doyng likewise to the frenchmen, they both at one tyme departed from the barriers and mounted on hozse backe, and departed the French kyng to Amias, and kin ward to his army, to whome was sent out of the French kings house all ti, s necessary foz a Pzince, in so much that neither Tozches noz Tozchettes lacked bnsent. When the French king was departed from Picquegny, he called to him the Lozd of Argenton, saiyng, by the peace of God, the king of England is an amozous and a faire pzince, he at the first beck would gladly see Paris, where he might fozтune to fynde such pleasaunt oz talkatyue Dames, which with fayze wozdes, and pleasaunt pastimes might allure him to their fantasies, that it might bzeede an occasion in him to come ouer the sea againe, which I woulde not gladly see, foz his pzogenitozs haue bene to long and to often both in Paris and Nozmandy (on this side the sea) therfoze I loue neyther his slight, noz his compauye, but when he is at home, I loue him as my bzother, and take him as my friende.

The French king after this departyng, soze desirous to make warre on the Duke of Bzitaine, which he could not do, except he were left out of the treatie: wherefoze he sent the Lozde Bouchage, and the Lozd of S. Pierre, to the king of England, entreatyng him by all wayes and mocions possible, to leaue the Duke of Bziteyn foz his alie, and not to haue him compzehended in the league: the king of England heeryng them so seriously, and so feruently speake agaynst the Duke of Bziteyne, with an earnest countenaunce aun-swered, saiyng: My Lordes I assure you, if I were peaceably at home in my realme, yet for the defence of the Duke of Bryteyne and his Countrie, I woulde passe the Seas againe, agaynst all them that either woulde doe hym iniurie, or make warre vpon him. The French Lordes nothing farther saiyng, much maruelled why the king of Englande, so surely claue to the Duke of Bryteynes partie: But they knewe not (or else at the least remembred not) that Henry Erle of Richmond, was within the power and Dominion of the Duke of Bryteyne, whom king Edwardes phantasie euer gaue him, would make once a title to the Crowne of England, as next heyre to the house of Lancaster: For he knewe well, that if the Duke of Bryteyne, would transport him into England, where he had both kinsfolke and friends, with neuer so small an ayde (yea, although it were but a shadowe of an armie) then were he enforced, newely to begin again a conquest, as though he had neuer wonne the Crowne, nor obteyned the possession of the Realme, which was the very cause, why he stacke so sore on the Duke of Bryteynes part. The same night the Lordes returned to Amias, and reported to their Maister king Edwardes aunswere, which therewith, was not the best pleased, but pleasure or displeasure, there was no remedie, but to dissimule the matter. This same night also, there came the Lord Hayward, and two other of the king of Englandes Counsaile (which had bene helpers forwarde of the peace) to the Frenche king to supper. The Lorde Hayward sayde to the French king, secretly in his eare, that if it stoode with his pleasure, he coulde perswade the king of England, to come to Amias, yea, peraduenture as farre as Paris, familiarly and friendly to solace himselfe with him, as his trustye friend and faythfull brother. The French king, to whom this motion was nothing pleasaunt, callyng for water, washed and rose without any answere makyng: but he sayde to one of his Counsaile, that he imagined in his owne conceipt. that this request would be made: the Englishe men began againe, to com[illegible]n of that matter, the Frenche men pollitiquely brake their communicatio[illegible], saiyng: that the king with all speede must marche forward, agaynst the Duke of Burgoyn. Although this motion seemed, onely for to encrease loue, and continuall amitie betwene the Princes, yet the French men hauyng in their perfite remembraunce, the innumerable dammages & hurtes, which they of late dayes had susteyned by the English nacion: wherby cõtinuall hatred encreased, agaynst him in Fraunce, thought by pollicie and wisdome, with faire wordes, and friendly countenaunce, to put by this request, and to motion them rather, to depart homeward, then to pricke them forwarde to Paris. This peace was sayde to be made, onely by the holy Ghost, because that on the day of meeting, a white Doue sat on the verie top of the king of Englandes Tent: whether she sat there to drie her, or came thether as a token geuen by God, I referre it to your iudgement. At this treatie and meting, was not the Duke of Gloceſter, nor other Lordes, which were not content with this truce, but the Duke came afterwarde to Amias, with diuers other Lordes of England, to the Frenche king, which both highly feasted them, and also presented them with plate and horses, well garnished. King Lewys consideryng, what gaine the Englishemen had gotten, by makyng warre in Fraunce, and what miserie, and what pouertie, the French nacion had suffered, by reason of the sayd warres, determined clerely, rather to pacifie and tie and enterteine the Englisth nacion, by fayre wordes, and great rewardes, (although it were to his great charge) then by to muche hardinesse, to put himselfe, his nobilitie, and realme, in a hazarde, by geuing them battaile, as his predecessors, had vnwisely done at Poyters, and at Agincort: wherefore, to buy peace, he graunted to king Edward, for a yerely tribute fiftie thousand Crownes, as is mencioned before, to be payde at London, which accompting a Crowne at foure shillinges, amounteth to ten thousande poumde. And to haue the fauor and good will, of his chiefe counsaylors, he gaue great pencions, amountyng to the somme of. xvj. thousand Crownes a yere, that is to say: to his Chauncelor, to the Lorde Hastynges, his chiefe Chamberleyn, a man of no lesse wit, then vertue, and of great authoritie with his Maister, and that not without a cause: For he had aswell in time of aduersitie, as in the faire flatteryng worlde, well and truely serued him, and to the Lorde Hawarde, to sir Thomas Mountgomerie, to sir Thomas Sentliger, to sir John Cheney, maister of the kinges horses, to the Marques Dorset, sonne to the Queene, and diuers other, he gaue great and liberall rewardes, to the entent to kepe himselfe, in amitie with England, while he wanne and obteyned his purpose and desire in other places.

These persons had geuen to them great giftes, beside yerely pencions: For the lord of Argenton his Counsailor, affirmeth of his awne knowlege, that the lord Hawarde, had in lesse then the terme of two yeres, for reward in money and plate. xxiiij. M. Crownes, & at the time of his meeting, he gaue to the Lorde Hastynges, the kinges chiefe Chamberlaine, as the Frenchemen write, a hundreth Marckes of siluer made in plate, whereof euery Marke is. viij. ounces sterlyng: but the Englishe writers affirme, that he gaue the said Lorde Hastinges. xxiiij. dosen boulles, that is to say, xij. dosen gilte, and xij. dosen vngilte, euery Bolle waiyng. xvij. nobles, which gift, either betokened in him, a great liberall nature, or else a great and especiall confidence, that he had in the sayd Lorde Chamberleyn. Beside this, he gaue him yerely, two thousand Crownes pencion, the which somme he sent to him, by Piers Cleret, one of the Maisters of his house, geuyng him in charge, to receyue of him an acquittance, for the receipt of the same pencion, to the entent that it should appere in time to come, that the Chauncelor, Chamberleyn, Admirall, Maisters of the horses, to the king of England, and many other of his counsaile, had bene in fee and pencionaries, of the French king, whose yerely acquittances (the Lorde Hastynges onely except) remaine of record to be shewed, in the Chamber of accomptes, in the Palace of Paris. When Piers Cleret had payed the pencion to the Lorde Hastynges, he gently demaunded of him an acquittaunce, for his discharge, which request when he denied, he then onely required of him a letter of three lines, to be directed to the king, testifiyng the receipt of the pencion, to the intent that the king his Maister, should not thinke the pencion to be imbesiled. The Lord Hastyngs although he knewe, that Piers demaunded nothing but reason, aunswered him: Sir this gift commeth onely, of the liberall pleasure of the king your maister, and not of my request: if it be his determinate wil, ỳ I shal haue it, then put you it into my sleue, and if not, I pray you render to him his gift againe: For neither he nor you, shal haue either letter, acquittãce, or scrow, signed with my hande, of the receipt of any pencion, to the intent to brag another day, that the kings

Chamberlain of England, hath bene pencionarie, with the French king, and shewde his acquittance, in the Chamber of accomptes, to his dishonor. Piers left his money behinde, and made relacion of all thinges to his maister, which although that he had not his will, yet he muche more praysed the wisedome and pollicie of the Lord Hastynges, then of the other pencionaries, commaūdyng him verely to be payed, without any discharge demaundyng.

When the king of Englande had receiued his tribute, and his nobilitie their rewardes of the French king: he trussed vp his tentes, and laded al his bagage, and departed towarde Calice, but or he came there, he remembryng the craftie dissimulacion, and the vntrue dealyng of Lewys Erle of S. Poule, high Constable of Fraunce, entending to declare him, to the Frenche king, in his verie true likenesse, and portrature: sent vnto him two letters of credence, written by the sayde Constable, with the true report of all suche wordes and messages, as had beene to him sent, and declared by the said Constable & his Ambassadors, which letters, the french king gladly receiued, and thankfully accepted, as the chiefe instrument, to bring the Constable to his death: which he escaped no long season after, such is the ende of dissimulers.

The returne of king Edward into Englande.

When king Edwarde was come to Calice, and had set all things in an order, he toke ship, & sailed with a prosperous winde, into England, and was receyued by the Maior of London, and the Magistrates clad in Scarlet, and v.C. commons, apparelled in Murry, the xviij. daye of September, in the xiiij. yere of his reigne, vpon blacke Heath, and so conueyed with a great triumph, through the Citie of London vnto Westminster, where after his long labor, he reposed himselfe a while: euery daye almost talking with the Queene his wife, of the maryage of his daughter, whom he caused to be called Dolphinesse: thinking nothing surer, then that mariage to take effect, according to the treatie. The hope of which mariage, caused him to dissimule and doe things, which afterward chaunsed greatly to the French kings profite, and smally to his.

When king Edwarde was arriued in England, the French king thinkyng by no meane possible, to haue his will on the Constable, but onely by the Duke of Burgoyn, determined to conclude a truce, for.vi. yeres, vpon couenaunt, euery man to haue his owne: but the Ambassadours, would not haue the truce proclaimed, thinking therby, to saue the Duke from periurie, which had sworne, neuer to conclude a peace, till the king of Englande had beene three monethes in his realme, after his returne from Calice. The king of Englande, was of all these doyngs, assertained by his friendes: wherefore, in all hast he sent syr Thomas Mountgomerie, a wise, and a sage knight, to the french king, being then at Vernyns, concluding with the Duke of Burgoyns Ambassadors, requiryng him to take none other truce, with the Duke Charles, then that which was by them concluded, desiryng him farther, in no wyse to depart with saint Quintines, to the Duke: Offering that if he would, any longer continue the warre, against the sayde Duke, that he would for his pleasure, and the Dukes displeasure passe the seas again, the nert Sommer: so that the French king, should paie to him fiftie thousande Crownes, for the losse which he should sustaine, in his custome by reason that the wolles at Calice, because of the warre, coulde haue no vent, nor be vttred, and also paye halfe the charges, and halfe the wages of his Souldiers, and men of warre.

The

The French king, moſt hartily thanked the king of Englande, of hys kynde offer, and faithful friendſhip, excuſing hym, that the peace was alreadꝑ aſſented to: howbeit, it was the verye ſame peace, that was betweene them concluded, ſauing onely, that the Duke woulde be a contractoꝛ in the league, and not compꝛehended in the ſame, as another Ꝑinces alie. This matter was thus aunſwered, and faintlye excuſed, and with the ſame, ſyꝛ Thomas Mountgomerie diſpatched, which was with plate conuenientlye rewarded: and wyth him returned, the Lorde Hawarde, and ſyꝛ John Cheiney, which were hoſtages wyth the French king, tyll kyng Edwarde were returned into Englande. The French kyng marueiled not a litle, at king Edwardes offers, and thought it perilous to cauſe the Engliſhmen to paſſe the ſea again, and to ioyne with the French men, whome they neuer loued, coniecturyng farther, that the Engliſhmen, and the Burgonions, would ſone agree, by reaſon of their olde acquaintaunce and familiaritie, and by chaunce, both become enemies to the French men: wherefoꝛe, in auoyding of all ambiguities, hee determyned to conclude the truce.

When king Edwarde had after this maner eſtabliſhed, as well his affaires of outwarde warre, as hys pꝛiuate and perticuler buſineſſe at home: notwithſtanding, that he beyng the moſt valyaunt, & foꝛtunate victoꝛ, of ſuch and ſo many terrible and bloudy battailes, myght thynke to leade his life, in perfect quietneſſe, and ſure ſafety: Yet conſidering, that Henry the yong Erle of Richmonde, one of the offꝛyngs, of the blood of king Henry the ſixt, was yet liuyng and in good health, he iudged hymſelfe, to be farre from hys purpoſe, and that onely thing, did ſo vexe and trouble hys ioye and felicitie, that he thought hymſelfe neuer to be in a ſure eſtate. Wherfoꝛe, he determined yet once agayne, to ſollicite and moue, Fraunces Duke of Britayne, eyther foꝛ giftes, pꝛomiſes, oꝛ pꝛayers, to deliuer the Erle into his handes. Wherefoꝛe he ſent Doctoꝛ Stillyngton, & two other, his Ambaſſadoꝛs, well laden wyth no ſmall ſomme of Gold, with al haſte to the Duke of Britein: And to the entent ỹ their deſire ſhould appeere moꝛe honeſt, in the open face of the woꝛld. he willed them to declare to the Duke, that their requeſt, to haue the Erle deliuered to them, was only foꝛ this purpoſe, to ioyne with him aliance by mariage, & ſo to extirpate & pluck vp, all the dꝛegges and leuyngs of the aduerſe part, and contrary faction. The Duke gently harde the Ambaſſadoꝛs, and firſt he began to deny, and after to excuſe, why he might, noꝛ ought not agree to their requeſt: but inconcluſion, what with pꝛayers requiring, and monies ſollicityng, the Duke beyng weried and ouercome, deliuered the Erle to the Ambaſſadoꝛs, whom in his letters he highly cõmended, to king Edward, not thinking that he deliuered the ſhepe to the woolfe, but the ſonne to the father, beleuyng ſurely, without ſcruple oꝛ doubt, that king Edward would geue in mariage to him Lady Elizabeth his eldeſt daughter, whome in deede he maried, after her fathers death, as you herafter ſhall here. When the Ambaſſadoꝛs had the pꝛay that they ſo much deſired, they departed to the towne of Saint Malo, ſtandyng on the ſea ſyde, where they reckned to haue taken ſhippyng, and ſo to haue ſayled into England. The Erle of Richmond knowyng, that he was goyng toward his death, foꝛ very penſiuenelle, and inwarde thought, fell into a feruent and ſoꝛe ague. In this very ſeaſon, one John Cheulet, ſo eſtemed among the Ꝑinces of Britayn, as fewe were in all the Countrey, and in much credite, and well accepted with the Duke, was when these thinges were thus concluded, for his solace in the Countrie, but beyng thereof certified, beyng chafed with the abhominacion of the fact: resorted to the Court, and familierly came to the Dukes presence, and there stoode so sadly, and so pale, without any worde speakyng, that the Duke was much amased, and sodainely marueyled at his sad and frownyng countenaunce, and demaunded of him what should signifie, that dumpishenesse of minde, and inward sighing, the which by his countenaunce manifestly appered: he modestly aunswered, most noble and redoubted Lorde, this paleness of visage, and deadly looke, doth prognosticate the time of my death to approche and be at hande, whiche if it had chaunced to me, before this day, I assure you, it had much lesse hurted me. For then had I not beene preserued, to feele the dolorous pagues which a fact by you done (that I thought impossible to be obteined) hath imprinted in my stomacke: so that I well perceiue, that either I shall leese my life, or else liue in perpetuall distresse, and continuall miserie: For you my singuler good Lorde, by your vertuous actes, and noble feates, haue gotten to you, in maner an immortall fame: which in euery mannes mouth, is extolled and eleuated, aboue the high Clowdes, but alas me semeth (I pray you pardon me my rudenesse) that nowe that you haue obteyned, so high a laude and glorie, you nothing lesse regarde then to keepe and preserue the same inuiolate, considering that you forgetting your faith and faythfull promise, made to Henry Erle of Richmond, hath deliuered the most innocent yong gentleman, to the cruell tormentors, to be afflicted, rent in pieces, and slain: wherfore all such as loue you, of the which number I am one, cannot chose but lament and be sorie, when they see openly the fame and glory of your most renouned name, by such disloialtie & vntruth against promise, to be both blotted and stayned, with a perpetuall note of slaunder and infamie. Peace mine aboue good John, quod the Duke, I pray the beleue me, there is no such thing like to happen to the Erle of Richmond: for King Edward hath sent for him, to make of him, beyng his suspect enemie, his good and faire son in lawe. Well, well, quod John, my redoubted Lorde, geue credence to me: the Erle Henry is at the very brinke to perishe, whome if you permit once to set but one foote, out of your power and dominion, there is no mortall creature able hereafter to deliuer him from death. The Duke beyng moued with the perswasions of John Cheulet, which either little beleeued, or smally suspected King Edward, to desire the Erle, for any fraude or decept, or else seduced by blinde auarice and loue of money, more then honestie or wisedome would require, did not consider, what he aduisedly did, or what he aduisedly should haue done. Wherefore, with all diligence, he sent foorth Peter Landoyse, his chiefe treasorer, commaundyng him to stay the Erle of Richmond, in all hast possible. Peter not sluggyng, nor dreamyng his businesse: came to the Englishe Ambassadors, to Saint Malos, there abidyng the winde. And first he inuented a cause of his comming, and kept with them a long communication, to protract the time, till his men in the meane season, had conueyed the Erle (almost halfe dead) into a sure Sanctuarie, within the towne, which in no wise might be violated: where he beyng deliuered, from the continuall feare of dreadful death, recouered his health, and in good plight was brought to the Duke.

Henry Erle of Richmond taketh Sanctuarie.

Here

Here a man maye euidently percepue the olde Greeke Prouerbe to be very true, which is that a man, to a man shall sometime be as a God, for the yong Erle Henry without desert deliuered to his death, sodaynely by the labor of John Cheulet, and the fauour of the good Prince was preserued, saued and deliuered. God graunt that suche examples maye be a doctrine and myrror to such as be rulers aboue other, lacking counsaylors to monish and warne them of their duety and office. That they remembring thys good act, may learne to take into their counsayle and family, such as will well and truly admonishe and warne them, and they likewise with good minde and glad intent to be followers of the same.

The Englishe Ambassadours complayned and murmured, that they were both spoyled of their money and marchaundise, requiring Peter Landoyse that they in no wise should returne so deluded without pray or penny. The treasurer effectuously promised them, that ỹ Erle either should be surely kept in the Sentuary, into the which he escaped (by their negligence as he layed to their charge) or else should be againe in the Dukes house put in prison, so that they should not neede no more to feare him then his shadowe. And so the king of England for his money, purchased the keping of his enemie by the space of three dayes and no more.

King Edwarde in the meane season, sore longing, and desiring to knowe what effect his Ambassage toke with the Duke of Britaine, was therefore euery houre troubled and vnquieted with harkening and looking, and at the last was certefied from thence, how the Erle of Richemond was deliuered, and at a point to be brought home to him as prisoner in captiuitie: but that he escaped, which newes he tooke most greeuously, but after being somewhat appeased, when he had heard that he should be safely kept in prison, determined clerely hereafter to banishe that care out of his minde and phantasie, and to employ all his whole studie and diligence for the keeping of his house, after a more bountifull and liberall proportion, then before he was accustomed. And when he had sufficiently stored his Cheste with treasure, remembring hys honor, least he peraduenture should be noted with the spot of Nigardship, he shewed himselfe lyke a liberall and beneficiall Prince to hys commons, and lyke a good and a profitable king to the common wealth, and to the poore people of his realme and dominion.

Now as this good king Edward sought & studied daylie and hourely to bring himselfe to quietnesse & rest, and hys realme to a continuall amitie, and a perpetuall peace, so likewise at the same time Charles Duke of Burgoyn, whose wyt neuer loued peace, nor yet was weary or abhorred trouble, whose intollerable paines in the warres were to him pleasure, & especiallye where he thought to obteyne any newe seigniorie, or else to be reuenged of auncient enemies, for olde griefes and displeasures to him done. So that desyre of rule mixte with hatred and malice, ioyned with couetousnesse, kindled and prouoked so his courage this yere, that he partly to be reuenged of the Duke of Lorayne & the Swytchers, and partly for the couetous desire that he had to certaine landes, lying betwene his low countries of Brabant and Flaunders and his Duchie of haute Burgoyn, assembled a great army and a mightie puyssaunce, & besieged a towne called Granson in Lorayne, which when he had receyued, without mercy lyke a tyraunt he caused all the inhabitants 1476 16

cruelly to be put to death, wherof hearing the Switchers manfully encountred wyth him, and discomfited his whole armie, where the Duke lost both honor, prayse, and such abundaunce of ryches, that fewe princes in his time were able to shewe such iewels, and so many, and of such high price and value. And after not content wyth these chaunces, but euer in hope of reuenging, he fought with the Switchers agayne at Morrot, where of .xviij. M. good men of warre, he lost ten thousande, beside them that were wounded and hurt: yet this fierce and couragious Capitayne, more couragious then circumspect, gathered agayne a newe armie, and contrarie to the mindes of hys whole counsayle, in the deepe of wynter, besieged the towne of Nancy, belonging to the Duke of Lorrayne, where he was encountred with the said Duke and the Switchers, and there by them agayne ouercome, discomfited and slayne.

Grantson, Morrat, Nancy.

Thus in one yere he lost three great battayles, the first at Grantson, where he lost honor, and all hys ryches: the second at Morrat, where he lost honor, and almost all hys men: the thirde at Nancy, where he lost life, honor, ryches, men, and all worldly felicitie, on the Vigile of the Epiphany.

Thys ende had the valyaunt hart and stoute courage of Duke Charles of Burgoyne, who in hys time could neuer agree with peace and concorde, tyll death more puyssant then life may resist, brought his bodie to quietnesse, which bodie is interred in the Church of saint George in Nancy, leauing behinde him one sole daughter lawfully begotten to be his heire, which afterward was maried to Maximilian Archeduke of Austriche.

At thys battayle were taken Anthony and Bauldwyn, bastard brethren to Duke Charles, whome the French king bought of the Duke of Lorrayne, to the intent that they should not withstand his pretenced purpose in Flaunders. If any man were sorie of the Duke of Burgoyns death, you may be sure that he was not so inwardly sorie, as the French king was in hart ioyous and glad: For nowe hauing peace with Englande, he knew no creature that was able to matche with him, in earnest or in game, & because he would leese no time, he vnder couler that women be not able to enioye any thing, that is or hath bene apperteyning to the Crowne of Fraunce, tooke of the yong damosell of Burgoyne the townes of Moundedier, Perone, Abbeuile, Monstreul, Roy, and all the townes on the ryuer of Some: Beside thys, he with no great paine obteyned Hesdyng, Arras, and the towne of Bulleyn, with the Countie of Bullonoys, which king Charles his father had before engaged, and empledged to Duke Philip of Burgoyne, as before is mencioned. But thys wylie and wittie king Lewys, comming to the towne of Bulleyn, perceyued that if it were fortefied with a garrison, it should not onely be an ill neighbor to the townes of Calice and Guysnes, but also a port necessarie and conuenient for all hys subiects, when they should be, eyther by enemies assayled, or by stormie tempestious weather driuen on the narrow Seas: wherefore to cast a sure Incker, knowing the Lorde Bartrame de la Toure, Erle of Auluerie, to be the verie true and vndubitate heyre of the said towne and Countrie: He first obteyned of him his right and tytle in the same, rewardyng hym with a greater summe, and a more yerely value of reuenewes, in the Countie of Forest and other places. And after to the entent to haue a port euer open vpon Englande, he annexed the same towne of of Bulleyne, and the Countie of Bullonoys, with the partes adiacent to the crowne and regalitie of Fraunce. And because the forenamed towne and Countie were holden of the Erledome of Artoys, he chaunged the tenure, and solemply auowed to hold the same towne & Countie of our Lady of Bulleyn, and therefore did homage to the Image in the great Church called our Lady Church in Bulleyn, offring there a Harte of Golde, waiyng two thousand Crownes, ordeyning farther, that all his heyres and successors, at their entrie into the estate and dignitie royall, by themselfe, or their deputie should offer a Hart of like waight and value, as a relefe and homage done, or made for the same towne and Countie.

You may be sure that the kyng of Englande woulde not haue suffered the French kyng to haue buylded such a couert nest so nere his towne of Calice, and the territories of the same, except hys league had bound him, or that he had to much affiaunce in the French king, whose hart was double, & whose wit was euer inconstant, but surely the hope of the preferment of his daughter, both brought him to blindnesse, and dotage. Let these doyngs ouer passe and see how politikely the French king wrought for his aduantage. During these doings in the lowe partes, he caused the Duke of Lorayne to enter into high Burgoyn with a great army, which by policie and promises brought the whole Duchie vnder obedience of the French kyng, which then claymed to haue the order and mariage of the yong Ladye, as a pupille, warde, and orphane, apertainyng to the Crowne of Fraunce, for the which title after rose no small mischiefe and trouble in Flaunders, and the countryes there about. Let vs leaue a whyle to speake of outwarde businesse, and retourne to our owne.

In this yere, then beyng Mayor of London syr Raufe Jollyn draper, the wall of the Citie of London, that is to say, from Creplegate to Bishopsgate, was buylded, at the costes, and charges of the Citizens.

In the. xvij. yere of kyng Edwarde, there fell a sparcle of priuye malice, betweene the kyng, and his brother the Duke of Clarence, whether it rose of olde grudges before time passed, or were it newlye kindled, and set a fire by the Queene or her blond, which were euer mistrusting and priuily barking at the kings linage, or were he desirous to reigne after his brother: to men that haue thereof made large inquisition, of such as were of no small authoritye in those dayes, the certaintye there of was hid, and coulde not truely be disclosed, but by coniectures, which as often decepue the imaginacions of fantasticall folke, as declare truth to them in their conclusion. The fame was that the king or the Queene, or both, sore troubled with a foliche Prophesie, and by reason thereof began to stomack and greeuously to grudge against the Duke: The effect of which was, after king Edwarde shoulde reigne, on whose first letter of hys name shoulde be a G. and because the Deuill is wont with such witchcrafts, to wrap and entangle the myndes of men which delite in such deuilish fantases, they sayde afterwarde that that Prophesye lost not his effect, when after kyng Edwarde, Glouceſter vsurped his kyngdome. 1477 17

Other allege this to be the cause of his death: That of late, the olde rancor betwene them beyng newly reuiued (the which betwene no creatures can be more behement then betwene brethren, especially when it is firmely fired fixed and rooted) the Duke beyng deſtitute of a wyfe, by the meanes of Lady Margaret, Duches of Burgoyn, his ſiſter, procured to haue the Lady Marye, daughter, and heyre to Duke Charles, her huſbande, to be geuen to him in matrimony: which mariage king Edwarde (enuiyng the felicitie of hys brother) both agayne ſayde and diſturbed. This priuye diſpleaſure was openly appeaſed, but not inwardly forgotten, nor outwardlye forgeuen, for that, notwythſtandyng a ſeruaunt of the Dukes was ſodainelye accuſed (I can not ſay of truth, or vntruely ſuſpected by the Dukes enemyes) of poyſonyng, ſorcery, or inchauntment, and thereof condempned, and put to taſt the paynes of death. The Duke which might not ſuffer the wrongfull condemnation of his man (as he in hys conſcience adiudged) nor yet forbere, nor paciently ſuffer the vniuſt handlyng of hys truſty ſeruaunt, dayly did oppugne, and wyth ill wordes murmur at the doing thereof. The king much greeued and troubled with his brothers dayly complayntes, and continuall exclamation, cauſed him to be apprehended, & caſt into the Towre, where he beyng taken and adiudged for a traytor, was priuily drowned in a Butte of Malmeſey.

George duke of Clarence drowned in a But of Malmeſey in the towre.

But ſure it is, that although king Edward were conſenting to his death, and deſtruction, yet he much did both lament hys infortunate chaunce, and repent hys ſodayne execution. In aſmuch, that when any perſon ſued to him for pardon or remiſſion, of any malifactor condempned to the puniſhment of death, he would accuſtomably ſay and openly ſpeake, O infortunate brother, for whoſe lyfe not one creature would make interceſſion, openlye ſpeakyng, and apparauntly meaning, by the meanes of ſome of the nobility he was ſurcumuented, and brought to his confuſion.

This Duke left behinde him two yong infantes, engendered of the bodie of the daughter to Richard late Erle of Warwicke, which children by deſtinie, or by their awne merites, folowing the ſteppes of their auncеſtors, ſucceded them in like miſfortune, and ſemblable yll chaunce. For Edwarde hys heire, whome king Edward had created Erle of Warwicke, was .xxiij. yeres after in the time of king Henrie the ſeuenth, attainted of treaſon, and on Towre hil behedded. Margaret his ſole daughter was maried to ſir Richard Pole knight, being much bound to king Henry the ſeuenth, for her aduaunce-ment in mariage, beſide manifolde benefites, by her of him receyued: But moſt of all obliged to that excellent Prince king Henry the eight, for reſtoring her aſwell to the name and title of Counteſſe of Saliſburie, as to the poſſeſſions of the ſame: ſhe forgetting the miſerable chaunce of her father, and leſſe remembring the kindeneſſe and kindred of her ſayd ſouereigne Lorde, committed againſt his maieſtie and his realme, abhominable and deteſtable treaſon, for the which ſhe was in open Parliament, adiudged and attainted, and ſixtie and two yeres after her father was put to death in the Tower, ſhe on the greene within the ſame place, with an Axe ſuffered execution. In whole perſon died the very ſurname of Plantagenet, which from Geoffrey Plantagenet, ſo long in the blood roiall of this realme, had flouriſhed and continued.

Edward erle of Warwick.

Margaret Counteſſe of Saliſbury.

After the death of this Duke, by reaſon of great heate and vntemperate aire, happened ſo fierce and ſo quicke a Peſtilence, that fiftene yeres warre paſt, conſumed not the thirde part of the people, that onely foure monethes miſerably and pitifully diſpatched, and brought to their ſepulture.

A greate peſtilence.

You haue heard not long before, howe the Frenche king not onely clay-

med the rule, gouernaunce, and mariage of the yong Princesse, and Damosell of Burgoyne, but also howe he, what with pollicie, and what with force, had plucked from her the faireſt feathers of her taile, that is to meane, whole haute Burgoyne, and the ſtrong townes of Picardie, which in time to come might (as they were very like) happen to proue yll neighbors to the Engliſh nacion. All theſe thinges were pollitikely pondered, and ripely digeſted by the wiſe counſaylors of England, which firſt conſidered the olde amitie, betwene the houſe of England and Flaunders, and the dayly entercourſe, trafficke and commutacion, which no ſmall ſeaſon had bene practiſed, frequented, and exerciſed, mutually and friendly betwene the ſubiectes, and all nacions hauyng reſort to either of the ſayd Countries, ſawe it open before their eies, that if the French king, either by force or by conunction of mariage to Charles Erle of Angouleſme (to whome he promiſed his good will, for the obteyning of the yong Princes) ſhould get the vpper hande of the Damoſell or of her ſeignories and dominions, that then dammage might enſue to the whole realme of England, both for vttering of their commodities in thoſe partes, and alſo for the impediment or ſtop of their entercourſe, beſide new impoſicions and gabels, to be ſet within the ſayde Countries, vpon the Marchaunts, their goodes and wares. Wherefore the whole Nobilitie and ſage fathers, made humble requeſt to king Edward to helpe and ayde the yong Ladie and Princes of Burgoyne, alleging that as farre as they could perceyue, the mariage of his daughter with the Dolphin, was but diſſumuled and fayned, for in the treatie concluded at Picquegnie, betwene him and king Lewys, it was appointed, agreed, and openly ſworne, that the French king, within a yere folowing, ſhould ſend for the Lady Elizabeth, entituled Dolphineſſe of Vien, to be conueyed into Fraunce, which yere with foure more were paſſed and gone, without any worde ſpeakyng of her ſendyng for, or goyng into Fraunce.

The Queene of Englande alſo had written in this ſeaſon to the Ladye Margaret, Ducheſſe of Burgoyne, for the preferment of her brother Anthome Erle Riuers, to the mariage of the yong Damoſell, but the counſaile of Flaunders, conſidering that he was but an Erle of a meane eſtate, and ſhe the greateſt enheritrice of all Chriſtendome at that time, gaue but deafe heeryng to ſo vnmete a requeſt: the which deſire, if the Flemynges had but geuen good eare to, or with gentle wordes delayed the ſuyte, thee had both bene ſuccoured and defended with a good number, and not ſuſteined ſo great loſſe as ſhe did. Whether king Edward were not content with this refuſall, or that he truſted more the Frenche kinges promiſe, then all his Counſayle conlde ſee cauſe, or that he was loth to leeſe his yerely tribute of fiftie thouſande Crownes, he would in no wiſe conſent to ſende any armie into Flaunders againſt the Frenche king: But he ſent Ambaſſadors to king Lewys with louing and gentle letters, requiring him to conclude ſome reaſonable peace, or elſe at the leaſt to take a certaine truce with her at his requeſt.

The Ambaſſadors of England, were highly receyued, bountifully feaſted, and liberally rewarded: But aunſwere to their deſire had they none, but that ſhortly the French king would ſend Ambaſſadors, hoſtages, and pledges to the king of England their Maiſter, for the concludyng and performance of all things, depending betwene them two: So that their ſouereigne Lorde and they, ſhould haue good cauſe, to be contented and pleaſed. All theſe faire wordes, were onely delayes to protract time, and in the meane ſeaſon, to winne townes and countries, from the Damoſell, or any ayde or ſuccor could be to her adminiſtred.

A great offer made by the French king to king Edwarde the fourth.

And beſide this, to ſtaye king Edwarde, from taking parte with her. He wrote to him, that if he woulde ioyne with him in ayde, or perſonally make warre, in any part of the Ladies territories, or dominions, that then king Edwarde, ſhoulde haue, and enioye, to hym and hys heyres, the whole Countye, and Contrey of Flaunders, diſcharged of all homage, ſuperiorityе, and ryght to be claymed by the French kyng, and hys heires and ſucceſſors, and farther, he ſhoulde haue the whole Duchie of Brabant, whereof the French kyng offered, at his owne charge and coſt, to conquere foure, the chiefe and ſtrongeſt townes, within the ſayde Duchie, and them in quiet poſſeſſion, to deliuer to the king of Englande, graunting farther to paye to him, tenne thouſand Aungelles, towarde hys charges, beſides munitions of warre and Artillerie, which he promiſed to lende hym, with men and cariage, for the conueyance of the ſame.

The king of Englande aunſwered, that the townes of Flaunders were of no ſmall ſtrength, nor of no little quantitie, verie vneaſie to be kept, when they were conquered: and of no leſſe force was the Duchie of Brabant, with whome his ſubiectes were both loth, and not verie wylling to haue warre there, conſidering that thether was one of their common trafficques and ventes, of all their Marchaundiſe: But if the French king would make him partener of his conqueſt in Picardy, rendering to him part of the townes, alreadу gotten and gayned, as Boleine, Mounſtrell, and Abbeuile, then he would ſurely take hys part, and aide him with men at his awne coſtes and charges. While this matter was in aunſwering, and replyng againe, the French king ſpoyled the yong Princes of townes and Regions, and of the beſt Capitaines that her father left, as the Lorde Cordes and other: wherefore for pure neceſſitie of aide and ſtrength, ſhee maried with Maximilian, ſonne to Frederike the Emperor, which to his power, ſore reſiſted the french king, for making any inuaſions into Flaunders, or other his wifes landes and ſeignories. This Princeſſe conceyued of her huſbande, in the firſt yere of her mariage, a faire Ladie called Margaret, whome king Lewys ſo phanteſied, eyther to haue a publique peace with Maximilian her father, by the which he might ſtay all warre and hoſtilitie betwene them, and ſo by that meane peaceably to enioy the Countries and townes, by him ſtollen and faintly conquered, or elſe imagining by that onely damoſell, in concluſion to conioyne the whole Countrie of Flaunders, and the other dominions thereunto apperteyning to the crowne of Fraunce, (as he had no fewe times, before attempted and aſſayed.) That he cleerely forgetting his promiſe made, written, and ſworne to the King of Englande, for the mariage of his daughter, ſolicited priuily the Lordes of Flaundyrs, to haue the ſayde Lady Margarete to be conioyned in matrimonie with the Dolphin his ſonne, wryting and ſending to the king of Englande faire promiſes and flattering letters, when his purpoſe was cleerely vaniſhed out of England and fixed in Flaunders, as you ſhall hereafter well vnderſtande.

time, he had abundantly tasted, and more then he was wylling had both felt and had in continuall experience, began first more then he was before accustomed, to serch out the penall offences, as well of the chiefe of his Nobilitie, as of other Gentlemen, being proprytaries of great possessions, or abundauntly furnished in goods, beside Marchaunts and other inferior persons. By the reason whereof, it was of all men adiudged more then doubted, considering his new fame of ryches, and his greedy appetite of money and treasure, that he would proue hereafter a sore and an extreme prince amongst his subiectes, and this imagination in especiall, wandred through the heades of all men, that after his brother the Duke of Clarence was put to death, he should say, that all men should stande and liue in feare of hym, and he to be vnbrideled and in doubt of no man. But his newe inuented practise, what for other forrein and outwarde affaires, and what for the shortening of his dayes in this transitorie worlde (which were within two yeres after consumed) toke some, but no great effect. Howbeit experience teacheth, that prosperitie often tunes is as great a trouble as a mischiefe, and as vnquiet a profite to the possessioners of riches and such as haue the fruition of the same: as pouertie and aduersitie are profitable & laudable, in other persons which can with pacient stomack, and meeke hart, beare and suffer the stormes and surges of euill fortune, and peruerse mischaunce.

Here I finde noted that about thys tyme, that one Thomas Iland a Shriefe of London, builded of his awne costes the great Conduyt in Cheape in London.

After this king Edward hauing all things brought to that effect, which he had long desired, except the mariage of his daughter with Charles the Dolphyn, much studied and no lesse desired to haue this affinitie, according to the appoyntment made and concluded, to be accomplished and solempnized, and therefore not only wrote, but sent diuers messengers to the french king for the performaunce of the same. The French king which neuer intended to haue that mariage take effect, considering that the Dolphin, was muche ponger then the Ladie Elizabeth, and for other causes sent Ambassadors to the king of England with faire wordes, and friuolous delayes, making hys excuse that he had not sent for the kings daughter to be maried to his sonne the Dolphin, according to the league and treatie concluded by the occasion of his great troubles, and busie warres enterprised in high Burgoyne, and the lowe countries, so that he was disgarnished as well of his nobilitie, as of other men of honour to receiue her into his realme, according to her estate and degree: promising faythfully, shortly to sende for her, and to conueye her with such a pompe and royall traine, that it should be to both their honors and laudes, and to the high contentation of the king of England and hys Quene, which he no lesse then her husband desired, and sore longed to see the conclusion of the sayde mariage take effect. 1480

These Ambassadors were well feasted, and lykewise rewarded, and so toke their leaue. And wythin a conuenient season after, he sent other Ambassadors, which were neuer in Englande before, to the entent that if their predecessors, had sayde or concluded any thing, (although they were authorised so to doe) yet if it myght tourne, to the French kings preiudice or damage, they might without blame, excuse themselues by ignorannce, of that matter, affirmyng that they had no commission to common, or else once to enterpryse, to meddle wyth that matter. Or if he perceiued that any thing was like to be concluded, which sounded not to his pleasure or profite, he woulde sende for his Ambassador, in great hast, and after sende another, with new instructions nothing depending on the olde.

This fashion kyng Lewys, vsed with all Princes, to whome he sent anie Ambassadors, by the which he compassed many things, to his purpose and to their losse: But most of all, he thus dalyed with the king of Englande concernyng this mariage, onely to the entent, to keepe hym styll in amitye, aboue all other Princes. And for a truth the king of Englande beyng of no suspicious nature, so much trusted, and gaue to hym so much confidence, that hee thought the Sunne, would soner haue fallen from his circle, than that kyng Lewys, eyther would haue dissimuled, or broken his promise wyth him.

But who soner breaketh promise, then he that is most trusted, or who soner deceiueth, then he to whome most credence is attributed. And on the other part, who is so sone beguiled, as he that least mistrusteth, and who soner falleth, then he that casteth no perill, but as in nothing, mistrustyng, is no small lightnesse, so into much trusting, is to much foly: wherefore if king Edwarde had eyther not to much trusted, or mistrusted the French kings fayre promises, (as I woulde he had done in deede) the Crowne of Fraunce, had not so increased in possessions and dominions, to the great glory, and strength of that realme, nor the Princes of Burgoyn, had not so bene plucked, harried, and spoyled, of her fayre townes and Castles as she was, which chaunce, she being destitute of friends, and without comfort of defenders, by pacience perforce, was compelled to suffer and susteyne.

Thus is the league made with Lewys the French king, fraudulentlye glosed and dissimuled. Thus is the oth made, and sworne vpon the holy Euangelistes, violated, and contrary to the worde, and honor of a Prince, broken and falsefyed: by which vntrue dealing, and couert dissimuling, with his especiall and trustie friende, all men may easely see, and more apparauntlye then in a glasse beholde that the verie naturall condition of the French nation, is pleasauntly to flatter, plentifully to reward, and gloriously to glose, till they haue once obteyned, their pretensed purpose, and haue their ambitious desire accomplished and satisfied, and that gaine once gotten on their side, neither othe holdeth, nor friendship continueth, nor yet humanity and kindnesse before shewed, is once regarded, or of them remembred: wherefore (sayth Hall) mine aduise is, let all men trust them, as they finde them.

1481 21 And in this verie season, James the thirde of that name king of Scottes, sent into England a solempne Ambassage, for to haue the Lady Cicile, king Edwardes second daughter, to be maried to his eldest sonne, James prince of Scotlande, Duke of Rothesay, and Erle of Caricke. King Edward and his counsayle, thinking that this affinitie should be as well honorable as profitable to the realme, did not onely graunt to his desire and demaund, but also before hande disbursed certaine summes of money, to the onely intent, that the mariage should hereafter neither be interrupted nor broken, vpon thys condition that if the sayd matrimony by any fortune or chaunce should in time to come, take no successe nor perfection: or that king Edward would notefie to the king of Scottes or his counsayle, that his pleasure was determined to

haue the ſayd mariage, to be infringed and diſſolued: Then the Prouoſt and Marchaunts of the towne of Edenborough, ſhould be bound for the repaiment of the ſayde ſomme agayne. All which things were with great deliberation concluded & ſealed, in hope of continuall peace. But this king James being a man of a ſharpe wit, more wedded to his awne opinion then reaſon would ſcarce beare, would neither here nor geue credite to them, that ſpake contrarie to his awne phantaſie, or his imagined opinion: And to the intent that no man ſhould finde fault with his doings, or reprehende his actes, he promoted and made counſaylers, men of baſe linage and lowe bloud, and in eſpeciall Cochrane and his company, by whoſe euill aduiſe and miſchieuous inſtigation, he ſo puniſhed and grieued his nobilitie, both with impriſonment, exactions and death, that ſome of their voluntarie will went into exyle, and other fayning cauſe to depart, fled into other landes, and ſtraunge Countries. For the Duke of Albanie called Alexander, brother to king James, was exiled into Fraunce, but paſſing through Englande, he taried with king Edward as you ſhall here. The Erle of Mar a wiſe and pollitique counſayler, was in Edenborough beheadded: And beſide this he forgetting his othe, promiſe and affinitie, concluded with king Edward, cauſed armies to be made into England, ſpoyling, burning, and kylling the kings faythfull ſubiectes: at the which vnprincely doyng, the king of Englande being not a little moued and chafed, determined to be reuenged on him by battayle and dent of ſworde. Yet notwithſtanding, becauſe king James craftily excuſing himſelfe, alledging the miſchiefe late committed to be attempted & done without his conſent, knowledge, or counſayle, this matter had beene lightly pacified and blowen ouer, if the Duke of Albany being with king Edwarde, had not incenſed and prouoked him to make warre on the Scottiſh king his brother, both to reuenge the iniuries of late, to the ſayde king done, contrarie to all lawes of armes and princely demeanure, and alſo to helpe to reſtore the ſayde Duke to his poſſeſſions and dominions agayne: out of the which he was by the king his brother diſpoſſeſſed and reiected, promiſing to king Edwarde great ayde and aſſiſtance, when his armie was once entered into the confines of Scotland.

King Edward beyng thus perſwaded by the Duke, and truſtyng on his aide, was ſomewhat agreeable to this: but the inwarde remembraunce how that king James, had ſupported againſt him, with men and money, his olde enemie king Henrie the firſt: and alſo truſting, that if Alexander Duke of Albanie by his ayde ſhould vanquiſhe his brother, and obteine the Crowne of Scotland, he would be alwayes to him, ſure, faithfull, and truſtie: whiche did ſo enflame his courage, and ſet his heart on fire, that he determined with all diligence, with an armie royall, to inuade the Countrie of Scotland, and make the king to knowe that he had neither honourably nor truely kept his league and promiſe: Wherefore, all the winter ſeaſon, he muſtred his ſouldiors, prepared his ordinaunce, rigged his ſhippes, and left nothing apperteinyng to the warre vnpurueied or vnloked for: ſo that in the beginnyng of the yere, all thinges were prepared, and no thing was miſſed.

And when all thinges apperteinyng, to the furniture of ſuche an enterprice, were put in a redineſſe, and redie to be ſet forwarde: King Edward appoynted, to be chieftaine of his hoſt, and Lieutenant generall, his brother 1482 22

The king sendeth a great army to inuade Scotland.

Richard Duke of Glouceſter, and to him aſſociated, Henry the fourth Erle of Northumberland, Thomas Lorde Stanley, Lorde Steward of his houſeholde, the Lorde Louell, and the Lorde Greyſtocke, and diuers other noble men and knightes. Theſe valiaunt Capitaines ſet forwarde in May, and made ſuch diligence, with pollitique conueyaunce of their ſouldiours: beſide the troubleous cariage of their ordinaunce, that they came to the towne of Alnewicke, in Northumberland, about the beginnyng of July, where they firſt encamped themſelues, and marſhalled their hoſte. The forewarde was led by the Erle of Northumberland, vnder whoſe Standard were, the Lord Scrope of Bolton, ſir John Middleton, ſir John Dichfield, and diuers other knightes, Eſquiers and Souldiours, to the number of fiue thouſand, and ſeuen hundred men. In the middle warde was the Duke of Glouceſter, and with him the Duke of Albanie, the Lorde Louell, the Lorde Greyſtock, ſir Edwarde Wooduile, and other, to the number of fiue thouſand, and eight hundreth men. The Lorde Neuell was appoynted to folowe, accompanied with three thouſand men. The Lorde Stanley, led the wing on the right hand of the Dukes battaile, with foure thouſande men, of Lancaſhire, and Cheſſhire: The left wing was guided by the Lorde fitz Hewe, ſir William a Parre, ſir James Harryngton, with the number of two thouſand men, & beſide all theſe, there was a thouſand men appoynted to geue attendance on the ordinaunce. This royall army, not entendyng to ſlepe, but to geue the Scots knowlege of their arriuall in thoſe parties, came ſodainly by the water ſyde, to the towne of Berwicke, and there what with force, and what with feare of ſo great an armie, tooke and entered the towne: But the Erle Bothwell, beyng Capitaine of the Caſtell, would in no wiſe deliuer it, neither for flatteryng wordes, nor for manacing bragges: wherefore, the Capitaines deliberately conſultyng together, planted a ſtrong ſiege, and enuironed it round about. When this ſiege was thus layde, the two Dukes, and all the other Souldiors, except the Lorde Stanley, ſir John Elrington, treaſorer of the Kinges houſe, ſir William a Parre, and foure thouſand men, that were left behinde to keepe the ſiege before the Caſtell, departed from Barwicke towarde Edenborough: And in marchyng thytherward, he brent and deſtroyed in Scotland more then. xliiij. townes.

While theſe thinges were in doyng, King James of Scotland, hauing ſmall confidence in his Commonaltie, & leſſe truſt in his Nobilitie, did voluntarily encloſe himſelfe into the ſtrong Caſtell of Maydens in Edenborough, perfectly truſting there to be out of all doubts and daunger, except famine, or treaſon ſhould cauſe him violently to open the portes or gates: wherfore the Duke of Glouceſter entred into the towne, and at the eſpeciall requeſt & deſire of the Duke of Albany, ſaued the towne, & the inhabitaunts of the ſame, from fire, blood, and ſpoyle, takyng onely ſuch preſentes as the marchaunts gently offered him, and his Capitaines: Cauſyng Gartier, principall king at armes, to make a publike Proclamacion at the high Croſſe, in the Market place of Edenborough, in the which he warned and admoniſhed, James king of Scottes, to keepe, obſerue, and performe all ſuch promiſes, compactes, couenauntes, and agreementes, as he had concluded and ſealed to, with the high and mightie Prince Edward, by the grace of God king of England. &c. And alſo to make condigne and ſufficient recompence to his Subiectes, for the

the great tirannie, ſpoyle, and crueltie, that he and his people had perpetrate, and committed contrary to his league, within the marches and territoryes of his Realme of Englande, before the firſt day of Auguſt next enſuyng.

And farther without delay to reſtore the high & mighty Prince Alexander, Duke of Albany, hys naturall brother to hys eſtate, and all hys offices, poſſeſſions, and authorities, in as ample and liberall maner, as he before occupied and enioyed the ſame: or elſe the high and valiaunt prince Richarde Duke of Glocester, Lieutenant generall, and chiefetain for the kyng of Englande, was redy at hande to deſtroy hym, his people and country with ſlaughter, fyre, and famine.

Kyng James woulde make no aunſwere, neyther by worde nor by wryting, knowyng that his power nowe fayled, either to performe the requeſt demaunded, or to defende his countrie beyng with ſuch a puiſſant armye inuaded. The Lordes of Scotlande, lyeng at Hadington wyth a great puiſſaunce, hearyng the kyng of Englandes reaſonable deſire, determined firſt to practiſe wyth the Duke of Glocester for a peace, and ſo to haue the caſtle of Berwicke to their parte and after by ſome meanes to allure the Duke of Albanie, from the Engliſh amitie, and vpon this motion, the .ij. day of Auguſt, they wrate to the Duke of Glocester, that the mariage betwene the Prince of Englande ſhoulde be accompliſhed in all poyntes, according to the couenantes agreed, and the inſtrumentes therof engroſſed, requiring farther that a peace from hence forth might be louingly concluded betweene both the Realmes. The Duke of Glocester wiſely and circumſpectly certified them agayne, that as touchyng the article of mariage, to take effect betwene their Prince and the Lady Cicilie of England, he knew not the determinate pleaſure of the kyng his maiſter and brother, eyther for the affirmaunce or denyaunce of the ſame, but he deſired full reſtitucion of all ſuch ſummes of money, as for the ſaid mariage before time had bene diſburſed, or preſted out in loane. And where the ſayde Lordes deſyred to haue a peace concluded from thence forth, betwene both the ſayde realmes. He firſt required to haue the Caſtell of Barwicke to him deliuered, at the leaſt if he did agree to the ſayde peace, that then his ſiege lyeng about the ſayde Caſtell, ſhoulde be hereafter in any wiſe, neither troubled, vexed, nor moleſted, nor the king of Scottes, nor none of his ſubiectes, nor any other by his procurement or prouoking, ſhould ayde, comfort, or aſſiſt with victaile, ordinance, or otherwyſe the Capitaine, Conſtable, or ſouldiors of the ſayd Caſtell, duryng the ſiege.

The Lordes, Prelates, Barons, and eſtates of the realme of Scotland, perceiuyng and well pondering, both the aunſwere and the demaundes of the Duke of Glouceſter, ſent to him ſufficiently inſtructed with theſe concluſions the reuerend father Andrew, Erle of Murray, and the Lord John Darnell, which thus aunſwered, that where the ſayde Duke deſired repayment of the ſummes of money deliuered in part of payment for the contract of mariage, to be made betwene the Prince of Scotland, and the kinges daughter of England: the time of lawfull contract of mariage is not yet come, becauſe of the minoritie of the ſayde Prince and Princeſſe. And the fault hereof is, that no day was appoynted for the money, to be payde before the contract began. And if the king your brother would demaund farther aſſuraunce, either for the contract to be made, or for the payment of the money, they promiſe thereto, vnto, according to reaſon to agree. Secondarily as touching the Caſtell of Barwicke, they ſayde, all we knewe well enough, that it is the olde enheritaunce of the Crowne of Scotland, of many hundreth yeres paſt, and that our ſouereigne Lord hath right therunto. And if it be alleged, that it belonged to the realme of England by conqueſt, it is well knowen that it ſtandeth in Scotland, and ouer the Scottiſhe ground. The Duke notwithſtanding their ſaiyngs, would condiſcend to no peace, without the Caſtell of Barwicke were rendered to the king of Englande, and ſo the Meſſengers departed, and on the ſame daye the Archebyſhop of Saint Andrewes, the Byſhop of Dunkelle Colyn, Erle of Argyle, Lorde Cambell, and Lorde Andrewe, Lorde Auandale, Chauncelour of Scotlande, wrote vnto the Duke of Albanie a ſolempne and autenticall Inſtrument, ſigned and ſealed wyth their ſeales, bindyng their bodies, landes, and goodes, to the ſayde Duke, that if he would hereafter be obedient to the king of Scottes, and keepe and obſerue his fayth and promiſe to be made to the ſayde Lordes, that he ſhould not onelye bee reſtored to all his landes, hereditamentes, offices and poſſeſſions, whiche he enioyed at the daye of hys departure out of Scotlande, but alſo ſhould haue and enioy to him, and his ſeruauntes and familiers, a free and a generall pardon, which reſtitution and pardon, they likewiſe promiſed to be ratified and approued by the king and the three eſtates aſſembled at the next Parliament. The Duke beyng glad to be reſtored againe to his olde eſtate and poſſeſſions, and eſpecially in his awne natiue Countrie, receyued their offer, which was truely performed, and ſo tooke his leaue of the Duke of Gloceſter, thanking him (as he was no leſſe bound) for the great labor, trauaile and paine, that he had taken in his awne perſon for his reſtitution. And promiſed both by worde, and by writyng of his awne hand to doe and performe all ſuch thinges, as he before that tyme had ſworne and promiſed to king Edward, notwithſtandyng any agreement, nowe made or to be made with the Lordes of Scotland: and for the performaunce of the effect of the ſayde Scedule, he againe tooke a corporall othe before the Duke of Glouceſter, and ſealed the writyng the thirde day of Auguſt, in the Engliſhe campe at Leuington, beſides Hadington, & departed to his awne poſſeſſions. After he was thus reſtored and reconciled, the Lordes of Scotland proclaimed him great Lieutenant of Scotland, and in the kinges name made Proclamation, that all men ſhoulde be readie, vpon paine of death within .viij. dayes at Crauſhawes, both to rayſe the ſiege before the Caſtell, and for the recouerying againe of the towne of Barwicke. The Duke of Albanie wrote all this preparation to the Duke of Gloceſter, humbly requiring him to haue no miſtruſt in him, promiſyng to kepe his othe and promiſe, made to kyng Edward and to him. The Duke of Glouceſter wrote to him againe, that it ſhould neither be honorable nor cõmendable in him, to helpe to raiſe the ſiege, at the laiyng whereof he was counſaylor and partener, nor yet to reward the king of England with ſuch a diſpleaſure for his kindeneſſe, coſtes, and expences, to him in his extreme neceſſitie, louyngly ſhewed, and liberally exhibited. But he aſſured him in the worde of a Prince, that if he and all the power of Scotland attempted to come to rayſe the ſiege, planted before the Caſtell of Barwike, that he himſelfe with his armie woulde defende the beſiegers, or elſe die in the quarell.

The

The counſayle of Scotlande ſagely and politiquely ſawe before, that if they ſhoulde come to rayſe the ſiege, that the Duke of Gloceſter woulde with them ſhortly encounter, and that if they loſt the fielde, both the ſtrength of the realme was brought to an imbecilitie, the nobles ſore miniſhed, and the Caſtell loſt and taken. And on the other ſide, if they obteyned victorye, nothing was gotten but the poore towne of Barwike, & they were likely ſone to be inuaded wyth a greater powre ſhortly agayne, wherfore they ſent Lyon king at armes to the Duke of Gloceſter, offeryng to hym as they thought, two offers very reaſonable, the one was, that if he would promiſe on hys honor, to ſubuert and caſt downe the towne walles of Barwicke, they woulde likewyſe race, and clerely deface the walles, Towres, and portes of the Caſtell, or elſe the Duke of Gloceſter to put in a capptayne, and a garriſon of men of warre into the towne, and the Duke of Albanie, likewiſe to doe with the Caſtel, for the Tuicion of the ſame. And farther the forſayde Lion deſired an abſtinence of warre to be taken, till the two Dukes might haue communication, of thys and other graue matters, concerning the welthes of both the Realmes. The Duke of Glouceſter refuſed both the offers, ſayeng, that he had long maintayned the ſiege before the Caſtell of Barwicke, to no ſmall waſt and conſumyng of hys brothers treaſure and riches, and to the great trauaile & payne of the Lordes, Gentlemen, and men of warre, that continuallye made there abode and dayly reſidence, at the ſayde ſiege: wherefore he ſaid, that he in this poynt was firmely reſolued, not to departe tyll the caſtell were yelded by appoyntment, or taken by force, or elſe his ſiege were by the power of Scotlande rayſed, or he and his armie vanquiſhed: wherefore hee woulde by no meane harken to the petition of the Scottiſh Lordes, concerning the abſtinence of warre, tyll he were eyther vanquiſhed or poſſeſſed of the Caſtell of Barwicke. With which aunſwere the Herault departed, and thereof made relacion to the Lordes and counſayle of Scotlande. When the Dukes aunſwere was of them well digeſted, they euidently perceiuyng that the Caſtell of Barwicke was the onely maker of the peace, and that the not deliuerye of the ſame, ſhould be the norice and continuer of warre and hoſtilitie: conſyderyng farther, that the nobilitie nor commons of Scotlande, did not drawe together by one line, nor were ſorted in one leuell, electyng and choſing the better parte, and reiectyng and auoyding the worſe, agreed and determined to delyuer the Caſtell of Barwicke to the Engliſh partie, ſo that there ſhould be truce or abſtinence of warre taken and concluded for a determinate ſeaſon. And therevpon they ſent to the Duke of Gloceſter a league indented, which was dated the. xxiiij. day of Auguſt, in the yeere of our Lorde a. M.CCCC. lxxij. in the which it was contracted and agreed betwene the Duke of Gloceſter, lieuetenaunt generall for the king of Englande, and Alexander Duke of Albanie, lieuetenaunt for James kyng of Scottes, that an eſpeciall abſtinence of warre ſhoulde be kept and obſerued betwixt the realmes of Englande and Scotlande and the people of the ſame, aſwell by ſea, as by lande, to begyn the. viij. day of September next enſuing, & to endure till the fourth day of Nouember, next folowyng. And in the meane ſeaſon, the towne and Caſtell of Barwicke, to be occupied, and bee in the reall poſſeſſion of ſuch as by the kyng of Englands deputie ſhoulde be apoynted and aſſigned with all and ſinguler ſuch bounds, limites, and territories as the Engliſh nacion, laſt vsed and possessed, when the Castell and towne were in the subiection of the Englishmen, and all other marches & boundes, beyng in difference betwene the sayde realmes, to stande and to be holden in lyke case and condicion, as they were before the last truce concluded. The Duke of Gloceſter, which well perceiued that the Scottes more graunted to his demaunds, for reliefe of their owne necessitie, then to gratifie him or the kyng his brother in any poynt: lyke a wise counsayler, toke his aduantage when it was offered, and especially because these things made for his long desired purpose.

The reconcile of the towne & the Castell of Barwike.

First the deliuery of the Castell of Barwicke, he voluntarily without counsayle (as a praye priuily gotten) both accepted and alowed, and for that only cause he did not refuse the abstinence of warre but to that gently agreed. As touching the possession, to be kept in the landes dependyng in variance betwene the realmes (commonlye called the batable grounde) he woulde not, nor durst not conclude wyth the Duke of Albanie, without hauing farther intelligence of the king hys souereigne Lordes pleasure and counsaile, meanyng thereby euer to keepe them, as suiters to him, and he no farther to seke on them, and in the meane season to let that matter be in suspence. When he had sealed to the first two Articles, & that they were sent againe to the Lords of Scotlande, they them gladly receiued, and with good will embraced, and lykewise truely performed the same: for the Castell of Barwicke was incontinent deliuered to the Lorde Stanley, and other thereto appointed, which therein put both Englishe men and Artilerie, sufficient for the defence of all Scotlande for .vj. monethes. By this meanes as you haue harde, the Englishmen repossessed agayne the towne and castell of Barwicke, which .xxj. yeres before by kyng Henry the sixt was to the Scottes, as you haue hard, giuen vp & deliuered. And lest peraduenture the Duke of Gloceſter might thinke that the Duke of Albanie did not in all things set forwarde, preferre, and auance his first requestes, and demaundes, made and required of the Lordes of Scotland, and in especiall one which was for the assurance to be made for the repaiment to the king of Englande, of all such summes of money, as he had before hande prested and disbursed to the kyng of Scottes for the mariage to be solempnised and consummate betwene their childrē, as before is rehersed. Therefore the sayde Duke of Albanie caused the Prouost and Burgesses of Edenborough to make a sufficient instrument obligatorye, to Kynge Edwarde, for the true satisfaction and contentation of the same money, which he also sent by the sayde Prouost to the Duke of Gloceſter to Alnewyke.

When the Duke of Gloceſter had thus obteined his purpose, and receiued writings signed and sealed for the performance of the same, he sent the instruments to king Edward his brother, which much cōmended both his valiant manhood, and also hys prudent pollicy in conueying his businesse, both to his owne purpose, and also to the profite of the realme. King Edward not a little mused, and much more debated with his counsayle, whether it were more profitable and honorable to him and his realme, to suffer the sayd mencioned mariage to take effect, and proceede to a conclusion, or else to require a repayment and redeliuery of the summes of money layde out for the same purpose. After long consultation had, and it was considered in what case the realme and the king of Scottes stood in, for it was well knowen that he and

hys Nobilitie were at great diſcorde as you before haue heard: it was conſidered farther, that if the nobilitie preuayled and gat the ſouereigntie, the lyne and ſucceſſion of James the thirde were likely to be vtterly extirpate, and diſinherited for euer: It was alſo alleged that the Prince of Scotlande neuer condiſcended, nor as he himſelfe ſayde would agree to this mocioned mariage. Theſe things thus debated, the king by great aduiſe, refuſed and reuoked all things to be done for the more forewardneſſe of the ſayde matrimonie, and elected and choſe the repayment of all ſuch ſummes of money, as for the occaſion of the ſayde betruſted mariage was payde, and before hande contented and deliuered. And according to the wordes of the obligation, made by the towne of Edenborough, he ſent Garter hys principall king at Armes and Northumberlande Herault, to declare and intimate to the Prouoſt and Burgeſſes of Edenborough, the determinate refuſall of the matrimony, and the election and choyſe of the repayment of the money and duety. And for the farther ouerture of the whole concluſion, Garter was inſtructed by writyng what he ſhould ſaye and declare: and ſo by conuenient iourneys came to the towne of Edenborough, eyght dayes before the feaſt of all Saintes, where he openly ſayde as foloweth: I Garter king at armes, ſeruaunt, protectour and meſſenger vnto the moſt high and mightie prince, my moſt dread ſouereigne Lorde, Edwarde by the grace of God, king of Englande and of Fraunce, and Lorde of Ireland, by vertue of certaine letters of procuracie here redie to be ſhewed by mee, by my ſayde ſouereigne Lorde made and geuen, make notice and geue knowlege vnto you Prouoſt, Burgeſſes, Marchauntes and communaltie of the towne of Edenborough in Scotland, that where as it was ſometime commoned & agreed, betwene my ſayde ſouereigne Lorde on the one partie, and the right high and mightie prince James king of Scottes on the other party, that mariage and matrimonie ſhould haue bene ſolempniſed and had betwene James the firſt begotten ſonne of the ſayd king of Scottes, and Ladie Cicile daughter to my ſayde ſouereigne Lorde the king of England. And for the ſayde mariage to haue bene performed, certain and diuers great ſummes of money, haue bene payde and contented by my ſayde ſouereigne Lord: which ſummes of money in caſe of refuſall of the ſayde mariage, by my ſayde ſouereigne Lorde to be made and declared, ye the ſaid Prouoſt, Burgeſſes, Marchaunts and communaltie, and euery one of you are bounde and obliged by your letters vnder your common ſeale of your towne of Edenborough, to repaye vnto hys highneſſe vnder like forme, and at ſuch termes as they were firſt paide. So that the king my ſouereigne Lorde woulde make notice and knowlege of his pleaſure and election, in taking or refuſing of the ſayde mariage, of the repayment of the ſayde ſummes of money, before the feaſt of Alhalowes nert to come, lyke as in your ſayde letters, bearing date at Edenborough the fourth day of Auguſt laſt paſt, it was conteyned all at large. The pleaſure and election of my ſayde ſouereigne Lorde, for diuers cauſes and conſiderations him mouing, is to refuſe the accompliſhement of the ſayde mariage, and to haue the repayment of all ſuch ſummes of money, as by occaſion of the ſayde betruſted mariage, his highneſſe had payde. The ſayde repayment to be had of your Prouoſte, Burgeſſes, Marchaunts, and communaltie, and euery of you, your heyres and ſucceſſours, according to your bond and obligation gation afore reherſed. And therefore I geue you notice and knowlege by this writing, which I deliuer to you within the terme in your ſaide letters knitted and expreſſed to all entents and effects, which thereof may enſue.

When Garter had thus declared all things geuen to him in charge, the Prouoſt or other Burgeſſes made anſwere, that they nowe knowing the kings determinate pleaſure, would according to their bonde, prepare for the repayment of the ſayde ſummes, and gently entertayning Garter conueyed him to Barwike, from whence he departed to newe Caſtell, to the Duke of Glouceſter, making relation to him of all his doings, which Duke with all ſpeede returned to Sheryhutton, and there abode. Shortly after Garters departing, the Duke of Albanie, thinking to obteyne agayne the high fauour of the king his brother, deliuered him out of captiuitie and priſon, wherein he had a certaine ſpace continued (not without the Dukes aſſent, which beſieged him in the Caſtell of Edenborough a little before) and ſet him at large, of whome outwardly he receyued great thankes, when inwardly nothing, but reuenging and confuſion was in the kings ſtomack incorporate, ſo that ſhortly after in the kings preſence, he was in ieopardie of his life, & all impriſoned for dread of death enforced to take a ſmall Balinger & to ſaile into Fraunce, where ſhortly after ryding by the men of armes, which encountered at the Tilt, by Lewys then Duke of Orliaunce, after French king, he was with miſcharging of a ſpeare, by fortunes peruerſe countenaunce pittifully ſlayne and brought to death, leauing after him one onely ſonne named John, which being baniſhed Scotlande, enhabited and maried in Fraunce, and there died. How ſorrowfull is it to write, and to remember the chaunces and infortunites that happened within two yere in England and Scotlande, betweene naturall brethren. For king Edwarde ſet on by ſuch as enuied the eſtate of the Duke of Clarence, forgetting nature, and brotherly friendſhip, conſented to the death of hys ſayde brother. James king of Scottes, putting in oblition that Alexander his brother was the onely Organe and inſtrument by whome he obteyned libertie and freedome, ſeduced and led by vyle and malicious perſons, which maligned at the glory and indifferent iuſtice of the Duke of Albanie, imagined and compaſſed his death and exiled him for euer: what a pernicious Serpent, and what a peſtiferous Scorpion is that deuiliſhe whelpe, called priuie Enuie? Agaynſt it no fortreſſe can defend nor caue can hide, no wood can ſhadowe, nor foule can eſcape, nor no beaſt can auoyde, her poyſon is ſo ſtrong.

The Duke of Albanie in daunger of his life, is forced to flie into Fraunce and ſhortly after was there ſlaine.

Wherefore let euery indifferent perſon ſearche hiſtories, read Chronicles, looke on authours, as well holy as prophane, and they ſhall apparauntly perceyue, that neyther open warre, daylie famine, nor accuſtomed mortalitie, is not ſo much an enemie, nor ſo great a Whale to deſtroye, and ouerthrowe high power and Nobilitie, as is rooted malice, inward grudge, and diſſimuled hatred.

Although that king Edwarde were glad & ioyous of all the proſperous ſucceſſe of all enterpriſes in the realme of Scotlande, yet euen now hys Feuer tercian, of the which he had languiſhed ſore, ſithe hys voyage royall into Fraunce, was ſodainely turned into a vncurable quartain: For where he was before toſſed betweene hope and diſpaire, that the matrimonie of hys daughter and Charles the Dolphin, ſhould come to the ſolempnization, according cording to the league, betwene him & the frenche king, concluded at Picquegnie: Now he was out of all doubt. For the Lorde Hayward which was returned out of Fraunce, with many faire wordes & painted promises but without tribute or cõclusion of the mariage, certified the king of his awne knowlege: howe that he beyng present, sawe the Ladie Margaret of Austriche, daughter to Duke Maximilian, sonne to the Emperor Fredericke, receyued into Fraunce, with pompe more then Emperiall, by the Duke of Burbon, the Lorde Delabret, and many other Lords and magistrates of the realme, and so with great triumph, conueyed to Amboyse, where the Dolphyn laye, and there was to him contracted and espoused.

King Edward now beyng certein, how the French king had with pleasant language, & colourable aunsweres, foded him forth, and allured him to geue credence, to his dissimulyng wordes, neither meanyng as he sayde, nor shewyng what he ment, determined with himselfe, no longer to suffer so apparant wrong, nor so intollerable an iniurie. Wherefore, he called his Nobilitie together, and declared to them the manifolde wrong, which he had receyued of late at the handes of the Frenche king, and howe he vntruely and vnprincely, had broken the league and amitie, aswell in denyng the paymẽt of the tribute, as also in refusyng the accomplishement of the mariage of his daughter, accordyng as in the treatie was concluded. Requiryng them therefore to studie how to reuenge and punishe so great a villanie, offered to their native Countrie. The nobilitie not a little glad of this motion, aunswered: that their whole desyre was to fight with the Frenche men, whome they often times had vanquished, and ouercome in battaile, and that for the dignitie and fame of their Countrie, they would let nothing be vnattempted, offering him in an instant, to be redie in harnesse, to fulfill his minde and desire. When the king knewe the towarde myndes of his subiectes of the Temporaltie, he moued the Spiritualtie (because by the ecclesiasticall lawes, they be prohibited to weare armure) to ayde him with money, formaintenaunce of his warres, & suppressyng of his enemies, who also condiscended to his request.

And in this yere I find noted that Edmond Shaw Goldsmith who had bene Maior of London, of his awne costs redefied Cripplegate in London.

But now behold, while king Edward was intentiue, & emploied his whole labor diligence, and industrie, to furnish & set forward this warre, which he newly had attempted & begon: whether it was with the melancholy, & anger that he toke with the French king, for his vntruth and vnkindnesse, or were it by any superfluous surfet (to the which he was much geuen) he sodainly fell sicke, and was with a grieuous maladie taken, yea, so grieuously taken, that his liuely spirites began to faile, and war feble, which weakenesse when he perceyued, he called together all his nobles, which that time were about London, and sayd vnto them as in the historie of king Edwarde the fift shall be at large declared, and so shortly after departed vnto God, and was buried at Windsore.

This story from the beginnyng of this kyng, and a part of Richard the third as shall appere by a note in the mergent was written by sir Thomas Moore when he was vnder Shrife of London, and nowe of late conferred & corrected by his awne copie.

KIng Edward of that name the forth, after that he had lyued .xlij. yeres and .vij. monethes, and vj. dayes, and had reigned king. xxij. yeres, one moneth & viij. daies, as is afore expressed, died at Westminster the. ix. day of Apryll, the yere of our redemption .1463. leauing much fayre issue, that is to witte. Edwarde the Prince. xij. yeres of age: Richarde Duke of Yorke two yere ponger, Elizabeth whose fortune and grace was after to be Queene, wyfe vnto king Henrye the vij. and mother vnto king Henry the .viij. Cicilie not so fortunate as fayre: Briget, which representyng the vertue of her, whose name she bare, professed and obserued a religious life in Dertforde a house of close Nonnes: Anne that was after honorablye maryed vnto Thomas then Lorde Hawarde, and after Erle of Surrye, and Katheryn which long time tossed in eyther fortune, sometyme in wealth, and often in aduersitie, at the last, if this be the last (for yet she lyueth) is by the beningtye of her Nephewe king Henrye the eyght in very prosperous estate, and worthye her birth and vertue.

The burial of king Edwarde the fourth.

After that this noble Prince was deceassed at Westminster as aforesayde, he was wyth great funerall honor and beauynesse of his people from thence conueyed and enterred at Windsore. A kyng of such gouernaunce and behauior in tyme of peace (for in warre each part must be others enemye) that there was neuer any prince of this lande attayning the Crowne by battayle, so heartily beloued with the substaunce of the people: nor he himselfe so specially in any part of his lyfe, as at the tyme of his death. Which fauour and affection yet after his death, by the crueltie, mischiefe and trouble of the tempestious worlde that followed, highly towarde him more encreased. At such tyme as he dyed, the displeasure of them that bare him grudge for kyng Henries sake the first, whom he deposed was well allwaged, & in effect quenched, in that that many of them were dead in more then .xx. yeres of his reigne (a great part of a long lyfe) and many of them in the meane season growen into his fauor, of which he was neuer straunge. He was a goodly personage and very princely to beholde: Of hart couragious, politique in counsayll, in aduersitie nothing abashed, in prosperitie rather ioyful then proude, in peace, iust and mercifull, in warre, sharpe and fierce, in the felde, bolde and hardye, and natheleſſe no farther then wisdome would, aduenturous. Whose warres whoso well consider, he shall no lesse commend his wisedome where he boyded, then his manhood where he banquished. He was of visage louely, of body mightie, strong and cleane made, howbeit in his later dayes with ouer liberall diet, somewhat corpulent and bowrelye, and natheleſſe not vncomelye. He was in youth greatly geuen to fleshly wantonnesse: From which health of bodye in great prosperitie and fortune without a speciall grace hardlye refrayneth. This faulte not greatly greued the people: for neyther could any one mans pleasure, stretch and extende to the displeasure of very many, and was without without violence, and ouer that in hys later dayes bleſſed and well left. In which tyme of his later dayes, this realme was in quiet & proſperous eſtate, no feare of outwarde enemyes, no warre in hande, nor none towarde, but ſuch as no man loked for. The people towarde the Prince not in a conſtreyned feare, but in a willyng and louyng obedience among themſelues, and the commons in good peace. The Lordes whome he knew at variaunce, himſelfe in his deathbed appeaſed. He hadde left all gatheryng of money (which is the onely thing that wythdraweth the hartes of the Engliſhe men from the Prince) nor any thing entred he to take in hand by which he ſhould be dryuen thereto: For his tribute out of Fraunce hee had before obtayned. Tributs.

And the yere foregoyng his death he had obtayned the towne of Barwike,
And albeit that all the time of his reigne, he was with his people ſo benigne, courteſie, and ſo familier, that no part of his vertues was more eſteemed, yet that condicion in the ende of his dayes (in which many princes by a long contynued ſouereintye decline to a proude port from debonayr behauior of their beginnyng) meruelouſlie in him grew and encreaſed: ſo farforth that in the Sommer laſt that euer he ſawe, his highneſſe beyng at Windſor in hunting ſent for the Maior and Aldermen of Londō vnto him, for none other arrand but to haue them hunt, and to be merry with him, where he made them not ſo ſtately, but ſo friendly & ſo familier cheere, & ſent veniſon from thence ſo freely into the Citie, that no one thing in many dayes before gat him moe harts, or more hartie fauor among the common people, which oftentymes more eſteme, and take for great kindneſſe a little courteſye then a great benefite. So deceaſſed as I haue ſaide, this noble kyng, in that tyme, in which his lyfe was moſt deſyred, whoſe loue of hys people and entier affection towardes hym, had bene to his noble children (hauing in themſelues alſo as many giftes, of nature, as many princely vertues, as much goodlye towardneſſe as theyr age could receiue) a meruelous fortreſſe and ſure armor, if deuiſion, and diſſencion of their friendes, had not vnarmed them, and left them deſtitute, and the execrable deſyre of ſouereintie, prouoked him to their deſtruction, which if either kind, or kindneſſe had holden place, muſt nedes haue bene their chiefe defence. For Richarde the Duke of Gloceſter, by nature their vncle, by office their protector, to their father beholden, to themſelues by oth and allegeaunce bounden, all the bandes broken, that bindeth man and man together without reſpect of God or the worlde, vnnaturally contryued to bereue them, not onelie of their dignitie, but alſo of their lyues. But foraſmuch as this demeanor miniſtreth in effect all the whole matter, whereof this ſpeciall ſtorye ſhall intreate, it is therefore conuenyent somewhat to ſhewe you ere we farther go, what maner of man this was that coulde fynde in his hart ſo much miſchiefe to conceiue. A noble and gentle prince.

Richard Duke of Yorke, a noble man and a mightie, began not by warre but by lawe to chalenge the Crowne, puttyng his clayme into the Parliament, where his cauſe was either for right or fauor ſo farforth aduaunced, that king Henry his blood (albeit he had a goodly Prince) vtterly reiected, the Crowne was by aucthoritie of Parliament entayled vnto the Duke of Yorke and his iſſue male in remainder immediately after the death of king Henry. But the Duke not indurying ſo long to tary, but entendyng vnder pretext of diſſention and debate ariſing in the realme, to preuent his time, and Richarde Duke of Yorke how he chalenged the Crowne.

to take vpon him the rule in king Henryes life, was with many Nobles of the realme at Wakefielde slaine, leauyng three sonnes, Edwarde, George, and Richard. All three as they are great states of birth, so were they great & stately of stomacke, gredie, and ambicious of auctoritie, and impacient of partners.

This was King Edward the fourth.

George duke of Clarence.

George Duke of Clarence was a noble Prince, and at all poyntes fortunate, if either his awne ambicion had not set him agaynst his brother, or the enuy of his enemyes, his brother agaynst him. For were it by the Queene and the Lordes of her blood, which highly maligned the kinges kindred (as women commonly not of malice, but of nature hate them whome their husbandes loue) or were it a proude appetite of the Duke himselfe entendyng to be king: at the last heynous treason was there layd to his charge, and finally were he faultie or faultlesse, attainted was he by Parliament, and iudged to the death, and therevpon hastily drowned in a Butte of Malmesie (as is aforesayde) whose death king Edward (albeit he commaunded it) when he wist it was done, pitifully bewayled it, and sorowfully repented it.

The description of king Richard the thirde.

Richard the thirde sonne, of whome we nowe intreate, was in wit and courage egall with either of them, in bodie and prowesse farre vnder them both, little of stature, euill featured of limmes, crooke backed, his left shoulder much higher then his right, hard fauoured of visage, and such as is in states called warlike, in other men, otherwise, he was malicious, wrathfull, enuyous, and from afore his birth euer froward. It is for truth reported, that the Duches his mother had so much a do in her trauaile, that she could not be deliuered of him vncut: and that he came into the world with the feete forward, as men be borne outward, and (as the fame runneth) also not vntothed: whether men of hatred report aboue the truth, or else that nature chaunged her course in his beginnyng, which in the course of his life many thinges vnnaturally committed, I cannot tell. None euill Capitaine was he in the warre, as to the which his disposition was more meetly then for peace. Sundry victories had he, and sometyme ouerthrowes, but neuer in default as for his awne person, either of hardinesse or of pollitique order: Free was he called of dispence, and somewhat aboue his power liberall: with large giftes he gate him vnstedfast friendship, for which he was faine to pill and spoyle in other places, which gat to himselfe stedfast hatred: He was close and secret and a depe dissimuler, lowly of countenaunce, arrogant of heart, outwardly compinable where he inwardly hated, not lettyng to kisse whome he thought to kill: despiteous & cruell, not for euill will alway, but oftener for Ambicion, and either for the suretie or the encrease of his estate: Friend and foe was much what indifferent vnto him: where his aduauntage grew, he spared no mannes death, whose life withstoode his purpose. He slue with his awne handes king Henry the sixt beyng prisoner in the Tower of London, as men constantly say, and that without commaundement or knowlege of the king, which would vndoubtedly, if he had entended that thing, haue appointed that Butcherly office to some other then to his awne borne brother. Some wyse men also weene that his drift couertly conueyed, lacked not in helpyng forth his brother Duke of Clarence to his death: which he resisted openly, how be it somewhat (as men demed) more faintly then he that were hartily myn-

to his welth. And they that thus deeme, thinke that he long time in king Edwardes life forethought to be king, in case that his brother (whose lyfe he loked that euill diet should shorten) should happen to decease (as in deede he did) while his children were yong. And they deme that for this intent, he was glad of his brothers death the Duke of Clarence, whose life must nedes haue hindered him so entendyng, whether the same Duke of Clarence had kept him true to his nephew the yong king, or enterprised to be king himselfe. But of all this matter concernyng the Duke of Clarence, there is no certeintie, and whoso deuiseth vpon coniectures, may as well shote to farre, as to short. Howbeit this I haue by credible information learned, that the selfe night in which king Edwarde died, one Mistlebrooke long before morning came in great haste to the house of one Pottier, dwelling in Redcrosse streete without Crepelgate: And when he was with hastie rappyng quickly letten in, he shewed vnto Pottier that king Edwarde was departed: by my troth man quod Pottier, then will my maister the Duke of Glocester be king. What cause he had so to thinke, hard it is to say, whether he beyng towards him any thing knewe that he such a thing purposed, or otherwise had any inckelyng therof: for he was not likely to speake it of naught.

But nowe to returne to the course of this historie, were it that the Duke of Gloucester had of olde forempnded this conclusion, or was now at earst therevnto moued, and put in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the yong Princes his nephewes (as opportunitie and likelihoode of spede, putteth a man in courage of that he neuer entented) certeine it is that he contriued their destruction, with the vsurpacion of the Regall dignitie vpon himselfe. And forasmuche as he well wysted, and holpe to maintaine a long continued grudge and heart brennyng betweene the Queenes kindred and the kings blood, either partie enuiyng others authoritie, he now thought that their deuision should be (as it was in dede) a fortherly beginnyng to the pursuyte of his entent, and a sure ground for the foundacion of all his buyldyng, if hee might first vnder the pretence of reuengyng, abuse the anger and ignorannce of the one partie, to the destruction of the other: and then winne to his purpose as many as he could: and those that could not be wonne, might be lost ere they looked therfore. For of one thing was he certaine, that if his entent were perceyued, he should soone haue made peace with both the parties, wyth his awne blood.

King Edward in his life albeit that this discention betweene his friends somewhat yked him, yet in his good health he somewhat the lesse regarded it, because he thought whatsoeuer businesse should fall betweene them, himselfe shoulde alway be able to rule both the parties. But in his last sickenesse, when he perceaued his naturall strength so sore enfeebled, that he dispaired of all recouery, then he considering the youth of his children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrusted then that which happened, yet well foreseing that many harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his children should lack discretion of themselues, and good counsayle of their friends, of which either party would counsayle for their awne commoditie, and rather by pleasaunt aduise to winne themselues fauour, then by profitable aduertisement to doe the children good, he called some of them before him that were at variaunce, and in especiall the Lorde Marques Dorset the Queenes sonne by her firſt huſbande, and Richard the Lorde Haſtings a noble man, then Lord Chamberleyn, agaynſt whome the Quene eſpecially grudged, for the great fauour the king bare him, and alſo for that ſhe thought him ſecretly familier with the king in wanton company. Her kindred alſo bare him ſore, as well for that the king had made him Capitaine of Calice, which office the Lorde Ryuers, brother to the Quene claymed of the kings former promiſe, as for diuers other great giftes which he receyued, but they loked for. When theſe Lordes with diuers other of both the parties were come in preſence, the king lifting vp himſelfe, and vnder ſet with pillowes, as it is reported, ſayde on thys wiſe vnto them.

The exhortation of king Edward in his death bed

My Lords, my dere kinſmen and alies, in what plight I now lye, you ſee, & I well feele: by which the leſſe while I loke to liue with you, the more deepely am I moued to care in what caſe I leaue you, for ſuche as I leaue you, ſuch are my children lyke to finde you. Which if they ſhould as God forbid, finde you at variaunce, might hap themſelues to fall at warre, ere their diſcretion would ſerue them to ſet you at peace. Yee ſee their youth, of which I reken the onely ſuretie to reſt in your concord. For it ſuffiſeth not that all you loue them, if eche of you hate other. If they were men, your faithfulneſſe would happily ſuffiſe: but childhood muſt be mainteyned by mens authoritie, & ſlipper youth vnder propped with elder counſail, which neither can they haue, but you geue it, neither can you geue it, if ye agree not. For where eche laboreth to breake that the other maketh, and where hatred is of eche others counſayle, there muſt it needes be long ere any good concluſion go forwarde. And alſo while eyther partie laboreth to be chiefe, flatterie ſhall haue more place, then plaine and faithfull aduiſe, of which muſt needes enſue the euill bringing vp of the Prince, whoſe minde in tender youth infect, ſhall redily fall to miſchiefe and ryot, and draw downe this noble realme to ruine, but if grace turne him to wiſedome: which if God ſend, then they that by euill pleaſed him before beſt, ſhall after fall fartheſt out of fauour, ſo that euer at the laſt, euill drifts driue to naught, and good playne waies proſper. Great variance hath there lōg bene betwene you, not alway for greatcauſes. Sometime a thing right well entended, oure miſconſtruction turneth it to worſſe: or a ſmal diſpleaſure done vnto vs, either our awne affection or euill tongs maketh it much more grieuous. But this wot I wel, ỹ ye neuer hertofore had ſo great cauſe of hatred, as ye haue now of loue. That we be al mē and all chriſten men, this will I leaue vnto preachers to tell you (& yet I wot not whether any preachers words ought more to moue you, then his that is by and by goyng to the place that they all preach off.) But this ſhall I deſire you to remember that the one part of you is of my bloud, the other of mine alies, & eche of you with other eyther of kindred or affinity, which ſpiritual kindred of affinity, if the ſacraments of Chriſtes church beare that weight with vs, that I would God they did, ſhould no leſſe moue vs to charitie, then the reſpect of fleſhly conſanguinitie. Our Lorde forbid that ye loue together the worſſe for the ſelfe ſame cauſe that ye ought to loue together the better. And yet that happeneth ſometime: and no where finde we ſo deadly debate as among them which by nature and lawe, ought moſt beſt to agree together: Such a peſtilent Serpent is ambition, and deſire of vaine glorie and ſoueraigntie, which among ſtates where he once entereth, creepeth ſo farre forth, till with diuision and variaunce he turneth all to mischiefe. First longing to be next to the best: Afterward egall with the best, and at the last chiefe and aboue the best. Of which immoderate appetite of worship, and thereby of debate and discention, what losse, what sorowe, what trouble hath within these fewe yeres growen in this realme, I praye God as well to forget, as we well remember. Which things if I could as well haue foreseene as I haue with my more pain then pleasure proued: By Gods blessed Ladie (that was euer his othe) I would neuer haue wonne the curtesie of so many mens knees with the losse of so many mens heads. But sithence things passed cannot be called agayne, much ought we the more to beware, by what occasion we haue taken so great hurt before, that we eftsones fall not into that occasion of daunger againe. Now be those griefes passed, & all is (God be thanked) quiet, and likely right well to prosper in wealthfull peace vnder your Cosyns my children, if God send them lyfe and you loue. Of which two things the lesse losse were they, by whome though God did his pleasure, yet should the realme alway finde kings, and paraduenture as good kings. But if you among your selues in a childes raigne fall at debate, many a good man shall perishe, and happily he to, and ye to, or this land finde peace agayne: wherfore in these last wordes that euer I looke to speake to you or with you, I exhort and require you all for the loue that ye haue euer borne to me, for the loue that I haue euer borne to you, and for the loue that our Lorde and sauiour Christ beareth to vs all, from this time forward, all griefes forgotten, eche of you loue other. Which I verily trust you will, if you any thing earthly regard, either God or your king, affinitie or kindred, this realme your awne Countrie, or your awne suretie. And therwithall the king not able to endure any lenger to sit vp, layd him downe on his right side, his face toward them: and none was there present that could refrain from weping. But the Lordes comforting him with as good wordes as they could, and aunswering for the time, as they thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence, as by their wordes appered, eche forgaue other, and ioyned their hands together, when (as it after appered by their deedes) their hartes were farre a sunder.

Edward the Prince commeth toward London.

Assone as the king was departed, Edward the Noble Prince his sonne drewe towardes London, which at the time of his fathers decease, kept his house at Ludlow in Wales: which Countrie being farre of from the lawe and recourse to iustice, was begonne to be farre out of good rule and waren wylde, so that Robbers and Ryuers walked at libertie vncorrected. And for this encheason the Prince was in the life of his father sent thether, to the ende that the auctority of his presence, should refraine euil disposed persons from the boldenesse of their former outrages. And to the gouernaunce and ordering of this yong Prince at his sending thether, was there appointed syr Anthony Wooduile Lorde Ryuers and brother to the Quene, a right honorable man, as valyaunt of hande as pollitique in counsayle. And there were adioyned vnto him other of the same party, and in effect euery one as he was nerest of kinne vnto the Queene, so was he planted nere about the Prince. That drift was by the Queene not vnwisely deuised, whereby her bloud might in the youth of the Prince be rooted in his fauour. But all thys the Duke of Gloucester turned vnto their destruction, and vpon that ground he set the foundation of all his vnhappy building. For whome soeuer he perceaued

ued eyther at variance with them, or bearing himselfe their fauour, he brake vnto them, some by mouth, some by writing and secret messengers, that it neither was reason, nor in any wise to be suffred, that the yong king their maister and kinsman should be in the hands and custody of his mothers kindred, sequestred in maner from their company and attendance, of which euerie one of them ought him as faithfull seruice as they, and many of them of farre more honorable part of kinne then his mothers side: whose bloud (quod he) sauing the kinges pleasure, was full vnmeete to be matched with hys: which now to be as who saye remoued from the king, and the lesse noble to be left about him, is (quod he) neither honorable vnto his maiestie, nor vnto vs, and also to his grace no suretie to haue the mightiest of his friendes from him, and vnto vs no little ieopardie to suffer our well proued euill willers to growe in ouer great authoritie with the Prince in his youth, namely which is light of beliefe and sone perswaded. Ye remember I trow king Edwarde himselfe, albeit he was a man of age & discretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bende, more then stoode eyther with his honor or our profite, or with the cõmodity of any man elſe, except only the immoderate aduãcement of themselues: which whether they thriued after their awne weale, or our woe, it were hard I wene to gesse. And if some folkes friendship had not holden better place with the king then any respect of kindred, they might easely haue trapped and brought to confusion some of vs or hys: and why not as easely as they haue done some already, as nere of his royall bloud as we are? But our Lorde hath wrought his will, and thanks be to his grace that perill is past. Howbeit, as great is growyng, if we suffer hys yong king in our enemies hande, which wythout his witting might abuse the name of hys commaundement to any of our vndoyng, which thing God and good prouision forbid. Of which good prouision none of vs hath any thing the lesse neede for the late made attonement, in which the kinges pleasure had more place, then the partie willes. Nor none of vs I beleue is so vnwise or oversene, to trust a newe friend made of an olde foe: Or to thinke that an hourely kindnesse, sodainely contract in one houre continued, should be deeper settelled in their stamackes, then a long accustomed malice many yeres rooted.

With these wordes and writynges, and such other, the Duke of Gloucester soone set on fire them that were of themselues ethe to kindle, and in especially twaine, Edward Duke of Buckingham, and Richard Lorde Hastinges and Chamberlanie, both men of honour and of great power. The one by long succession from his auncestrie, the other by his office, and the kinges fauour. These two not beryng eche to other so much loue, as hatred both vnto the Quenes part: in this poynt accorded together with the Duke of Gloucester, that they would vtterly amoue from the kinges companie all his mothers friendes, vnder the name of their enemyes. This beyng concluded, the Duke of Gloucester vnderstandyng that the Lordes which were about the king, entended to bring him vp to his coronation, accompanied with suche power of their friendes that it should be hard for him to bring his purpose to passe, without the gatheryng and assemble of people, and in maner of open warre, whereof he wist the ende was doubtfull, and in which the king beyng on their side, his part should haue the face and name of a rebellion: He secretly therefore by diuers meanes, caused the Queene to be perswaded and brought brought in minde, that it neither was neede, and also shoulde be ieopardous the king to come vp so strong. For where as nowe euery Lord loued other, and none other thing studied vpon, but about the coronacion and honor of the king: If the Lordes of her kindred should assemble in the kings name much people, they should geue the Lordes an occasion, betwene whome had bene before some debate, to feare and suspect, least they should gather this people, not for the kinges sauegard, whome no man impugned, but for their destruction, hauyng more regarde to their olde variaunce, then to their newe atonement: For which cause they should assemble on the other partie much people againe for their defence, whose power she wist well stretched farre, and thus should all the realme fall on a roare. And of all the hurt that thereof should ensue, which was likely not to be little, and the most harme there like to fall where she lest would, all the world would put her & her kindred in the wight, and say that they had vnwisely and vntruly also broken the amitie and peace that the king her husband had so prudently made betweene his kin and hers in his death bed, and which the other partie faythfully obserued.

The Queene beyng in thus wise perswaded such worde sent vnto her sonne, and vnto her brother beyng about the king, and ouer that, the Duke of Gloucester himselfe and other Lordes the chiefe of his bend, wrote vnto the king so reuerently, and to the Queenes friendes there so louingly, that they nothing earthly mistrustyng, brought the king vp in great haste, but not in good speede, with a small companie. Now as the king passed towardes London, from the towne of Northampton, leauyng behinde him the Lorde Ryuers, the kinges vncle, who thought the nert day to be with the king at stony Stratforde, ten miles from thence, thether came the Dukes of Gloucester, and Buckingham. So was there made that night much friendly cheere betwene these Dukes, and the Lorde Riuers, a great while. But incontinently that they were openly departed with great courtisie, and the Lord Riuers lodged, the Dukes secretly, with a fewe of their most priuie friendes, set them downe in counsaile, wherein they spent a great part of the night. And at their risyng in the dawnyng of the day, they sent about priuily vnto their seruantes in their Innes and lodgynges, geuing them commaundement to make them selues quickly redie, for their Lordes were redie to horsebacke. Upon which Messages many of their folkes were attendant, when many of the Lord Ryuers seruaunts were vnreadie. The Dukes also at that tyme, had taken the keyes of their Inne into their custodie, that none should passe forth without their license. And also in the high way towarde stonie Stratford, where the king lay, they had bestowed certaine of their folke to stoppe the passage, that no person shoulde passe from Northampton towarde stonie Stratforde, but should be either stayed, or compelled to returne againe, vntill they shoulde geue other licence: because sayd they, that the Dukes themselues entended for the shewe of their diligence, to be the first that should attend that day vpon the kinges highnesse out of that towne: thus bare they folke in hande.

But when the Lorde Ryuers vnderstoode the Gates to be closed, and the wayes on euery syde beset, neither his seruauntes, nor himselfe suffered once to go out, and perceiuyng well that so great a thing without his knowlege could not be begon for naught, comparyng also with himselfe this maner of doyng present, with the last nightes cheere, in so fewe houres, so great a chaunge, a chaunge, which he maruelously mislyked. Howbeit, sith he could not get away, and to keepe himselfe close he would not, least he should seeme to hide himselfe for some secrete feare of his owne fault, whereof he sawe no suche cause in himselfe, he determined vpon the suretie of his owne conscience to go boldely vnto them, and to inquire what this matter did meane. Whom assone as they saw, they began to quarrell with him, and sayde, that he entended to set distaunce betweene the king and them, and to bring them to confusion, but it should not lie in his power. And when he began, as he was a verye well spoken man, in goodly wise to excuse himselfe, they tarved not the ende of his aunswere, but shortly tooke him and put in warde, and that done went forthwith to horsebacke, and tooke the way to stonie Stratford, where they found the king with his companie readie to leape on horsebacke, and to depart forward and to leaue that lodging for them, because it was to streight for both companies. And assone as they came in his presence, they light downe with all their companie about them. To whome the Duke of Buckingham sayde, go afore Gentlemen, and yomen, kepe your rowmes. And thus in a goodly aray they came to the king, & on their knees in humble wise saluted his grace, which receyued them in verye ioyous and amiable maner, nothing earthly knowyng nor mistrustyng as yet: But euen by and by in his presence, they picked a querell to the Lorde Richard Gray the kinges other brother by his mother, saiyng that the Lorde Marques his brother, and the Lord Ryuers his Uncle, had compassed to rule the king and the realme, and to set variance among the states, and to subdue and destroy the noble blood of the realme. Toward the accomplishyng whereof, they sayde that the Lorde Marques had entred into the Tower of London, and thence taken out the kinges treasure, and sent men to the sea. All which thinges these Dukes wist well, were done for good purposes, and necessary by the counsaile at London, sauyng that somewhat they must say. Unto which wordes the king aunswered, what my brother Marques hath done, I cannot tell: But in good fayth I dare well aunswere for my Uncle Ryuers, and my brother here, that they be innocent of any such matters. Yea my leege, quod the Duke of Buckingham, they haue kept their dealyng in these matters farre from the knowlege of your good grace. And forthwith they arrested the Lorde Richard Gray, and sir Thomas Vaughan knight, in the kinges presence, and brought the king and all backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counsail. And there they sente away from the king whome it pleased them, and set newe seruantes about him, such as liked better them then him. At which dealyng the king wept, but it booted not. And at dinner the Duke of Gloucester sent a dishe from his owne table to the Lorde Ryuers, praiyng him to be of good cheere, all should be well enough. And he thanked the Duke, and prayed the Messenger to beare it to his Nephew the Lorde Richard Gray, with the same message for his comfort, as one to whom such aduersitie was straunge: But himselfe had bene in all his dayes inured therewith, and therefore could beare it the better. But for all this comfortable curtisie of the Duke of Gloucester, he sent the Lorde Riuers, and the Lorde Richard, with sir Thomas Vaughan into the North Countrie to diuers places into prison, and afterwarde, they were all sent to Pomfret Castell, where in the ende they were beheaded.

The Lorde Ryuers committed to warde.

Richard lord Gray apprehended.

The death of the Lorde Ryuers and diuers other.

In

In this wise the Duke of Glouceſter tooke vpon him ſelfe the order and gouernaunce of the yong kyng, whome with much honor and humble reuerence, he conueyed vpwarde towarde the Citie of London. But anone the tidyngs of this matter came haſtily to the Queene a litle before the midnight followyng, and that in the forſt wiſe, that the kyng her ſonne was taken, her brother, her ſonne, and her other friends areſted, and ſent, no man wiſt whether, to be done wyth, God wot what. With which tidinges, the Queene in great fright, and heauineſſe, bewailyng her childes reigne, her friends miſchaunce, and her owne infortune, curſſyng the time that euer ſhee was diſſwaded the gatheryng of power about the king, gote her ſelfe in all the haſt poſſible wyth her yong ſonne and her daughters out of the palaice of Weſtminſter, in which ſhe them lay, into the Sanctuarie, lodging her ſelfe and her company there in the Abbots place. The Queene taketh ſanctuarie.

Now came there one in likewiſe not long after midnight from the Lord Chamberleyn, vnto the Archebiſhop of Yorke, then Chaunceller of England, to hys place not farre from Weſtminſter. And for that hee ſhewed his ſeruauntes that he had tidinges of ſo great importaunce, that his maiſter gaue him in charge not to forbeare his reſt, they letted not to wake him, nor he to admitte this meſſenger vnto his bed ſyde. Of whome hee heard that thoſe Dukes were gone backe with the kinges grace from Stony Stratforde vnto Northhampton: Notwithſtanding, Syr quoth he, my Lord, ſendeth your Lordſhip worde, that there is no feare: For he aſſureth you that all ſhall be well. I aſſure him quod the Archebiſhop, be it as well as it wil, it will neuer be ſo well as we haue ſeene it. And therupon by and by after the meſſenger was departed, he cauſed in all the haſt, all his ſeruaunts to be called vp, and ſo with his owne houſholde about him, and euerye man weaponed, he tooke the great ſeale with him, and came yet before daye vnto the Queene. About whome he founde much heauineſſe, romble, haſt and buſineſſe, cariage, and conueiyng of her ſtuffe into the Sentuary, Cheſtes, Cofers, Packes, Ferdels, Truſſes, all on mens backes, no man vnoccupied, ſome lading, ſome goyng, ſome diſcharging, ſome commyng for more, ſome brekyng downe the walles to bring in the next way, and ſome yet drew to them that holpe to carye a wrong way. The Queene her ſelfe ſate alone alowe on the ruſhes all deſolate, and diſmayed, whome the Archebiſhop comforted in the beſt maner he coulde, ſhewyng her that he truſted that the matter was nothing ſo ſore as ſhe tooke it for, & that he was put in good hope, and out of feare by the meſſage ſent him from the Lord Chamberleyn. Ah, wo worth him quoth ſhe, for he is one of them that laboureth to deſtroy me and my blood. Madam quoth he, be ye of good cheere, for I aſſure you, if they crowne any other king then your ſonne, whome they now haue with them, we ſhall on the morow crown his brother, whome you haue here with you. And here is the great Seale, which in likewiſe as that noble Prince your houſbande, deliuered it vnto me, ſo here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vſe and behoſe of your ſonne, & therewith he toke her the great Seale, and departed home agayne, yet in the dawning of the day: By which time he might in his chamber window ſe al the Thamis full of boates of the Duke of Glocesters ſeruauntes, watching that no man ſhoulde go to the Sentuary, nor paſſe vnſerched, and examined. Then was there great commocion, and murmor aſwell in other places about, and ſpecially ally in the Citie, the people diuerslye deuisyng vpon this dealing. And some Lordes, Knights, and gentlemen, either for fauor of the Queene, or for feare of themselues, assembled in sundry companies, and went flocking in harnesse: and many also, for that they reconed this demeanor attempted, not so specially against the other Lords, as against the king himself in the disturbance of his coronation: therefore they assembled by and by together, to common of this matter at London: At which meeting, the Archebishop of Yorke fearing that it woulde be ascribed (as it was in deede) to his ouermuch lightnesse, that he so sodainely had yelded vp the great seale to the Queene, to whome the custody thereof nothyng appertayned, without especiall commaundement of the king, secretly sent for the great Seale agayne, and brought it with him after the customable maner. And at this meting the Lord Hastinges, whose troth towarde the king no man doubted, nor needed to doubt, perswaded the lords to beleue that the Duke of Gloceſter was sure & fastly faithfull to his prince, and that the Lord Ryuers, and Lord Richarde with the other knights were for matters attempted by them against the Duke of Gloceſter, and Buckingham put vnder arrest for their suretie, not for the kinges ieopardie: and that they were also in safegarde, and there no longer to remaine, then till the matter were, not by the Dukes onely, but also by all the other Lords of the kings counsayle indifferently examined, and by their discrecions ordered, and either iudged or appeased. But one thing he aduysed them to beware, that they iudged not the matter to farre forth, ere they knewe the truth, nor turning their priuate grudges into the common hurt, irriting and prouoking men vnto anger, and disturbing the kings coronacion, towarde which the Dukes were comming vp, that they might peraduenture bring the matter so farre out of ioynt, that it should neuer be brought in frame againe. Which strife if it should hap, as it were likely to come to a fielde, though both parties were in all other thinges egall, yet shoulde the aucthorite be on that side, where the kyng himselfe is: with these persuasions of my Lorde Hastinges, whereof parte himselfe beleued, of part he wist the contrary: these commocions were somewhat appeased, but specially, by that that the Dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham, were so nere and came so shortlye on with the kyng, in none other maner, nor with none other boyce or semblaunce, then to his coronacion, causyng the fame to be blowen about, that these Lords & knightes that were taken, had contriued the destruction of the Dukes of Gloceſter & Buckingham, and of other the noble blood of the realme, to the ende that themselues would alone demeane and gouerne the king at their pleasure. And for the colourable proofe therof, such of the Dukes seruaunts as rode with their cartes of their stuffe, which were taken, among the which stuffe no marueyll though some were harnesse, which at the breaking vp of such an houshold must nedes be brought away, or cast awaye, they shewed to the people all the way as they went and sayde: lo, here be the barelles of harnesse, that these traitours had priuilye conueighed in their cariages to destroy the noble Lordes withall. This diuerse, (although it made the matter to wise men more vnlikely) well perceiuyng that the entendours of such a purpose woulde rather haue hadde their harnesse on their backes, then to haue bounde them vp in barrelles, yet many of the common people were therewith right well satisfyed, and saide it were almose to hang them.

When

When the king approched nere the City, the Maior, and Aldermen and fiue hundred commoners receiued his grace reuerently at Harnesay Parke, and so conueyed him to the Citie, where he entred the fourth day of May, in the first and last yere of his reigne, and was lodged in the bishop of Londons Pallace: but the Duke of Gloucester bare him in open sight so reuerently, saiyng to all men as he rode, beholde your Prince and souereigne Lorde, and made suche semblaunce of lowlynesse to his Prince, that from the great obloquy that he was in so late before, he was sodainely fallen in so great trust that at the counsaile next assembled, he was made the onely chiefe ruler, and thought most mete to be Protector of the king and his realme: so that, were it destenie, or were it foly, the Lambe was betaken to the Woolfe to kepe. At which counsel ỳ Archbishop of Yorke was sore blamed for deliuering ỳ great seale to the Quene, & the seale taken from him and deliuered to Doctor John Russell Bishop of Lincoln, a wise man and a good, & of much experience, and one of the best learned men vndoubtedly that England had in his time, & diuers lords & knights were apointed to diuers rowmes, the Lord Chamberlayne & some other kept the rowmes that they were in before, but not many.

The king comming to London.

The Duke of Gloucester made Protector.

Now were it so that the Protectour (which alwayes you must take for the Duke of Gloucester) sore thirsted for the achieuyng of his pretensed enterprise, and thought euery daye a yere till it were perfourmed, yet durst he no farther attempt, as long as he had but halfe his praye in his hande, well witting that if he deposed the one brother, all the realme would fall to the other, if he remayned eyther in Sanctuarie, or should happily be shortly conueyed to his farther libertie. Wherefore incontinent at the next meeting of the Lordes in counsell, he purposed to them that it was a heynous deede of the Queene, and proceeding of great malice toward the kings counsellers, that she should kepe the kings brother in Sanctuarie from him whose speciall pleasure and comfort were to haue his brother with him, and that to be done by her to none other intent, but to bring all the Lordes in an obloquy and murmour of the people, as though they were not to be trusted with the kings brother, which Lordes were by the whole assent of the Nobles of the Realme appointed as the kings nere friends to the tuition of his royall person, the prosperitie whereof (quod he) standeth not alonely in keeping from enemies and euill dyet, but partly also in recreation and moderate pleasure, which he can not take in his tender youth in the company of old and auncient persons, but in the familiar conuersation of those that be not farre vnder nor farre aboue his age, and neuertheless of estate conuenient to accompany his noble maiestie, wherefore with whome rather then with his awne brother? and if anye man thinke this consideration light (I am sure no man so thinketh that loueth the king) let him consider that sometime without small thinges, greater cannot stande, and verily it redowneth greatly to the dishonour both of the kinges highnesse, and of all vs that be about his grace to haue it runne in euery mans mouth, not in this realme onely, but also in other landes (as euill wordes walke farre) that the kings brother should be faine to kepe sanctuarie. For euery man will indge that no man wil so do for nought, & such opinion once fastened in mens harts, hard it is to be wrested out, and may growe to more griefe then any man here can diuine. Wherefore me thinketh it were not the worst to send to the Quene some honorable and truſtie perſonage, ſuch as tendereth the kings weale and the honour of his counſell, and is alſo in credite and fauour with her: for all which conſiderations none ſeemeth more meetely to mee, then the reuerend father here preſent, my Lorde Cardinall Archebyſhop of Yorke, who may in this matter doe moſt good of all men, if it pleaſe hym to take the payne, which I doubt not of hys goodneſſe he will not refuſe for the kings ſake and ours, and wealth of the yong Duke himſelfe the kinges moſt honorable brother, and for the comfort of my ſouereigne Lord himſelfe my moſt deare Nephew, conſidering that thereby ſhall be ceaſſed the ſlaunderous rumour and obloquy nowe going abrode, and the hurtes auoyded that thereof might enſue, and much reſt and quietneſſe growe to all the realme. And if cheer perchaſe be ſo obſtinate and ſo preciſely ſet vpon her owne will and opinion, that neither his wiſe and faythfull aduertiſement can moue her, nor anye mans reaſon ſatiſfie her, then ſhall we by mine aduiſe by the kings authoritie fetch him out of that priſon, and bring him to his noble preſence, in whoſe continuall company he ſhall be ſo well cheriſhed and ſo honorably intreated, that all the worlde ſhall to our honour and her reproche, perceyue that it was onely malice, frowardneſſe, and folye, that cauſed her to keepe him there. Thys is my mynde for thys tyme, except that any of you my Lordes any thyng perceyue to the contrary, for neuer ſhall I by Gods grace ſo wed my ſelfe vnto mine owne wyll, but I ſhall be ready to chaunge it vpon your better aduiſes.

When the Protector had ſayde, all the counſayle affirmed that the motion was good and reaſonable, and to the king and the Duke hys brother honorable, and a thing that ſhould ceaſe great murmour in the realme, if the mother might by good meanes be induced to delyuer him: which thing the Archebyſhop of Yorke, whome they all agreed alſo to be moſt conuenient therevnto, tooke vpon him to moue her, and thereto doe his vttermoſt endeuour. Howbeit, if ſhe could in no wiſe be intreated with her good wyll to delyuer him, then thought he and ſuche other of the ſpiritualtie as were preſent, that it were not in any wiſe to be attempted to take him out againſt her wyll, for it would be a thing that ſhould turne to the great grudge of all men and high diſpleaſure of God, if the priuilege of that holy place ſhould now be broken, which had ſo many yeres beene kept, which both kings and Popes ſo good had graunted, ſo many had confirmed, and which ground was more then fiue hundred yeres ago ſanctified by ſaint Peter himſelfe, in his owne perſon (ſayth Sir Thomas Moore) in ſpirite accompanied, with a great multitude of Aungels by night ſo ſpecially halowed and dedicate to God, for the proofe whereof they haue yet in the Abbey, ſaint Peters Cope to ſhewe, and from that time hetherward, was there neuer ſo vndeuoute a king, that euer enterpriſed the ſacred priuilege to violate, nor ſo holy a Byſhop that durſt preſume the Church of the ſame to conſecrate: and therefore, quod the Archbiſhop, God forbid that any man ſhould for any earthly enterpriſe breake the immunite and libertie of that ſacred Sanctuarie, that hath bene the ſafegarde of ſo many a good mans lyfe, and I truſt quod he we ſhall not neede it, but for any maner of nede I would we ſhould not do it, I truſt ỹ ſhe with reaſon ſhal be contented, and al thing in good maner obteyned. And if it hap that I bring it not ſo to paſſe, yet ſhal I further it to my beſt power, ſo that you all ſhall perceyue my good wil, diligence and endeuor: But the mothers dread and womaniſh feare ſhall be the let, if any be.

Nay womanniſhe frowardneſſe, quod the Duke of Buckingham, for I dare take it on my ſoule, that ſhe well knoweth that ſhe nedeth no ſuch thing to feare, either for her ſonne or for her ſelfe. For as for her, here is no man that will be at warre with women, would God ſome of the men of hir kinne were women to, and then ſhould all be ſone in reſt. Howbeit there is none of her kinne the leſſe loued for that they be of her kinne, but for their owne euill deſeruyng. And put the caſe that we neyther loued her nor her kinne, yet there were no cauſe why we ſhould hate the kinges noble brother, to whoſe grace we our ſelues be of kinne, whoſe honour if ſhe aſmuch deſired as our diſhonour, and aſmuche regarde toke to his welth, as to her awne will, ſhee would be as loth to ſuffer hym to be abſent from the king as any of vs be, for if ſhe had any wit, as would God ſhe had as good will, as ſhe hath frowarde wit: ſhe would thinke her ſelfe no wyſer then ſome that are here, of whoſe faythfull myndes ſhe nothing doubteth, but verily beleueth and knowlegeth, that they would be as ſory of his harme as her awne ſelf, and yet they would haue him from her, if ſhe abyde there.

And we all I thinke be content that both her children be with her, if ſhe come from thence, and abide in ſuch place where they may be with their honour. Nowe then, if ſhe refuſe the deliuerance of him to folow the wiſedome of them, whoſe wiſedome ſhe knoweth, whoſe truth ſhe well truſteth: it is eaſie to perceyue that frowardneſſe letteth her, and not feare. But go to, ſuppoſe that ſhe feareth (as who may let her to feare her awne ſhadow) the more ſhe feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we to feare to leaue him in her handes, for if ſhe caſt ſuch fond doubtes that ſhe feare his hurt, then will ſhe feare that he ſhall be fet thence, for ſhe will ſone thinke that if men were ſet (which God forbid on ſo great a miſchiefe) the Sanctuarie will little let them, which Sancturay good men as me thinketh might without ſinne, ſomwhat leſſe regard then they do. Now then, if ſhe doubt leaſt he might be fetched from her, is it not likely enough, that ſhe will ſende him ſomewhere out of the Realme? verily I loke for none other. And I doubt not but ſhe nowe as ſore mindeth it, as we minde the let thereof. And if ſhe might hap to bring that purpoſe to paſſe, as it were no great maiſterie to doe, we lettyng her alone, all the world would ſay that we were a ſort of wiſe counſaylors about a king, to let his brother be caſt away vnder our noſes. And therfore I enſure you faythfully, for my minde, I will rather mauger her ſtomack fetche him away, then leaue him there till her feare or fond frowarde feare conuey him away, and yet will I breake no Sanctuarie, for verily ſith the priuilege of that place and other of that ſort haue ſo long continued, I woulde not go about to breake it, and in good fayth if they were nowe to begin, I would not be he that ſhould go about to make them: yet will not I ſay naye, but it is a dede of pittie that ſuch men as the chaunce of the ſea, or their euill debters haue brought into pouertie, ſhould haue ſome place of refuge to kepe their bodies out of daunger of their cruell creditours. And alſo if it fortune the Crowne to come in queſtion as it hath done before this time, whyle eche part taketh other for traytors, I thinke it neceſſary to haue a place of refuge for both. But as for theeues and murderers, whereof theſe places be full, and which neuer fall from their craft, after they once fall therevnto, it is pittie,

that euer Sanctuary ſhould ſerue them, and in eſpeciall wilfull murderers, whome God commaundeth to be taken from the Aultar, and to bee put to death. And where it is otherwiſe then in theſe caſes, there is no nede of ſanctuaryes, appoynted by God in the olde lawe. For if neceſſitie of his owne defence, or miſfortune driue him to that neede, then a pardon ſeruеth him, which eyther is graunted of courſe, or the king of pitie & compaſſion geueth. Then looke me nowe howe fewe ſanctuary men there be whome neceſſitie or miſfortune compelleth to go thether: And then ſee on the other ſyde, what a ſort there be commonly therein of ſuch, whom wilfull vnthriftineſſe hath brought to naught: what a rable of theues, murderers, and malicious heynous traytors be there: and that in two places ſpecially, the one at the elbowe of the Citie, and the other in the very bowels. I dare well anowe it, if you wray the good that they doe, with the hurt that commeth of them, ye ſhall finde it much better to leeſe both, then to haue both. And this I ſay, although they were not abuſed (as they nowe be, and ſo long haue bene) that I feare me euer they will be while men be afeарde to ſet to their handes to the amendment, as though God and Saint Peter were the Patrones of vngracious liuyng.

The abuſe of Sanctuaries

Now vnthriftes riott and runne in debt vpon boldneſſe of theſe places, yea, and riche men ronne thether with pooze mennes goodes, there they builde, there they ſpende and byd their creditors go whiſtle. Wyues wyues ronne thether with their huſbandes Plate, and ſay they dare not abide with their huſbandes for beatyng, theeues bring thether ſtolne goodes and liue thereon. There they deuiſe newe robberyes nightly and ſteale out and rob, ryue, and kill men, and come againe as though thoſe places gaue them not onely a ſauegarde for the harme that they haue done, but a licence alſo to doe more miſchiefe: howbeit much of this great miſchiefe (if wiſe men would ſet their handes thereunto) might be amended, with great thankes of God, and no breche of the priuilege. The concluſion is, ſith it is ſo long a go, I wote not what Pope, nor what Prince, more pitеous then politique, hath graunted it, and other men ſince of a certeine religious feare haue not broken it, let vs take a paine with it, and let it ſtande a Goddes name in his force, as farre forth as reaſon will, which is not fully ſo farre forth as may ſerue to let vs of the fetching forth of this noble man to his honour and welth, out of that place in the which he neither is nor can be a ſanctuarie or priuileged man. A ſanctuarie euer ſeruеth to defende the bodie of that man that ſtandeth in daunger abroade, not of great hurt onely, but alſo of lawfull hurt: for againſt vnlawfull hurtes and harmes, no Pope nor king entended to priuilege any one place, for that priuilege hath euery place. Knoweth any man any place wherin it is lawfull for one man to do another man wrong? That no man vnlawfully take hurt that libertie the king, the lawe, and very nature forbiddeth in euery place, and maketh to that regarde for euery man euery place a Sanctuary, but where a man is by lawfull meanes in perill, there needeth he the licion of ſome ſpeciall priuilege, which is the onely ground and cauſe of all Sanctuaries, from which neceſſitie this noble Prince is farre, whoſe loue to his king, nature, and kindred prooueth, whoſe innocencie to all the worlde his tender youth affirmeth, and ſo Sanctuary as for him is not neceſſary, nor none he can haue. Men come not to Sanctuary as they come to baptiſme, to require it by his Godfathers, he muſt aſke it himſelfe that muſt haue it, and reaſon, reason, sithe no man hath cause to haue it, but whose conscience of his awne fault maketh him haue neede to require it. What will then hath yonder babe which if he had discretion to require it if nede were, I dare say would be now right angry with them that kepe him there? And I would thinke without any scruple of conscience, without any breche of priuilege, to be somewhat more homely with them that be there Sanctuary men in deede, for if one go to Sanctuary with another mans goodes, why should not the king leauyng his bodie at libertie, satisfie the partie of his goodes euen within the Sanctuary, for neither king nor Pope can geue any place suche a priuilege that it shall discharge a man of his debtes beyng able to pay.

And with that diuerse of the clergie that were there present, whether they sayde it for his pleasure, or as they thought, agreed playnly by the lawe of God, and of the church, that the goods of a sanctuary man, shoulde be deliuered in payment of his debtes, and stollen goods to the owner, and onelye libertie reserued to him to get his liuing with the labour of his handes. Verily, quod the Duke, I thinke you saye verie trueth. And what if a mannes wife will take sanctuary, because she list to romne from her husband, I would thinke if she can allege none other cause, he maye lawfullye without any displeasure done to saint Peter, take her out of saint Peters church by ỹ arme. And if no body may be taken out of sanctuary because he saith he will abyde there, then if a Childe will take sanctuary, because he feareth to go to schole, his maister must let him alone. And as simple as that example is, yet is there lesse reason in our case then in it, for there, though it be a childish feare, yet is there at the least some feare, & herein is no feare at all. And verily I haue often hard of sanctuary men, but I neuer heard before of sanctuary children: and therefore, as for the conclusion of my minde, whosoeuer may deserue to haue neede of it, if they thinke it for their surety let them keepe it, but he can be no sanctuary man that hath neither discretion to desire it, nor malice to deserue it, whose lyfe nor libertie can by no lawfull processe stande in ieoperdy, and he that taketh one out of sanctuary to doe hym good, I saye playnely he breaketh no sanctuary.

When the Duke had done, the temporall men wholy, and the most part of the spirituall men also thinking no hurt earthly ment towarde the young Babe, condiscended in effect, that if he were not deliuered, he should be fetched out. Howbeit, they thought it all best in auoyding of all maner of rumour that the Lorde Cardinall shoulde first assay to get him with her good will. And therevpon all the counsail came to the Sterre chambre at Westminster, and the Cardinall leauing the Protector & other Lords in the Sterre chamber, departed into the sanctuary to the Queene, accompanied with certaine Lords, were it for the respect of his honor, or that she should by the presence of so many, perceiue that this arrand was not onely one mans mind, or were it for that the protectour entended not in this matter to trust one man alone, or else if she finally were determined to kepe him, some of the company had peradventure some secret instruction incontinent maugre her will to take hym and to leaue her no respite to conuey hym, which thee was likely to minde after this matter broken to her if time in any wise would haue serued her.

When the Queene, and these Lordes were come together in presence, the Cardinall shewed vnto her, that it was thought to the lorde protector and the whole counſaile that her kepyng of the king his brother in that place highly ſounded, not onely to the grudge of the people and their obloquie, but alſo to the importable griefe and diſpleaſure of the king his royall maieſtie to whoſe grace it were a ſinguler comfort to haue his naturall brother in companie, and it was their diſhonoures and theirs and hers alſo to ſuffer him in Sanctuary, as though the one brother, ſtoode in daunger, and perill of the other. And he ſhewed her farther, that the whole counſaile had ſente him to require of her the deliuerie of him, that he might bee brought to the king his preſence at his liberty, out of that place which men reckoned as a priſon, and there ſhould he be demeaned according to his eſtate and degree, and ſhe in this doyng ſhoulde both doe great good to the realme, pleaſure to the counſaile, profite to her ſelfe, ſuccour to her friendes that were in diſtreſſe, and ouer that which he wiſt well ſhe ſpecially tendered, not onely great comfort and honour to the kyng, but alſo to the yong Duke himſelfe, whoſe both great wealth it were to be together, aſwell for many greater cauſes, as alſo for their both diſport, and recreation, which things the Lordes eſteemed not light, though it ſeemed light, well pondering that their youth wythout recreation and play cannot endure, nor any eſtraunger for the conuenience of both their ages and eſtates ſo metely in that point for anye of them, as the eyther of them for the other.

The quenes aunſwere.

My Lorde (quod the Queene) I ſay not nay, but that it were very conuenient that this gentleman whome you require were in the company of the king his brother, and in good faith me thinketh it were as great commoditie to them both, as for yet a while to be in the cuſtody of their mother, the tender age conſidered of the elder of them both, but in eſpeciall the yonger, which beſides his infancie that alſo nedeth good loking to, hath a while bene ſo ſore diſeaſed with ſickneſſe, and is ſo newly rather a lytle amended then well recouered, that I dare put no perſon earthlye in truſt with his keeping, but my ſelfe onely, conſidering that there is as the phiſicians ſay, and as we alſo find, double the perill in the reſiduation that was in the firſt ſickneſſe, with which diſeaſe, nature beyng ſore laboured, foreweried, and weakened, wereth the leſſe able to beare oure a newe ſurfet. And albeit, there might be founden other that woulde happily doe their beſt vnto him, yet there is none that eyther knoweth better how to ordre him then I, that ſo long haue kept him, or is more tenderly lyke to cherish him then his owne mother that bare him.

No man denieth good Madame, quod the Cardinall, but that your grace of all folke were moſt neceſſary about your children, and ſo would all the coũſaile not only be content, but alſo glad that you were, if it might ſtand with your pleaſure to be in ſuch place as might ſtande with their honor. But if you appoint your ſelfe to tarie here, then thinke they it more conuenient the Duke of Yorke were with the king honorably at his libertie to the comfort of them both, then here as a Sanctuarie man to their both diſhonour and obloquie, ſith there is not alway ſo great neceſſity to haue the childe to be with the mother, but that occaſion ſometime may be ſuche that it ſhould be more expedient to kepe him elſe where, which in this well appeareth, that at ſuch time that your moſt deareſt ſonne, then Prince, and now king, ſhould for his honor and good order of the Countrie kepe houſhold in Wales, farre out of your keping, your grace was well content therewith your ſelfe. Not very very well content (quod the Quene) and yet the caſe is not like, for the one was then in helth and the other is now ſick, in which caſe I maruayle greatly why my Lorde Protectour is ſo deſirous to haue him in keeping, where if the childe in his ſickneſſe miſcaried by nature, yet might he run into ſlaunder and ſuſpicion of fraude. And they call it a thing ſo ſore agaynſt my childs honor and theirs alſo, that he abideth in this place, it is all their honors there to ſuffer him to abide where no man doubteth he ſhal be beſt kept, and that is here while I am here, which as yet entend not to come forth and ieopard my ſelfe after my friendes, which would God were rather here in ſuretie with mee, then I were there in ieopardie with them. Why Madame (quod the Lorde Haward) knowe you any thing, why they ſhould be in ieopardie? Nay verily, (quod ſhe) nor why they ſhould be in priſon neyther, as they now be, but I trowe it is no great maruell though I feare leaſt thoſe that haue not letted to put them in duraunce without colour, will let as little to procure their deſtruction without cauſe. The Cardinall made a countenaunce to the Lord Haward that he ſhould harpe no more vpon that ſtring: and then ſayde he to the Quene, that he nothing doubted but thoſe Lords of her kinne the which remayned vnder a reſt, ſhould vpon the matter examined doe well ynough, and as towarde her Noble perſon, neyther was, nor could be anye maner of ieopardie. Whereby ſhould I truſt that (quod the Queene) in that I am guiltleſſe, as though they were guiltie, in that I am with their enimies better beloued then they, when they hate them for my ſake, in that I am ſo neere to the king, and how farre be they of that would helpe, as God ſend grace they hurt not. And therefore as yet I purpoſe not to depart hence: as for this gentleman my ſonne, I mind he ſhal be where I am till I ſee further, for I aſſure you for that I ſee ſome men ſo greedy without any ſubſtantiall cauſe to haue hym, this maketh me much more further and ſcrupulous to delyuer him. Truely Madame (quod the Cardinall) the further that ye be to deliuer hym, the further be other men to ſuffer you to kepe him, leaſt your cauſeleſſe feare, might cauſe you farther to conuey him, and many be there that thinke he can haue here no priuilege, which can haue neyther wyll to aſke it, nor yet malice nor offence to neede it. And therefore, they recon no priuilege broken, although they fetch him out of Sanctuarie, which if you finally refuſe to deliuer him, I thinke verily the counſayle will enfraunches hym, ſo much dread hath my Lorde his Uncle, for the tender loue that he beareth him, leaſt your grace ſhould ſende him away. Ah Syr, quod the Quene, hath he ſo tender a zeale to him, that he feareth nothing, but leaſt he ſhould eſcape him? Thinketh he that I would ſend him hence, which is neyther in the plight to ſende out? and in what place could I recon hym ſure, if he be not ſure in this Sanctuarie? whereof was there neuer tyraunt yet ſo deuiliſhe, that durſt attempt to breake the priuilege, and I truſt God is nowe as ſtrong to withſtande his aduerſaries, as euer he was. But my ſonne can deſerue no Sanctuarie you ſay, and therefore he can not haue it, forſooth the Lorde Protectour hath ſent a goodly gloſe, by the which that place that may defende a Theefe, may not ſaue an innocent: but he is in no ieopardie nor hath no neede thereof, I would God he had not. Troweth the Protectour (I pray God he may proue a Protectour, rather then a deſtroyer, whereunto his paynted proceſſe draweth) that it is not honourable, that the

Duke bide here? it were more comfortable to them both that he were with his brother, because the king lacketh a play felow, yea be you sure, I praye God send them both better play felowes then him that maketh so high a matter vpon such a trifleyng pretext, as though there could none be found to play with the king, but if hys brother which had no lust to play for sickenesse, must come out of this sanctuary, & out of his safegard to play with him, as though that Princes so yong as they be, could not play without their peeres, or children could not play without their kindred, with whom for the more part they agree much worse then with straungers. But the childe you say cannot require the priuilege, who told the Protector so? Aske him and you shall heare him aske it, and so shall he if he wyll. Howbeit, this is a straunge matter, suppose he could not aske it, and thinke he would not aske it, and imagine he would aske to go out, if I say he shall not: Note if I aske the priuilege but for my selfe, I saye, that he that agaynst my will taketh out him, breaketh Sanctuarie. Serueth this libertie for my person onely, or for my goods to? you may not from hence take my horse from me, if I stole him not, nor owe you nothing: then foloweth it, that you may not take my childe from mee, he is also my ward, for as farre as my learned counsayle sheweth mee, he hath nothing by dissent holden, by knightes seruice, but by socage, then the lawe maketh me his guarden, then maye no man lawfully (I suppose) take my warde from me out of this place, without the breche of Sanctuarie, and if my priuilege could not serue him, nor he aske it for himselfe, yet sith the lawe committed to me the custodie of him, I maye require it for hym, except the lawe geue the infaunt a guarden onely for his goods, discharging him of the cure and safe keeping of his bodye, for which onely both goodes and landes serue. And if examples be sufficient to attaine priuilege for my childe, I nede not farre to seeke: For in this place in which we now be, and which is now in question, whether my childe may take benefite of it? Mine other sonne now king, was borne and kept in his Cradell & preserued to a more prosperous fortune, which I pray God long to continue. And as you all know, this is not the first time that I haue taken Sanctuarie: For when my Lorde my husband was banished and thrust out of his kingdome, I fled hether beyng great with childe, and here I bare the Prince, and when my Lorde my husbande returned safe agayne, and had the victorie, then went I hence to welcome him home. And from hence I brought my babe the Prince vnto his father, when he first tooke him in his armes: And I pray God that my sonnes Palace may be as great a safegarde to him nowe reigning, as thys place was sometime to the kings enemie: In which place I entend to kepe his brother, sithe mans lawe serueth the guarden to keepe the infante, and the lawe of nature wylleth the mother to keepe the childe, and Gods lawe priuilegeth the Sanctuarie, and the Sanctuary priuilegeth my sonne, sith I feare to put him to the Protectors handes, that hath hys brother alreadie, which is (if both fayled) inheritor to the crowne as heire Male, as he sayth. The cause of my feare no man hath to doe to examine; and yet feare I no farther then the law feareth, which as learned men tell me, forbiddeth euery man the custody of them, by whose death he may enherite lesse lande then a kingdome. I can say no more, but whosoeuer he be that breaketh this holye Sanctuarie, I praye God send him shortly neede of Sanctuarie, when he may not come to it, for I would not that my mortall enemie should be taken out of Sanctuarie.

The Cardinall perceyued that the Queene wared euer the longer the farther of, and also that she began to kindle and chafe, and speake sore byting words agaynst the Protectour, and such as he neither beleued, and also was loth to heare, he sayde to her, for a finall conclusion, that he would no more dispute the matter, & if she were content to deliuer the Duke to him and to the other Lordes there present, he durst lay his awne body & soule both in pledge, not onely for his suretie, but also for his estate, and surely he knew not suspected no cause but he might so doe, (but he knewe not all.) And further he sayde, if she would geue him a resolute answere to the contrary, he would therewith depart incontinent, and shyft who so would with this businesse afterwarde, for he neuer intended further to moue her in the matter, in the which she thought that he and all other also, saue her selfe, lacked eyther wit or truth. Wyt if they were so dull that they nothing could perceiue what the Protector entended, and if they should procure her sonne to be deliuered into his handes, in whom they should perceiue towards the childe any euill will entended, then she might thinke all the counsail both euill aduised and of little fidelitie to their Prince.

The Queene with these wordes stoode a good while in a great studie, and forasmuch as she sawe the Lorde Cardinall more redier to depart then the remnaunt, and the Protector himselfe redie at hande, so that she verily thought that she could not kepe them there, but he shoulde be incontinent taken thence: and to conuey him else where, neither had she time to serue her, nor place determined, nor persons appointed to conuey him, and so all thing was vnredie, when this message came so sodainly on her, nothing lesse loking for, then to haue him out of Sanctuary, which she knew now men to be set in all places about, that he could not be conueyed out vntaken, and partly as she thought it might fortune her feare to be false: so well she wist it was either nedelesse or booteles. Wherfore if she should nedes go from him, she demed best to deliuer him, and specially of the Cardinalles sayth she nothing doubtyng, nor of some other Lordes whome she sawe there, which as she feared least they might be deceyued, so well was she assured, that they would not be corrupted: then thought she that it would make them the more warily to looke to him, and the more circumspectly to see his suretie, if shee with her awne handes betoke him to them of trust, and at the last shee tooke the yong Duke by the hand, and sayde vnto the Lordes, my Lord quod she, and all my Lordes, neyther am I so vnwise to mistrust your wittes, nor so suspicious to mistrust your trouthes: of the which thing I purpose to make you suche a proofe, that if either of both lacked in you, might turne both me to great sorow, the realme to much harme, and you to great reproche. For lo, here is quod she thys Gentleman, whome I doubt not but I could keepe safe if I would, whatsoeuer any man saye, and I doubt not also but there be some abrode so deadly enemies vnto my blood, that if they wist where any of it laye in their awne body, they would let it out: we haue also experience that the desire of a kingdome knoweth no kindred, the brother hath beene the brothers bane, and may the nephewes be sure of the Uncle? eche of these children are others defence, whyle they be a sunder, and eche of theyr lyues lyeth eth in others body: kepe one safe and both be sure, and nothing to both more perilous then both to be in one place: for a wise Marchant neuer aduenture th all his goodes in one ship. All this notwithstanding here I deliuer him and his brother in him, to keepe to your handes, of whome I shall aske them both before God and the worlde. Faythfull you be and that I wote well, and I knowe you be wise and of power and strength to keepe him, if you will to keepe him, for you lack no helpe of your selues, nor neede to lack no help in this case, and if you cannot elsewhere, then may you leaue him here: But onely one thing I beseeche you, for the trust that his father put you in euer, and for the trust that I put you in nowe, that as farre as you thinke that I feare to much, ye be well ware that you feare not as farre to little. And therwithall she sayde to the chylde, farewell mine awne sweete sonne, God sende you good keeping, let mee once kisse you or you go, for God knoweth when we shall kisse together againe, and therewith she kissed him, and blessed him, and turned her back and wept, going her waye, leauing the poore innocent childe weeping as fast as the mother.

Oh depe and wretched dissimulation.

When the Cardinall and the other Lordes had receyued the yong Duke, they brought hym into the starre Chamber, where the Protector tooke him into his armes and kissed him with these wordes: nowe welcome my Lorde euen with al my very hart, & he sayd in that of likelihood euen as he inwardly thought, & therevpon forthwith brought him to the king his brother into the Bishops palace at Paules, and from thence through the Citie honorably into the tower, out of which after that day they neuer came abrode.

When the Protectour had both the children in his handes, he opened himselfe more boldly both to certaine other men, and also chiefly to the Duke of Buckyngham, although I know that many thought that thys Duke was priuie to all the Protectors counsayle, euen from the beginning: and some of the Protectors friends sayde, that the Duke was the first mouer of the Protector to thys matter, sending a priuie messenger vnto him streight after king Edwardes death: But other agayne which knew better the subtile wit of the Protector, denied that he euer opened hys enterprise to the Duke, vntill he had brought to passe the things before rehersed. But when he had imprisoned the Quenes kinsfolkes, and gotten both her sonnes into his awne hands, then he opened the rest of his purpose with lesse feare to them whom he thought meete for the matter, & especially to the Duke, who being wonne to his purpose, he thought his strength more then halfe increased. The matter was broken vnto the Duke by subtile folkes, & such as were their craftes maisters in the handelyng of suche wycked deuyses, who declared vnto him that the yong king was offended with him for his kinsfolkes sakes, and that if he were able he would reuenge them: who would prick him forward therevnto, if they escaped (for they would remember their imprisonment) or else if they were put to death, the yong king without doubt would be carefull for their deathes, whose imprisonment was grieuous vnto him. And that wyth repenting, the Duke should nothing auayle, for there was no way left to redeeme his offence by benefites: but he should soner destroy himselfe then saue the king, who with his brother and kinsfolkes he sawe in such place imprisoned, as the Protectour might with a beck destroy them all, and that it were no doubt, but that he would doe it in deede, if there were any new enterprise attempted, attempted, and that it was likely, that as the Protector had prouyded a pryuy garde for himſelfe, ſo had he eſpialles for the Duke, and traynes to catche him, if he ſhould be agaynſt him, and that peraduenture from them whome he leaſt ſuſpected. For the ſtate of things, and the diſpoſitions of men were then ſuch that a man could not tell whome he might well truſt, or whome he might feare. Theſe things & ſuch lyke, being beaten into the Dukes minde, brought him to that point, that where he had repented the way that he had entred, yet would he go forth in the ſame. And ſithence he had once begonne, he would ſtoutly go thorowe, and therefore this wicked enterpriſe which he beſeued could not be auoyded, he bent himſelfe, and went thorough, and determined that ſithence the common miſchiefe could not be amended, he would turne it as much as he might to his awne commoditie.

The entrance into one miſchiefe prouoketh the going forward wyth more.

Then it was agreed that the Protectour ſhould haue the Dukes ayde to make him king, and that the Protectors onely lawfull ſonne ſhould marry the Dukes daughter. And that the Protectour ſhould graunt him the quyet poſſeſſion of the Erledome of Hertford, which he claymed as his inheritaunce and could neuer obteyne it in king Edwardes time. Beſide theſe requeſtes of the Duke, the Protector of his awne minde promiſed him a great quantitie of the kings treaſure and of his houſholde ſtuffe. And when they were thus at apoint betweene themſelues, they went about to prepare for the coronation of the yong king, as they would haue it ſeeme: And that they might turne both the eyes and mindes of men from perceyuing of their driftes, they had cauſed the Lordes beyng ſent for from all the partes of the realme, to come thicke to that ſolempnitie. But the Protector and the Duke, after that they had ſet the lord Cardinall the Archbiſhop of Yorke, then lord Chauncelour, the Biſhop of Ely, the Lorde Stanley, and the Lord Haſtinges, then Lorde Chamberleyn, wyth manye other noble men, to commen and deuyſe about the coronation in one place, as faſt were they in another place contryuing the contrarie, and to make the Protectour kyng. To which counſayle albeit there were called verye fewe, and they verye ſecret: yet then began there, here and there ſome maner of mutteryng amongeſt the people, as though all thing ſhould not long be well, though they wiſt not what they feared nor wherefore: were it, that before ſuch great thinges mennes harts (of a ſecret inſtinct of nature) miſgeueth them, as the ſea without winde ſomtime ſwelleth of himſelfe before a tempeſt: or were it that ſome one man happily ſomewhat perceiuyng, filled many men with ſuſpicion though he ſhewed fewe men what he knewe: howbeit ſomewhat the dealing it ſelfe made men to muſe on the matter, thoughe the counſaile were cloſe, for little and little all folke drewe from the Tower where the king was, and drewe to Croſbies place in Biſhopesgate ſtreete, where the Protector kept his houſhoulde. The Protector had the reſort, and the king in maner deſolate. While ſome made ſute vnto them that had the doyng, ſome of them were by their friendes ſecretly warned, that it might happely turne them to no good to be to much attendant on the king, without the Protectors appoyntment, which remoued diuerſe of the king his olde ſeruauntes from him, and ſet newe in their roomes about him.

A compact made betweene the Protectour and the Duke of Buckingham.

A ſubtile practiſe.

Thus many things comming together, partly by chaunce, and partlye by purpoſe cauſed at length, not common people onely, which wauer with the wynde, wynde, but wise men also and some Lordes, to marke the matter, and muse therevpon: in so much that the Lord Stanley, which afterwarde was Erle of Darby, wisely mistrusted it, and sayd to the Lord Hastynges, that he much misliked these two seuerall counsayles, for whyle we, quod he, talke of one matter at the one place, litle wote we whereof they talke in the other: peace my Lorde, quod the Lord Hastinges, on my life neuer doubt you, for whyle one man is there, which is neuer thence, neyther can there be any thing once minded that should sounde amisse toward me, but it shoulde be in mine eares or it were well out of their mouthes. This ment he by Catesby which was nere of his secret counsaile, and whom he familiarly vsed in hys most weighty matters, putting no man in so speciall trust as him, reconing him selfe to no man so liefe, sith he wist well there was no man to him so much beholding as was this Catesby, which was a man well learned in the lawes of this lande, and by the speciall fauour of the Lorde Hastinges in good authority, and much rule bare in the cōties of Leicester, and Northampton, where the Lorde Hastinges power lay. But surelye great pitie was it that he had not had either more truth, or lesse witte, for his dissimulation onely, kept all that mischiefe vp, in whome if the Lorde Hastinges had not put so speciall trust, the Lorde Stanley and he with diuerse other Lordes had departed into their countries, & broken all the daunce, for many euill signes that he sawe, which he now construed all for the best, so surely thought he that there coulde be no harme towarde him in that counsaile entended where Catesby was. And of truth the Protectour and the Duke of Buckingham made very good semblеaunce vnto the Lord Hastinges, and kept him much in their company. And vndoubtedly, the Protectour loued him well, and loth was to haue lost hym, sauing for feare, lest his life should haue quayled their purpose, for ꝑ which cause he moued Catesby, to proue with some worde, cast out a farre off, whether he coulde thinke it possible to winne the Lorde Hastinges to their part. But Catesby, whether he assayed him, or assayed him not, reported vnto them that he founde him so fast, and heard him speake so terrible wordes that he durst no farther breake, & of a truth the Lord Hastinges of very trust shewed vnto Catesby the mistrust that other began to haue in the matter. And therfore, he fearing lest their motions might with the Lorde Hastings minish his credence, wherevnto onely all the matter leaned, procured the Protectour, hastily to rid him, and much the rather, for that he trusted by his death to obtayne much of the rule which the Lorde Hastinges bare in his countrie, the onely desire whereof, was the thing that enduced him to be the procurer and one of the specialleſt contriuers of all this horrible treason. Wherevpon the Lorde Protectour caused a counsaile to be set at the Tower on the friday, the thirtene day of June, where was much commonyng for the honourable solemnitie of the coronation, of the which the time appointed approched so neere that the pageauntes were a making day and night at Westminster, and bytaile killed, which afterwarde was cast away.

Catesby.

The counsail in the tower.

These Lordes thus sitting, commoning of this matter, the Protectour came in among them first about nine of the clocke, salutyng them curteously, excusing himselfe that he had been from them so long: saiyng merily that he had bene a sleper that day. And after a litle talking wyth them, he said to the Bishop of Ely, my Lorde you haue very good strawberies in your Garden at Holborne, Holborne, I require you let vs haue a meſſe of them. Gladly (my Lorde quod he) I would I had ſome better thing as redie to your pleaſure as that, and with that in all haſte he ſent his ſeruaunt for a diſhe of Strawberies. The Protector ſet the Lordes faſt in communyng, and therevpon prayyng them to ſpare him a little, and ſo he departed and came againe betwene.x. and xj. of the clocke into the Chamber, all chaunged with a wonderfull ſowre angry countenance, knittyng the browes, frownyng and frettyng and gnawyng on his lippes, and ſo ſet him downe in his place. All the Lordes were diſmayed, and ſore marueyled of this maner and ſodaine chaunge, and what thing ſhould him ayle. When he had ſitten a while, thus he began: What were they worthie to haue that compaſſe and ymagine the deſtruction of me beyng ſo nere of blood to the king, and Protector of this his royall realme? At which queſtion, all the Lordes ſate ſore aſtonied, muſyng much by whom the queſtion ſhould be ment, of which euery man knewe himſelfe clere.

Then the Lorde Haſtynges as he that for the familiaritie that was betwene them, thought he might be boldeſt with him, anſwered and ſayd, that they were worthy to be puniſhed as heinous traitors whatſoeuer they were, and all the other affirmed the ſame, that is (quod he) ponder Sorcereſſe, my brothers wife and other with her, meanyng the Queene, at theſe wordes many of the other Lordes, were ſore abaſhed which fauoured her, but the Lorde Haſtynges was better content in his minde that it was moued by her then by any other that he loued better, albeit his hart ſomewhat grudged, that he was not afore made of counſaile of this matter, as well as he was of the takyng of her kindred, and of their puttyng to death, which were by hys aſſent before deuiſed to be behedded at Pomfret, this ſelfe ſame daye, in the which he was not ware that it was by other deuiſed, that he himſelfe ſhould the ſame day be behedded at London: then ſayd the Protector, ye ſhall all ſee in what wiſe that Sorcereſſe and other of her counſaile, as Shores wife wyth her affinitie haue by their ſorcerye and witchecraft waſted my bodie, and therewith plucked vp his Dublet ſleue to his elbow on his left arme, where he ſhewed a weriſhe withered arme, and ſmall, as it was neuer other. And therevpon euery mans minde ſore miſgaue them, well perceiuyng that this matter was but a quarell, for well they wiſt that the Queene was both to wiſe to go about any ſuch folly, and alſo if ſhe would, yet would ſhe of all folke make Shores wife leaſt of her counſaile, whome of all women ſhe moſt hated, as that Concubine whome the king her husband moſt loued.

Alſo there was no man there preſent, but knew that his arme was euer ſuch ſithe the day of his birth. Neuertheleſſe the Lorde Haſtynges, which from the death of king Edward kept Shores wife, whom he ſomwhat doted in the kinges life, ſauyng as it is ſayde, that he, that while forbare her for reuerence toward his king, or elſe of a certaine kinde of fidelitie toward his friend: yet now his heart ſomewhat grudged, to haue her whome he loued, ſo highly accuſed, and that as he knewe well vntruely, therefore he anſwered and ſayde, certainely my Lorde, if they haue ſo heynouſly done, they bee worthie of heynous puniſhement, what quod the Protector, thou ſeruеſt me I wene with if and with and, I tell thee they haue ſo done, and that will I make good on thy bodie traytor. And therewith (as in a great anger) he clapped his fiſt on the boorde a great rappe, at which token geuen, one cried treason, without the Chamber, and therewith a doore clapped, and in came rushing men in harnesse as many as the Chamber could holde. And anone the Protector sayde to the Lorde Hastynges, I arrest thee traytor, what me, my Lorde quod he? yea, thee traytor quod the Protector. And one let flie at the Lorde Stanley, which shronke at the stroke and fell under the Table, or else his head had bene cleft to the teeth, for as shortly as he shranke, yet ranne the blood about his eares. Then was the Archebishop of Yorke, and Doctor Morton bishop of Ely, and the Lord Stanley taken, and diuers other which were bestowed in diuers Chambers, saue the Lorde Hastynges (whom the Protector commaunded to speede and shriue him apace) for by Saint Paule (quod he) I will not dine till I see thy head off, it booted him not to aske why but heauily he toke a priest at aduenture, and made a shorte shrift, for a longer would not be suffered, the Protector made so much haste to his dinner, which might not go to it till this murder were done, for sauyng of his vngracious othe. So was he brought forth into the greene beside the Chappell within the Tower, and his head layd on a logge of Tymber, that lay there for building of the Chappell, and there tyrannously stricken off, and after his bodie and hed were enterred at Windsore by his maister king Edward the fourth.

The Lorde Hastinges arrested.

The Lorde Stanley wounded.

The Lorde Hastynges beheaded in hast.

A marueylous case it is to heare, eyther the warnynges that he shoulde haue voyded, or the tokens that he could not voyd. For the next night before his death, the Lorde Stanley sent to him a trustie and secret messenger at midnight in all the hast, requiryng him to rise and ryde away with him, for he was disposed vtterly no lenger for to abyde, for he had so fearefull a dreame in the which he thought that a Bore with his tuskes, so rased them both by the heads that the blood ranne about both their shoulders, and forasmuch as the Protector gaue the Bore for his Cognisaunce, he imagined that it should be he. This dreame made such a fearefull impression in his heart, that hee was throughly determined no lenger to tarie, but had his horse redie, if the Lord Hastynges would go with him: So that they would ryde so farre that night, that they should be out of daunger the next day. Ah good Lorde (quod the Lord Hastyngs) to the messenger, leaneth my Lord thy maister vnto such tryfles, and hath such fayth in dreames, which either his awne feare phantasieth, or do ryse in the nightes rest, by reason of the dayes thought. Tell him it is plaine witchcraft to beleue in such dreames, which if they were tokens of thinges to come, why thinketh he not that we might as likely make them true by our goyng, if wee were caught and brought backe, (as friendes fatle flyers) for then had the Bore a cause likely to rase vs with his tuskes, as folkes that fled for some falshoode, wherefore either is there perill, nor none there is in deede, or if any be, it is rather in goyng then abidyng. And if we should nedes fall in perill one way or other, yet had I liefer that men shoulde see it were by other mens falshead, then thinke it were eyther our awne fault or faint feble heart, and therefore go to thy maister, and commend me to him, and pray him to be mery & haue no feare, for I assure him, I am assured of the man that he wotteth of, as I am sure of mine awne hand. God send grace (quod the messenger) and so departed. Certaine it is also, that in ryding toward the Tower the same morning, in which he was beheaded, his horse that he accustomed to ryde on stumbled with him twyse or thrise almost to the fallyng, which thing although it happeneth to them dayly to whome no miſchaunce is toward, yet hath it bene as an olde euill token obſerued as a goyng toward miſchiefe. Now this that foloweth was no warnyng but an enuious ſcorne, the ſame morꝛnyng ere he were vp from his bed where Shores wife lay with him al night, there came to him ſir Thomas Hawarde ſonne to the Lorde Hawarde (which Lorde was one of the priuieſt of the Lorde Protectors counſaile and doyng) as it were of curteſye to accompanie him to the counſail, but of truth ſent by the Lord Protector to haſt him thetherward.

This ſir Thomas, while the Lorde Haſtinges ſtayed a while commoning with a prieſt whome he met in the Towerſtrete, brake the Lords tale, ſaiyng to him merrily, what my Lorde? I pray you come on, wherefore talke you ſo long with that prieſt, you haue no nede of a prieſt yet, and laughed vpon him, as though he woulde ſay, you ſhall haue neede of one ſone: But litle wiſt the other what he ment (but or night theſe words were well remembred by them that heard them) ſo the true Lorde Haſtinges litle miſtruſted, and was neuer merier, nor thought his life in more ſuretie in all his dayes, which thing is often a ſigne of chaunge: but I ſhall rather let anye thing paſſe mee then the bayne ſurety of mans minde ſo neare his death, for vppon the verye towre wharffe, ſo nere the place where his head was of not ſo farre of as a man might wel caſt a balle, a Purſiuaunt of his awne called Haſtinges mette with him, and of their meting in that place he was put in remembraunce of another time, in which it happened them to mete before together in the ſame place, at which other time the Lord Haſtinges had bene accuſed to king Edwarde by the Lorde Ryuers the Queenes brother, inſomuch that he was for a while, which laſted not long, highly in the kinges indignation, foraſmuch as he now mette the ſame Purſiuaunt in the ſame place, the ieoperdy ſo well paſſed, it gaue him great pleaſure to talke with him thereof with whome he had talked in the ſame place of that matter, and therefore he ſayde: Ah Haſtinges, art thou remembred when I met thee here once with an heauy hart. Ye my Lorde (quod hee) that I remember well, and thanked be to God they gat no good, nor you no harme thereby, thou wouldeſt ſay ſo (quod he) if thou kneweſt ſo much as I do, which fewe knowe yet, and mo ſhall ſhortlye, that meant he that the Erle Riuers and the Lorde Richarde, and Syr Thomas Vaughan ſhoulde that day be behedded at Pomfret, as they were in deede which act he wiſt well ſhoulde be done, but nothing ware that the axe hong ſo nere his awne heade. In faith man (quod he) I was neuer ſo ſory nor neuer ſtoode in ſo great daunger of my life as I did, when thou and I mette here, and lo the worlde is turned now, now ſtande mine enimies in the daunger as thou maiſt happe to heare more hereafter, and I neuer in my life merier nor neuer in ſo great ſuretye, I pray God it proue ſo (quod Haſtinges, proue quod he? doubteſt thou that) nay may I warraunt thee, and ſo in maner diſpleaſed, he entered into the Towre, where he was not long on lyue as you haue heard. O Lord God the blindneſſe of our mortall nature, when he moſt feared, he was in moſt ſuretie, and when he reconed himſelfe moſt ſureſt, he loſt his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honorable man a good knight and a gentle, of great auctority with his Prince, of liuyng ſomewhat diſſolute, plain and open to his enemies, and ſure and ſecret to his friend, eaſie to beguile, as he that of good heart and courage foreſawe no perilles, a louyng man and paſſyng well beloued, very faythfull and truſty enough, but truſting to much was his deſtructiō as you may perceiue.

Now flewe the fame of this Lordes death through the Citie and farther about, like a winde in euery mans eare, but the Protector immediately after dinner (entendyng to ſet ſome colour vpon the matter) ſent in all the haſt for many ſubſtantiall men out of the Citie into the Tower, and at their comming himſelfe with the Duke of Buckyngham ſtode, harneſſed in olde euill fauored Briganders, ſuch as no man would wene that they woulde haue vouchſafed to haue put on their backes, except that ſome ſodeine neceſſitie had conſtrayned them. Then the Lorde Protector ſhewed them, that the Lord Haſtynges and other of his conſpiracie had contriued to haue ſodeinly deſtroyed him and the Duke of Buckyngham there the ſame day in counſaile, & what they entended farther, was yet not well knowen, of which their treaſon he had neuer knowlege before ten of the clocke the ſame forenoone, which ſodeine feare draue them to put on ſuch harneſſe as came next to their handes for their defence, and ſo God had holpen them, that the miſchiefe turned vpon them that would haue done it, and thus he required them to report. Euery man aunſwered fayre, as though no man miſtruſted the matter, which of truth no man beleued. Yet for the further appeaſyng of the peoples mindes, he ſent immediately after dinner an Herauld of armes with a Proclamacion to be made through the Citie of London which was proclaymed in the kings name, that the Lord Haſtyngs with diuers other of his trayterous purpoſe had before conſpired, the ſame day to haue ſlain the Protector, & the Duke of Buckyngham ſittyng in counſaile, and after to haue taken vpon them the rule of the king, and the realme at their pleaſure, and thereby to pill & ſpoyle whome they liſt vncomptrolled, and much matter was there in the Proclamacion deuiſed to the ſlaunder of the Lorde Haſtynges, as that he was an euill Counſaylor to the kinges father, entiſyng him to many thinges highly redounyng to the diminiſhyng of his honour, and to the vniuerſal hurt of his realme by his euill company & ſiniſter procuryng and vngracious example, aſweil in many other things, as in vicious liuing & inordinate abuſion of his body, both with many other and eſpecially with Shores wife, which was one alſo of his ſecret counſaile of this heynous treaſon, with whome he lay nightly, and namely the night paſſed next before his death, ſo that it was the leſſe maruaile if vngracious liuyng brought him to an vnhappie ende, which hee was now put to by the commaundement of the king his highneſſe, and of his honourable and faythfull Counſaile, both for his demerites beyng ſo openly taken in his falſe contriued treaſon, and alſo leaſt the delayng of his execution might haue encouraged other miſchieuous perſons parteners of his conſpiracie, to gather and aſſemble themſelues together, in makyng ſome great commocion for his deliueraunce, whoſe hope nowe beyng by his well deſerued death politikely repreſſed, al the realme ſhall by Gods grace reſt in good quiet and peace. Now was this Proclamacion made within two houres after he was behedded, and it was ſo curiouſly endited, and ſo fayre written in Parchement in a fayre ſet hande, and therewith of it ſelfe ſo long a proceſſe, that euery childe might perceyue that it was prepared and ſtudyed before, (& as ſome men thought by Cateſby) for all the time betwene his death & the Proclamacion proclaymyng, could ſcant haue ſuffiſed vnto the bare writyng alone, albeit that it had bene in paper, and ſcribled forth in haſt at aduenture.

The Protectours proclamation.

So

So that vppon the proclaimyng thereof, a certayne Scholmayſter ſtanding by and comparyng the ſhortneſſe of the time with the length of the matter, ſayde to them that ſtoode about him, here is a gaye goodly caſt, foule caſt away for haſt: And a Marchaunt that ſtoode by him ſayde that it was written by inſpiration and propheſie. Now then by and by, as it were for anger and not for couetous, the Protector ſent Sir Thomas Hawarde to the houſe of Shores wyfe (for her huſband dwelt not with her) which ſpoyled her of al that euer ſhe had, aboue the value of two or three thouſand markes, and ſent her bodie to priſon. And the Protector had layde for the maner ſake that ſhe was a counſaile with the Lorde Haſtynges to deſtroy him. In concluſion, when no colour could faſten vpon theſe matters, then he layde heynouſly to her charge that thing that ſhe coulde not denie, for all the worlde knewe that it was true, and that notwithſtanding euery man laughed to here it then ſo ſodeinly, ſo highly taken, that ſhe was naught of her bodie. And for this cauſe as a godly continent prince cleane and faultleſſe of himſelfe, ſent out of heauen into this vicious worlde, for the amendment of mens maners, he cauſed the biſhop of London to put her to open penaunce, goyng before a Croſſe on a Sonday at Proceſſion with a taper in her hand. In the which ſhe went in countenaunce and pace ſo womanly, and albeit ſhe was out of all array ſauyng her kyrtell onely, yet was ſhe ſo fayre and louely, and namely, when the wondring of the people caſt a comely red in her chekes, of the which ſhe before had moſt miſſe, that her great ſhame wanne her muche prayſe amongeſt them that were more amorous of her bodie, then curious of her ſoule, and many good folke that hated her liuyng, and were glad to ſee ſinne corrected, yet pitied they more her penaunce, then reioyced in it, when they conſidered that the Protector did it more of corrupt minde, then of any vertuous affection.

Shores wife

This woman was borne in London, wel friended, honeſtly brought vp, and very well maried, ſauing ſomewhat to ſone, her huſbande an honeſt, and a yong Citezen, godly, and of good ſubſtaunce, but foraſmuch as they were coupled or ſhe were well rype, ſhe not verye feruently loued for whome ſhee neuer longed, which was the thing (by chaunce) that the more eaſelye made her to enclyne to the kings appetite, when he required her. Howbeit the reſpect of his royaltie, the hope of gaye apparell, eaſe, pleaſure, and other wanton welth was able ſone to pierce a ſoft tender hart: but when the king had abuſed her, anone her huſbande beyng an honeſt man, and one that could his good, not preſuming to touch a kinges concubyne left her vp to hym altogether. When the king dyed, the Lorde Haſtinges toke her, which in the kings dayes albeit that he was ſore enamoured with her, yet he forbare, eyther for a Princely reuerence, or for a certayne friendly faithfulneſſe. Proper ſhe was, and fayre, nothing in her body that you coulde haue chaunged, but if you would haue wiſhed her ſomewhat higher. This ſay they that knewe her in her youth, ſome ſayde, & iudged that ſhe had beene well fauoured, and ſome iudged the contrary, whoſe iudgement ſeemeth like as men geſſe the beautie of one long before departed, by a ſkalpe taken out of a charnel houſe, and this iudgement was in the time of king Henrye the eight, in the eightene yere of whoſe reigne ſhe dyed, when ſhe had nothing but a reuyled ſkynne and bone. a proper witte, and could both reade and write, merry in company, redy and quick of aunswere, neither muete, nor ful of bable, somtime taunting without displeasure, but not without disport. King Edward woulde say that he had three concubines, which in diuerse properties diuersely excelled, one, the merriest, the other the wyliest, the thirde the holyest harlot in the realme as one, whom no man coulde get out of the Church to any place lightly, but if it were to his bed, the other two were somewhat greater personages then mystres Shore, and neuertheless of their humilitie were content to be nameless and to forbeare the praise of these properties. But the meriest was Shores wife in whome the king therefore toke great pleasure, for many he had, but her he loued, whose fauour to say the truth (for it were sinne to lye on the deuill) she neuer abused to any mans hurt, but to many mens comfort, and relefe. For where the king toke displeasure, she would mitigate and appease his minde, where men were out of fauour, she would bring them into his grace, for manie that had highlie offended, she obtayned perdon, & of great forfeitures she gat remission, & finally, in many weighte suites she stode many men in great steade, either for none, or for very small rewarde: and those rather gape then riche, either for that she was content with the deede well done, or for that she delighted to be sued vnto, and to shewe what shee was able to doe with the king, or for that that wanton women, and welthie be not alwayes couetous, I doubt not some man will thinke this woman to be to slight a thing to bee written of, among so graue and weightie matters, which they shall specially thinke that happily sawe her in her age, and aduersitie, but me semeth the chaunce so much more worthye to be remembred, in howe much after wealth she fell to pouertie, and from riches to beggery vnfriended, out of acquaintaunce, after great substaunce, after so great fauour with her Prince, after as great suite and seking to with all those, which in those dayes had businesse to speede as manye other men were in their tymes, which be nowe famous onely by the infamy of their euill deedes, her doynges were not much lesse, albeit they bee much lesse remembred, because they were not euill, for men vse to write an euyll turne in marble stone, but a good turne, they write in the dust, which is not worst proued by her, for after her welth, shee went begging of manye that had begged themselues, if shee had not holpen them, suche was her chaunce.

The description of king Edwardes three Concubines.

The Lorde Riuers and other beheded

Now was it so deuised by the Protector and his counsail, that the same day that the Lorde Chamberlayne was beheded in the Towre of London and about the same houre should be beheded at Pomfret the Erle Ryuers and the Lorde Rychard the Quenes sonne, syr Thomas Vaughan, and syr Richard Haute, which as you heard were taken at Northampton and Stony Stratford by the consent of the Lorde Hastings, which execution was done by the order and in the presence of syr Richard Ratclife knight, whose seruice the Protector specially vsed in the counsaile, & in the execution of such lawlesse enterprises, as a man that had bene long secrete with hym, hauyng experience of the worlde, and a shrewde wyt, short and rude in speech, rough and boysterous of behauiour, bolde in mischiefe, as farre from pitie as from all feare of God.

Richarde Ratclife knight.

Thys knight brought these foure persons to the Scaffolde at the day appointed, and shewed to all the people that they were Traytors, not suffring ring the Lordes to speake, and to declare their innocencie, least their words might haue enclined men to pittie them, and to hate the Protectour and hys part, and so wythout iudgement and processe of the lawe caused them to be beheaded, wythout other earthly guilt, but onely that they were good men and true to the king & to hie kinne to the Queene, in so much as syr Thomas Vaughan going to his death, sayde: A woe worth them that tooke the prophecie that G. should destroy king Edwardes children, meaning that by the Duke of Clarence Lorde George, which for the suspicion is now dead, but now remayneth Richard G. Duke of Gloucester, which nowe I see is he that shall and will accomplishe the prophecie, and destroye king Edwardes children and all their alyes and friends, as it appereth by vs thys day, whom I appeale to the high tribunall of God for his wrongfull murther and oure true innocencie. And then Ratcliffe sayde, you haue well appealed, lay downe your head, yee quod Syr Thomas, I dye in right, beware you dye not in wrong, and so that good knight was beheaded and the other three, and buried naked in the Monastery at Pomfret. When the Lord Hastings & these other Lords and knights were thus beheaded and rid out of the waye, then the Protector caused it to be proclaymed that the coronation for diuers great and vrgent causes should be deferred till the second daye of November, for then thought he, that whyle men mused what the matter ment, and whyle the Lordes of the realme were about him, out of their awne strengthes, and whyle no man wiste what to thinke, nor whome to trust, or euer they should haue time and space to digest the matter, and make parts, it were best hastily to pursue his purpose, and put himselfe in possession of the Crowne, or men could haue tyme to deuise any waye to resist. But now was all the studye, thys matter beyng of it selfe so heynous might be first broken to the people in such wise as it might well be taken. To thys counsayle they tooke diuers suche as they thought meete to be trusted and likely to be enduced to that part, and able to stande them in stead, eyther by power or by pollicie. Among whome they made a counsayle Edmond Shaa then Maior of Londō, which vpon trust of his awne auauncement, where he was of a prowde hart highly desirous, tooke on him to frame the Citie to their appetite. Of spirituall men they tooke such as had wyt, and were in aucthoritie amongst the people for opinion of their learning, and had no scrupulous conscience. Among these had, they tooke Raufe Shaa Clearke, brother to the Maior, and Fryer Pynkie prouinciall of the Augustine Friers, both Doctors in diuinitie, both great Preachers, both of more learning then vertue, of more fame then learning, and yet of more learning then truth. For they were before greatly esteemed among the people, but after that, neuer none of these two were regarded. Shaa made a Sermond in prayse of the Protectour before the coronation, and Pynkye made one after the coronation, both so full of tedious flatterie, that no good mans eares could abyde them, Pinkye in his Sermond so loste his voyce, that he was fayne to leaue off and come downe in the middest, Doctour Shaa by his Sermond loste hys honestye, and sone after his lyfe, for very shame of the worlde, into the which he durst neuer after much come abrode, but the Fryer forced for no shame, and so it harmed him the lesse. Howbeit, some doubt and manye thinke that Pynkye was not of counsayle before the coronation, but after the common maner fell to flatterie after, namely because his Sermonde was not incontinent vpon it, but at Saint Mary Spittle the Easter after. But certaine it is that Doctor Shaa was of counsaple in the beginning, in so much that they determined that he should first breake the matter in a Sermond at Paules crosse, in which he should by the auctoritie of his preaching, induce the people to enclyne to the Protectours ghostly purpose. But now was all the labour and studie in the deuise of some conuenient pretexte, for which the people should be content to depose the Prince and accept the Protector for King. In which dyuers things they deuised, but the chiefe thing, and the weight of all that inuention rested in thys, that they should allege bastardy in King Edwarde hymselfe, or in his children, or both, so that he should seme disabled to enherite the crowne by the Duke of Yorke and the prince by him. To lay bastardy in Kyng Edwarde, sounded openly to the rebuke of the Protectors aune mother, which was mother to them both. For in that point could be none other colour, but to pretende that his aune mother was an auoutresse, but neuertheleffe he would that point should be lesse and more finely and closely handled, not euen fully playne and directly, but touched a slope craftily, as though men spared in that point to speake al the truth for feare of his displeasure. But that other point concerning the bastardie, they deuised to surmise in King Edward his children, that would he should be openly declared and enforced to the vttermost. The colour and pretert whereof cannot be well perceyued, except we first repete some thinges long before done about king Edward his mariages.

After king Edwarde the fourth had deposed king Henrie the sixt, and was in peaceable possession of the realme, determining hymselfe to marry (as was requisite) both for himselfe and for the realme, he sent ouer in Imbassade the Erle of Warwike, and diuers other noble men to the French king to intreat a mariage betweene the king and the Ladie Bona sister to the French Quene, then being in Fraunce, as before in the storie of king Edwarde the fourth ye haue heard. In which thing the Erle of Warwike founde the parties so toward and wylling, that he speedily without any difficultie according to his instructions, brought the matter to a good conclusiõ.

Dame Elizabeth Gray.

Now happeneth it in the meane season, there came to make a suite to the king by peticion Dame Elizabeth Gray (which after was his Quene) then a Widdowe, borne of noble bloud, specially by her mother, which was Ducheffe of Bedforde, which was maried to Sir Richarde Wooduile, Lorde Riuers, her Father.

Howbeit this dame Elizabeth being in seruice with Queene Margaret, wife to king Henry the sixt, was maried to one John Gray Esquire whome king Henry made Knight at the last battaple of Saint Albones, but little whyle he enioyed his knighthood, for at the same fielde hee was slayne.

After when that king Edward was king and the Erle of Warwike being on hys Imbassade, this poore Lady made suite to the king to be restored to such small lands as her husbande had geuen her in ioynture, whom when the king beheld and heard her speake, as she was both fayre and of good fauour, moderate of stature, well made, & wery wise, he not all onely pitied her, but also waxed enamored on her, and taking her afterward secretly aside, began gan to enter into talking more familiarly, whoſe appetite when ſhe perceyued, ſhe verteously denied hym, but that ſhee did ſo wiſely and that with ſo good maner & words ſo well ſet, that ſhe rather kindled his deſire then quenched it. And finally after many a meeting and much woyng and many great promiſes ſhe well eſpied the kyng his affection toward her ſo greatly encreaſed, that ſhe durſt ſomewhat the more boldly ſay her minde, as to him whoſe hart ſhe perceyued more feruently ſet then to fall of for a worde. And in concluſion ſhe ſhewed hym playne, that as ſhe wiſt her ſelfe to ſimple to be hys wyfe, ſo thought ſhe her ſelfe to good to be hys Concubine. The kyng much marueyling of her cõſtancie, as he that had not bene wont elſe where ſo ſtifly ſayde nay, ſo much eſteemed her continencie and chaſtitie, that he ſet her vertue in ſtead of poſſeſſion and rycheſſe: And this taking counſayle of his awne deſire, determined in all poſſible haſte to marry her. And after that he was thus appointed, and had betwene them twayne enſured her, then aſked he counſayle of his ſecret friends, and that in ſuch maner that they might eaſyly perceyue that it booted not to ſay nay.

Notwithſtanding the Duches of Yorke his mother was ſo ſore moued therewith, that ſhe diſſwaded that mariage as much as ſhee poſſibly might: alleging that it was his honor, profite and ſuretie, to marry in ſome Noble progeny out of his realme, whereupon depended great ſtrength to hys eſtate by that affinitie, and great poſſibilitie of increaſe of his dominions. And that he could not well otherwiſe doe, conſidering the Erle of Warwike had ſo farre forth entred into the matter all ready, which was not like to take it wel if all his voyage were in ſuch wiſe fruſtrate, and his appointment deluded. And ſhe ſayde farther, that it was not princely to marry his owne ſubiect, no greater occaſion, leading thereunto no poſſeſſions, nor other commoditie depending therupon, but only as a riche man would marry his mayden onely for a little wanton dotage vpon her perſon. In which mariage many men commended more the maydens fortune then the mans wiſedome, and yet ſhe ſayd that there was more honeſty then honor in this mariage, for as much as there is not betwene a Marchant and his mayde ſo great a difference as betwene a king and his ſubiect, a great Prince and a poore Wydow. In whoſe perſon, although there were nothing to be miſlyked, yet was there ſaide ſhee, nothing ſo excellent but that it might be found in diuers other that were more meetely (quoth ſhe) for your eſtate: yea and maydens alſo, the onely Wydowhed of Dame Elizabeth Gray (although ſhe were in all other points and things conuenient for you) ſhould ſuffiſe as me thinketh to refraine you from her mariage, ſith it is an vnſitting thing & a great blemiſh to the ſacred maieſtie of a Prince, that ought as nere to approch prieſthood in cleanneſſe, as he doth in dignitie, to be defiled with bygamy in his firſt mariage. The king made his mother an anſwere part in earneſt and part in play merily, as he that wiſte himſelf out of her rule: & albeit he would gladly that ſhe ſhould take it wel, yet was he at a point in his awne minde, toke ſhe it well or otherwiſe. Howbeit ſomewhat to ſatiſfy her he ſaid, þ albeit mariage being a ſpiritual thing it ought rather to be made for the reſpect of God, where his grace enclineth, the parties ought to encline to loue together (as he truſted it was in his caſe) rather then for the regarde of any tempozall aduauntage: yet neuertheleſſe him ſeemed that this mariage well conſidered not to be vnprofitable, table, for he reconed the amitie of no earthly nacion to be so necessary for him as ỳ friendship of his awne, which he thought likely to beare him so much the more harty favor, in that he disdeined not to mary with one of his awne land: and yet if outwarde alliaunce were thought so requisite, he would finde the meanes to enter therinto much better by other of his kinne where all ỳ parties could be contented, then to marry himself wherin he should never happily loue, and for the possibilitie of possessions, lese the fruite and pleasure of thys that he had alredie. For small pleasure taketh a man of all that euer he hath beside, if he be wiued agaynst his appetite, and I doubt not (quod he) but there be as you say other that be in euery point comparable with her, and therefore I let not them that like them to mary them, no more is it reason that it mislike any man that I marry where it liketh me. And I am sure that my Cosyn of Warwicke, neither loueth me so little, to grudge at that that I loue, nor is so vnreasonable to looke that I should in choyse of a wife, rather be ruled by his eye then by mine awne, as though I were a warde that were bounden to mary by the appoyntment a guarden. I would not be a king with that cõdicion to forbeare mine owne libertie in choyse of mine awne mariage. As for possibilitie of more inheritaunce by newe affinitie in straunge landes, is oft the occasion of more trouble then profite. And we haue alredie title by that meanes, so much as suffiseth to get and keepe well in one mans dayes. That she is a widdowe and hath alredie children: By God his blessed Lady, I am a Bacheler and haue some to, and so eche of vs hath a proofe, that neyther of vs is like to be barren. And therefore Madame, I pray you be content, I trust to God she shall bring forth a yong Prince that shall please you. And as for the bigamye, let the Bishoppe hardly lay it to my charge when I come to take orders, for I vnderstand it is forbidden a priest, but I neuer wist that it was forbidden a Prince. The Duchesse with these wordes nothyng appeased, and seyng the king so set on that she coulde not plucke him backe, so highly she disdeyned it, that vnder pretext of her dutie to Godward, she deuised to disturbe this mariage, & rather to helpe that he should marry one dame Elizabeth Lucy, whome the king not long before had gotten with childe: wherfore ỳ king his mother obiected openly against this mariage (as it were in discharge of her conscience) that the king was sure to dame Elizabeth Lucy, and was her husband before God, by reason of which wordes such obstacle was made in that matter, that eyther the Bishop durst not, or the king would not proceede to the solemnization of the mariage, till his fame were cleerely purged, and the truth well and openly testified. Wherevpon Dame Elizabeth Lucy was sent for, and albeit she was by the king his mother and manye other put in good comfort to affirme that shee was assured to the King, yet when shee was solemply sworne to say the truth, shee confessed shee was neuer ensured. Howbeit she sayde, his grace spake suche louyng wordes to her, that she verily hoped that he woulde haue maryed her, and that if such kinde of wordes had not bene, she woulde neuer haue shewed such kindenesse to him, to let him so kindely get her with childe. This examinacion solemnly taken, when it was cleerely proued that there was no impediment to let the king to marrie, wherefore he shortly after at Grafton beside stonie Stratford maryed the Ladie Elizabeth Gray very priuily, which was his enemies wife, and had prayed hartily for his losse, in the which God loued her better then to graunt her her bone, for then had she not beene hys wife: And after that she was crowned Quene, then her father was created Erle Riuers, and her sonne created Marques Dorset. But when the Erle of Warwike vnderstoode of this mariage, he tooke it so highly, that thereof ensued much trouble and great bloodshed as is declared before in the storye of king Edward the fourth.

I haue rehersed this mariage somewhat the more at length, because it might thereby the better appere vpon howe slipper a ground the Protectour builded his colour, by which he pretended king Edward his children to bee bastardes, but the inuencion, as simple as it was liked them to whome it sufficeth to haue somewhat to saye, while they were sure to be compelled to no larger proofe then themselues list to make.

Doctor Shaas sermon.

Nowe to returne where I left, as I began to shewe you, it was by the Protectour and his counsaile concluded that this Doctor Shaa shoulde in a sermon at Paules Crosse signifie to the people, that neither king Edward de himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence were lawfully begotten, nor were the very children of the Duke of Yorke, but begotten vnlawfully by other persons, by aduoutery of the Duches their mother. And that Dame Elizabeth Lucy was the very wife of king Edward, and so Prince Edward and all the children begotten on the Queene were bastardes. And accordyng to this deuise, Doctor Shaa the Sonday after at Paules crosse in a great audience (as alway a great number assembled to his preachyng) came into the Pulpit takyng for his Theme. Spuria vitulamina non agent radices altas. Sapien. 4. that is to say, Bastard slippes shall neuer take depe rootes: wherevpon when he had shewed the great grace that God geueth and secretly infoundeth in right generation after the lawes of matrimonie, then declared he that those children commonly lacked the grace (and for the punishement of their parentes) were for the most part vnhappy which were gotten in baste, and specially in aduoutrie, of which, (though some by the ignorance of the worlde and the truth hid from knowlege) haue enherited for a season other mens landes, yet God alway so prouideth that it cõtinueth not in their blood long, but the truth comming to light, the rightfull enheritors be restored, and the bastard slippes plucked vp or it can be rooted depe. And when he had layde for the proofe and confirmation of this sentence, examples taken out of the olde testament and other auncient Hystories, then began he to discende to the prayse of the Lord Richard, late Duke of Yorke, callyng him father to the Lorde Protector and declared his title to the crowne by enheritaunce, and also by entaile authorised by Parliament after the death of king Henry the first. Then shewed he that the Lorde Protector, was onely the right heyre, of his bodie lawfully begotten. Then declared he that king Edward was neuer lawfully maryed to the Queene, but his wife before God was dame Elizabeth Lucy, and so his children were bastardes. And beside that, that neyther king Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence (amongst them that were secret in the Duke of Yorkes houshold) were neuer reconed surely to be the children of the noble Duke, as those that by their fauors more resembled other knowen men then him, from whose vertuous condicions he sayde also that king Edward was farre off. But the Lord Protector (quod he) that very noble prince, the speciall patrone of knightly prowesse, aswell in all princely behauior, as in the li-niamentes and fauour of his visage representeth the verye face of the noble Duke his father. This is (quod he) the fathers awne figure, this is hys awne countenaunce, the verye print of his visage, the sure undoubted Image, the plaine expresse likenesse of this noble Duke. Nowe was it before deuised, that in the speaking of these words, the Protector should haue come in amongest the people to the Sermond ward, to the ende that these words, so meetyng with his presence, might haue bene taken amongest the heerers, as though the holy ghost had put them in the preachers mouth, and shoulde haue moued the people euen there to haue cried king Richard, king Richard, that it might haue bene after sayde, that he was specially chosen by God, and in maner by miracle: but this deuise quayled, eyther by the Protectors negligence, or the preachers ouer hasty diligence. For while the Protector staied by the way, tarying, least he should haue preuented these wordes, the Doctor fearyng that he should come or his sermon coulde come to those wordes, hastyng his matter therto, he was come to them, and past them, and entred into other matters or the Protector came, whome when he beheilde comming, he sodainly left the matter which he had in hand, and without any deduction therevnto out of all order, and out of all frame, began to repete those wordes agayne. This is the verye noble prince, the especiall patrone of knightly prowesse, which aswell in all princely behauiour, as in the liniamentes and fauour of his visage, representeth the very face of the noble Duke of Yorke his father. This is the fathers awne figure, this is his awne countenaunce, the very print of his visage, the sure and vndoubted image, the plain expresse likenesse of that noble Duke, whose remembraunce can neuer die while he liueth. While these wordes were in speaking, the Protector accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, went through the people vp into the place where the Doctors commonly stand in the vpper storye, where they heard out the Sermon: but the people were so farre from crying king Richarde, that they stoode as they had beene turned into stones, for wonder of this shamefull Sermon: after which once ended, the preacher gate him home, and neuer after durst looke out for shame, but kept him out of sight as an Owle, and when he asked any of his olde friendes, what the people talked of him, although that his awne conscience well shewed him that they talked no good, yet when the other aunswered him, that there was in euery mans mouth of him much shame spoken, it so strake him to the heart, that in fewe dayes after, he withered and consumed away.

Then on the tuesday after next folowing this sermond, beyng the. xvij. day of June, there came to the Guyld hall of London, the Duke of Buckingham and diuers Lordes, and knightes mo then happily knewe the message they brought. And there in the east ende of the hall, where the hoystinges be kept, the Duke and the Mayor, and the other Lords sate downe, and the Aldermen also, all the commons of the Citie beyng assembled and standing before them. After silence cõmaunded vpon a great payne in the Protectors name. The Duke stode vp, and as he was well learned, and of nature meruellously well spoken, he sayde to the people, with a cleare, and a lowd voyce: Friendes, for the zeale, and hartye fauour that we beare you, we become to breake of a matter right great, and weightie, and no lesse weightie, then pleasing to God, & profitable to all the realme, nor to no parte of the realme more

For why, the thyng that you haue long lacked, and as wee well knowe ſore longed for, that you woulde haue geuen great good for, that you woulde haue gone farre to fetch: that thing be we come hether to bring you, without your labour, paine, coſte, auenture, or ieoperdie. For whom trusted he, that mistrusted his owne brother? Whome spared he, that killed his owne brother? Or who coulde perfectly loue him, if his owne brother coulde not? What maner of folke that he most fauoured (we shall for his honour spare to speake of) howbeit, this ye wot well all, that whoso was best, bare euer the lest rule, and more suite in his daies was to Shores wife, a vile and abhominable strompet, then to all the Lordes in Englande, except vnto those that made her their protectour, which simple woman was yet well named, and honest, till the king for wanton lust, and sinful affection, bereft her from her husbande, a right honest yong man, and substanciall amongst you. And in that point which in good faith I am sory to speake of, sauing that it is in vayne to kepe counsaile in that thing, that all men knoweth, the king hys greedy appetite was insaciable, and euery where ouer all the realme intollerable. For no women was there any where yong or olde, poore or riche, whome he set his eie vpon, whome hee any thing liked, either for person, or beautie, speche, pace or countenaunce, but without anye feare of God, or respect of his honour, murmure or grudging of the worlde, he woulde importunatly pursue his appetite and haue her, to the great distruction of manye a good woman, and great doloure to their husbandes and friendes, which being honest people of themselues, so much regarded the clennesse of their houses, the chastitie of their wiues, and children, that them were liefer to lose all that they haue beside, then to haue such a vilany done to them. And albeit that with this, and other importable dealing, the realme was in euery place anoyed, yet speciallye you the Citezens of this noble Citie, as for that amongst you is most plentie of all suche thinges as minister matter to suche iniuries, as for that you were nerest at hande, sith that nere here about was hys most common abiding. And yet be ye the people whome he had as singuler a cause well and kindly to entreat, as any part of his realme: not onelye for

London is the speciall Chamber of the Prince. that the prince by this noble Citie, as of his speciall chamber, and renoumed Citie of this realme, much honourable fame receiueth amongst all other nacions, but also for that, yea not without your great cost & sundry perilles and

ieoperdies in al his warres bare euer your especiall fauor to his part: which your kinde mindes borne to the house of Yorke, sith he hath nothing worthily requited you, there is of that house now, which by God his grace shall make you full recompence, which thing to shew you, is the whole some and effect of our arrande. It shall not I wote well neede, that I reherse vnto you agayn that you alredy haue heard of him that can better tell it, and of whome I am sure ye will better beleue it (and reason it is that it so be) I am not so prowd to loke therfore that you should receiue my words of so great authority as the preachers of the worde of God, namely a man so cunning, and so wise, that no man wotteth better what he should doe & say, and thereto so good and vertuous, he would not say the thing, which he wist he should not say in the pulpit, namely, into the which no honest man commeth to lie: which honourable preacher ye well remember, substancially declared to you at Paules Crosse on Sonday last paste, the right and tytle of the most excellent Prince Richard Duke of Gloucester now Protector of this realme, which he hath vnto the crowne of the kingdome of the same. For that worshipfull man made it perfectly and groundely open vnto you, that the children of king Edward the fourth were neuer lawfully begotten, for as much as the king (liuing his verie wyfe dame Elizabeth Lucie) was neuer lawfully maried to the Queene their mother, whose blood, sauing that he set his volupteous pleasure before his honour, was full vnmeetely to be matched with his (the mingling of which two bloodes together hath beene the effusion of a great part of the noble blood of this realme, whereby it maye well be seene, that mariage was not well made of which there is so much mischiefe growen. For lack of which lawfull copulation, and also of other things which the said worshipfull Doctor rather signified then fully explaned, and which thing shall not be spoken for me, as the thing that euery man forbeareth to say that he knoweth, in aduoyding the displeasure that my noble Lorde Protectour bearing as nature requireth a reuerence to the Duches his mother. For these causes before remembred I saye, that for lacke of issue lawfully comming of the late noble Prince Richard Duke of Yorke, to whose royall blood the crownes of Englande and of Fraunce, are by the high authoritie of a parliament entayled, the right and title of the same is by iuste course of inheritaunce according to the common law of this land, dissended and come vnto the most excellent prince the Lorde protectour, as to the verie lawfull begotten sonne of the fore remembred noble Duke of Yorke. Which thing well considered, and the knightly prowesse of him pondered, with many vertues which in his noble person singulerly do abound: The nobles and commons also of this realme, and specially of the North partes, not wylling anye bastard blood to haue rule of the lande, nor the abusions in the same before vsed and exercised any longer to continue, haue fully condiscended and vtterly determined to make humble peticion vnto the puyssaunt prince the Lorde protectour, that it maye like his grace at our humble request, to take vpon him the guyding and gouernaunce of this realme, to the welth and increase of the same, according to his verie right and iust tytle, which thing I wote well he will be loth to take vpon him, as he whose wisdome well perceyueth, the labour and studie both of minde and body that shall come therewith to him, whosoeuer shall occupie that rome. I dare say he will if he take it (for

J warraunt you that rome is no childes office) and that the great wise man well perceyued, when he sayd Væ regno, cuius Rex puer est, woe to that realme whose king is a childe, wherefore so much the more cause haue we to thanke God, that this noble personage, which is so righteously entituled thereto, is of so sad age, and thereto of so great wisedome, ioyned with so great experience, which albeit, he will be loth as J haue sayde to take vpon him, yet shall he to our petition in that behalfe the more graciously encline, if ye the worshipfull Citizens of thys Citie, being the chiefe Citie of the realme, ioyne with vs the Nobles in our sayde request, which for your awne weale we doubt not but that ye will. And yet neuertheless we pray you so to do, wherby ye shall doe great profite to all this realme: Beside that, in chosing them so good a king, it shall be to your selfe a speciall commoditie, to whome his maiestie shall euer after beare so much the more tender fauour in how much he shall perceyue you the more prone and benevolently minded towarde his election: wherein deare friendes, what minde you haue we require you playnely to shewe vs?

When the Duke had sayde and looked that the people whome he hoped that the Maior had framed before, should after this flattering proposition made, haue cryed king Richard, king Richard, all was still and muete, and not one worde aunswered to: wherewith the Duke was maruellously abashed, and taking the Maior neere vnto him, with other that were about hym priuie to the matter, sayde vnto them softly. What meaneth thys, that the people be so styll? Sir quod the Maior, percase they perceyue you not well, that shall we amende quod he, if that wyll helpe, and therewith somewhat lowder rehearsed the same matter agayne, in other order and other words so well and ornately, and neuertheless so euidently and plaine, wyth voyce, gesture, and countenaunce so comely and so conuenient, that euery man much marueyled that heard him, and thought that they neuer heard in their lyues so euill a tale so well tolde. But were it for wonder or feare, or that eche looked that other should speake first, not one worde was there answered of all the people that stood before, but all were as still as the midnight, not so much as rouming among them, by which they might seme once to common what was best to doe. When the Maior sawe thys, he wyth other parteners of the counsayle, drewe about the Duke and sayde that the people had not bene accustomed there to be spoken to, but by the Recorder, which is the mouth of the Citie, and happily to him they will answere. With that the Recorder called Thomas Fitz Wylliam, a sadde man and an honest, which was but newly come to the office, and neuer had spoken to the people before, and lothe was with that matter to beginne, notwithstanding thereunto commaunded by the Maior, made rehersall to the commons of that which the Duke had twise proponed himselfe, but the Recorder so tempered his tale, that he shewed euery thing as the Duke his wordes were, and no part of his awne, but all this no chaunge made in the people, which alwaye after one, stood as they had bene amased. Wherupon the Duke rouned with the Maior and sayde, this is a maruellous obstinate scilence, and therewith turned to the people agayne with these wordes. Deare friends we come to moue you to that thing which paraduenture we so greatly needed not, but that the Lords of this realme and commons of other partes might haue sufThomas Fitz william Recorder of London.

ſtied, ſauing ſuch loue we beare you, and ſo much ſet by you, that we would not gladly do without you, that thing in which to be parteners is your weale and honour, which as to vs ſeemeth you ſee not or way not: Wherefore we require you to geue vs an aunſwere, one or other, whether ye be minded as all the nobles of the realme be, to haue thys noble Prince now Protector to be your king. And at theſe wordes the people beganne to whiſper among themſelues ſecretly, that the voyce was neyther loude nor baſe, but lyke a ſwarme of Bees, tyll at the laſt, at the nether ende of the hall a buſhement of the Dukes ſeruaunts & one Nathfield, and other belonging to the Protectour, with ſome prentices and laddes that thruſted into the hall amongſt the preaſe, began ſodainely at mens backs to cry out as loude as they could, king Richard, king Richard, and there threw vp their Cappes in token of ioy, and they that ſtood before caſt back their heads marualyng thereat, but nothing they ſayde. And when the Duke and the Maior ſaw this maner, they wiſely turned it to their purpoſe, and ſayd it was a goodly cry, and a ioyfull, to here euery man with one voyce & no man ſaiyng nay. Wherefore friends (quod the Duke) ſithe we perceyue that it is all your whole mindes to haue this noble man for your king, whereof we ſhall make his grace ſo effectuall report, that we doubt not but that it ſhall redownde to your great welth and commoditie. We therefore require you that to morowe ye go with vs, and we with you to hys noble grace, to make our humble petition and requeſt to him in maner before remembred. And therewith the Lords came downe and the company diſſolued and departed the more part all ſadde, ſome with glad ſemblaunce that were not very merie, and ſome of them that came with the Duke, not able to diſſemble their ſorrowe, were fayne at hys backe to turne their face to the wall, whyle the dolour of their hartes braſt out of their eyes.

Then on the morow the Maior and Aldermen, and chiefe Commoners of the Citie in their beſt maner apparelled, aſſembled themſelues together at Paules, and reſorted to Bainerds Caſtell where the Protector lay, to which place alſo accordyng to the appointment repayred the Duke of Buckingham and diuers Nobles with him, beſydes many knightes and gentlemen: And therevpon the Duke ſent worde to the Lorde Protector of the beyng there of a great honourable companie to moue a great matter to his grace. Wherevpon the Protector made great difficultie to come to them, except he knewe ſome part of their errand, as though he doubted and partly miſtruſted the commyng of ſuch a number to him ſo ſodainly, without any warnyng or knowlege, whether they came for good or harme. Then when the Duke had ſhewed this to the Maior and other, that they might thereby ſee howe little the Protector loked for this matter, they ſent againe by the meſſenger ſuch louyng meſſage, and there ſo humbly beſought him to vouchſafe that they might reſort to his preſence to propoſe their entent of which they would to none other perſon any part diſcloſe. At the laſt he came out of his Chamber, and yet not downe to them, but in a Galory ouer them, with a Biſhop on euery hand of him, where they beneath might ſee him and ſpeake to him, as though he would not come nere them, till he wiſt what they ment. And therevpon, the Duke of Buckingham firſt made humble petition to him on the behalfe of them all, that his grace would pardon them, and licence them to purpose vnto his grace the entent of their commyng without his displeasure, without which pardon obteyned, they durst not be so bolde to moue him of that matter. In which, albeit they ment as much honour to his grace as welth to all the realme beside, yet were they not sure howe his grace woulde take it, whom they would in no wise offende. Then the Protector, as he was very gentle of himselfe, and also longed sore apparauntly to know what they ment, gaue him leaue to purpose what him liked, verily trusting for the good mind that he bare them all, none of them any thing would entend to himward wherewith he ought to be grieued. When the Duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then wexed he bolde to shewe him their entent and purpose, with all the causes mouyng them thervnto, as ye before haue heard. And finally, to beseech his grace that it would like him of his accustomed goodnesse, and zeale vnto the realme, nowe with his eye of pitie to beholde the long continued distresse and decay of the same, and to set his gracious hand to the redresse and amendment thereof, by takyng vpon him the Crowne and gouernaunce of the realme, accordyng to his right and title lawfully discended vnto him, and to the laude of God, profite and suretie of the lande, and vnto hys grace so muche the more honour and lesse paine, in that that neuer Prince reigned vpon any people that were so glad to liue vnder his obeysaunce, as the people of this realme vnder his.

When the Protector had heard the proposition, he loked very straungely thereat and made aunswere, that albeit he knew partly the things by them alleged to be true, yet such entier loue he bare to king Edward and his children, & so much more regarded his honour in other Realmes about, then the Crowne of any one, of which he was neuer desirous, so that he coulde not finde in his heart in this poynt to enclyne to their desire, for in all other nacions where ỹ truth were not well knowen, it should peraduenture be thought that it were his awne ambicious minde and deuise to depose the Prince, and to take himselfe the Crowne, with which infamie he would in no wise haue his honour steyned for any Crowne, in which he had euer perchaunce perceyued much more labour and paine, then pleasure to him that so would vse it as he that would not and were not worthie to haue it. Notwithstandyng, he not onely pardoned them of the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and hartie fauour they bare him, prayyng them for hys sake to geue and beare the same to the Prince, vnder whome he was and would be content to liue, and with his labour and counsaile as farre as it should like the king to vse it, he woulde doe his vttermost deuoyer to set the realme in good estate which was alredie in the little tyme of his protectorship (lauded be God) well begon in that the malice of such as were before the acasion of the contrary, and of newe entended to be, were now partly by good pollicie, partly more by God his speciall prouidence, then mans prouision, repressed and put vnder.

Upon thys aunswere geuen, the Duke of Buckyngham by the Protector hys licence a little rounded, as well with other noble men about hym as with the Maior and Recorder of London. And after that (vpon lyke pardon desired and obteyned, he shewed alowde vnto the Protector, for a finall conclusion that the realme was appointed that king Edward his line should no longer reigne vpon them, both for that they had so farre gone that it was now no suretie to retreate and for that they thought it for the weale vniuersal to take that way, although they had not yet begon it. Wherfore if it would lyke hys grace to take the crowne vpon him, they would humbly beseeche hym thereunto, and if he would geue them a resolute aunswere to the contrarie (which they would be loth to here) then must they seeke and should not fayle to finde some other noble man that would. These wordes much moued the Protector, which as euery man of small intelligence may weet would neuer haue enclined thereto: but when he sawe there was none other way but that eyther he must take it, or else he and his both to go from it, he sayde to the Lordes and commons, sithe it is we perceyue well that all the realme is so set (wherof we be very sory) that they will not suffer in any wise king Edwarde his line to gouerne them, whom no man earthly can gouerne against their wyls: And we also perceyue that no man is there to whom the crowne can by so iust tytle appertayne as to our selfe as verie right heire lawfullye begotten of the body of our most dread and dere father Richard, late Duke of Yorke, to which tytle is now ioyned your election, the nobles and commons of the realme, which we of all tytles possible take for most effectuall, we be content and agree fauourably to encline to your petition and request, and according to the same, here we take vpon vs the royall estate of preheminence and kingdome of the two noble realmes, Englande, and Fraunce, the one from this day forward by vs and our heyres to rule, gouerne and defend, the other by God his grace and your good helpe to get agayne, subdue and establishe for euer in due obedience vnto this realme of England, the auaunce-ment whereof we neuer aske of God longer to liue then we entende to procure and set forth. With this there was a great cry and shoute, crying king Rychard, king Richard, and so the Lords went vp to the King. But the people departed talking diuersly of the matter, euery man as his phantasie gaue him, but much they marueled of this maner of dealing, that the matter was on both partes made so straunge, as though neuer the one parte had communed with other part thereof before, when they wist that there was no man so dull that harde them, but he perceiued well ynough that all the matter was made betwene them. Howbeit, some excused that againe, saying: all thinge must be done in good order, and men must sometime for the maner sake not be a knowen what they knowe. For at the consecration of a Bishoppe, euery man perceiueth by paiment of his Bulles, that he entendeth to bee one, yet when he is twise asked whether he will be a Bishop, he must twise say naye, and at the third time take it vpon him, as compelled thereto by his awne wil. And in a stage playe, the people know right well that he that plaieth the sowdaine, is percase a sowter, yet if one of acquaintance perchaunce of little nurture shoulde call him by his name, while he standeth in his maiestie one of hys tormentours might fortune breake his heade for marring of the play. And so they saide, these matters be kynges games, as it were stage playes, and for the most part plaid vpon scaffoldes, in which poore men be but lokers on, & they that wise be, wil meddle no farther, for they that steppe vp with them when they cannot play their partes, they disorder the play and doe themselues no good.

The Protector taketh vpon him the royall estate and Kingdome of this realme.

After

After that the Protector had taken vpon him the royal estate, preheminence and kingdome of this realme, as is aforesaid in the history of king Edward the fift, he the next day following with a great traine, went on foote to Westminsterhall, & there when he had placed himselfe in the Court of the kings Benche, he declared to the audience, that he would take vpō him the crowne there in that place where the king himselfe sitteth, & ministreth the lawe, because he considered, that it was the chiefest duty of a king to minister the lawes. Then with as pleasaunt an oracion as he coulde, he went about to wynne the hartes of the nobles, the merchauntes, & artificers, and in conclusion all kinde of men, but speciall the Lawyers of this realme. And finally to the entent that no man should hate him for feare, and that his deceytfull clemency might get him the good will of the people, when he had declared the discommoditie of discord, and the commoditie of concord, and vnitie, he made on open proclamacion, that he did put out of his minde all enemities, and that he there did pardon all offences committed against him. And to the entent that he might shew a proofe thereof, he commaūded that one Fogge, whome he had deadly hated, shoulde be brought before him, who being brought out of the Sanctuarie, for thether had he fled for feare of him. In the sight of the people he toke him by the hand, which thing the common people reioyced at, and praysed: But wise men tooke it for a vanitie. And in his retourne homeward, whom so euer he met, he saluted: for a mind that knoweth it selfe guiltie, is in a maner dejected to a seruile flattery.

1483 1 When he had begonne his reigne the .xix. daye of June, in the yeare of our Lorde. 1483. after this mockish election, then was he proclaymed king openly by sounde of trompet the next day folowing, and the first day of July next ensuyng, was solemply crowned at Westminster. And that solempnitye was furnished for the most parte with the selfe same prouision that was appointed for the coronation of his nephew. But forasmuch as the maner of the same coronacion came vnto my hands, & also for that no mencion is made of the maner of the Coronacion of any prince in al this Chronicle, I thought it not amisse in this place to expresse the same.

The fourth day of July he came to the tower by water with his wyfe, and there he created Edwarde, his onely begotten sonne, a childe of ten yeres olde, Prince of Wales, and John Hayward, a man of great knowlege, and vertue, (aswell in counsaile, as in battaile) he created Duke of Norffolk, and sir Thomas Hayward his sonne, he created Erle of Surrey, & William Lord Barkley was then created Erle of Nottingham, and Fraunces Lord Louell was then made vicount Louell and the kings chamberleyne, and the Lorde Stanley, was deliuered out of ward for feare of his son the Lord Straunge which was then in Lancasshire gathering men (as it was saide) and the sayd

On the morow beyng the first day of July, the king with Queene Anne his wife, came downe out of the white Hall into the great Hall at Westminster, and went directly to the kinges Benche. And from thence the king and the Queene goyng vpon raye cloth barefooted, went vnto Saint Edwards Shrine, and all his Nobilitie goyng with him, euery Lorde in his degree. And first went the Trompets, and then the Heraultes of Armes in their rich Cotes, and next folowed the Crosse with a solempne Procession, the prieste hauyng fine Surplesses, and gray Amysses vpon them. The Abbottes and Bishops Mytred and in riche Copes, and euery of them caryed their Crosiers in their handes. The Bishop of Rochester bare the Crosse before the Cardinall. Then folowed the Erle of Huntingdon, bearyng a payre of guilt Spurres, signifiyng Knighthood. Then folowed the Erle of Bedford bearyng Saint Edwardes staffe for a Relique. After them came the Erle of Northumberland bare hedded, with the poyntlesse sworde naked in his hand, which signified mercy. The Lorde Stanley bare the Mace of the Constableship. The Erle of Kent bare the second sworde on the right hande of the king naked, with a poynt which signified iustice to the Temporaltie. The Lorde Louell bare the thirde sworde on the left hande with a poynt, which signified signified iustice to the Clergie. The Duke of Suffolk folowed with ỳ Scepter in his hande, which signified peace. The Erle of Lincolne bare the Ball and Crosse, which signified a Monarchy. The Erle of Surrey bare ỳ fourth swoꝛd befoꝛe the king in a rich skaberd, and that is called the swoꝛd of estate. Then went thꝛee together, in the middest went Garter king at armes in his riche Cote. And on his left hande went the Maioꝛ of London bearing a Mace, and on his right hand went the Gentleman Usher of the pꝛiuie chamber. Then folowed the Duke of Noꝛffolke bearing the kinges crowne betwene his handes. Then folowed king Richard in his robes of purple Uelnet, and ouer his head a Canapie boꝛne by foure Barones of the fiue poꝛtes, and on euery side of the king there went one Bishop, that is to say, the Byshop of Bathe, and the Byshop of Durham. Then folowed the Duke of Buckyngham bearing the kings trayne, with a whyte staffe in his hande, signifiyng the office of the high Steward of England. Then there folowed a great number of Erles and Barons befoꝛe the Queene. And then came the Erle of Huntington, who bare the Queenes Scepter, and the Loꝛde Lisle Uicount bare the rod with the dosse, which signifieth innocencie. The Erle of Wiltshire bare the Queenes crowne befoꝛe her. Then folowed Queene Anne daughter to Richard Erle of Warwike in robes lyke to the king, and haning a Canapy ouer her head, and on euery coꝛner of the same was a Bell of Golde. And on her head was a Circlet of Golde, set with manye pꝛecious stones. The Countesse of Richmond bare the Queenes trayne. And after them came the Duchesse of Suffolke in her robes of estate, and on her head a Cronicle of Golde. Then folowed the Duchesse of Noꝛffolke appareled in lyke maner as was the Duchesse of Suffolke, and then folowed twentie Ladies richely apparelled, and after them a great number of knightes and Esquires, and then a great number of Typstaues, and passed foꝛwarde vntill they came vnto Saint Edwardes Shꝛyne to their seates of estate. And shoꝛtly the king and the Queene sat dowue in their seats of estate. And foꝛthwith there came vp befoꝛe the king & the Queene both pꝛiests and Clarkes, that song most delectable and excellent Musick. And so soone as thys was done, the king and Queene were shifted from their robes, and had diuers places open from the middle vpwarde, in which places they were annoynted. And that beyng done, the king and Queene chaunged their robes into cloth of Golde. And then foꝛthwith the Cardinall beyng accompanied with all the Byshops, crowned the king and Queene with great solempnity, with the crowne of Saint Edward, and then they sang Tedeum and the Oꝛgans went, and then they put vpon the king Saint Edwardes Cope (as an holy relique.) And the Byshops deliuered to the king the Scepter in his right hande, and the Ball with the Crosse in his left hande, and to the Queene the Scepter in her right hand, and the rod with the Doue in her left hande. And then the Cardinall and Byshops went to Masse, and the King and Queene went to their seates agayne. And shoꝛtly after came vp befoꝛe the king two Byshops and kneeled dowue befoꝛe him a little whyle, and then they aꝛose vp and kissed the king one after another: on euery side of the king stoode a Duke, and one euery side of the Queene stood a Byshop. And befoꝛe the king stood the Erle of Surrey with a swoꝛd in hys hande, and befoꝛe the Queene was a Lady kneeling. And there kneeled befoꝛe the Queenes seate the Duches ches of Norffolke and sundrie other Ladies. And so they sate still vntill the Yare was geuen, and then the king & Queene dissended and came downe to the highe aultar, and there receyued the Sacrament, the same beyng deuided betweene them. And then they went vp vnto S. Edwards Shryne, and there the king offred saint Edwards crowne with many other reliques. And then the king returned agayne to his seat, and the Lordes set hys awne crowne vpon his head. And so in order as they came they departed to Westminster hall, and so to their Chambers for a season. During which time the Duke of Norffolke came into the hall, his horse being trapped to the ground in cloth of Golde as high Marshall, and voyded the Hall.

About foure of the clock the king and Queene entred the Hall, and the king sate in the middle, and the Queene on the left hande of the table, and on euery side of her stoode a Countesse, holding a cloth of pleasaunce when she list to drinke. And on the right hande of the king sate the Archebyshop of Caunterburie. All the Ladies sate on one side at a table, in the middle of the hall, and at the table agaynst hym sate the Chauncelour and all the Lordes. At the table next the Cupbord sat the Maior of London. At the table behind the Lordes sate the Barones of the fiue Portes. And at the other bords sate dyuers noble and worshipfull personages.

When all persons were set, the Duke of Norffolke Erle Marshall, the Erle of Surrey Constable for that day, the Lorde Stanley Lorde steward, syr William Hopton Treasorer, and syr Thomas Percy Comptroller came in and serued the king solempnly with one dishe of Golde, & another of Syluer, and the Queene all in guilt Vessell, and the Byshop in Siluer. At the second course came into the hall syr Robert Dymmock the kings Champion makyng proclamation, that whosoeuer would saye that king Richard was not lawfull king, he woulde fight with him at the vtteraunce, and threwe downe his gauntlet, and then all the hall cryed king Richard, king Richard. And so he did in three partes of the hall. And then one brought him a Cup of Golde with Wine couered, and when he had dronke as much as he woulde, he threwe out the rest and departed with the Cup. After that the Heraultes cryed a largesse thrise in the hall, and so went vp to their stage. At the ende of dynner the Maior of London serued the king and Queene with Ipocras, and had of eche of them a Cup of Golde with a couer of Golde. And by that tyme all was done it was darke night, and so the king and Queene returned to their Chambers, and euery man to his lodging.

Incontinent after thys feast he sent a solempne Ambassade to Lewys the French king to conclude a league and amity with him, trusting also to obteyne the tribute that king Edwarde his brother had before out of Fraunce. But the French king so abhorred him and his crueltie, that he woulde neyther see nor here his Ambassadors, & so in vaine they returned home againe.

Now after this triumphant coronation, there fell mischiefes thick and thick, & as the thing euill gotten is neuer well kept, so through all the time of his vsurped reigne, neuer ceased their cruel murther, death, and slaughter, till his awne destruction ended it. But as he finished his time with the best death and most rightwise, that is to say his awne, so began he with the most pitteous and wicked, I meane the lamentable murther of his innocent Nephews the yong king and his tender brother, whose death and finall fortune hath

so farre come in question that some remayned long in doubt whether they were in his dayes destroyed or no. Not for that onely that Perkyn Warbeck by many folkes malice, and no folkes folly so long space abusing the worlde, was as well with princes as with poore people reputed and taken for the yonger of these two: But for that also that all things were in late dayes so covertly demeaned, one thing pretended and another ment, that there was nothing so playne and openly proued, but that yet for the common custome of close and covert dealing, men had it ever inwardly suspect, as many well counterfeit Jewels, make the true mistrusted. Howbeit, concerning ỳ opinion, with the occasions mouing either party, we shall have place more at large to intreate, in the story of the late Noble Prince of famous memorie king Henry the seuenth, in the processe of Perkyn. But in the meane season, for this present matter I shall reherse to you the dolorous ende of these two Babes, not after euery waye that I have heard, but after that waye that I have so heard by such men and such meanes as me thinketh it were herde but it should be true.

Close dealing is euer suspicious.

The destruction of king Edwardes children.

John Greene.

Robert Brakenburie Lieutenant of ỳ Towre.

King Richarde after his coronacion, taking his waye to Glocester, to visite in his newe honour, the towne, of which he bare the name before of old, devised as he rode to fulfill that thing which he before had entended. And forasmuch as his minde gaue him that his neue wes lyuing, men would not recon that he coulde haue right to the realme: he thought therefore without delay to ridde them, as though the killyng of his kynsmen might ende hys cause, and make him a kindly king. Where vpon he sent one John Greene, whome he specially trusted, vnto sir Robert Brakenburie, constable of the tower, with a letter and credence also, that the same sir Robert in anye wyse shoulde put the two children to death. This John Greene did his errand to Brakenbury, kneeling before our Ladye, in the Towre, who plainlye answered that he would neuer put them to death, to die therefore. With ỳ which answere John Greene returned, recompting the same to king Richarde at Warwicke yet on his iourney, wherwith he toke such displeasure, & thought, that the same night, he sayd, to a secret page of his: Ah, whome shall a man trust? they that I have brought vp my selfe, they that I went woulde haue most surely serued me, euen those fayle me, & at my commaundement wyll do nothing for me. Sir quod the page, there lieth one in the palet chambre without, that I dare well say, to do your grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that he would refuse, meanyng this by sir James Tirrell, which was a man of right goodly personage, and for the giftes of nature worthy to haue serued a much better Prince, if he had well serued God, & by grace obterned to haue as much truth and good will, as he had strength and witte. The man had an high hart, and sore longed vpwarde, not rispng yet so fast as he had hoped beyng hindered and kept vnder by sir Richard Ratcliffe, and sir William Catesby, which longyng for no more partners of the Princes fauour, namelye not for him, whose pride they knewe woulde beare no pere, kept him in secret dutes out of all secret trust: which thing this page had well marked, and knowen: wherefore, this occasion offered, of very speciall friendship spied his time to set him forward, and in such wise to do him good, that all the enemies that he had (except the Deuill) coulde neuer haue done him so much hurt and shame, for vpon the Pages wordes, king Richard arose (for this communication had he sitting on a Jaques, a conuenient carpet for such a counsayle) and came out into the palet chambre, where he did find in bed the sayd James Tyrell, and sir Thomas Tyrell, of person like, & brethren of blood, but nothing of kinne in condicions. Then sayde the king merely to them, what sirs, be you in bed so sone? and called vp James Tyrell, and brake to him secretly his minde, in this mischeuous matter, in the which he founde him nothyng straunge. Wherfore on the morowe he sent him to Brakinburie with a letter by the which he was commaunded to deliuer to the sayd James all the keyes of the Towre for that night, to the ende that he might there accomplishe the kings pleasure in such things as he there had geuen him in commaundement. After which letter deliuered and the keyes receyued, James appointed the next night ensuyng to destroy them, deuisyng before & preparyng ỹ meanes.

James Tyrell.

The Prince assone as the Protectour toke vpon him to be king, and left the name of Protectour, was thereof aduertised and shewed, that he should not raigne, but his vncle shoulde haue the crowne. At which word the prince sore abashed began to sighe, and sayde: Alas I woulde mine vncle woulde let me haue my life, although I leese my kingdome. Then he that tolde him the tale vsed him with good wordes, and put him in the best comfort that hee coulde, but forthwith he and his brother were both shut vp, and all other remoued from them, one called blacke Will, or William Slaughter onely except, which were set to serue them, and foure other to see them sure. After which time, the Prince neuer tyed his pointes, nor any thing rought of hymselfe, but with that young babe his brother lyngered in thought & heauinesse, till this traiterous dede deliuered them of that wretchednesse.

The lamentable wordes of the yong king.

For James Tyrell deuised that they should be murthered in their beds and no blood shed: to the execution whereof, he appointed Miles Forest one of the foure that before kept them, a felow fleth bred in murther before time, and to him he ioyned one John Dighton, his awne horsekeper, a big, broade square, and strong knaue. Then all the other beyng remoued from them, this Miles Forest, and John Dighton about midnight, the sely children lyng in their beddes, came into the chambre, and sodenly lapped them vp amongest the clothes, and so bewrapped them, and entangled them, kepyng downe by force the fetherbed & pillowes hard vnto their mouthes, that within a while they smored, and stifled them, & their breathes faylyng, they gaue vp to God their innocent soules, into the ioyes of heauen, leauing to ỹ tormentors their bodies, dead in ỹ bed, which after the wretches perceiued, first by the strugling, with the pangs of death, & after long lyng stil to be throughly dead, they layd the bodies naked out vpon the bed, & fetched James Tyrell to see them, which when he saw them perfitly dead, he caused ỹ murtherers to bury them at the stayre foote, metely deepe in the ground vnder a great heape of stones.

Miles Forest. John Dighton.

The yong king and his brother murdered.

Then rode James Tyrell in great haste to king Richard, and shewed him all the maner of the murder, who gaue him great thankes, and as men say, there made him knight, but he allowed not their buriall in so vile a corner, saiyng that he woulde haue them buried in a better place, because they were a kinges sonnes: Lo the honourable courage of a king, for he would recompence a detestable murther with a solempne obsequie. Wherevpon a priest of Sir Robert Brakenburies toke them vp, and buried them in such a place secretly as by the occasion of his death (which was very shortly after) which onely knew it, the very truth coulde neuer yet be well and perfectlye knowen. Some ſay that king Richard cauſed them to be taken vp, and cloſed them in lead, & to put them in a Coffin full of holes, hooked at the endes with two hookes of yron, and ſo caſt them into a place called the black deepes, at the Thames mouth, ſo that they ſhould neuer riſe vp nor be ſeene againe. This was the verye truth vnknowen by reaſon that the ſayde prieſt died ſo ſhortly, and diſcloſed it neuer to any perſon that would vtter it. And for a truth, when ſir James Tyrrell was in the Tower for treaſon committed agaynſt king Henry the ſeuenth: both he and Dighton were examined together of this poynt, and both they confeſſed the murder to be done in the ſame maner as you haue heard, but whether the bodyes were remoued, they both affirmed they neuer knewe. And thus as I haue learned of them that much knewe, and little cauſe had to lye, were theſe two noble Princes, theſe innocent tender children, borne of the moſt royall blood, and brought vp in great welth, likely long to liue, to reigne & rule in the realme, by trayterous tirannie taken and depriued of their eſtate, ſhortly ſhut vp in priſon, and priuilye ſlaine and murdered by the cruell ambition of their naturall Uncle and hys diſpiteous tormentors: which thinges on euery part well pondered, God gaue this worlde neuer a more notable example, either in what vnſuretie ſtandeth this worldes weale, or what miſchiefe worketh the prowde enterprice of an high heart, or finally what wretched ende enſueth of ſuch diſpiteous crueltie. For firſt to begin with the miniſters, Myles Forreſt, at Saint Martines le graund, by peece meale miſerably rotted away, John Dighton liued at Calice long after, no leſſe diſdeyned and hated then poynted at, and there dyed in great miſery: But Sir James Tirrell was beheadded at the Tower hill for treaſon: And king Richard himſelfe was ſlaine in the fielde, hacked, and hewen of his enemies hands, haried on a horſeback naked being dead, his heare in diſpite torne and tugged like a curre Dogge. And the miſchiefe that he tooke in leſſe then three yeres, of the miſchiefe that he did in three monethes be not comparable, and yet all the meane time ſpent in much trouble and paine outwarde, and much feare, dreade, and anguiſhe within. For I haue heard by credible report, of ſuch as were ſecret with his chamberers that after this abhominable deed done, he neuer was quiet in his mind, he neuer thought himſelfe ſure where he went abroade, his bodie priuilye fainted, his eyen whirled aboute, his hande euer on his dagger, his countenaunce and maner like alwayes to ſtrike again, he toke euill reſt on nightes, lay long waking and muſing, foreweried with care and watch, rather ſlumbred then ſlept, troubled with fearefull dreames, ſodeinly ſometime ſtart vp, leapt out of his bed and loked about the Chamber, ſo was his reſtleſſe heart continually toſſed and tombled with the tedious impreſſion and ſtormie remembraunce of his abhominable murther and execrable tirannie.

The out and inward troubles of Tirants.

King Richard by this abominable and miſchieuous act, thinking himſelfe well relieued both of feare and thought, woulde not haue it kept counſaile, but within a fewe dayes cauſed it to runne in a common rumor that the two children were ſodainly deade, and to this entent as it is to be demed, that now none heyre male beyng alyue of king Edwardes bodie lawfully begotten, the people would be content with the more pacient heart, and quiet mind to obey him and ſuffer his rule and gouernaunce: but when the fame of this

deteſtable fact was reueled, and demulged through the whole realme, there fell generally, ſuch a doloꝛ and inward ſoꝛow into the heartes of all the people, that all feare of his crueltie ſet aſyde, they in euery towne, ſtreete, and place, openly wept, and piteouſly ſobbed. And when their ſoꝛrow was ſomwhat mittigate, their inwarde grudge could not refrayne but crie out in places publike, and alſo pꝛiuate, furiouſly ſaiyng, what creature of all creatures is ſo malicious and ſo obſtinate an enemie either to God, oꝛ to Chꝛiſtian religion, oꝛ to humaine nature, which would not haue abhoꝛred, oꝛ at the leaſt abſteyned from ſo miſerable a murther of ſo execrable a tyꝛanny. To murder a man is much odious, to kill a woman is in maner vnnaturall, but to ſlay and deſtroy innocent babes, and yong infantes, the whole woꝛld abhoꝛreth, and the blood from the earth cryeth, foꝛ vengeaunce to almightie God. If the common people cryed out, I aſſure you the friendes of the Queene, and her childꝛen made no leſſe exclamation and complaint with lowde voice, lamentably cꝛiyng and ſaiyng, alas what will he doe to other, that thus ſhamefully murdereth his owne blood without cauſe oꝛ deſert? whom will he ſaue when he ſlaieth the pooꝛe Lambes cõmitted to him in truſt? now we ſee and behold that the moſt cruell tiranny hath inuaded the common welth, now we ſee that in him is neither hope of iuſtice noꝛ truſt of mercie, but abundaunce of crueltie and thꝛyſt of innocent blood. But when theſe newes were firſt bꝛought to the infoꝛtunate mother of the deade childꝛen yet beyng in Sanctuarie, no doubt but it ſtrake to her heart, like the ſharpe darte of death: foꝛ when ſhe was firſt infoꝛmed of the murder of her two ſonnes, ſhe was ſo ſodainly amazed with the greatneſſe of the crueltie, that foꝛ feare ſhe ſounded and fell downe to the ground, and there lay in a great agonie like to a dead coꝛps. And after that ſhe came to her memoꝛie, and was reuiued againe, ſhe callyng by name diuers tymes her ſweete babes, accounted her ſelfe moꝛe then mad that ſhe deliuered her ponger ſonne out of the Sanctuarie to his enemie to be put to death, thinkyng that next the othe made to God bꝛoken, and the duetie of allegeaunce toward her childꝛen violated, ſhe of all creatures in that poynt was moſt ſeduced and diſceyued. After long lamentacion, when ſhe ſaw no hope of reuengyng otherwiſe, ſhe kneled downe and cried on God to take vengeaunce foꝛ the deceytfull periury, as who ſayd that ſhe nothing miſtruſted but once he would remember it. What is he lyuyng that if he remember and beholde theſe two noble infantes without deſeruyng, ſo ſhamefully murthered, that will not abhoꝛre the fact, yea and be moued and toꝛmented with pitie and mercie. And yet the woꝛlde is ſo fraile, and our nature ſo blinde that fewe be ſtirred with ſuch examples, foꝛgetting and little conſidering, that oftentimes foꝛ the offences by the parents perpetrate and committed, that ſinne is puniſhed in their line and poſteritie. This chaunce might ſo happen to this innocent childꝛen, becauſe king Edwarde their father and parent offended in ſtaynyng his conſcience: he made his ſolempne othe beꝛoꝛe the gate of the City of Yoꝛke (as you haue heard before) and pꝛomiſed and ſware one thing by his woꝛde, thinkyng cleane contrarie in his heart, as after did appere. And afterwarde by the death of the Duke of Clarence his bꝛother, he incurred (of likelyhoode) the great diſpleaſure towarde God.

After this murther thꝰs perpetrated & that the had viſited his towne of

Glouceſter

Gloucester which he for his olde dignity both loued and with ample liberties and priuileges endued and garnished, he toke his iorney toward the Countie of Yorke, where the people abusing hys lawfull fauour, as he both fauored and trusted them in hys hart, had of late presumed to attempt diuers rootes and riots contrarie to his lawes and enfringing of his peace, and vpon hope of his maintenaunce, were so eralted, that no Lorde, were he neuer of so great power could eyther pacifie or rule them till the king himselfe came personally thether to set a concorde and an vnitie in that Countrie, and so he by long iourneying came to the Citie of Yorke, where the Citizens receyued him with great pompe and triumph, and made diuers dayes playes and Pagiaunts in token of ioy and solace. Wherefore king Richarde magnified and much commended them and also did shewe himselfe apparantly before them in habite royall with Scepter in hande and Diademe on his head, and made proclamation that all persons should resort to Yorke on the day of the Assention of our Lorde, where all men should both beholde him and his Queene and Prince in their high estates and degrees, and also for their good wylles shoulde receyue many thankes. At the daye appointed the whole Clergie assembled in Copes richelye reuested and so with a reuerent ceremonie went about the Citie in Procession, after whome folowed the king with his Crowne and Scepter appareled in his circote Robe royall accompanied with no small number of the Nobilitie of hys Realme: after whome marched in order Queene Anne hys wife lykewise crowned, leading on her left hande Prince Edwarde her sonne, hauing on hys head a Demy Crowne appointed for the degree of a Prince. The king was had in that triumph in such honor, and the common people of the North so reioyced that they extolled and prayed him farre aboue the starres. After thys solempne feast and glorious pompe he kept great counsayles there, as well for the ordering of the Countrie in time to come, as for the bridling and punishing of such as there had misgouerned themselues: and farther of the gentlemen of that Countrie, he augmented the number of hys houshold, ministers and seruaunts, in the which persons he put his whole trust and affiaunce. When all things were thus discreetely ordered, he returned by Notyngham, and after came to London: whome more for dread then for loue, the Citizens receyued in great companies. Thus king Richard by a newe inuented cruelty and late practised tirannie obteyned and grewe to high praise and honor, and then by the admiration and iudgement of the common multitude, he was most esteemed to be eralted into heauen, when he couertly had intelligence that he was lyke to lose hys estate, and could by no meanes haue long continuaunce in hys vsurped power: For assuredly after the death of king Edwards children, when any blustering winde, perillous thunder, or terrible tempest chaunced or were apparauntly like to happen: Sodainly the people hauing in there fresh memorie the mischieuous act of their king and Prince, would openly speake and cry that God did take vengeaunce, and punishe the poore English men for the crime and offence of their vngracious king, whom they blamed, accursed, and wished to haue extreme tortures. Although king Richarde harde often of these slaunderous wordes and malicious saiyngs and knewe well by what persons they were spoken, yet he durst not wyth strong hande be on the first inuentors reuenged, knowyng that some time it is no wisedome to refuse or disdaine them that tell a ruler his duetie, or declare to him his misbehauior towarde the common welth or counsayle him to amende and chaunge hys yll lyfe. After this great felicitie, he fell agayne into a great feare and pensiuenesse of minde, & because he could by no meanes eyther correct or amend things that were passed, he determined by doing his duetie in all things to his commons, to blot and put out of memorie that note of infamie, with the which his fame was iustly spotted & stayned, and to cause the people to conceyue so good an opinion in him, that from thence forth no calamitie or trouble should be adiudged to happen to the common welth, eyther by his negligence or by his misgouernaunce (although it is harde and straunge shortly to turne and pluck out such qualities and vsages as haue of long time beene engrauen in a mans minde and rooted in his maners and conditions.) Therefore whether it was for the performaunce of his former entent of amendment, or (as the common fame flue abrode) that he tooke great repentaunce of hys mischieuous actes, and deuilishe doyngs, and pretended to haue the name of a good and vertuous man, by reason that he shewed himselfe more iust, more meeker, and more liberall (especially amongst the poore people) then before he had accustomed to doe, and so by thys meanes he surely trusted first to obteyne of God forgeueneſſe, and after to remoone by little and little the enemitie and inwarde grudge that the common people bare in their mindes toward him, and in conclusion, to obteyne their friendly loue and assured fauour. He furthermore beganne and enterprised diuers things as well publike as priuate, the which he beyng preuented by sodaine death did neyther accomplishe nor bring to conclusion, for he begun to founde a College of a hundred priestes, which foundation with the founder shortly tooke an ende. To please the common people also, he in his high Courte of Parliament enacted diuers and sundrie good lawes and profitable estatutes and in especiall one agaynst straungers and forreyn wrought wares, not to be transported into this realme, which cõmodious act for the common welth if he had liued he fully purposed to haue auaunced and set forward and put in execution. But afterward euidently to all persons it appeared, that onely feare (which is not a mayster long in office and in continuall auctoritie) and not iustice, caused king Richard at that verie time to ware better and amend his sinnefull lyfe, for shortly the goodnesse of the man which was but painted and deceauable, sodainly wared colde and vanished away. And from thencefoorth not onely all hys counsayles, doyngs and proceedings, sodainely decayed and sorted to none effect: But also fortune began to frowne and turne her wheele downeward from him, in so much that he lost his onely begotten sonne called Edwarde in the thirde Moneth, after he had created him Prince of Wales.

And shortly after he was vnquieted by a conspiracy, or rather a confederacie betweene the Duke of Buckingham and many other gentlemen against him as ye shall here: But the occasion why the Duke and the king fell out, is of diuers folke diuersly pretended. Thys Duke as you haue heard before alsoone as the Duke of Gloucester after the death of king Edwarde was come to Yorke, and there had solempne funerall seruice done for king Edward, sent to him a secret seruaunt of hys called Persall, with such messages as you haue heard before. And after the Duke of Buckyngham came with three hundred horſe to Northampton and ſtill continued with him, as partener and chiefe organe of his deuiſes till after his coronation, they departed to all ſeeming verie friends at Glouceſter. From whence aſſone as the Duke came home, he ſo highly turned from him and ſo vehemētly conſpired againſt him, that a man would marueyle whereof the chaunge grewe in ſo ſhorte ſpace. Some ſay this occaſion was that a little before the coronation, the Duke required the king amongſt other things to be reſtored to the Erle of Herfordes landes: And for as much as the tytle which he claymed by inheritaunce, was ſomewhat interlaced with the tytle of Lancaſter, which houſe made a tytle to the crowne, and enioyed the ſame three diſcentes, as all men knewe, till the houſe of Yorke depriued the thirde king, which was Henry the firſt, king Richard ſomewhat miſtruſted and conceyued ſuche an indignation, that he reiected the Dukes requeſt with many ſpitefull and knappiſhe wordes, which ſo wounded the Dukes hart with hatred and miſtruſt, that he could neuer after endure to looke right on king Richard, but euer feared hys awne lyfe, ſo farre forth, that when the Protector ſhould ryde to his coronation, he feyned himſelfe ſicke, becauſe he would doe him no honor. And the other taking it in euill part, ſent him worde to riſe and ride, or he woulde make him to be caried. Wherevpon gorgiouſly apparelled and ſumpteouſly trapped with burning cart nanes of Golde embrodered, he roade before the king through London with an euill wyll and worſe hart. And that notwithſtanding he roſe the daye of the coronation from the feaſt, fayning himſelfe ſicke, which king Rychard ſayde was done in hate and ſpight of him. And therefore men ſayde that eche of them euer after lyued continually in ſuch hatred and diſtruſt of other, that the Duke looked verily to haue bene murthered at Glouceſter, from which he in fayre maner departed: but ſurely ſuche as were right ſecret with both, affirme all this to be vntrue, and otherwyſe men thinke it vnlikely, the deepe diſſimuling nature of both theſe men well conſidered. And what neede in that greene worlde the Protector had of the Duke, and in what perill the Duke ſtood if he fell once in ſuſpicion of that tyraunt, that eyther the Protector would geue the Duke occaſion of diſpleaſure, or the Duke the Protector occaſion of miſtruſt: And ſurely men thinke that if king Richard had any ſuche opinion conceyued in him, he would neuer haue ſuffred him to auoyde his handes or eſcape his power: but verie true it is that the Duke of Buckyngham was an high minded man, and euil could beare the glorie of another, ſo that I haue heard of ſome that ſawe it, that he at ſuch time as the crowne was ſet vpon the Protectors head, his eye coulde neuer abide the ſight thereof, but wryed his head another way: but men ſaid he was not well at eaſe, and that was both to king Rycharde well knowen and well taken, nor any demaunde of the Dukes requeſt vncurteouſly reiected, but gently deferred, but both he wyth great giftes and high beheſtes in moſt louing & truſtie maner departed from the king to Glouceſter. This euery man iudged as he thought, but ſoone after his cōming home to Brecknocke, hauing there by king Richardes cōmaundement Doctor Morton Biſhop of Ely, who before as you haue hard was takē at the coūſail at ỹ towre, ward with him very familier, whoſe onelye wiſedome abuſed his pride, to his awne deliueraunce, and the Dukes deſtruction. The biſhop was a man of great naturall witte, very well learned, and of honourable behauiour, lacking king no wise wayes to winne fauour. Hee was first vpon the part of kyng Henry, while that part was in welth, and neyther left it nor forsoke it in no wo, but fled the realme with the Queene and the Prince. And whyle king Edwarde had king Henrye in prison, hee neuer returned but to the fielde at Barnet: after which fielde lost and vtterly subdued and all parte takings extynguished, king Edwarde for his fast fayth & wisedome, was not onely contente to receyue him, but also wooed him to come, & had him from thencefoorth both in secret trust, and speciall fauour whome he nothing deceyued. For he beyng after king Edwardes death first taken by the tyraunt king Richarde, for his truth to king Edwarde found the meane to set the Duke of Buckingham in his toppe, & ioyned Gentlemen together in ayde of the Erle of Richmonde, which after was named king Henry the seuenth: First deuising the mariage betweene the Ladie Elizabeth, daughter to king Edward the fourth, by the which his faithfull & true seruice declared to both his maisters at once, was an infinite benefite to the realme, by the coniuntion of the bloods of Lancaster, and Yorke, whose seuerall titles had long inquieted the realme. This man afterwarde escaped from the Duke of Buckingham, and fled the realm, and went to Rome, neuer minding to meddle with the world, till king Henry the seuenth sent for him, and after made him Archebishop of Caunterburye, and Chauncelour of Englande, and after was made Cardinall, & liued well to all mens iudgements, and died well. But to returne to the former purpose he by the long, and often chaunges, as well of prosperitie, as aduerse fortune, had gotten by great experience the very mother and maistresse of wisedome, and depe insight in pollitique and worldly driftes, whereby perceiuyng nowe the Duke to common with him, fed him with faire words, and many pleasant prayses, and perceiuyng by the griefe of their communications, the Dukes pride now and then to balke out a litle, braide of enuy toward the glory of the kyng, and thereby feiyng him easie to fall out, if the matter were well handeled, he craftely sought the wayes to pricke him forwarde takyng alwayes the occasion of his comming, & also kepyng himselfe close within his bands that he rather seemed to folow him then to lead him. For when the Duke began first to praise, and boast the king, & shew how much profite the realme should take by his reigne. Bishop Morton answered, surely my Lord, foly it were for me to lie, for I am sure if I would sweare the contrary, ye would not once beleue me, but if the world would haue gone as I would haue wyshed, ỹ king Henries sonne had had the crowne & not kyng Edward, then would I haue bene his true & faithfull subiect, but after that God had ordayned him to lose it, and king Edward to reigne, I was neuer so mad wt a dead man: to striue against the quick, so was I euer to king Edward a faithful and true chapleyn, & glad would haue bene that his childrẽ should haue succeded him, howbeit if the secret iudgement of God, haue otherwise prouided, I purpose not to spurne against the prick, nor labor to set vp, that God pulleth downe. And as for ỹ late protectour, & now kyng: and with that worde he left, sauing that he said, that he had alreadie medled to much with the worlde, and woulde from that daye medle with his booke and beades, and no further. Then longed the Duke sore to heare, what he woulde haue sayde, because he ended with the king, and there so sodainely stopped, and exhorted him familierly, betweene them both to be bolde and to say whatsoeuer he thought, whereof he faithfully promised

there ſhoulde neuer come hurt, and peraduenture moꝛe good then he woulde weene. And that he himſelfe entended to vſe his faithfull ſecret aduice, & coũſayle, which he ſayde was the onelye cauſe foꝛ the which he pꝛocured of the kyng to haue him in his cuſtodie, where he might recon himſelfe at home, oꝛ elſe he had bene put in the handes of them with whome he ſhoulde not haue founde like fauour. The Biſhoppe right humbly thanked him, and ſayde, in good faith my Loꝛde, I loue not much to talke of Pꝛinces, as of a thing not all out of perill, although the woꝛde be without faulte, foꝛaſmuch as it ſhall not be taken as the partie ment it, but as it pleaſeth the Pꝛince to conſtrue it. And euer I thinke on Iſopes tale, that when the Lion had pꝛoclaymed that on payne of death there ſhoulde no hoꝛned beaſtes come into the woode, one beaſt that had a bonche of fleſh growyng out of his heade, fled a great pace: the Foxe that ſawe him flie with all the haſt, aſked him whether he fled? In faith quod he, I neyther wote, ne recke, ſo I were once hence, becauſe of the pꝛoclamacion made againſt hoꝛned beaſtes. What foole quod the Foxe, the Lyon neuer ment it by thee, foꝛ that which thou haſt is no hoꝛne in thy heade. No mary quod he, I wot that well ynough, but if he ſaye it is a hoꝛne where am I then? The Duke laughed merely at the tale, and ſayde, my Loꝛde I warraunt you, neyther the Lion, noꝛ the Boꝛe ſhall picke any matter at anye thing here ſpoken, foꝛ it ſhall neuer come neere their eares. In good fayth, ſir ſayde the biſhop, if it did, the thing that I was about to ſaye taken aſwell as befoꝛe God I ment, it could deſerue but thanke, and yet taken as I wene it woulde, might happen to tourne me to little good, and you to leſſe.

Then longed the Duke much moꝛe to weete what it was, wheꝛvpon the biſhop ſayde. In good faith my Loꝛde, as foꝛ the late Pꝛotectour, ſith he is nowe king in poſſeſſion, I purpoſe not to diſpute his title, but foꝛ the welth of this realme, whereof his grace hath nowe the gouernaunce, and whereof I my ſelfe am a pooꝛe member, I was about to wiſhe that to thoſe good abilities whereof he hath alredie right many, little needyng my pꝛayſe, yet might it haue pleaſed God foꝛ the better ſtoꝛe to haue geuen him ſome of ſuch other excellent vertues mete foꝛ the rule of the Realme, as our Loꝛde hath planted in the perſon of your grace, and there left of again. * The Duke ſomwhat marueylyng at his ſodaine pauſes, as thoughe they were but Parentheſes, with a high countenaunce ſayde: my Loꝛde I euidently perceyue and no leſſe note your often bꝛeathing, and ſodaine ſtoppyng in your communication, ſo that to my vnderſtandyng your woꝛdes neyther come to any direct oꝛ perfect ſentence in cõcluſion, wheꝛby either I might perceiue & haue knowlege what your inward intent is now toward the king, oꝛ what affection you beare toward me. Foꝛ the compariſon of good qualities aſcribed to vs both, (foꝛ the which I my ſelfe knowlege and recogniſe to haue none, noꝛ loke foꝛ no pꝛayſe of any Creature foꝛ the ſame) maketh mee not a little to muſe, thinking that you haue ſome other pꝛiuye imagination, by loue oꝛ by grudge engraued and impꝛinted in your heart, which foꝛ feare you dare not, oꝛ foꝛ childiſhe ſhamefaſtneſſe you be abaſhed to diſcloſe and reueale, and eſpecially to me beyng your friend, which on my honour doe aſſure you to be as ſecrete in this caſe as the deffe and dumme perſon is to the ſinger, oꝛ the tree to the hunter. The Biſhop beyng ſomewhat bolder, conſideryng the Dukes pꝛomiſe, but moſt of all animated and encouraged becauſe he knewe the Duke

desirous to be exalted and magnifyed, & also he perceyued the inward hatred and priuie rancor which he bare toward king Richard, was now boldened to open his stomack euen to the very bottome, entending therby to cõpasse how to destroy and vtterly confound king Richard & to depryue him of his dignity royall, or else to set the Duke so a fyre with the desire of ambiciõ, that he himselfe might be safe & escape out of al daunger & perill, which thing he brought shortly to conclusion, both to the kings destruction, and the Dukes cõfusion, & to his awne safegard, & finally to his high promociõ. And so (as I said before) vpon trust & confidence of the Dukes promise, the Bishop sayd: my singuler good Lord, sith the time of my captiuitie, which being in your graces custody, I may rather call it a liberall libertie more then a straight emprisonment, in auoyding ydlenesse mother and norisher of all vices, in readyng bookes and auncient Phamphlets, I haue found this sentence written, that no man is borne free and in libertie of himselfe onely, for one part of duetie he oweth or should owe to his parentes for his procreation due by nature: another part, to his friendes and kinsfolke for nerenesse of blood: But the native Country in the which he tasted first the sweete ayers of this pleasaunt and flatteryng worlde after his natiuitie, demaundeth as a debt by a naturall bonde not to be forgotten, which saiyng causeth me to consider in what case this realme my native Countrie now standeth, and in what estate and assuraunce before this time it hath continued: what gouernour we nowe haue, and what ruler we now haue, and what ruler we might haue, for I plainly perceyue the realme beyng in this case must nedes decay and be brought to vtter cõfusion. But one hope I haue incorporate in my breast, that is, when I consider and in my minde doe diligently remember, and dayly beholde your noble personage, your iustice and indifferencie, your feruent zeale and ardent loue towarde your naturall Countrie, and in like maner the loue of your Countrie toward you, the great learnyng, pregnaunt witte, and goodly eloquence, which so much doth abound in the person of your grace, I must nedes think this Realme fortunate, yea twise more then fortunate, which hath suche a prince in store, mete and apt to be a gouernor, in whose person being endued with so many Princely qualities, consisteth and resteth the verye vndoubted similitude and ymage of true honour. But on the other syde, when I call to memorie the good qualities of the late Protector, and now called king, so violated and subuerted by tyrannie, so chaunged and altred by vsurped authoritie, so clowded and shadowed by blind and insaciable ambicion, yea and so sodeinly (in a maner by a metamorphosis) transformed from politike ciuilitie, to detestable tyrannie: I must nedes say and iustly affirme, that he is neither mete to be a king of so noble a realme, nor so famous a realme mete to be gouerned by such a tyraunt: Was not his first enterprise to obteyne the Crowne begun by the murther of dyuers noble, valiaunt, true, and vertuous personages? O a holy beginnyng to come to a mischieuous endyng, did he not secondarily procede contrary to all lawes of honestie, shamefully against his naturall mother, beyng a woman of much honour, and more vertue, declaryng her openly to be a woman geuen to carnall affection, and dissolute liuyng, which thing if it had bene true (as it was not in deede) euery good and naturall childe would haue rather murmned at, then to haue blasted abroad and especially she beyng aliue. Declaryng furthermore his two brethren, and his two nephewes to be Baſtardes, and to be borne in aduoutery, yet not therewithall this content: After that he had obteyned the garland for the which he ſo long thirſted, he cauſed the two poore innocentes his Nephewes committed to him (for eſpecial truſt) to be murdered and shamefully to be killed. The blood of which liely and little babes daply crie to God, from the earth for vengeaunce. Alas my heart ſobbeth, to remember this bloody and cruell monſter, what ſuretie ſhall be in this realme to any perſon either for life or goodes vnder ſuche a cruell Prince, which regardeth not the deſtruction of his owne blood, and then leſſe the loſſe of other. And moſt eſpecially as oftentymes it chaunceth, where a couetous or a cruell Prince taketh ſuſpicion, the ſmalleſt ſwarying that is poſſible (if the thing be miſconſtrued) may be the cauſe of the deſtruction of many guiltleſſe perſons: and in eſpeciall of noble and welthie perſonages, hauyng great poſſeſſions and richeſſe: Such a Lorde is Lucifer when hee is entered into the heart of a prowde Prince, geuen to couetouſneſſe and crueltie. But nowe my Lorde to conclude what I meane towarde your noble perſon, I ſay and affirme, if you loue God, your linage, or your native Countrie, you muſt your ſelfe take vpon you the Crowne and Diademe of this noble Empyre, both for the maintenaunce of the honour of the ſame (which ſo long hath flouriſhed in fame and renowne) as alſo for the deliueraunce of your naturall Countrie men, from the bondage and thraldome (worſe then the captiuitie of Egypt) of ſo cruell a tyraunt and arrogant oppreſſor. For thus I dare ſay, if any forrein Prince or Potentate, ye the Turke himſelfe would take vpon him the regiment here and the crowne, the Commons would rather admit and obey him, then to liue vnder ſuch a blood ſupper and childe killer: but how much more ioyfull and glad would they be to liue vnder your grace, whom they all know to be a ruler mete and conuenient for them, and they to be louyng and obedient ſubiectes mete to liue vnder ſuch a gouernor: diſpiſe not, nor forſake not ſo manifeſt an occaſion ſo louingly offered. And if you your ſelfe knowing the paine and trauaile that apperteyneth to the office of a king, or for any other conſideration, will refuſe to take vpon you the Crowne and Scepter of this realme: Then I adiure you by the fayth that you owe to God, by your honour, and by your othe made to Saint George, patrone of the noble order of the gartier (whereof you be a Companion) and by the loue and affection that you beare to your native Countrie and the people of the ſame, to deuiſe ſome way how this realme now beyng in miſerie may by your high diſcretion and Princely pollicie, be brought and reduced to ſome ſuretie and conuenient regiment vnder ſome good gouernour by you to be named or picked out. For if you could either deuiſe to ſet vp againe the linage of Lancaſter, or aduaunce the eldeſt daughter of king Edwarde to ſome highe and puiſſaunt Prince, not onely the newe crowned king ſhall ſmall tyme enioy the glory of his dignitie, but alſo all ciuill warre ſhould ceaſſe, and peace, profite and quietneſſe ſhould be ſet forth and embraſed.

When the Biſhop had thus ended his ſaiyng, the Duke ſighed and ſpake not of a great while, which ſore abaſhed the Biſhop and made him chaunge couler: which thyng when the Duke apperceyued, he ſayde, be not afrayd my Lord, all promiſes ſhall be kept, to morow we will common more: let vs go to ſupper, ſo that night they commoned no more, not a little to the vnquietyng

vnquietyng of the Bishop, which nowe was euen as desirous to knowe the Dukes minde and entent, as the Duke longed the day before to knowe his opinion and meanyng. So the next day, the Duke sent for the Bishop, and reherſed to him in maner (for he was both wittie and eloquent) all the communication had betwene them before, and so pawsed a while, and after a little season puttyng of his bonet he sayde: O Lorde God creator of all thinges howe much is this realme of Englande and the people of the same bounden to thy goodnesse, for where we nowe be in veration and trouble, and with great stormes oppressed, sailyng and tossyng in a desperate shippe without good mayster or gouernor: but by thy helpe good Lorde I trust or long time passe that we shall prouide for such a ruler, as shall be both to thy pleasure, and also to the maintenaunce and defence of this noble Realme. And then he put on his Bonet, saiyng to the Bishop, my Lorde of Ely whose true heart and syncere affection toward me at all tymes, I haue euidently perceiued and knowen, and now most of al in our last priuie communication, and secrete deuisyng, I must nedes in heart thinke and with mouth confesse and say, that you be a sure friend, a trustie Counsaylor, a vigilant forseer, a very louer of your Countrie, & a natural Countriman: for which kindnesse for my part, I most louyngly render to you my hearty thankes nowe wyth wordes: hereafter trustyng to recompence and reward you with deedes, if life and power shall serue. And sith at our last communication, you haue disclosed, and opened, the verie secretes and priuities of your stomake, touchyng the Duke of Gloceſter nowe vsurper of the Crowne, and also haue a little touched the auauncement of the two noble families of Yorke and Lancaster: I shall likewise not onely declare and manifest vnto you, all my open actes, attemptes, and doynges, but also my priuie ententes, and secrete thoughtes. To the entent that as you haue vnbuckled your Bouget of your priuie meanynges, and secrete purposes to me: so shall all my clowdie worsking, close deuises, and secret imaginations, be (as cleere as the Sunne) reueled, opened, and made lightsome to you. And to beginne, I declare: that when king Edward was displeased, to whome I thought my selfe little or nothing beholdyng, (although we two had maried two sisters) because, he neyther promoted nor preferred me (as I thought I was worthie and had deserued) neither fauoured nor regarded me, accordyng to my degree and birth: For surely I had by him little authoritie, and lesse rule, and in effect nothing at all: which caused me lesse to fauour his children, because I found small humanitie, or none in their parent. I then began to studie, and wyth good deliberation, to ponder and consider, howe and in what maner thys realme should be ruled and gouerned. And first I remembred an olde prouerbe worthie of memorie, that often rueth the realme, where children rule, and woman gouerne. This olde adage so sanke, and setled in my heade, that I thought it a great error and extreme mischiefe to the whole realme, eyther to suffer the yong king to rule, or the Queene his mother to be a gouernour ouer him, considerynge that her brethren, and her first children (although they were not extract of highe and noble lynage) tooke more vpon them, and more exalted themselues by reason of the Queene, then did the kinges brethren, or anye Duke in his Realme: Which in conclusion turned to their confusion. Then I beyng perswaded with my selfe in thys poynt, thought

it

it neceſſarye both for the publique and profitable welth of thys Realme, and alſo for myne awne commoditye and better ſtaye, to take part wyth the Duke of Gloucester: Whome I aſſure you I thought to bee as cleane without diſſimulation, as tractable wythout iniurye, as mercifull wythout crueltie, as nowe I knowe hym perfectlye to be a Diſſimuler, wythout veritye, a Tyraunt wythout pittie, yea and worſe then the Tyraunt Phaleres, deſtitute of all truth and clemencie: And ſo by my meanes, at the firſt counſaile holden at London, when he was moſt ſuſpected of that thyng that after happened, (as you my Lorde knowe well ynough) hee was made Protectour and defender, both of the kinge and of the realme, which aucthoritie once gotten, and the two children partly by my pollicie brought vnder hys gouernaunce, he beyng mooued with that gnawyng and couetous Serpent, deſired to raygne & neuer ceaſed priuilie to exhorte and require (yea and ſome times wyth threatning termes) to perſwade me and other Lords as well ſpirituall as temporall, that he might take vpon hym the crowne, till the Prince came to the age of foure and twentie yeres, and were able to gouerne the realme, as an hable and ſufficient king: Which thing when he ſawe me ſomewhat ſtick at, both for the ſtraungeneſſe of the example (becauſe no ſuch preſident had bene ſeene) and alſo becauſe we remembered that men once aſſended to the higheſt type of honor and aucthoritie will not gladly diſcende agayne, he then brought in inſtruments, authentike Doctors, Proctors, and notaries of the lawe, with depoſitions of dyuers wytneſſes teſtifyng king Edwardes children to be Baſtardes, which depoſitions then I thought to be as true, as nowe I knowe them to be fayned, and teſtified by perſons with rewardes vntruely ſubornate. When the ſaide depoſitions were before vs red and diligently heard, he ſtood vp bare hedded ſaiyng: Well my Lordes, euen as I and you ſage and diſcreete counſailers woulde that my Nephew ſhould haue no wrong: So I praye you doe me nothing but right. For theſe witneſſes and ſaiyngs of famous Doctors beyng true. I am onely the vndoubted heyre to the Lorde Richarde Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, adiudged to be the verie heyre to the crowne of this realme by aucthoritie of parliament, which thyngs ſo by learned men to vs for a veritie declared, cauſed me and other to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted prince and ſouereigne Lorde. For well we knewe that the Duke of Clarence ſonne, by reaſon of the attaynder of his father was diſabled to inherite, and alſo the Duke himſelfe was named to be a baſtarde, as I my ſelfe haue heard ſpoken, and that vpon great preſumptions more tunes then one: ſo agayne by my ayde and fauour, he of a Protector was made a king, and of a ſubiect made a gouernour, at which time he promiſed me on his fidelitie, laiyng his hand in mine at Baynard Caſtell, that the two yong Princes ſhould lyue, and that he would ſo prouide for them, and ſo maintaine them in honorable eſtate, that I and all the realme ought and ſhould be content. But when he was once crowned king, and in full poſſeſſion of the whole realme, he caſt away his olde conditions as the Idder doth her ſkinne, beryfyng the olde prouerbe, honors chaunge maners, as the pariſhe prieſt remembreth not that euer he was pariſhe Clarke. For when I my ſelfe ſued to him for my part of the Erle of Harfordes landes, which his brother king Edwarde wrongfully deteyned and withheld from mee, and alſo required to haue the office of the high Constablelhip of Englande, as diuers of my noble aunce-ters before thys time haue had, and in long diſcent continued. In thys my firſt ſuyte ſhewing his good minde towarde me, he did not onely firſt delaye me, and afterwarde denay me, but gaue me ſuch vnkinde wordes, with ſuch tauntes and retauntes, ye in maner, check and check mate to the vttermoſt proofe of my patience. As though I had put him downe and not ſet him vp:

yet all theſe vngratitudes and vndeſerued vnkindneſſe, I bare cloſlye and ſuffered patiently and couertly remembred, outwardlye diſſimulyng that I inwardly thought, and ſo with a painted countenaunce I paſſed the laſt ſommer in his laſt company, not without many fayre promiſes, but without any good deedes. But when I was credibly enformed of the death of the two yong innocents, his awne naturall Nephews contrarie to his fayth and promiſe, to the which God be my iudge I neuer agreed nor cõdiſcended. O Lord how my vaynes panted, howe my body trembled and howe my hart inwardly grudged, in ſo much that I ſo abhorred the ſight and much more the company of him, that I could no lenger abide in his Court, except I ſhould be openly reuenged. The ende whereof was doubtfull, and ſo I fayned a cauſe to departe, and with a merie countenaunce and a diſpitefull hart I tooke my leaue humbly of him (he thinking nothing leſſe then that I was diſpleaſed) and ſo returned to Brecknock to you. But in the iourney as I returned, whether it were by the inſpiracion of the holy ghoſt, or by Melencolous diſ-poſition, I had diuers and ſundrie imaginations howe to depriue this vnnaturall Uncle, and bloody Butcher, from his royall ſeate and princely dignitie. Firſt I phantaſied that if I liſt to take vpon me the crowne and impe-riall Scepter of the realme, now was the time propice and conuenient. For nowe was the way made plaine, and the gate opened, and occaſion geuen, which now neglected, ſhould paraduenture neuer take ſuch effect and concluſion. For I ſawe he was diſdayned of the Lordes temporall, abhorred and accurſſed of the Lords ſpirituall, deteſted of all Gent'lemen, and deſpiſed of al
the communaltie: ſo that I ſaw my chaunce as perfitely as I ſaw my awne Image in a glaſſe, that there was no perſon (if I had beene greedy to attempt the enterpriſe) could nor ſhould haue won the ring or got the gole before me. And on this point I reſted in imagination ſecretly with my ſelfe two dayes at Tewkeſburie. And from thence ſo iorneying I muſed and thought that it was not beſt nor conuenient to take vpon me as a conquerour, for then I knew that all men and eſpecially the nobilitie, would with all their power withſtand me, both for reſcuing of poſſeſſions and tenors, as alſo for ſubuerting of the whole eſtate, lawes, and cuſtomes of the realme: Such a power hath a Conquerour as you knowe well ynough my Lorde. But at the laſt, in all this doubtfull caſe there ſprang a new braunche out of my head, which ſurely I thought ſhould haue brought forth fayre flowers, but the ſonne was ſo hote that they turned to drie weedes, for I ſodainly remembred that Lord Edmond Duke of Sommerſet my Grandfather was with king Henrie the firt in the ſecond and thirde degrees from John Duke of Lancaſter lawfully begotten: So that I thought ſure my mother being eldeſt daughter to Duke Edmonde, that I was next heyre to king Henry the firt of the houſe of Lancaſter. This title pleaſed well ſuch as I made priuie of my coũ-ſaile, but much more it encoraged my foliſh deſire, and entent, in ſo much that

clerely I iudged, and in mine owne minde was determinatlye reſolued, that I was the vndoubted heire, of the houſe of Lancaſter, and therevpon concluded, to make my firſt foundacion, and erect my new buildyng. But whether God ſo ordained, or by fortune it ſo chaunced while I was in a maſe, either to conclude ſodainely on this title, and to ſet it open amongſt the common people, or to kepe it ſecret for a while, ſee the chaunce: as I rode betwene Worceſter and Bridgenorth, I encountered with the Lady Margaret, Counteſſe of Richmonde, now wife to the Lorde Stanley, which is the verye daughter and ſole heyre, to Lorde Iohn Duke of Sommerſet my grandfathers eldeſt brother. Which was as cleane out of my minde as though I had neuer ſene her, ſo that ſhe and her ſonne the Erle of Richmonde be both bulwarcke and portcolice betwene mee, and the gate, to enter into the maieſtie royall and getting of the Crowne. And when we had commoned a little concerning her ſonne, as I ſhall ſhew you after, and were departed, ſhe to our Lady of Worceter, and I towarde Shrewesberie: I then new chaunged and in maner amaſed, began to diſpute with my ſelfe, litle conſideryng that thus my earneſt title was turned euen to a Tittill not ſo good as eſt amen. Eftſones I imagined whether I were beſt to take vpon me, by the election of the nobilitie, and commonaltie, which me thought eaſie to be done, the vſurpor kyng thus beyng in hatred, & abhorred of this whole realme or to take it by power, which ſtandeth in fortunes chaunce, and harde to be achieued and brought to paſſe. Thus rumblyng and toſſyng, in the waues of ambiguitie, betwene the ſtone, and ſacrafice, I conſidered firſt the office, duetie, and payne of a king, which ſurely I thinke that no mortall man can iuſtly, and truely obſerue, except he be called, elected, and ſpecially appointed by God, as king Dauid, and diuers other haue bene. But farther I remembered that if I once tooke on me the ſcepter, and the gouernaunce of the realme: That of two extreme enemies I was daply ſure but of one truſty friende (which now a dayes begon a pilgrimage) I was neyther aſſured, nor credibly aſſertayned (ſuch is the worlds mutation) for I manifeſtlye perceiued that the daughters of kyng Edwarde and their alies, and friendes, which be no ſmall number, beyng both, for hys ſake much beloued, and alſo for the great iniurie, and manifeſt tirannie done to them, by the newe vſurper, much lamented, and pitied, would neuer ceaſe to barke if they cannot bite at the one ſide of me. Semblable my Coſin the Erle of Richmonde, his aydes and kinſfolke, which bee not of little power, will ſurely attempt lyke a fierce greyhounde, either to bite or to pierce me on the other ſyde. So that my lyfe and rule ſhould euer hang by a heare, neuer in quiet, but euer in doubt of death or depoſition. And if the ſayde two linages of Yorke and Lancaſter, which ſo long haue ſtryued for the imperiall Diademe ſhould ioyne in one agaynſt me, then were I ſurely mated and the game gotten. Wherefore I haue cleerely determined, and with my ſelfe concluded, vtterly to relinquiſhe all ſuch phantaſticall imaginations concerning the obteyning of the crowne. But all ſuch plagues, calamities and troubles (which I feared and ſuſpected) might haue chaunced on me if I had taken the rule and regiment of thys realme, I ſhall with a reredemayne ſo make them rebound to our common enemie that calleth himſelfe King, that the beſt ſtopper that he hath at tennyce ſhal not well ſtop without a fault: for as I tolde you before, the Counteſſe of Richemonde in my returne from the

newe named king, meeting me in the high way, prayed me first for kindred sake, secondarily for the loue that I bare to my Grandfather Duke Humfrey, which was sworne brother to her father, to moue the king to be good to her sonne Henry Erle of Richemond, and to licence him with his fauour to returne agayne into Englande: and if it were his pleasure so to doe, shee promised that the Erle her sonne should marry one of king Edwards daughters at the appointment of the king, without any thing to be taken or demaũded for the sayde espousals, but onely the kinges fauour, which request I sone ouer passed and gaue her fayre words and so departed. But after in my lodging when I called to memorie with a deliberate studie, and did circumspectly ponder them, I fully adiudged that the holy ghost caused her to moue a thing (the ende whereof shee could not consider) both for the securitie of the realme, as also for the preferment of her childe, and the destruction and finall confusion of the common enemy king Richard. Which thing, she neither then thought I am sure, as I by her words could make coniecture, nor I my selfe cast not her desire to be so profitable to the realme as I nowe doe perceyue, but such a Lorde is God, that with a little sparcle he kindeled a great fyre, and so finally to declare to you the verie conclusion to the which I am both bent and set, my mind is, and my power and purse shall helpe, that the Erle of Richmond very heyre to the house of Lancaster (in the quarell of the which linage, both my father and Grandfather lost their lyues in battayl) shall take to wyfe Lady Elizabeth eldest daughter to king Edward, by the which mariage both the houses of Yorke and Lancaster maye be obteyned and vnite in one, to the clere stablishment of the title to the crowne of this noble realme. To which conclusion, if the mothers of both parties and especially the Erle himselfe, and the Ladie wyll agree, I doubt not but the bragging Boze, which with his tuskes raseth euery mans skinne, shall not only be brought to confusion as he hath deserued but ẏ this Empire shall euer be certayne of an vndoubted heire, and then shal al ciuil and intestine warre cease, which so long hath continued to the paring of many mens crownes, & this realme shall be reduced againe to quietnesse, renowme, and glory. When the Duke had said, the Bishop, which fauoured euer the house of Lancaster, was wonderous ioyfull, and much reioyced to here this deuice, for now came the winde about euen as he would haue it, for al his imagination tended to this effect to haue king Richard subdued, and to haue the lines of king Edward, & king Henry the first againe raysed & aduaunced. But Lord how he reioysed to thinke how that by this mariage the linages of Yorke and Lancaster should be conioyned in one, to the very stedfastnesse of the publike welth of this realme. And least the Dukes courage should swage, or his minde should againe alter, as it did often before, as you may easily perceyue by his awne tale. He thought to set vp all the sayles that he had, to the entent that the ship of his pretensed purpose might come shortly to some sure port: And sayde to the Duke, my Lorde, sithe by Gods high prouision and your incomparable wisedome and politicie, this noble coniunction is first moued, nowe is it conuenient, yea and necessary to consider, what personages and what friends we shall first make priuie of this highe deuice, and pollitique conclusion. By my truth, quod the Duke, we will begin with my Ladie of Richmond the Erles mother which knoweth where he is, either in captiuitie or at large in Britaine. For I heard heard ſay that the Duke of Britayne reſtored him to libertie immediately after the death of king Edward, by whoſe meanes he was reſtrained. Sithe you will begin that way (ſayde the Biſhop) I haue an olde friend with the Counteſſe, a man ſober, ſecret, and well witted, called Reignold Bray whoſe prudent politicie I haue knowen to haue compaſſed thinges of great importaunce, for whome I ſhall ſecretly ſende, if it be your pleaſure, and I doubt not he will gladly come, and that with a good will. So with a little diligence the biſhop wrote a letter to Reignold Bray, requiryng him to come to Brecknocke with ſpeede, for great and vrgent cauſes touchyng his maiſtreſſe: and no other thing was declared in the letter. So the meſſenger rode into Lancaſhire where Bray was with the Counteſſe and Lorde Thomas Stanley her huſband, and deliuered the letter, which when he had red, he tooke it as a ſigne or token of ſome good fortune to come, and ſo with the meſſenger he came to the Caſtell of Brecknock, where the Duke and the Biſhop declared what thing was deuiſed, both for to ſet the realme in a quiet ſtedfaſtneſſe, as alſo for the highe preferment of the Erle of Richemond ſonne to his Ladye and maiſtreſſe: Willyng her firſt to compaſſe howe to obteine the good will of Queene Elizabeth, & alſo of her eldeſt daughter bearyng the ſame name: and after ſecretly to ſend to her ſonne into Britayne to declare what high honor was prepared for him if he would ſweare to marry the Ladie Elizabeth aſſone as he was king, and in royall poſſeſſion of the Realme. Reignold Bray with a glad heart forgettyng nothing geuen to him in charge, in great haſt and with good ſpeede returned to the Counteſſe his Ladie and Maiſtreſſe. When Bray was departed, and this great doubtfull veſſell once ſet abrode, the Biſhop thryſtyng for nothing more then for libertie: When he ſawe the Duke pleaſaunt and well minded towarde him, he tolde the Duke that if he were in his Ile of Elye, he could make many friendes to further that enterpriſe, and if he were there, and had but foure dayes warnyng, he little regarded the malice of king Richard, his Countrie was ſo ſtrong. The Duke knewe well all this to be true, but yet loth he was that the Biſhop ſhoulde depart, for he knewe well that as long as the Biſhop was with him, he was ſure of politique aduiſe, ſage counſaile, and circumſpect proceding. And ſo he gaue the Biſhop kayre wordes, ſayeng that he ſhould ſhortly depart, and that well accompanied for feare of his enemies. The Biſhop beyng as wittie as the Duke was wilye, did not tary till the Dukes companie were aſſembled, but ſecretly diſguyſed in a night departed (to the Dukes great diſpleaſure) and came to the See of Ely, where he found money and friendes, and ſo ſayled into Flaunders, where he did the Erle of Richemond good ſeruice, and neuer returned againe, till the Erle of Richemond after beyng king, ſent for him, and ſhortly promoted him to the See of Cauntorburie. Thus the Biſhop wound himſelfe from the Duke when he had moſt neede of his ayde, for if he had taried ſtil, the Duke had not made ſo many blabbes of his counſaile, nor put ſo much confidence in the Welſhemen, nor yet ſo raſhely ſet forwarde without knowlege of his friendes as he did, which thinges were his ſodein ouerthrow, as they that knewe it did report.

When Reignold Bray had declared his meſſage and priuie inſtruction to the Counteſſe of Richemond his Maiſtreſſe, no marualle though ſhe was ioyous and glad both of the good newes, and alſo for the obteyning of ſuch a high friend in her ſonnes cauſe as the duke was: wherfore ſhe willing not to Reignold Bray.

sleepe this matter, but to further it to the vttermost of her power and abilitie, deuised a meanes how to breake thys matter to Quéene Elizabeth then being in Sanctuare at Westminster. And therupon she hauing in her familie at that time for the preseruation of her helth, a certayne Welshman called Lewys learned in phisicke, which for his grauity and experience, was well knowne & much esteemed amongst great estates of the realme: with whom she vsed sometime liberally & familiarly to talke, now hauing opportunity and occasion to breake her minde vnto him of this weighty matter, declared that the time was come that her sonne should be ioyned in mariage with Lady Elizabeth daughter and heyre to king Edward, and that king Rychard being taken and reputed of all men for the common enemie of the realme, should out of all honor and estate be reiected, and of his rule and kingdome to be cleerely spoyled and expulsed: and required him to go to Quéene Elizabeth (with whom in his facultie he was of counsayle) not as a messenger, but as one that came friendly to visite and consolate her, and as tyme and place should require to make her priuie of this deuise, not as a thing concluded, but as a purpose by him imagined. This phisician dyd not long lynger to accomplish her desyre, but with good diligence repaired to the Quene being stil in the sanctuary at Westminster. And when he saw tyme conuenient for hys purpose, he saide vnto her: Madame, although my imagination be very simple, and my deuise more folish, yet for the entier affection that I bere toward you and your children, I am so bolde to vtter vnto you a secret and priuy conceit, that I haue cast and compassed in my fantasticall brayne. When I well remember, and no lesse consider the great losse and dammage that you haue sustayned by the death of your noble and louing husbande, and the great dolour, & sorowe that you haue suffered, by the cruell murther of your innocent children: I can no lesse do of bounden dutie, then dayly to studie, and hourely imagin, not onely how to bring your hart to comfort and gladnesse, but also deuise how to reuenge the righteous quarel of you, and your children on that bloody bloodsupper, and cruell tirant king Richarde. And first consider, what battaile, what manslaughter, what mischiefe hath risen in this realme, by the dissencion betweene the two noble houses of Yorke and Lancaster, which two families (as I haue contriued) if they may be ioyned in one, I thinke, ye and doubt not but your line shall be agayne restored to the pristinate estate and degree, to your great ioy and comfort, and to the vtter confusion of your mortall enemie the vsurped king. You knowe verie well Madame that of the house of Lancaster, the Erle of Richemond is next of blood, which is lyuing and a lustie yong Batcheler, and to the house of Yorke your daughters now are heyres: if you could agree and inuent the meane how to couple your eldest daughter with the yong Erle of Richemond in matrimony, no doubt but the vsurper of the realme should be shortly deposed, and your heire againe to her right restored.

When the Quéene had hard thys friendly motion (which was as farre from her thought as the man that the rude people say is in the Mone) Lorde how her spirites reuyued, and how her hart lept in her body for ioy and gladnesse. And first geuing lawde to almightie God as the chiefe authour of her comfort, secondarily to Mayster Lewys as the deuiser of the good newes and tydings, instauntly besought him that as he had bene the first inuenter uenter of ſo good an enterpriſe, that now he would not relinquiſhe nor deſiſt to folowe the ſame: requiryng hym farther (becauſe he was appertayning to the Counteſſe of Richemond, mother to the Erle Henry) that he would with all diligent celeritie reſort to her, then lodging in her huſbands place within the Citie of London, and to declare on the Queenes behalf to the Counteſſe, that all the friends and fautours of king Edwarde her huſbande, ſhould aſſiſt and take parte with the Erle of Richemond her ſonne, ſo that he would take a corporall othe after the kingdome obteyned, to eſpouſe and take to wyfe the Ladie Elizabeth her daughter, or elſe Ladye Cecile, if the eldeſt daughter were not then lyuing.

Mayſter Lewys wyth all diligence ſo ſped his buſineſſe that he made and concluded a finall ende and determination of thys enterpriſe betweene the two mothers, and becauſe he was a Phiſitian and out of all ſuſpition and miſdeeming, he was the common currer and daylie meſſenger betweene them ayding and ſetting forth the inuented conſpiracie againſt king Rychard. So the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richemond brought into a good hope of the preferment of her ſonne, made Reygnold Bray her moſt faythfull ſeruaunt chiefe ſoliciter and priuie procurer of thys conſpiracie, geuyng hym in charge ſecretly to enuegle and attract ſuch perſons of ỹ nobility to ioyne with her and take her part as he knewe to be ingenious, faythfull, diligent and of actiuitie. This Reygnolde Bray within a fewe dayes brought vnto his lure (firſt of all taking of euery perſon a ſolempne othe to be true and ſecret) ſyr Gyles Daubenei, ſyr John Cheiney knight, Richarde Guylforde and Thomas Raine Eſquiers and diuers other. The Counteſſe of Richemond was not ſo diligent for her part, but Queene Elizabeth was as bigilaunt on the other ſide and made friendes and appointed Counſellers to ſet forward and auaunce her buſineſſe. In the meane ſeaſon the Counteſſe of Richemond toke into her ſeruice Chriſtopher Urſwike an honeſt and a wiſe prieſt, and after an othe of him to be ſecret taken and ſworne, ſhe vttered to him all her minde and counſell, adhibityng to him the more confidence and truth for that he all hys lyfe had fauoured and taken part with king Henry the ſixt, & as a ſpeciall Jewell put to her ſeruice by ſyr Lewys her Phiſitian. So the mother ſtudious for the proſperitie of her ſonne, appointed thys Chriſtopher Urſwike to ſayle into Britayne to the Erle of Richemond and to declare and vtter to him all pactes and agreements betwene her and the Queene agreed and concluded: But ſodainely ſhe remembryng that the Duke of Buckyngham was one of the firſt inuenters, and a ſecret founder of this enterpriſe, determined to ſende ſome perſonage of more eſtimation then her Chaplaine, and ſo elected for a meſſenger Hugh Conwey Eſquire and ſent him into Britayne with a great ſomme of money to her ſonne, geuing him in charge to declare to the Erle the great loue and eſpeciall fauour that the moſt part of the nobilitie of the realme bare toward him, the louing hartes and benenolent minds which the whole commonalty of theie awne free will frankly offred & liberally exhibited to him, wylling & aduiſing him not to neglect ſo good an occaſion apparantly offred, but with al ſpede and diligence to addict & ſet his minde and full intention how to returne home againe into England where he was both wiſhed & loked for, geuing him farther monicion and counſell to take lande and arriuall in the principalitie of Wales, where he ſhould not doubt to find both aide, comfort and friends. Richard Guylford, lest Hugh Conwey might fortune to be taken or stopped at Plimmoth, where he entended to take shypping, sent out of Kent Thomas Ramme with the same instructions: & both made such diligence, and had such winde and wether, the one by lande from Caleys, & the other by water from Plimmoth, that within lesse then an houre both arriued in the Duke of Britaynes court, & spake with the Erle of Richmond, which from the death of king Edwarde went at his pleasure and lybertie, and to him counted and manifested the cause and effect of their message and ambassade. When the Erle had receiued this ioyfull message, which was the more pleasaunt because it was vnlooked for, he rendred to God his moste heartie thankes, hoping that such things as he with busie minde and careful intent had wished and desired should now come to passe, and now being put in comfort of his long longing, he brake to the Duke of Britayne all his secrets and priuie messages which were to him declared, aduertising him that he was entred into a sure and stedfast hope to obteyne and get the crowne and kingdome of the realme of England desiring him both of his good will and friendly helpe towarde the achieuing of his offred enterprise, promysing him when he came to his entended purpose to render to him againe equall kindnesse and condigne recompence.

Although the Duke of Britayne before that day by Thomas Hutton Ambassador from king Richarde had both by money & praiers bene solicitted and moued to put agayne into safe custodie the Erle of Richmonde, he neuertheless promised faithfully to aide him, and his promise he truly performed.

In the meane season the chiefetaines of the coniuracion in England began together many enterprises: Some in conuenient fortresses put strong garrisons: Some kept armed men priuily, to the entent when they shoulde haue knowlege of the Erles landing, they woulde beginne to sturre vp the warre: Other did secretly moue and sollicite the people to rise and make an insurrection: Other (amongst whome John Morton Bishop of Elye then beyng in Flaunders was chiefe) by priuie letters and cloked messengers, dyd sturre and moue to this new coniuration, al such which they certainely knew to haue a rooted hatred or to beare a cankard malice towarde king Richarde and his procedings.

Although this great enterprise were neuer so priuily handled and so secretly amongst so circumspect persons treated, compassed and conueyed, yet knowledge thereof came to the eares of kyng Richarde, which with the sodayne chaunce was not a little moued and astonyed. First because he had no host ready prepared: Secondarily, if he shoulde rayse an armie so sodainely, he knew not where to meete his enemies, or whether to go, or where to tary. Wherefore

Wherfore he determined to dissemble the matter as though he knew nothing till he had assembled his host, & in the meane season either by the rumor of the common people, or by the diligence of his espialles to search out all the counselles, determinations, ententes, and compasses of his close aduersaries, or else by pollecie to intercept and take some person of the same coniuration, considering that there is no more secret nor hyd espyall then that which lurketh in dissimulation of knowlege and intelligence, or is hydden in name & shadow of counterfeit humanitie and feined kindnesse. And because he knewe the Duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head and aide of the cõiuration, he thought it most necessary to plucke him from that part, either by faire promises or open warre. Wherevpon he addressed his louyng letters to the Duke, full of gentle wordes, and most friendly speche, geuyng farther in charge to the messenger that caried the letter, to promise to the Duke on his behalfe, golden hilles, and siluer riuers, and with all gentle and pleasaunt meanes to perswade, and exhort the Duke to come to the Court. But the Duke as wilie as the king, mistrustyng the faire flatteryng wordes, and the gaye promises to him so sodainly, without any cause offered, knowyng the craftie castes of king Richardes bowe, which in diuers affaires before tyme he had sene practised, required the king to pardon him, excusing himselfe that he was so diseased in his stomacke that skant he coulde take eyther refection or rest. King Richarde not beyng content with this excuse woulde in no wise admitte the same, but incontinent directed to the Duke other letters, of a more rougher & hawtier sort, not without taunting and biting termes, & checking words, commaundyng him all excuses set apart, to repaire without any delaye to his royall presence. The Duke made to the messenger a determinate aunswere that he woulde not come to his mortall enemie, whome he neyther loued, nor fauoured: and immediatly prepared open warre against him, and perswaded all his complicies and partakers that euery man shoulde in his quarter with all diligence rayse vp the people and make a commotion. And by thys meanes almost in one moment Thomas Marques Dorset came out of sanctuarie where he sith the beginnyng of king Richardes dayes had continued, whose life by the only help of sir Thomas Louel Esquier, was preserued frõ all daunger and perill in this troubleous worlde, gathered together a great bande of men in Yorkeshire. Sir Edward Courtney and Peter his brother Bishop of Exceter, raysed another armie in Deuonshire, and Cornewall. In Kent, Richard Guylforde and other Gentlemen, collected a great companie of Souldiours, and openly began warre. But king Richard which in the meane time had gotten together a great strength and puissance, thinking it not most for his part beneficiall to disparse and deuide his great armie into small braunches, and perticulerly to persecute any one of the coniuration by himself, determined al other things being set aside, with his whole puyssance to set on the chiefe hed which was the Duke of Buckingham. And so remouyng from London, he tooke his iourney toward Salisbury, to the entent that in his iourney he might set on the Dukes armie, if he might know him in any place encamped or in order of battaile arrayed. The king was scarce two dayes iourney from Salisbury when the Duke of Buckingham accompanied with a great power of wilde Welchemen, whome he beyng a man of great courage and sharpe speche in maner against their willes had rather thereto inforced and compelled by lordly and strait commaundement then by liberal wages and gentle reteynour, which thing was the very occasion why they left him desolate, and cowardly forsooke him. The Duke with all his power marched through the Forest of Deane entending to haue passed the riuer of Seuerne at Glocester, and there to haue ioyned in armie with the Courtneys, and other Westerne men of his confederacie and affinitie, which if he had done, no doubt but king Richard had bene in great ieopardie either of priuation of his realme, or losse of his life or both. But see the chaunce, before he could attaine to Seuerne syde, by force of continuall raine and moysture, the ryuer rose so high that it ouerflowed all the Countrie adioinyng, insomuch that men were drowned in their beddes, and houses with the extreme violence were ouerturned, children were carryed about the fieldes, swimmyng in Cradels, beastes were drowned on hilles, which rage of water lasted continually ten dayes, in so much that in the Countrie adioinyng, they call it to this day, the great water, or the Duke of Buckinghams great water. By this flood the passages were so closed that neyther the Duke could come ouer Seuerne to his Complices, nor they to him, duryng the which tyme, the Welchemen lingring ydely and without money, vittaile, or wages, sodainly scattered and departed: and for all the Dukes fayre promises, threatnyngs, and enforcementes, they would in no wise neither go farther nor abide. The Duke beyng thus left almost post alone was of necessitie compelled to flie, and in his flight was with this sodaine fortune marueylously dismayed: and beyng vnpurueyed, what counsaile he should take, and what way he should folow, like a man in dispaire not knowyng what to do, of very trust and confidence conueyed himselfe into the house of Humfrey Banaster his seruant beside Shrewesburie, whom he had tenderly brought vp, and whome he aboue all men loued, fauoured, and trusted, nowe not doubtyng but that in his extreeme necessitie he should finde him faythfull, secret, and trusty, entendyng there couertly to lurke till either he might raise againe a newe armie, or else shortlye to sayle into Britayne to the Erle of Richemond.

But when it was knowen to his adherentes which were ready to geue battaile, that his hoste was scattered and had left him almost alone, and was fled and could not be found, they were sodainlye amased and stricken with a sodaine feare, that euery man lyke persons desperate shifted for himselfe and fled, some went to Sanctuary and to solytary places, some fled by Sea, whereof the most part within a fewe dayes after arriued safely in the Duchie of Britayn. Among which number were these persons, Peter Courtney Bishop of Exceter, and Sir Edmond Courtney his brother, by king Henry the seuenth after created Erle of Deuonshire, Thomas Marques Dorset, John Lorde Welles, Sir John Burchier, Sir Edmond Wooduile, a valiaunt man in armes, brother to Queene Elizabeth, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir John Cheyney and his two brethren, Sir William Barkeley, Sir William Brandon, and Thomas his brother, Sir Richard Edgecombe, all these for the most part beyng Knightes, John Halwell, and Edward Poynynges a politique Capitaine. At this very season John Morton Bishop of Ely, and Christopher Vrswike priest, and an other companie of noble men soiourned in Flaunders, ders, and by letters and Meſſengers procured many enemies agaynſt King Richard, which dyng a vigilant eie, and a quicke remembrance, beyng newly come to Sa'ſbury, hauing perfect notice and knowlege howe the Duke was fled, and howe his complices entended to paſſe out of the Realme. Firſt he ſent men of warre to all the next portes and paſſages to keepe ſtraitly the ſea coaſt, ſo that no perſon ſhould paſſe outwarde, nor take land within the Realme without their aſſent and knowlege. Secondarily, he made proclamation, that what perſon coulde ſhewe and reuele where the Duke of Buckingham was, ſhould be highly rewarded, if he were a bondman, he ſhould be infranchiſed and ſet at libertie, if he were of free blood, he ſhould haue a generall pardon, and be rewarded with a thouſand poundes. Furthermore, becauſe he vnderſtoode by Thomas Hutton, which as you haue heard was newely returned out of Britayn, that Fraunces Duke of Britayn not onely refuſed to kepe the Erle of Richmond as a priſoner at his cõtemplacion, and for his ſake, but alſo that he was redie to ayde and ſuccor the ſayde Erle with men, money, and all thinges neceſſary for his tranſporting into Englande: wherefore he rigged and ſent out Shippes of warre well furniſhed and decked with men and artillary, to ſkoure and kepe that part of the Sea that lieth agaynſt Britayn, to the entent that if the Erle of Richemond would aduenture to ſayle toward Englande, either he ſhould be taken captiue, or be beaten & driuen from the coaſt of England. And moreouer, to the entent that euery coaſt, way, paſſage, and corner, ſhould be diligently watched and kept, he ſet at euery doubtfull and ſuſpected place men of warre, to ſeeke, ſearche, and enquire if any creature could tell tidings of the Duke of Buckingham, or of any of his confederation, adherents, fautours, or partakers.

Whyle this dutie ſerche was diligently applyed and put in execution, Humfrey Banaſter (were it more for feare of loſſe of lyfe and goodes, or attracted and prouoked by the auaricious deſire of the thouſand poundes) he betrayed his gueſt and Mayſter to John Mitton then Shrieſe of Shropſhire, which ſodaynely with a ſtrong power of men in harneſſe apprehended the Duke in a little groue adioyning to the Manſion of Humfrey Banaſter, and in great haſte and euill ſpeede conueyed him apparelled in a pilled black Cloke to the Citie of Shrewesburie, where kyng Richarde then kept hys houſholde.

Whether thys Banaſter betrayed the Duke more for feare then couetous, many men doe doubt: but ſure it is, that ſhortly after he had betrayed the Duke his maiſter, his ſonne and heyre waxed mad and ſo died in a Bores ſtie, his eldeſt daughter of excellent beautie was ſodainely ſtriken with a foule leaperie, his ſecond ſonne very marueilouſly deformed of hys limmes and made lame, his yonger ſonne in a ſmall puddle was ſtrangled and drowned, and he being of extreme age arraigned and found guiltie of a murther, and by his clergie ſaued. And as for his thouſand pound king Richard gaue him not one farthing, ſaying that he which would be vntrue to ſo good a maiſter, would be falſe to all other, howbeit ſome ſay that he had a ſmall office or a farme to ſtop his mouth withall. The Duke beyng by certayne of the kinges Counſell diligently vpon interrogatories examined what things he knewe preiudiciall to the kings perſon, opened and declared frankly and freely all the coniuration without diſſimuling or gloſing, truſting becauſe he had had truely and playnely reueled and confessed all things that were of hym required, that he should haue lycence to speake to the king which (whether it were to sue for pardon and grace, or whether he being brought to his presence would haue sticked him with a dagger as men then iudged) he sore desyred and required. But when he had confessed the whole fact and conspiracy vpon Allsoulen day without arreignment or iudgement, he was at Salisburie in the open market place on a newe Skaffold beheaded and put to death. This death (as a reward) the Duke of Buckyngham receaued at the hands of king Richard, whome he before in his affaires, purposes and enterprises had holpen susteyned and set forward aboue all Gods forbode.

The Duke of Buckingham beheaded.

By thys all men may easely perceaue that he not onely loseth both hys labor, trauayle and industrie, and farther steyneth and spotteth his lyne with a perpetuall ignomonie and reproche, which in euill and mischiefe assisteth and aydeth an euill disposed person, considering for the most part that he for his friendlye fauour should receyue some great displeasure or infortunate chaunce. Beside that God of his iustice in conclusion appointeth to him a condigne payne and affliction for his merites and desertes.

Whyle these things were thus handeled and ordered in England, Henry Erle of Richemond prepared an armie of fyue thousand manly Britons, and fortie well furnished shippes. When all things were prepared in a readynesse, and the day of departing and setting forward was appointed, which was the twelue day of the Moneth of October, the whole armie went on Shipborde and haised vp their sayles, and with a prosperous winde tooke the Sea: But toward night, the winde chaunged and the weather turned, and so houge and terrible a tempest so sodainely rose, that with the verie power and strength of the storme, the shippes were disparcled, seuered and seperate a sunder: some by force were driuen into Normandy, some were compelled to returne agayne into Britayne. The ship wherin the Erle of Richemond was, associate onely with one other Barck was all night tossed and turmoyled. In the morning after when the rage of the furious tempest was asswaged, and the yre of the blustering winde was some deale appeased, about the houre of noone the same day, the Erle approched to the south part of the realme of Englande, euen at the mouth of the hauen of Pole, in the Countie of Dorcet, where he might playnely perceyue all the sea bankes and shores garnished and furnished with men of warre and Souldiours, appointed and deputed there to defende his arryuall and landing, as before is mencioned. Wherefore he gaue straight charge and sore commaundement, that no person should once presume to take lande and go to the shore, vntill such time as the whole Naule were assembled and congregate. And whyle he taryed and lyngered, he sent out a Shipbote towarde the lande side to know, whether they which stoode there in suche a number and so well furnished in apparell defensiue were hys foes and enemies, or else his frendes and comforters. They that were sent to enquire, were instantly desired of the men of warre kepyng the coast (which thereof were before instructed and admonished) to dissende and take lande, affirming that they were appoynted by the Duke of Buckyngham there to awayte and tarie for the arryuall and landing of the Erle of Richemond, and to conduict him safely to the Campe, where the Duke not farre of laye encamped with a mightie armie and an hoste of great strength and power, to the entent that the Duke and the Erle ioyning in puyssaunces and forces together, might prosecute and chase king Rycharde beyng destitute of men, and in maner desperate, and so by that meanes, and their awne laboures to obteyne the ende of their enterprise which they had before begonne.

The Erle of Richemond suspecting their flattering request to be but a fraude (as it was in deede) after that he perceaued none of his shippes to appere in sight, he wayed vp his Ancors and halsed vp hys sayles, hauing a prosperous and streynable winde and a fresh gale sent euen by God to deliuer him from that perill and ieopardy, and arryued safe and in securitie in the Duchy of Normandy, where he to refreshe and solace his Souldyours and people, tooke his recreation by the space of three dayes, and clerely determined with part of his companie to passe all by land againe into Britayne. And in the meane season he sent Ambassadors to the French king called Charles the. viii. which newly succeeded hys father king Lewys the. xi. not long before departed to God, requiring of him a safeconduite and licence to passe thorough his Countrie of Normandie into Britayne. The youg king hauing compassion of the misfortune of the Erle of Richemond, not onely gently graunted and assigned to him a pasport, but also liberally disbursed to him a conuenient somme of money for hys conduite and expenses necessarie in hys long iourney and passage. But the Erle trustyng on the French kings humanitie, aduentured to sende his ships home into Britayne, and to set forward himselfe by lande on his iourney, making no great haste till hys messengers were returned, which beyng with the benefite so comforted, and with hope of prosperous successe so encouraged, marched towarde Britayne with all diligence entending there to consult farther with his louers and friendes of his affayres and enterprises. When he was returned agayne into Britayne he was certefied by credible information that the Duke of Buckynham had lost hys head, and that the Marques Dorset and a great number of Noble men of England had a lyttle before enquired and searched for him there, and were nowe returned to Vannes. When he had heard these newes thus reported, he first sorowed and lamented the first attempt, and setting forward of hys friendes, and in especiall of the nobilitie not to haue more fortunately succeded. Secondarily, he reioyced on the other part that God had sent hym so many valyaunt and prudent Captaynes to be his companions in hys martiall enterprises, trusting surely and nothing doubting in his awne opinion, but that all hys busynesse should be wisely compassed, and brought to a good conclusion. Wherefore he determinyng with all diligence to set forward hys newe begon businesse departed to Renes and sent certayne of his priuie seruitours to conduct and bring the Marques and the other noble men to hys presence. When they knewe that he was safely returned into Bryteyne, Lorde howe they reioyced, for before that tyme they mysled hym and knewe not in what part of the worlde to make inquirie or serche for hym.

For they doubted and nolesse feared lest he had taken lande in Englande, and fallen into the handes of king Rycharde in whose person they knew well was neyther mercy nor compassion. Wherefore in all speedy maner they galoped toward hym, and hym reuerently saluted, which meeting after great ioy and solace, and no small thankes geuen and rendered on both parts, they aduisedly debated and commoned of their great businesse and weightie enterprise, in the which season the feast of the natiuitie of our Sauiour Christ happened, on which day all the Englishe Lordes went with great solempnitie to the chiefe Church of the Citie, and there eche gaue fayth and promise to other. The Erle himselfe first tooke a corporall othe, and on his honor promising that incontinent after he should be possessed of the crowne and dignitie of the realme of Englande, he would be conioyned in matrimonie with the Lady Elizabeth daughter to king Edward the fourth. Then all the company sware to him fealtie, and did to him homage as though he had bene that time the crowned king and annoynted Prince, promising faythfully and firmely assuring that they would not onely leese their worldly substaunce, but also be priuated of their lyues and worldly felicitie, rather then to suffer king Richarde that tyraunt longer to rule and reigne ouer them. Which solempne othes made and taken, the Erle of Richemond declared and communicated all these doynges to Fraunces Duke of Britayne, desiring and most hartily requiring hym to ayde him with a greater armie to conduct him into his Countrie, which so sore longed and looked for his returne, and to the which he was by the more part of the nobilitie and communaltie called and desired (which with Gods aid, & the Dukes comfort) he doubted not in short time to obteine, requiring him farther to prest to him a conuenient somme of money, affirming that all such sommes of money which he had receaued of hys especiall friends, were spent and consumed in the preparation of the last iourney made towarde Englande, which sommes of money after his enterprise once achieued, he in the worde of a Prince faythfully promised to repay and restore agayne. The Duke promised him ayde and helpe, vpon confidence whereof he rigged his shippes, and set foorth hys Naule well decked wyth ordynaunce, and warlikely furnished with all things necessarye, to the entent to sayle forward shortly, and to lose no time.

In the meane season, king Richarde apprehended in diuers parties of the realme certaine gentilmen of the Erle of Richmonds faction and confederation, which eyther entended to sayle into Britain toward him, or else at his landing to assist and ayde him. Amongst whome, sir George Browne, sir Roger Clyfforde and foure other were put to execution at London, and sir Thomas Gentliger which had maried the Duches of Exeter the kings awne sister, and Thomas Ram and diuers other were executed at Excester. Beside these persons, diuerse of his housholde seruaunts, whome either he suspected, or doubted, were by great crueltie put to shamefull death. After this, he called a parliament, in the which he attaynted the Erle of Richmond and all other persons which were fled out of the realme for feare, or any other cause, as enemies to him, and to their naturall countrey, and all their landes goods, and possessions, were confiscate and seased to the kings vse. And yet not content with this pray, which no doubt was of no small valour, and moment, he layed on the peoples neckes a great tare and tallage, and surely necessitie to that act in maner him compelled. For what with purging and declaryng his innocencie concernyng the murther of his Nephewes towarde the worlde, and what with cost to obtayne the loue and fauour of the communaltie (which outwardly glosed, and openly dissimuled with him) he gaue prodigally so many and so great rewardes, that now both he lacked, and skarce wist honestly how to borowe. In this troublous season, nothing was more merueyled at, then that the Lorde Stanley had not beene taken and reputed as an enemie to the king, considering the working of the Ladye Margaret his wife, mother to the Erle of Richmonde, but forasmuch as the enterprise of a woman was of him reputed of no regarde or estimacion, & that the Lord Thomas her husbande had purged himselfe sufficiently to be innocent of all doynges and attemptes by her perpetrated, and committed, it was geuen him in charge to kepe her in some secret place at home, without hauyng anye seruaunt or companie, so that from thence forth she should neuer sende letter nor messenger to her sonne, nor any of his friendes, or confederates, by the which the king might be molested or troubled, or anye hurte or preiudice might be attempted against his realme and commonaltie. Which commaundement was a while put in execution & accomplished according to his dreadfull commaundement. Yet the wilde worme of vengeaunce wauering in hys heade, coulde not be contented with the death of diuerse Gentlemen suspected of treason, but also he must extende his bloodye furie against a poore gentleman called Collyngborne, for making a small ryme of three of his vnfortunate Counsaylers, which were the Lorde Louell, Sir Richarde Radclyffe, his mischeuous Mynion, and sir William Catesbey his secret seducer, which Meeter or ryme was.

The Ratte the Cat and Louell our dogge,
Rule all Englande vnder the hogge.

Collingborne executed.

Meanyng by the Hog, the dreadfull wilde Boze, which was the kinges cognisaunce, but because the first line ended in Dog, the Metrician could not obseruyng the regiments of meeter ende the second verse in Boze, but called the Boze an Hogge. This poeticall schoolemaister corrector of Breeues and Longes, caused Collingborne to be abbreuiat shorter by the head, and to be deuided into foure quarters.

King Richarde beyng thus tormented, and tossed in his owne conceyte and imagination, called to his remembraunce that confederations, amities, and other honest bandes and packes, made, concluded, and appointed betwen Princes, and politique gouernours, are the cause efficient and especiall introduction that their realmes & countries are fortified with a double power, that is to saye, with their owne strength and the ayde of their friendes, deuised wyth him selfe to practise a league and amitie with the king of Scots, which not long before had made diuers incursions and rodes into the realme of Englande, where although he gat little, yet surely hee lost not much, and thereupon sued to haue a truce or peace concluded, which came euen as king Richarde hadde wished it. Wherefore commissioners were assigned for both partes to meete at Nothingham the seuen daye next ensuyng, at which tyme came thether for the kyng of Englande John bishop of Lincolne chauncelier of Englande, Richarde bishop of saint Asse, John Duke of Norffolke, Henry Erle of Northumberlande, Thomas Lord Stanley, George Stanley, Lord Straunge, John Gray, Lord Powes, Richard Lord Fitzhugh, John Gunthorpe, keper of the kings priuy seale, Thomas Barow, maister of ỳ rolles, Sir Thomas Brian chiefe Justice of the common place, Sir Richard Ratcliffe knight, William Catesby, and Richarde Salkeld esquiers. And for the king of Scottes, were deputed Colyn Erle of Ergile, Lorde Camplell and Lorde Chaunceller of Scotlande, William bishop of Aberdene, Robert lord Lyle, Laurence Lord Oliphant, John Drummond of Stobhall, Archibalde Dwhitelatoz Archdeacon of Lowdene and Secretary to king James, Lion king at Armes and Duncane Duncas. These Councellers diuers times mette, and after long debating, demaunding, and denying, in the ende of September they fullye concluded a peace, the Articles whereof are to long here to reherse.

When this league and amitie was thus concluded, finished, and sealed with all due circumstances therevnto required. Although king Richard iudged and demed himselfe somewhat the more stronger and quieter by force of this newe amitie, and concluded confederacie, yet to augment more the familiaritie begon betweene the king of Scottes and him, and to haue a double string for his Bowe, he entreated a newe aliaunce and mariage to be concluded betweene the Prince of Rothsay, eldest sonne to the king of Scottes, and Ladie Anne de la Pole, daughter to John Duke of Suffolke, and Ladie Anne sister to king Richard, which sister he so much fauoured, that he studying al the waies by the which he might aduaunce her offspring and linage, did not onely procure and seeke meanes how to make her daughter a Princesse, and consequently a Queene, but also after the death of his sonne, he proclaymed John Erle of Lincolne his nephewe and her sonne, heyre apparant to the Crowne of England, disenheritynge king Edwardes daughters, whose brethren before as you haue heard he shamefully killed & murdered.

The king of Scottes hauyng neede of friendes, but not so much neede as king Richard, which was of necessitie compelled to seeke ayders, and to enterteyne fautours, the one for fauouryng of flatterers, and base borne personnes, and the other not onely for tyrannye and vnnaturall homicide, but also for the vsurpation of the Crowne beyng of all the realme detested and disdeyned, gladly accepted, and ioyously consented to king Richardes desire and coniunction of amitie. Wherefore the sayde Princes sent their Ambassadors and Counsaylors againe to the towne of Notingham, where the saide mariage was by writynges and instrumentes, couenaunted, condiscended, and agreed, and affiaunces made and taken by Proctors, and Deputies on both partes, and she immediately called Princes of Rothsaye, which name shee shortly lost by the short life of king Richard her louyng Uncle. Here may wel be noted the vnnaturall loue and disordered affection which this kinde kinsman shewed to hys blood: For he not remembryng the tirannie that he had executed agaynst his brothers sonnes, the wrong and manifest iniurie that he had done to his brothers daughters, both in takyng from them their dignitie, possessions, and liuyng, thought it should redound greatly to his honour and fame, if he promoted his systers childe (to whome he was nothing bound in conscience to make restitution) to the dignitie of a Queene, rather then to preferre his brothers daughter whome he had vntruely and by force disenherited, & of all their right depriued, to the mariage of a meane esquier: such was his brotherly kindnes, and such was his large conscience towards his brothers children.

After this league and mariage thus concluded and agreed, the king of Scottes disdeinyng that the strong Castell of Dumbarre should remaine in the Englishe mennes handes and possession, wrote a gentle letter to king Richard,

Richard, declaryng to him that where in the league cõcluded betwene them, it was agreed and appoynted that he should within. xl. dayes nert ensuyng, expresse and declare his opinion and meanyng concernyng the Castell of Dunbarre, whether the sayde Castell should be occupied and stand still in the handes of the Englishe men, duryng the whole tyme of the truce, or else for the terme of sixe monethes onely. He nowe certified king Richard by his letters, that he was content that he and his should enioy the possession of the sayde Castell quietly and peaceably duryng the sayde truce and amitie: Neuertheles he required him for the loue and familiaritie that nowe both by treatie and alyaunce was spronge and knit betweene them, that he would redeliuer the saide Castell into his handes, which was vntruly possessed of the English Nacion by deliuery of the rebels and Traytors, contrary to al right, equitie, and conscience. King Richard dalied with pleasaunt letters, and fayre wordes, and so foded forth the king of Scottes, that he neuer had Dunbar deliuered while king Richard liued, after whose death, whether it were by treason or by appoyntment, the Castell was rendered to the king of Scottes, to his great contentation and reioysing. Albeit this league and amitie thus couenaunted and concluded, it might manifestly seeme to all persons, that all conturations and confederacies against king Richard were extinct and put to silence, and in especiall considerynge, that the Duke of Buckingham and his alies were made out of his way, some by death, and some by banishment and exilyng into farre Countries and Regions. Yet king Richard more doubtyng then trustyng to his awne people and friendes, was continually vexed, tossed, and vnquieted, with feare of the returne of the Erle of Richemond and his complices and fautours, which dayly dread and hourely agonie, caused him to liue in dolefull miserie, euer vnquiet, and in maner in continuall calamitie. Wherfore he entendyng to be relieued and to haue an ende of all his doubtfull daungers, determined clerely to extirpate and pluck vp by the rootes all the matter & ground of his feare and doubtes. Wherefore after long and deliberate consultation had, nothing was for his purpose and entent thought either more necessarie or expedient then once againe with price, prayer, and rewardes, to attempt the Duke of Britayn in whose territorie the Erle of Richemond then abode, to deliuer the sayd Erle into his handes, by which onely meanes he shoulde be discharged of all feare of perill, and brought to rest and quietnesse both of bodie and minde. Wherefore incontinent he sent certain Ambassadors to the Duke of Britayn, which tooke vpon them (beside the great and ample rewardes that they brought with them into Britein) that king Richard shoulde yerely pay and aunswere the Duke of all the reuenues, rentes, and profites of the seignories, landes, and possessions aswell belongyng and appertainyng to the Erle of Richemonde, as to any other Noble or Gentleman, which then were in the Erles companie, if he after that time would kepe them in continuall prison and restraine them from libertie.

The Ambassadors furnished with these and other instructions, arriued in Britayne and came to the Dukes house, where with him they could haue no maner of communication concernyng their weightie affayres, by reason that he beyng faynt and weakened by a long and dayly infirmitie, began a little to wax pole and weake in his wit and remembraunce. For which cause

Peter Landoyse his chiefe Treasorer, a man both of pregnant wit & great authoritie, ruled and adiudged al things at his pleasure & commaundement, for the which cause (as men set into high authority be not best beloued) he excited and prouoked against him the malice & euill will of the Nobility of Britayn, which afterward for diuers great offences by him during his authoritie perpetrate and committed, by their meanes was brought to death, and confusion. The Englishe Ambassadors moued their message and request to Peter Landoyse, and to him declared their maisters commaundement, instantly requiryng, and humbly desiryng him (in whose power it lay to do all thing in Britayne) that he would friendly assent to the request of king Richard, offeryng to him the same rewardes and landes, that they should haue offered to the Duke.

Peter Landoyse.

This Peter which was no lesse disdeyned then hated almost of all the people of Britayne, thought that if he did assent and satisfie king Richardes petition and desyre, he should be of power and habilitie sufficiently to withstand and refell the malicious attemptes and disdainfull inuentions of his enuious aduersaries. Wherefore he faythfully promised to accomplishe king Richards request and desyre, so that he kept promise with him, that he might be able to withstand the cankard malice of his secret enemyes. This act that he promised to do, was not for any grudge or malice that he bare to the Erle of Richemonde, for as you haue heard before, he deliuered him from peril of death at Saint Malos, when he was in great doubt of life and ieopardie, but as cause riseth we euer offend, and that cursted hunger of golde, and execrable thirst of lucre, and inwarde feare of losse of authoritie, driueth the blinde mindes of couetous men and ambicious persons to euilles and mischiefes innumerable, not remembring losse of name, obloquie of the people, nor in conclusion the punishment of God for their merites, and desertes. But fortune was so fauourable to the publique welth of the realme of Englande, that this deadly and dolorous compact tooke none effect or place. For while Postes ranne, and letters were sent to and fro for the finishing of this great enterprise betwene king Richard and Peter Landoyse, John Morton Bishop of Ely soiournyng then in Flaunders, was of all this craftie conueyaunce certified by his secret and sure friendes: Wherefore he sent Christopher Urswike (which at that verye season was come out of Britayne into Flaunders) to declare to the Erle of Richemonde howe all the deceyt and craftie worcking was conueyed and compassed, geuyng him in charge to counsaile and aduise the Erle in all haste possible with all his companie to retire out of Britayne into Fraunce. When these newes were brought to the Erle he then kept house in Vannes, and incontinent dispatched again Christopher Urswike to Charles the French king, requiryng him that he and his, might safely passe into Fraunce, which desyre beyng obteyned, the messenger shortly returned to his Lorde and Prince. The Erle well perceiuyng that it was expedient and necessarie with all speede and diligence, to loke to this weightie matter, callyng very fewe to counsaile, he made inquirie and searche of all secrete and by wayes, and sent before all his noble men, as though for a certaine familiaritie and kindenesse they should visite and comfort the Duke, which then for recreation and chaunge of ayre, lay on the borders and confines of Fraunce. And secretly he gaue charge to the Erle of Pembroke which was the leader and conducter of his companie, that when they approched the marches and limits of Britayn, they should diuert and take the next way into Fraunce. The noble men somewhat suspicious of thinges newely imagined, without any tariyng, scouryng the wayes as fast as their horses could runne, came out of the Duchie of Britayn, into the Duchie of Angeou in the dominion of Fraunce, where they taryed the Erles comming, which two dayes after departed out of Vannes, onely accompanied with fiue seruitors, as though he had gone secretly to visite a familiar friend of hys in a small village adioinyng. No man suspected that he would depart, considering that a great multitude of Englishe men were left and continued in the Citie, but after that he had passed directly fiue myles forwarde, he sodainly turned into a solitarie Wood next adioinyng, where clothing himselfe in the simple Cote of his poore seruaunt, made and appointed his sayde minister, leader and maister of his small companie, and he as an humble Page diligently folowed and serued his counterfeit gouernour, neuer restyng nor themselues refreshing, except the baityng of their horses, till they by wayes vnknowen, nowe this way, nowe turnyng that way, came to their companie, abidyng them in Angiers.

The fourth day after the Erle of Richemonde was thus departed, that craftie marchaunt Peter Landoyse, trusting still after his pray, promised by king Richarde, was ready to set forwarde his crew of souldiours, which he priuily had consigned with certaine trustie capitaines for that onely purpose appointed and elected, to performe and achieue his pretensed enterprise, dissimulyng and feinyng them to be conducted and hyred by him to serue ỳ Erle of Richmonde, and hym to conduyte in his returne towarde his native countrey, meaning none other thing but to apprehende him and the other Noble men in his retinue, which no such fraude suspectyng, nor yet any treason ymaginyng, vnware and vnprouided and destitute of all ayde, and them to cast and commit sodainelye into continuall captiuitie and bondage, to the entent that by this wretched & naughtie act, he might satisfie the charitable request, & louyng desire of good kyng Richarde, more for his owne profite then kyng Richards gayne. But when this craftie dissembler Peter Landoyse, which was no wylier then an olde Fore, perceaued that the Erle was departed, (thinkyng that to be true that he imagined) Lorde how currours ranne into euery coast, how light horsemen galloped to euery streyt, to folow & deteyne him, if by any possibilitie he coulde be pursued and ouertaken, and him to apprehende and bring captiue into the Citie of Vannes. The horsemen made such diligence, and with such celeritie set forwarde their iorney, that nothyng was more likely then they to haue obtayned, ye and sealed their praye. For the Erle of Richmond was not entred into the realme of Fraunce, scarce one houre, but the folowers came to the limittes and confines of Britayne, and durst aduenture no further, but vainely without their desire sorowfully returned. At which season were left at Vannes about the number of three Englishe men, which not beyng called to counsaile, and vnaware of this enterprise, but knowyng of the Erles sodeine departure were so incontinently astonyed, that in maner they were all in dispayre both of him and their owne suretie and sauegarde. But fortune turned her saile, and otherwise it happened then their feare them encombred. For the Duke of Britayne nowe beyng yng somewhat recouered, was sore displeased, and nothing contented that the Erle of Richmond was in his dominion so vncurteously tracted and entreated, that he should be by fraude and vntruth compelled to leaue and flie out of his Duchie and Countrie contrary to his honour. Wherefore he toke great displeasure with Peter Landoyse his Treasorer, to whome (although he knewe not and was ignorant that all the drift was driuen and deuysed by him) he laide the fault and imputed the crime. Wherefore he sent for Edward Wooduile, and Edward Powmpuges valiaunt Esquiers of England, and deliuered vnto them money sufficient for their conduite, willyng them to conuey the rest of the Englishe men beyng in Britayn, to the Erle of Richmondes presence. When the Erle was thus furnished and appoynted wyth his trustie companie, and was escaped all the daungers, Labirinthes, and snares that were set for him, no maruaile though he were iocond and glad of the prosperous successe that happened in his affayres. Wherefore, least he should seeme to be blotted with the note of ingratitude, he sent diuers of hys Gentlemen to the Duke of Britayne, the which should publishe and declare to him on the behalfe of the Erle, that he and his, were onely by his benefite and fauour conserued and deliuered from the imminent daunger that they were like to be trapped in. Wherfore at that time he rendred to him his most hartie thankes in wordes, trustyng and not doubtyng but in time to come liberally to recompence him with actes and deedes.

After thys the Erle tooke his iourney to Charles the French king, lyeng then at Langes vpon the ryuer of Leyre, to whome after great thankes geuen for manifolde pleasures by him to the Erle shewed, he disclosed and manifested the cause and occasion of his accesse and repayre to his person. After that he required of him helpe and succour, to the intent that by his immortall benefite to him at that time shewed, he might safely returne to the nobilitie of hys realme, of whome he was greatly called to take vpon hym the crowne and Scepter of the realme, they much hated and abhorred the tyrannie of king Richard. King Charles promised him ayde and comfort, and bade him be of good courage and make good cheere, for he assured him that he woulde gladly shewe to him his benenolent minde and bountifull liberalitie. Which king from thence remoued to Mountargis, leadyng with him the Erle of Richemonde, and all the Noble personages of hys retinue and faction.

Whyle the Erle was thus attendaunt in the French Court, John Vere Erle of Orforde (which as you haue heard before was by king Edwarde kept in prison wythin the Castell of Hammes) so perswaded James Blount Cayptayne of the same fortresse, and Syr John Fortescewe Porter of the Towne of Caleys, that he himselfe was not onely dismissed and set at libertie, but they also abandonyng and leauing their fruitfull offices, condiscended to go wyth him into Fraunce to the Erle of Richemonde and to take his part remaynyng in the Castell before hys departure, he fortefied the same both with newe munitions and new Souldiours. When the Erle of Richemond sawe the Erle of Orforde, he was rauyshed with an incredible gladnesse, that he being a man of so high nobilitie, of such knowledge and practise in feates of warre, and so constaunt, trustie, and assured (which alwaye had studied for the maintenaunce and preferment of the house of Lancaster) was now by Gods prouision delyuered out of Captiuitie and imprisonment, and in time so necessary & conuenient come to his ayde, succour and aduancement, in whome more surer then any other he might put hys trust and confidence, and take lesse paine and trauayle in hys awne person. For it was not hid from hym that suche as had euer taken part with king Edwarde before thys time, came to doe him seruice eyther for malice that they bare to king Richarde, or else for feare to lyue vnder his cruell rule and tyrannous gouernaunce.

Not long after the French king returned agayne to Paris, whome the Erle of Richemonde folowed, entending there to solicite his matter to the conclusion. Wherevpon he besought king Charles to take vpon him the whole tuition and defence of him and hys cause, so that he and hys company beyng by hys meanes ayded and comforted, should confesse and saye, their welth, victorie and aduaunceinent to haue flowed and budded foorth of his bountyfulnesse and liberalitie, which they would God wylling shortly reacquite. In the meane season dyuers Englishe men which eyther fled out of Englande for feare, or were at Paris to learne and studie good litterature and verteous doctrine, came voluntarily and submitted themselues to the Erle of Richemond, and bowed and sware to take his part. Amongst whom was Richarde Fore a priest, a man of great wyt and no lesse learning, whom the Erle incontinent receaued into secret familiaritie, & in briefe tyme erected and auaunced him to high dignities and promotions, and in conclusion he made hym Bysshop of Wynchester.

In the meane season king Richard was credibly aduertised what promises and othes the Erle and his confederates had made and sworne together at Renes, and how by the Erles meanes all the English men were passed out of Britayne into Fraunce. Wherefore beyng sore dismayed and in a maner desperate, because hys craftie Cheuesaunce tooke none effect in Britayne, imagined and deuised how to infringe and disturbe the Erles purpose by another meane, so that by the mariage of Ladie Elizabeth his Neece he should pretend no clayme nor title to the crowne. For he thought if that mariage fayled, the Erles chiefe combe had bene clerely cut. And because that he beyng blynded with the ambicious desyre of rule before thys time, in obteyning the kingdome, had perpetrate and done many cursed actes and detestable tyrannies, yet according to the olde Prouerbe, let hym take the Bull that stale away the Calfe, he thought all factes by hym committed in times passed to bee but of small moment and not to be regarded in comparison of that mischieuous imagination, which he nowe openlye began and attempted. There came into hys vngracious minde a thing not onely detestable to be spoken of in the remembraunce of man, but much more cruell and abhominable to be put in execution. For when he reuolued in his wauering minde how great a fountayne of mischiefe towarde him should spring if the Erle of Richemond should be aduaunced to the mariage of hys Neece, which thing he heard saye by the rumour of the people that no small number of wise and wittie personages enterprised to compasse and bring to conclusion. He clerely determined to reconcile to hys fauour his brothers wyfe Queene Elizabeth eyther by fayre wordes or liberall promises, firmely beleuing her fauor once obteined, that she would not sticke to commit (and louingly credite) to him the rule and gouernaunce both of her and her daughter, & so by that meanes the Erle of Richemond of the affinitie of hys Neece should be vtterly defrauded and beguiled. And if no ingenious remedy could be otherwise inuented to saue the innumerable mischiefes which were euen at hande and lyke to fall, if it should happen Queene Anne hys wyfe to depart out of thys present worlde, then he himselfe would rather take to wyfe hys Cosyn and Neece the Ladie Elizabeth, then for lack of that affinitie the whole realme should run to ruyne, as who sayde, that if he once fell from hys estate and dignitie, the ruyne of the realme must needes shortly ensue and followe. Wherefore he sent to the Queene beyng in sanctuarie dyuers and often messengers, which first should excuse and purge him of all thinges before against her attempted or procured, and after shoulde so largely promise promotions innumerable, and benefices, not onely to her but also to her sonne Lorde Thomas Marques Dorset, that they should bring her if it were possible into some wanhope, or as men say into a fooles paradise. The messengers beyng men both of wyt and grauitie, so perswaded the Queene with great and pregnaunt reasons, what with fayre and large promises, that shee began somewhat to relent, and to geue to them no deafe eare, in so much that she faythfully promised to submit and yeelde her selfe fully and frankely to the kings will and pleasure. And so shee putting in oblition the murther of her innocent children, the infamie and dishonour spoken by the king her husbande, the lying in auoutrie layed to her charge, the bastardyng of her daughters, forgetting also the faythfull promise and open othe made to the Countesse of Richmond mother to the Erle Henry, blynded by auaricious affection and seduced by flattering wordes, first deliuered into king Richards hands her fiue daughters, as Lambes once agayne committed to the custodie of the rauenous Woolfe. After she sent letters to the Marques her sonne beyng then at Parys with the Erle of Richemond, wylling him in any wise to leaue the Erle and without delay to repaire into Englande, where for him were prouided great honors and honorable promotions, asserteyning him farther that all offences on both parties were forgotten and forgeuen, and both he and she highly incorporate in the kings hart. Surely the inconstancie of thys woman were much to be marueyled at, if all women had bene founde constaunt, but let men speake, yet women of the verie bonde of nature will followe their owne kinde. After that king Richard had thus wyth glorious promises and flattering wordes pleased and appeased the mutable minde of Queene Elizabeth, which knewe nothing lesse then that he most entended, he caused all his brothers daughters to be conueyed into his palace with solempne receauing, as though with his newe familier and louing entertainment they should forget, and in their minds blot out the olde committed iniurie and late executed tirannie. Nowe nothing was contrariant and obstacle to hys deuilishe purpose, but that hys mansion was not boyde of his wyfe, which thing he in any wise adiudged necessary to be done. But there was one thing that so much feared and stayed hym from committing this abhominable murther, because as you haue heard before, he began to counterfeit the ymage of a good and well disposed person, and therefore he was afeard least the sodaine death of his wyfe once openly knowne, he shoulde leese the good and credible opinion which the people had of him, without desert conceaued and reported.

porte. But in conclusion euill counsayle preuayled in a wyt lately minded to mischiefe, and turned from all goodnesse. So that his vngracious desire ouercame his honest feare. And first to enter into the gates of his ymagyned enterprise, he abstayned both from the bed and company of his wyfe. After he complayned to dyuers noble men of the realme, of the infortunate sterylitie and barennesse of hys wyfe, because she brought forth no fruit and generatiō of her body. And in especial he accompted to Thomas Rotheram Archbyshop of Yorke (whom lately he had deliuered out of warde & captiuitie) these impediments of his Queene & diuers other, thinking that he would reuele & open to her al these things, trusting the sequele hereof to take his effect, that she hering this grudge of her husband, & taking therfore an inward thought, would not long lyue in this world. Of this the Bishop gathered (which well knew the complexion and vsage of the king) that the Quenes daies were short, and that he declared to certain of his secret friends. After this he procured a common rumour but he would not haue the author knowne) to be published and spred abroad among the common people that the Queene was dead, to the intent that shee taking some conceyte of thys straunge fame, should fall into some sodayne sickenesse or greeuous maladie, and to proue if afterward shee should fortune by that or any other wayes to leese her lyfe, whether the people would impute her death to the thought or sickenesse, or thereof would lay the blame to him. When the Queene heard tell that so horrible a rumour of her death was sprong amongst the commonaltie, she sore suspected and iudged the worlde to be almost at an ende with her, and in that sorowfull agony, shee with lamentable countenaunce and sorowfull chere, repayred to the presence of the king her husbande, demaunding of hym, what it should meane that he had iudged her worthy to die. The king aunswered her with fayre wordes, and with smyling and flattering leasinges comforted her, bydding her to be of good cheere, for to his knowledge shee should haue none other cause. But howsoeuer that it fortuned, eyther by inward thought and pensiuenesse of heart, or by infection of poyson (which is affirmed to be most likely) within a few dayes after the Queene departed out of thys transitorie lyfe, and was with due solempnitie buried in the Church of Saint Peter at Westminster. Thys is the same Anne one of the daughters of the Erle of Warwike, which as you haue heard before at the request of Lewys the French king, was maried to Prince Edward sonne to king Henry the first.

A rumor spred abroade of ỹ Quenes death.

The Quene wife to king Richard the third sodainly dead.

The king thus (according to his long desire) losed out of the bondes of matrimonie, began to cast a foliche phantasie to Lady Elizabeth his Neece, making much suit to haue her ioyned with him in lawfull matrimonie. But because all men, and the mayden her selfe most of all, detested, and abhorred, this vnlawfull, and in maner vnnatural copulacion, he determined to prolong and deferre the matter til he were in a more quietnesse. For all that very season he was oppressed with great, weightie, and vrgent causes, and businesses on euery side, considering that dayly part of the nobilitie sailed into Fraunce to the Erle of Richmond: Other priuily fauoured and aided certaine of the coniuration, so that of his short ende, fewe or none were in doubt. And the common people for the most part were brought to such desperation, that manie of them had rather be reputed and taken of him in the number of his enemies, then to abide the chaunce and hazarde to haue their goodes taken as a spoyle ſpoyle of victory by his enemies. Amongeſt the noble men whome he moſt miſtrusted, theſe were the principall, Thomas Lorde Stanley, Sir William Stanley his brother, Gilbert Talbot and fiue hundred other, of whoſe purpoſes although king Richarde were not ignorant, yet he gaue neither confidence nor credence to any one of them, and leaſt of all to the Lorde Stanley becauſe he was ioyned in matrimonie with ỳ Lady Margaret, mother to the Erle of Richmond, as afterward apparauntly ye may perceiue. For when the ſayde Lord Stanley would haue departed into his countrey to viſit his family and to recreate and refreſh his ſpirites (as he openly ſayde) but the truth was to the entent to be in a perfite readineſſe to receiue the Erle of Richemond at his firſt arriuall in Englande: the king in no wiſe would ſuffer him to depart before that he had left as an hoſtage in the Court, George Stanley Lord ſtraunge his firſt begotten ſonne and heire. While king Richard was thus troubled and vexed with imaginacions of the troubleſus time that was like to come: Loe, euen ſodainly he herde newes that fyre was ſprong out of the ſmoke, and the warre freſhly begon, and that the Caſtell of Hammes was deliuered into the hands of the Erle of Richmond, by the meanes of the Erle of Oxenforde, and that not onely he, but alſo James Blount raptaine of the Caſtell, were fled into Fraunce to aide the Erle Henry. Wherefore he thinkyng it great pollicie to withſtande the firſt brunt, ſent the moſt part of ỳ garriſon of Caleis, to recouer againe, by force the Caſtell of Hammes. They which were in the Caſtell perceauing their aduerſaries to approch, prepared munitions and engins for their defence, and ſent alſo to the Erle of Richemond, to aduertiſe him of their ſodayne inuaſion, requiring him of haſty ayde and ſpeedy ſuccour. The Erle ſtepyng not this firſt begon aſſault, ſent ỳ Erle of Oxenforde, with an elected company of ſouldiours to raiſe the ſiege, and reſcewe the Caſtell: Which at their firſt arriuyng, pitched their campe not farre from their enimies. And while king Richardes men gaue vigilant eie, waityng leaſt the Erle of Oxenforde ſhoulde take anye aduauntage of them that lay on that ſide of the Caſtell. Thomas Brandon with. xxx. approued men of warre, by a marish which lay on the other ſide, entred into the caſtell. The ſouldiours within greatly encouraged, and much comforted by this new ſuccour and ayde, greued the enemies by ſhoting from the walles more then they were accuſtomed to do. And they of the Caſtell vexed their enemies on the forepart: the Erle of Oxenforde no leſſe moleſted and vnquieted them on the other part, which was the occaſion that king Richards men offered of their owne mere motion, licence to all beyng within the Caſtell to departe in ſafetie with bagge and baggage nothing excepted: which condicion the Erle of Oxenforde commyng onelye for that purpoſe to deliuer his louyng friendes out of all peril and daunger, & chiefely of all, his olde hoſteſſe Jane Blount wife to James Blount the capiteyne, would in no wiſe forſake or refuſe. And ſo leauyng the Caſtell bare and vngarniſhed, both of victaile and artilerie, came ſafe to the Erle of Richmond ſoiourning in Paris. During this time, kyng Richarde was credybly informed of his inquiſitors and eſpyalles that the Erle of Richmond was with long ſuite in the court of Fraunce ſore wearied, & deſiryng great ayde, coulde obtaine ſmall releaſe: In ſo much that all thing went ſo farre backwarde, that ſuch things as were with great diligence, and no leſſe deliberation, purpoſed, and determined to be ſet forwarde, warde, were now dashed and ouerthrone to the ground. King Richard either beyng to light of credence, or seduced and deluded by his craftie taletellers, greatly reioyced as though he had obtayned the ouerhande of his enemyes, with triumph and victorie, and thought himselfe neuer so surely deliuered of all feare and dreadfull imaginations, so that he neded nowe no more once for that cause eyther to wake or breake his golden sleepe. Wherefore he called home againe his shippes of warre, which he had appointed to kepe the narowe Seas, and dispatched all such Souldiours as he had deputed to keepe certayne garrisons, and to stoppe certayne passages as you haue heard before. Yet least he might for lack of prouision be sodainly trapped, he straightly charged and gaue in commaundement to al noble men and in especial such as inhabited neere to the sea coast, and on the Frontiers of Wales, that according to the vsage of the Countrie, they should keepe diligent watch and strong warde, to the intent that his aduersaries in no wise should haue anye place opportune, easely to take lande without defence or rebuttyng back. For the custome of the Countries adioyning neere to the sea is (especially in the time of warre) on euery hill or high place to erect a Beken with a great Lanternein the top, which may be sene and discerned a great space of. And when the noyse is once bruted that the enemies approche nere the lande, they sodeinly put fire in the Lanternes and make shewtes and outrages from towne to towne, and from village to village. Some ronne in post from place to place admonishyng the people to be redie to resist the ieopardie, and defend the perill. And by this pollicie the fame is soone blowen to euery Citie and towne, insomuch that aswell the Citizens as ỹ rurall people be in short space assembled and armed to refell and put backe the new arriued enemies.

Now to returne to our purpose, king Richard thus somewhat eased of his accustomed pensiuenesse, began to be somewhat more merier, and toke lesse thought and care for outward enemies then he was wont to do, as who say, that he with pollitique prouision shoulde withstande the destinie which hong ouer his heade, and was ordeyned in briefe time sodainly to fall. Such is the force and puissaunce of deuine iustice, that euery man shall lesse regard, lesse prouide, lesse be in doubt of all things, when he is most neerest punishement, and next to his mischaunce for his offences and crimes.

About this season, while the Erle of Richemond was desiryng ayde of the French king, certain noble men were there appoynted to rule the realme of Fraunce during the minoritie of king Charles, which amongest themselues were not of one opinion. Of which dissention, Lewys Duke of Orliaunce was the chiefe sturrer, which because he had maried Ladie Ioane sister to the French king, toke vpon him aboue other the rule and administration of the whole realme. By reason of which controuersie, no one man onely was suffered to rule all: wherefore the Erle of Richemond was compelled to make sute to euery one of the counsaile seuerally one after another, requiryng and desiryng them of ayde and reliefe in his waightie businesse, and so his cause was prolonged and deferred. Duryng which time, Thomas Marques Dorset which was as you haue heard entised by his mother to returne again into England, partly despairyng in the good successe of the Erle of Richemond, & partly onerate and banquished with the fayre glosyng promises of king Richarde: secretly in the night season stale out of Paris, and with áll diligent expedition tooke his iourney towarde Flaunders. When relation of his departure was made to the Erle of Richemond, and the other noble men, no maruaile though they were astonied and greatly amased. Yet that notwithstandyng they requyred of the Frenche king that it might be lefull to them in his name and by his commaundement to take and stay their Companion, confederate, and partaker of all their counsaile, in what place within his realme and territorye so euer they could finde him. Which petition once obtayned, they sent out Curriers into euery part, amongest whom Humfrey Cheiney playyng the part of a good blood hound, followed the tract of the flier so euen by the sent, that he ouertoke and apprehended him not far from Compeigne and so what with reason, and what with faire promises beyng perswaded, he returned again to his Companions. The Erle of Richmond vnburdened of this misaduenture, least by lingryng of dayes, and prolongyng of time, he might leese the great opportunitie of thinges to him offered and ministred: also least he should further wound or molest the mindes of his faythfull and assured friendes, which dayly did aspect and tary for hys commyng, determined no lenger to protract and deferre the time, but with all diligence and celeritie to attempt his begon enterprice, and so obteinyng of king Charles a small crewe of men, and borowyng certaine summes of money of him, and of diuers other his priuate friendes. For the which he left as debter, or more likelier as a pledge or hostage, Lorde Thomas Marques Dorset (whome he halfe mistrusted) and Sir John Burchier, he departed from the French Court, and came to the Citie of Roan. While he taryed there makyng prouision at Harflete in the mouth of the riuer of Seyne for all thinges necessary for his naupe, tidynges were brought to him that king Richard beyng without children, and nowe Widower, entended shortly to marry the Lady Elizabeth his brothers daughter, and to preferre the Ladie Cicile her sister to a man found in a Clowde, and of an vnknowne linage and familie. He tooke these newes as a matter of no small moment (and so all thinges considered) it was of no lesse vnportance then he tooke it for. For this thing onely toke away from him and al his Companions their hope and courage that they had to obteine an happie enterprise. And therefore no marueile though it nipped him at the verie stomacke: when he thought that by no possibilitie hee might attaine the mariage of anye of king Edwardes daughters, which was the strongest foundation of his buildyng, by reason whereof he iudged that all his friendes in England would abandon & shrinke from him. Wherefore makyng not many of his counsaile, after diuers consultations he determined not yet to set forward, but to tary and attempt how to get more ayde, more friendes, and more stronger succors. And amongest all other, it was thought most expedient to allure by affinitie in his ayde as a Companion in armes, Sir Walter Herbert, a man of an auncient stocke, and great power amongest the Welshemen, which had with him a fayre Ladie to his sister, of age ripe to be coupled in matrimonie. And for the atchieuyng of this purpose, messengers were secretly sent to Henry Erle of Northumberland (which had before maried another sister of Sir Walter Harbertes) to the entent that he should set forward all this deuice and purpose, but the wayes were so narowly watched and so manye spyes laide, that the Messenger proceded not in his iourney and businesse. But in the meane season, son, there came to the Erle a more ioyfuller message from Morgã Kidwelly learned in the temporall lawe, which declared that Rice ap Thomas, a man of no lesse valiauntnesse then actiuitie, and John Sauage an approued Capitaine, would with all their power be partakers of his quarrell. And that Reignold Bray had collected and gotten together no small summe of money for the payment of the wages to the Souldiours and men of warre: admonishing him also to make quicke expedicion, and to take his course directlye into Wales. The Erle of Richemond because he woulde no longer lynger and werye his friends, liuyng continually betwene hope and feare, determined in all conuenient hast to set forward, and caried to his shippes armour, weapons, vitaile, and all other ordinaunces expedient for warre.

After that all thing was in a readynesse, the Erle being accompanied onely with two thousand men and a small number of shippes, weyed vp his ancors and halsed vp his sayles, in the Moneth of August, and sayled from Harflet with so prosperous a winde that the seuenth daye after hys departure he arryued in Wales in the euening, at a port called Milforde Hauen, and incontinent tooke lande and came to a place called Dalle, where he heard say that a certain company of his aduersaries were layed in garrison, to defende his arriuall all the last winter. And the Erle at the sonne rising remoued to harforde west, beyng distant from Dalle not fully ten mile, where he was ioyfully receaued of the people, and he arryued there so sodainely that he was come and entred the towne at the same time when the Citizens had but knowlege of his comming. Here he heard newes which were as vntrue, as they truely were reported to him in Normandy, that Rice ap Thomas, and John Sauage with bodye and goodes were determined to ayde king Richard. While he and his companie were somewhat astonied of these newe tidinges, there came such message from the inhabitaumtes of the towne of Pembrooke that refreshed, and reuiued their frosen hearts and daunted courages. For Arnold Buttler a valiaunt captaine, which first asking perdon for his offences before time committed against the Erle of Richemonde, and that obtayned, declared to him that the Penbrochians were redy to serue and geue their attendaunce on their naturall and immediate Lorde Jasper Erle of Penbrooke. The Erle of Richmond hauyng his armie thus increased, departed from Herforde west to the towne of Cardigan beyng fiue mile distant from thence. While the souldiours were refreshing and trimming themselues in their campe, straunge tidinges sprong among them wythout any certaine authour, that sir Walter Herberd which lay with a great crewe of men at Carmarden, was now with a great armie ready to approch and bid them battaile. With which newes the armie was sore troubled, and euerye man assaied his armure and proued his weapon, & were prest to defend their enemies. And as they were in this fearefull doubt, certaine horsemen which the Erle had sent to make inquirie and search, retourned and reported al the countrey to be quiet and no let nor impediment to be laide or cast in their iourney. And euen at the same time the whole armie was greatly recomforted by reason that the comming of Richarde Griffyth, a man of great nobilitie, the which notwithstanding ỹ he was confederate with Sir Walter Herbert, and Richarde ap Thomas, yet at that very instant he came to the Erle of Rychmonde with all his company, which were of no great number. After hym

the ſame day came John Morgan with his men. Then the Erle aduaunced forward in good haſt, making no repoſe or abode in any one place. And to the entent to paſſe forward with ſure and ſhort expedicion, he aſſaulted euerie place where his enemies had ſet any men of warre, which with ſmall force, and leſſe difficultie he briefely did ouercome and vanquiſhe. And ſodeinly he was by his eſpialles aſſertayned that Sir Walter Harbert and Rice ap Thomas were in harneſſe before him redie to encounter with his armie and to ſtop their paſſage. Wherefore like a valiaunt Capitein he firſt determined to ſet on them, and eyther to deſtroy or to take them into his fauour, and after with all his power and puyſſance to geue battaile to his mortall enemie king Richard. But to the entent his friendes ſhoulde knowe in what redineſſe he was, and howe he proceeded forwarde, he ſent of his moſt ſecret and faythfull ſeruauntes with letters and inſtructions to the Ladie Margaret his mother, to the Lorde Stanley his brother, to Sir George Talbot, and to other his truſtie friendes, declaryng to them, that he beyng ſuccoured and holpen with the ayde & reliefe of his friends, entended to paſſe ouer the riuer of Seuerne at Shrewſburie, and ſo to paſſe directly to the Citie of London, requiryng them as his ſpeciall truſt and confidence was fixed in the hope of their fidelitie, that they would meete him by the way with all diligent preparation, to the entent that he and they at time and place conuenient might communicate together the depeneſſe of all his doubtfull and waightie buſineſſe. When the meſſengers were diſpatched with theſe commaundementes and admonicions, he marched forward toward Shrewſburie, and in his paſſyng there met and ſaluted him Rice ap Thomas with a goodly bande of Welchemen, which making an othe and promiſe to the Erle, ſubmitted himſelfe wholy to his order and commaundement. For the Erle of Richemond two dayes before made to him promiſe, that if he would ſweare to take his part and be obedient to him, he would make him chiefe gouernour of Wales, which part as he faythfully promiſed and graunted, ſo after that he had obteyned and poſſeſſed the realme and Diademe, he liberally performed and accompliſhed the ſame. In the meane time, the meſſengers that were ſent, diligently executed the things geuen to them in charge, and laden with rewardes of them to whome they were ſent, returned to him the ſame daye that he entred into Shrewſburie, and made relation to him that his friendes were redie in all poyntes to do all thinges for him which eyther they ought or might do. The Erle Henry brought in good hope with this pleaſaunt meſſage, continued forth his entended iourney, and came to a little towne called Newport and pitching his campe on a little hil adioining, repoſed himſelfe there that night. In the Euening the ſame daye came to him Sir George Talbot, with the whole power of the yong Erle of Shrewſburie then beyng in warde, which were accompted to the number of two thouſand men. And thus his power encreaſyng, he arriued at the towne of Stafford, & there pawſed. To whom came Sir William Stanley accompanied with a fewe perſons, and after that the Erle and he had commoned no long time together, he reuerted to his Souldiors which he had congregate together to ſerue the Erle, which from thence departed to Lichefielde, and lay without the walles in his campe all the night. The next Morning he entred into the towne, and was with all honour like a Prince receyued. A day or two before, the Lorde Stanley hauing

uing in his band almoſt fiue thouſand men, lodged in ꝑ ſame towne, but hearyng that the Erle of Richemond was marching thetherward, gaue to hym place, diſlodging him and his, and repayred to a towne called Adreſtone, there abidyng the comming of the Erle, and this wylie fore did this act to aduoyde all ſuſpicion, beyng afrayd leaſt if he ſhould be ſeene openly to be a fautor or ayder to the Erle his ſonne in lawe before the day of the battaile, that king Richard which yet did not vtterly put in him diffidence and miſtruſt, woulde put to ſome cruell death his ſonne & heyre apparant George Lord Straunge whome king Richard as you haue heard before, kept with him as a pledge or hoſtage, to the entent that the Lorde Stanley his father ſhould attempt nothyng preiudiciall to him.

King Rycharde at thys ſeaſon keepyng his houſe in the Caſtell of Notyngham was informed that the Erle of Richemonde with ſuch bamiſhed men as fled out of Englande to him were nowe arryued in Wales, and that all things neceſſarie to his enterpriſe were vnprouided, vnpurueyed and berie weake, nothing meete to withſtand the power of ſuch as the king had appointed to reſiſt hym. Thys rumour ſo enflated his minde, that in maner diſdayning to here ſpeake of ſo poore a company, determined at the firſt to take little or no regarde to this ſo ſmall a ſparcle, declaryng the Erle to be innocent and vnwiſe, becauſe that he raſhely attempted ſuche a great enterpriſe with ſo ſmall and thinne a number of warlike perſons, and therfore he gaue a definitiue ſentence, that when he came to that poynt that he ſhould be compelled to fight agaynſt hys wyll, he eyther ſhould be apprehended a lyue, or elſe by all likelyhood he ſhoulde of neceſſitie come to a ſhamefull confuſion, and that he truſted to be ſhortly done by Sir Walter Harbert and Rice ap Thomas, which then ruled Wales with egall power and lyke authoritie. But yet he reuoluyng and caſting in his minde that a ſmall warre begon and wynked at and not regarded, may turne to a great broyle and trouble, and that it was prudent pollicie not to contempne and diſdeyne the little ſmall power and weakeneſſe of the enemie, be it neuer ſo ſmall, thought it neceſſarie to prouide for after clappes that might happen and chaunce. Wherefore he ſent to John Duke of Norffolke, Henry Erle of Northumberland, Thomas Erle of Surrey, and to other of his eſpeciall and truſtie friends of the Nobilitie, which he iudged more to preferre and eſteeme hys welth and honor then their awne ryches and priuate commoditie, wylling them to muſter and viewe all their ſeruaunts and tenantes, and to elect and chooſe the moſt couragious and actiue perſons of the whole number, and with them to repayre to hys preſence with all ſpeede and diligence. Alſo he wrote to Robert Brakenbury Lieutenaunt of the Tower, commaunding him with his power to come to his armie and to bring with him as felowes in armes, Sir Thomas Burchier, and Sir Walter Hungerforde, and dyuers other Knightes and Eſquiers in whome he caſt no ſmall ſuſpicion. Whyle he was thus ordering hys affayres, tydinges came that the Erle of Richemonde was paſſed Seuerne & come to Shrewſburie without any detryment or encombraunce. At which meſſage he was ſore moued and broyled with Melancoly and dolour, and cryed out, aſking vengeaunce of them that contrarie to their othe and promiſe had ſo deceaued him. For which cauſe he began to haue diffidence in other, in ſo much that he determined himſelfe out of hande the ſame

day to meete with, and reſiſt his aduerſaries. And in all haſt ſent out eſpials to view and eſpie what way his enemies kept and paſſed. They diligently doyng their duetie, ſhortly after returned, declaring to the king that the Erle was encamped at the towne of Lichfield. When he had perfite knowledge where the Erle with his armie was ſoiourning, he hauing continuall repaire of his ſubiectes to him, began incontinently without delay to marſhall and put in order his battayles (like a valyaunt Capitaine and politique leader) and firſt he made his battayles to ſet forwarde fiue and fiue in a ranke, marchyng toward that way where his enemies as was to him reported entended to paſſe. In the middle part of the armie he appointed the traffick and cariage apperteyning to the armie. Then he (enuironed with his garde) with a frowning countenaunce and cruell viſage mounted on a great whyte courſer and folowed with his footemen, the wings of horſemen coaſtyng and rangyng on euery ſide: And keeping thys aray, he with great pompe entred the towne of Leyceſter after the ſonne ſet. The Erle of Richemond rayſed hys campe and departed from Lychefield to the towne of Tomwoorth thereto nere adioyning, and in the mid way paſſing, there ſaluted him Sir Walter Hungerford, and Sir Thomas Burchier knightes, and dyuers other which yeelded and ſubmitted them to his pleaſure. For they beyng aduertiſed that king Rycharde had them in ſuſpition and gealoſie, a little beyonde ſtony Stratford left and forſooke priuily their Captayne Robert Brakenbury, and by wandering by night, and in maner by vnknowne pathes and vncertayne wayes ſearchyng, at the laſt came to the Erle Henry. Dyuers other noble perſonages, which inwardly hated king Richarde worſe then a Toade or a Serpent, did likewiſe reſorte to hym with all their power & ſtrength. There happened in this progreſſion to the Erle of Richemonde a ſtraunge chaunce worthy to be noted: for albeit that he was a man of haute and valyaunt courage, and that his army encreaſed, and daylie more and more he wared mightier and ſtronger, yet he was not a little afeard, becauſe he in no wiſe coulde be aſſured of hys father in lawe Thomas Lorde Stanley, which for feare of the deſtruction of the Lorde Straunge his ſonne (as you haue heard) as yet enclyned to neyther partie. For if he had gone to the Erle, and that notefied to king Richard, his ſonne had ſhortly bene executed. Wherefore he accompanyed with twentie lyght horſemen lyngered in his iourney, as a man muſing and ymagyning what was beſt to be done. And the more to aggrauate his penſiuenelle, it was ſhewed him that king Richarde was at hande with a ſtrong power and a great armie. Whyle he thus heauily dragged behinde his hoſte, the whole armie came before the towne of Tomworth, and when he for the deepe darkneſſe coulde not perceaue the ſteppes of them that paſſed on before, and had wandered hether and thether, ſeeking after his companie, and yet not once heering any noiſe or whiſpering of them, he turned to a verie little Village, beyng about three myles from hys armie, taking great thought and much fearyng leaſt he ſhould be eſpied, and ſo trapped by king Richards ſtoute watch. There he taryed all night, not once aduenturyng to aſke or demaunde a queſtion of any creature, he being no more amaſed with the ieopardie and perill that was paſſed, then with thys preſent chaunce, ſore feared that it ſhould be a pronoſtication or ſigne of ſome infortunate plague afterwarde to ſucceede. As he was not merp beyng abſent from his armie likewiſe

The nexte morning earely in the dawning of the daye he returned, and by the conduyte of good fortune espyed and came to his armie, excusing himselfe, not to haue gone oute of the waye by ignorannce, but for a pollecie deuysed for the nonce he went from hys Campe to receyue some glad message from certayne of his priuie friendes and secrete alyes. Thys excuse made, he priuilie departed agayne from hys hoste to the towne of Aderstone, where the Lorde Stanley and Syr William hys brother with their bandes were abidyng. There the Erle came first to his fatherinlaw, in a litle close, where he saluted him, and Sir William his brother, and after diuers and many friendly embracings, eche reioyced of the state of other, and sodainly were surprised with great ioy, comfort, & hope of fortunate successe in al their affaires, and doyngs. Afterwarde they consulted together how to geue battayle to king Richarde if he woulde abide, whome they knewe not to be farre off with an houge army. In the euening of the same day, sir John Sauage, Sir Brian Sanforde, Sir Simon Digby, and many other, leuyng king Richarde, turned and came to the part of the Erle of Richmonde, with an elect company of men. Which refusall of king Richardes parte, by men of such experience, did augment and encrease both the good hope and the puissaunce of the Erle of Richmonde.

In the meane season, kyng Richarde (which was appointed nowe to finishe hys labour by the verie deuine iustice and prouidence of God, which called him to condigne punishment for his mischieuous desertes) marched to a place meete for two battayles to encounter by a Village called Bosworth, not farre from Leycester, and there he pitched hys fielde, refreshed hys souldyours and toke his rest. The same went that he had the same night a dreadfull and a terrible dreame, for it seemed to him beyng a sleepe that he sawe dyuers ymages like terrible Deuils which pulled and haled him, not suffering him to take any quiet or rest. The which straunge vision not so sodainly strake his hart with a sodaine feare, but it stuffed his head and troubled his minde with many dreadfull and busie imaginations. For incontinent after, his hart being almost damped, he pronosticated before the doubtfull chaunce of the battayle to come, not vsing the cheerefulnesse and mirth of minde, and of countenaunce as he was accustomed to doe before he came towarde the battayle. And least that it might be suspected that he was abashed for feare of his enemies, and for that cause looked so pitteously, he recyted and declared to his familier friends in the morning his wonderfull vision and terrible dreame. But I thinke this was no dreame, but a punction and prick of hys sinnefull conscience, for the conscience is so much more charged and aggrauate as the offence is greater and more heynous in degree.

The dreame of king Richard the thirde.

Now to returne agayne to our purpose, the next day after king Richard beyng furnished with men and all abilliments of warre, bringing all his men out of their campe into the playne, ordered hys forewarde in a marueilous length, in which he appointed both horsemen and footemen to the entent to imprint in the hartes of them that looked a farre off, a sodayne terror and deadly feare, for the great multitude of the armed Souldiours: and in the fore front he placed the archers like a strong fortified trench or Bulwarke:

ouer thys battayle was Cappytaine John Duke of Norfolke with whome was Thomas Erle of Surrey hys sonne. After this long vantgard folowed king Rycharde hymselfe, wyth a strong company of chosen and approoued men of warre, hauing horsemen for wynges on both the sides of hys battaile.

After the Erle of Richemond was departed from the communication of hys friendes as you haue heard before, he began to be of a better stomack and of a more valyaunt courage, and with all diligence pitched his field iust by the campe of his enemies, and there he lodged that night. In the morning betime he caused his men to put on their armure and apparell themselues readie to fight and geue battayl, and sent to the Lord Stanley (which was now come with his band into a place indifferently betwene both the armies) requiring him with his men to approche nere to his armie and to help to set the Souldiours in arraye, he aunswered that the Erle should set his awne men in a good order of battail while he would array his company, and come to him in time conuenient. Which answere was made otherwise then the Erle thought or would haue iudged, considering the opportunitie of the tyme, and the wayght of the businesse, and although he was therewithall a little vexed, & began somwhat to hang the lip, yet he without any time delaying compelled by necessitie, after thys maner instructed and ordred hys men. He made hys forewarde somwhat single and slender, according to the small number of his people. In the frount he placed the archers, of whome he made Capitayne John Erle of Oxforde: to the right wyng of the battayle he appointed Sir Gylbert Talbot to be the leader: to the left wing he assigned Sir John Sauage, and he with the ayde of the Lorde Stanley accompanied with the Erle of Penbroke hauing a good companie of horsemen, and a small number of fotemen: For al his whole number exceded not fiue thousand men, beside the power of the Stanleys, whereof thyee thousand were in the field vnder the Standard of Sir Wylliam Stanley: The kings number was double as much and more. When both these armies were thus ordered, and al men redie to set forward, king Richard called his Chiefetaines togeather and to them sayde.

Most faythfull and assured felowes and friends, although in the adoption and obteyning of the Garlande, I being seduced and prouoked by sinister counsayle dyd commit a naughty and detestable act. Yet I haue with straite penaunce and salt teares (as I trust) clerely purged the same offence, which abhominable crime I require you of friendship as cleerely to forget, as I daylie doe remember to lament the same. If you will nowe diligently call to remembraunce in what ease and perplexitie we stande, and in what doubtfull perill we be in: Then, I with you, and you with me, must needes this day take labor & pain to kepe and defend with force, that preheminence and possession which by your prudent deuises I haue gotten and obteyned. I doubt not but you knowe, how the Deuill, continuall enemie to humaine nature, disturber of concorde and sower of sedition, hath entred into the hart of an vnknowne Welshman, (whose father I neuer knewe nor him personally saw) excityng him to aspire and couet our realme, crowne, and dignity, and thereof clerely to depriue and spoyle vs and our posteritie: ye see farther how a companie of traytors, theeues, outlawes, and runnagates of our awne nation be ayders and partakers of his fact and enterprise, redie at hande to

ouercome and oppreſſe vs: You ſee alſo what a number of beggerly Britons and faynt harted Frenchmen be with him arriued to deſtroy vs, our wyues and children. Which imminent miſchiefes and apparaunt inconueniences, if we will withſtande and refell, we muſt liue together like brethren, fight together lyke Lyons, and feare not to die together lyke men. And if you conſider and wiſely ponder all things in your minde, you ſhall perceyue that we haue manifeſt cauſes, and apparaunt tokens of triumph and victorie. And to begin with the Erle of Richmond Capitayne of thys rebellion, he is a Welſhe milkſop, a man of ſmall courage and of leſſe experience in martiall actes and feates of warre, brought vp by my brothers meanes and mine lyke a Captiue in a cloſe cage in the Court of Fraunces Duke of Britayne, and neuer ſawe armie, nor was exerciſed in marciall affaires, by reaſon whereof he neyther can nor is able of hys awne wyt or experience to guyde or rule an hoſte. For in the wyt and pollecie of the Capitayne, conſiſteth the chiefe adeption of the victorie and ouerthrowe of the enemies: wherfore aduaunce forth your ſtandards, and euery one geue but one ſure ſtroke, and ſurely the tourney is ours. And as for me, I aſſure you, this day I will triumph by victorie, or ſuffer death for immortall fame.

This exhortacion encouraged al ſuch as fauoured him, but ſuch as were preſent more for dreade then loue, kiſſed them openly, whome they inwardelye hated, other ſware outwardely to take part with ſuch, whoſe death they ſecretlye compaſſed, and inwardely imagined, other promiſed to inuade the kings enemies, which fled and fought with fierce courage againſt the king: other ſtoode ſtill and loked on, entendyng to take parte wyth the victors, and ouercommers. So was his people to him vnſure and vnfaythfull at his ende, as he was to his Nephewes vntrue and vnnaturall in his beginning.

When the Erle of Richmond knew by his foreriders that the king was ſo nere embattayled, he rode about his army, from ranke to ranke, from wing to wyng, geuyng comfortable wordes to all men, and that finiſhed (beyng armed at all peces ſauyng his helmet) mounted on a litle hill ſo that all his people might ſee and beholde him perfitly, to there great reioyſing. For he was a man of no great ſtature, his countenaunce was cherefull and couragious, his heare yelow, like the burniſhed golde, his eies gray, ſhinyng, and quicke, prompte and readie in aunſwering, but of ſuch ſobrietie, that it could neuer be iudged whether he were more dull then quicke in ſpeaking (ſuch was his temperaunce.) And when he had ouer loked his armie ouer euery ſide, he paweſed a while, and after with a lowde voyce, and bolde ſpirit ſpake to his companions, theſe or like wordes folowyng.

The oration of king Henry the ſeuenth

If euer God gaue victory to men fighting in a iuſt quarrel? or if he euer ayded ſuch as made warre for the welth, and tuition of there owne naturall countrey? or if he euer ſuccoured them which aduentured there lyues for the reliefe of innocentes, ſuppreſſing of malefactors, and apparaunt offenders? No doubt my felowes, and friendes, but he of his bountyfull goodneſſe wyll this day ſend vs triumphaunt victory, and a luckey iorney ouer our prowde enemies, and arrogant aduerſaries: for if you remember, and conſider the very cauſe of our iuſt quarell, you ſhall apparauntly perceiue the ſame to be true, godly, and vertuous. In the which I doubt not but God wil rather aide vs (ye and fight for vs) then ſee vs vanquiſhed and ouercome, by ſuch as neither ther feare him, nor his lawes, nor yet regarde iustice or honestie. Our cause is so iust that no enterprise can be of more vertue, both by the lawes diuine & ciuile, for what can be a more honest, goodly, or godly quarell then to fight against a Captayne, beyng an homicide, and a murderer of his owne blood, and progenie? an extreme destroyer of his nobilitie, and to his and our countrey, and the poore subiectes of the same, a deadlye mayle, a fyre brande, and a burden vntollerable? beside him, consider who be of his bande and company such as by murther and vntruth committed against there owne kinne and lynage, ye against their Prince and soueraigne Lorde haue disherited mee, and you, and wrongfully deteyne and vsurpe our lawfull patrimony, and lineal inheritaunce: For he that calleth himselfe kyng, keepeth from me the Crowne and regiment of this noble realme and countrey, contrary to all iustice and equitie. Moreouer I assure you, that there be ponder in that great battayle, men brought thither for feare, and not for loue, souldiours by force compelled, & not with good will assembled: persons which desire rather the destruction, then saluacion of their maister and Capitayne: And finally a multitude whereof the most part will be our friendes, and the least part our enemyes. For truely I doubt which is greater, the malice of the souldiours towarde there captaine, or the feare of him conceiued of his people: for surely this rule is infallible, that as yll men dayly couet to destroy the good, so God appointeth the good to confounde the ill, and of all worldly goods the greatest is, to suppresse tirauntes, and relieue innocents, whereof the one is euer as much hated, as the other is beloued. If this be true (as clarkes preache) who will spare ponder tirant, Richard Duke of Goceſter vntruly calling himself king, considering that he hath violated, and broken both the lawe of God and man, what vertue is in him, which was the confusion of his brother, and murtherer of his Nephewes? what mercy is in him that sleyeth his trustie friendes, aswell as his extreme enemies? who can haue confidence in him, which putteth diffidence in all men? Yf you haue not red, I haue heard clerkes saye, that Tarquine the prowde for the vice of the body lost the kingdom of Rome, & the name of Tarquine banniſhed the Citie for euer: yet was not his fault so detestable as the fact of cruell Nero, which slew hys owne mother, & opened her entrayles to beholde the place of his conception. Beholde ponder Richard which is both Tarquine and Nero: Ye a tyrant more then Nero, for he hath not only murdered his nephew being his king & souereigne lord, bastarded his noble brethren, and defamed the wombe of his vertuous and womanly mother, but also compaſſed all the meanes and waies that he could inuent how to deflowre, and carnally to knowe his owne Neece vnder the pretence of a cloked matrimonye, which Ladye I haue swoorne, and promised to take to my make and wife, as you all knowe and beleue. If this cause be not iuſt, and this quarell Godly, let God the geuer of victory iudge & determine. Therefore let all feare be set a side, and like swoorne brethren let vs ioyne in one, for this daye shall be the ende of our trauaile and the gayne of our labor eyther by honorable death, or famous victory: And as I trust, the battayle shall not be so sowre, as the profit shall be sweete. Remember the victory is not gotten with the multitude of men, but with the courages of hartes & baliantneſſe of mindes. The ſmaller that our number is, the more glory is to vs if we vanquiſh, if we be ouer come, yet no laude is to be attributed to the victors, rors, consideryng that tenne men fought against one. And this one thing I assure you, that in so iust and good a cause, and so notable a quarrell, you shall fynde me this day, rather a dead carion vppon the colde grounde, then a free prisoner on a carpet in a Ladies chamber. Let vs therefore fight like men. And now auaunce forward true men against traitors, pitiful persons against murtherers, true inheritors against vsurpers, the scourges of God against tirauntes, display my banner with a good courage, march forth, and begin the battaile like hardye conquerers, the battaile is at hande, and the victory approcheth, and if we shamefully recule or cowardlye flie, we, and all oure sequele be destroyed, and dishonored for euer. This is the day of gayne, & this is the time of losse, get this day victory, and be conquerers, and lese this daies battaile, and be villaines, and therefore in the name of God and saint George let euery man couragiously auaunce forth his standard.

These cherefull wordes he set forth with such gesture of his bodye and smyling countenaunce, as though all readie he had vanquished his enemyes, and gotten the spoyle.

The battaile betwene king Richard and king Henrie the seuenth.

He had scantly finished his saiyng, but the one armie espied the other, Lorde howe hastily the Souldiours buckeled their Helmes, howe quicklye the Archers bent their Bowes, and frushed their feathers, howe redily the Byllmen shooke their Billes, and proued their staues, redie to approch and ioyne when the terrible Trompet should sound the bloodie blast to victorie or death. Betwene both armies there was a great marresse which the Erle of Richemond left on his right hande, for this entent that it should be on that side a defence for his part, and in so doyng he had the Sunne at his back and in the faces of his enemies. When king Richard sawe the Erles companie was passed the marresse, he commaunded with all hast to set vpon them, then the Trompettes blewe, and the Souldiours showted, and the kinges Archers couragiously let flie their arrowes, the Erles Bowmen stood not still, but payed them home againe. The terrible shotte once passed, the armies ioyned, and came to hande strokes, where neither Sworde nor Bill was spared, at which encounter the Lorde Stanley ioyned with the Erle. The Erle of Orforde in the meane season fearyng least while his companie was fightyng, they shoulde be compassed and circumuented with the multitude of his enemyes, gaue commaundement in euerie ranke that no man shoulde be so hardy as go aboue ten foote from the Standard, which cõmaundement once knowen, they knit themselues together, & ceased a little from fighting: the aduersaries sodainly abashed at the matter, and mistrustyng some fraude or deceyt, began also to pause and left strikyng, and not agaynst the willes of many which had liefer haue had the king destroyed then saued, and therefore they fought very faintly or stoode still. The Erle of Orforde bringyng all his bend together on the one part, set on his enemies freshely againe, the aduersaries perceiuyng that, placed their men slender and thin before, and thicke and brode behinde, beginnyng againe hardly the battaile. While the two forewardes thus mortally fought, eche entendyng to banquishe and conuince the other, king Richarde was admonished by his espialles, that the Erle of Richemond accompanied with a small number of men of Armes was not farre of, and as he approched and marched toward him, he perfectly knewe his personage by certaine demonstrations and tokens which he had learned and knowen of other. And beyng inflamed with yre, and bered with outragious malice, he put his Spurres to his horse and rode out of the syde of the range of his battaile, leauyng the auauntgardes fightyng, and like a hungrie Lyon ranne with speare in rest towarde hym. The Erle of Richemonde perceaued well the king furiously comming towarde hym, and because the whole hope of hys welth and purpose was to be determined by battayle, he gladly profered to encounter wyth hym bodye to bodye, and man to man. King Richarde set on so sharpely at the first brunt, that he ouerthrew the Erles standard bearer, & slue sir William Brandon his standard bearer, (which was father to sir Charles Brandon by king Henry the eight created Duke of Suffolke) and matched hande to hande with Sir John Cheiney, a man of great force and strength which would haue resisted him, but the said John was by him manfully ouerthrowne, and so he makyng open passage by dint of Sworde as he went forwarde, the Erle of Richmond withstoode his violence & kept him at the swordes point without aduantage longer then his companions eyther thought or iudged, which beyng almost in dispaire of victory, were sodeinly recomforted by Sir William Stanley, which came to succors with three. M. tall men, at which very instant king Richardes men were driuen back & fled, and he himself manfully fighting in the middle of his enemies was slaine and brought to his death as he worthely had deserued.

and

Sir William Brandon father to Charles Duke of Suffolke.

In the meane season, the Erle of Orforde with the ayde of the Lorde Stanley, after no long fight discõfited the forewarde of king Richard, whereof a great number were slaine in the chase and flight, but the greatest number which (compelled by feare of the king, & not of their mere voluntary motion) came to the field, gaue neuer a stroke, & hauyng no harme nor domage, safely departed, which came not thether in hope to see the king prosper & preuail, but to here that he should be shamefully confounded & brought to ruyne.

In this battaile dyed fewe aboue the number of a thousande persons: And of the Nobilitie were slaine John Duke of Norffolke, which was warned by diuers to refraine from the fielde, insomuch that the night before he should set forward toward the king, one wrote on his gate.

Iacke of Norffolke be not to bolde,
For Dickon thy maister is bought and solde.

Yet all this notwithstandyng he regarded more his othe, his honor, and promise made to king Richard, like a Gentleman, and a faythfull subiect to his Prince, absented not himselfe from his maister, but as he faithfully liued vnder him, so he manfully died with him to his great fame and lawde. There were slain beside him, Water Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Robert Brakenbury Lieutenaunt of the Tower, and not manye Gentlemen mo. Sir William Catesby learned in the lawes of the realme, and one of the chiefe Counsaylors to the late king, with diuers other were two dayes after behedded at Leycester. Amongest them that ranne away, were Sir Fraunces Vicount Louel, and Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother which tooke Sanctuary in Saint Johns at Glocester. Of captiues and prisoners there was a great number, for after the death of king Richard was knowen and published, euery man in maner vnarmyng himselfe, and castyng away his abilimentes of warre, mekely submitted themselues to the obeysaunce and rule of the Erle of Richemond: of the which the moze part had gladly so done in the beginnyng if they might haue conueniently escaped from king Richardes espialles, which hauyng as cleere eyes as Lynx, and as open eares as Midas ranged and searched in euery quarter. Amongest these was Henrie the fourth Erle of Nozthumberland, which whether it was by the commaundement of king Richard puttyng diffidence in him, oz he did it foz the loue and fauour that he bare vnto the Erle, stoode still with a great companie and intermitted not in the battaile, whiche was incontinently receyued into fauour and made of the Counsaile. But Thomas Hayward Erle of Surrey which submitted himselfe there, was not taken to grace, because his father was chiefe Counsaylour, and hee greatly familiar with king Richarde, but committed to the Tower of London, where he long remayned, and in conclusion deliuered, and foz his truth and fidelitie after pzomoted to high honozs, offices, and dignities. On the Erle of Richemondes part were slaine scarce one hundzeth persons, amongest whome the pzincipall was Sir William Bzandon his Standard bearer.

This battaile was fought at Bosworth in Leycester shire the. xxij. day of August, the whole conflict endured little aboue two houres. King Richard as the same went, might haue scaped and gotten sauegarde by flyng: Foz when they which were next about his person sawe and perceyued at the first ioyning of the battaile the Souldiours faintly and nothyng couragiously to set on their enemies, and not onely that, but also that some withdzewe themselues pziuily out of the pzease and departed. They began to suspect fraude, and to smell treason, and not onely exhozted but determinately aduised him to saue himselfe by flight: and when the losse of the battaile was imminent and apparaunt, they bzought to him a swift and a light hozse to conuey him away. He which was not ignozaunt of the grudge and ill will that the common people bare towarde him, castyng away all hope of fozтunate successe and happy chaunce to come, aunswered (as men say) that on that day he would make an ende of all battayles, oz else there finishe his life. Such a great audacity, and such a stoute stomacke reigned in his bodie, foz surely he knewe that to be the day in the which it should be decided & determined, whether he should peaceably obteyne and enioy his kingdome during his life, oz else vtterly fozgo and be depziued of the same. And so this miser at the same verie poynt had like chaunce and foztune, as happeneth to suche which in place of ryght iustice, and honestie, folowyng their sensuall appetite, loue, vse, and embzace, mischiefe, tirannie, and vnthziftinesse. Surely these be examples of moze vehemencie, then mans tongue can expzesse, to feare and astonne such euill persons as will not liue one houre vacant from doyng and exercisyng crueltie, mischiefe, oz outragious liuyng.

When the Erle had thus obteyned victozy, and slaine his mozтal enemy, he kneeled downe & rendzed to almighty God his heartie thanks. And afterward beyng replenished with incomparable gladnesse, ascended vp to the top of a little Mountaine, where he not onely pzaised & lauded his valiaunt souldiours, but also gaue vnto them his hartie thankes, with pzomise of recompence foz their fidelitie and valiaunt factes, willyng and commaundyng all the hurt and woumded persons to be cured, and the dead carcasses to be deliuered to the sepulture. Then the people reioyced & clapped their hands cryng vp to heauen, king Henry, king Henry. When the lord Stanley ſaw the good will and gladneſſe of the people, he toke the Crowne of king Richard which was founde amongeſt the ſpoyle in the field, and ſet it on the Erles head, as though he had bene elected king by the voyce of the people, as in auncient tymes paſt in diuers realmes it hath bene accuſtomed, and this was the firſt ſigne and token of hys good luck and felicity. I muſt put you here in remembraunce howe that king Richard puttyng ſome diffidence in the Lord Stanley, which had with hym as an hoſtage the Lord Straunge his eldeſt ſonne which Lord Stanley as you haue heard before, ioyned not at the firſt with his ſonne in lawes armie, for feare that king Richard would haue ſlaine the Lorde Straunge his heyre. When king Richard was come to Boſworth, he ſent a Purſeuant to the Lorde Stanley, commaundyng him to aduaunce forward with his companie, and to come to his preſence, which thing if he refuſed to do, he ſware by Chriſtes paſſion that he would ſtrike off his ſonnes hed before he dyned. The Lorde Stanley aunſwered the Purſiuant that if the king did ſo, he had more ſonnes aliue, and as to come to him he was not then ſo determined: When king Richard heard this aunſwere he commaunded the Lorde Straunge incontinent to be behedded, which was at that very ſame ſeaſon when both the armies had fight eche of other. The Counſaylors of king Richard pondering the tyme and cauſe, knowyng alſo the Lorde Straunge to be innocent of his fathers offence, perſwaded the king that it was nowe tyme to fight and not tyme to execution, aduiſyng him to kepe the Lorde Straunge as a priſoner till the battaile were ended, and then at leyſure his pleaſure might be accomplished. So as God would king Richarde brake his holy othe, and the Lorde was deliuered to the kepers of the kings Tentes to be kept as a priſoner, which when the fielde was done and theyr maiſter ſlaine, and proclamation made to knowe where the childe was, they ſubmitted themſelues as priſoners to the Lord Straunge, he gently receiued them and brought them to the newe proclaymed king, where of him and of his father he was receyued with great ioy and gladneſſe. After this, the whole campe remoued with bagge and baggage, and the ſame night in the Euening king Henrye with great pompe came to the Towne of Leyceſter. Where aſwell for the refreſhyng of his people and ſouldiours, as for preparyng all thinges neceſſary for his iourney toward London, he reſted and repoſed himſelfe two dayes. In the meane ſeaſon, the dead corps of king Richard was as ſhamefully caryed to the towne of Leyceſter, as he gorgeouſly the day before with pompe and pride departed out of the ſame towne. For his bodie was naked and diſpoyled to the ſkinne, and nothing left about him not ſo much as a clowte to couer his priuie members, and was truſſed behinde a Purſyuant of armes called Blaunche Senglier or white Boze, like a Hogge or a Calfe, the head and armes hangyng on the one ſyde of the horſe, and the legs on the other ſyde, and all beſprinckled with mire and blood, was brought to the gray Friers Church within the towne, and there lay like a miſerable ſpectacle: but ſurely conſiderynge his miſchieuous actes and vngracious doynges, men may worthely wonder at ſuch a captiue, and in the ſayde Church he was with no leſſe funerall pompe, and ſolemnitie enterred, then he would to be done at the buriyng of his innocent Nepheues, whom he cauſed cruelly to be murthered, and vnnaturally to be quelled.

King Henry the ſeuenth crowned in the field.

The ſhamefull caryng of the dead corps of king Richard.

When

when his death was knowen, fewe lamented, and many reioyſed, the proude braggyng whyte Boze (which was his badge) was violently raſed and plucked downe from euery ſigne and place where it might be eſpyed, ſo vile was his lyfe, that men wiſhed the memozie of him to be buryed with hys carren cozps: He reigned two yeres, two monethes, and one day.

Thus ended this Prince his mozтall life with infampe and diſhonour, which neuer preferred fame oz honeſtie, befoze ambicion, tirannie, and miſchiefe. And if he had continued ſtill Protectoz, and ſuffered his nephewes to haue liued and reigned, no doubt but the Realme had proſpered, and he much prayſed and beloued, as he is now abhozred and deſpyſed, but to God which knewe his inwarde thoughtes at the houre of hys death, I remit the puniſhment of his offences committed in his life.

Henry the ſeuenth.

Aſone as the Erle of Richemond returned from the field afozeſayde, and was entred into the towne of Leyceſter, he was there by ſounde of Trumpets proclaymed king of thys realme, by the name of king Henry the ſeuenth, which was the .xxij. day of Auguſt. 1485.

Now after that king Henry had not onlye obteyned the triumphant battayle afozeſayde agaynſt hys malicious enemie kyng Rycharde, but alſo by that glozious victozie he gatte the Diademe and poſſeſſion of the ſtate royall and pzincely pzeheminence of this famous Empire and renewmed kingdome as afozeſayde. He hauing both the ingenious fozecaſt of the ſubtill Serpent, and alſo fearing the burning fyze lyke an infant that is a little ſinged with a ſmall flame: did firſt befoze his departure from Leyceſter ſend Sir Robert Wylloughby knight to the maner of Sherhutton in the Countie of Yozke, foz Edward Plantagenet Erle of Warwike, ſonne and heire to Geozge Duke of Clarence then being of the age of .xv. yeres, whom king Richarde had kept there as a priſoner during the tyme of his vſurped reigne, and ſurely the king was not afeard without a cauſe, foz he muche miſtruſted leaſt by this yong man, ſome euill diſpoſed and enuious perſons of hys glozie and aduaunсement, might inuent ſome newe occaſion of remuyng of battayle agaynſt him, which beyng euen from his infancie with many encombzances and troubles vexed & endaungered, deſired nothing moze hartily then nowe to lyue in peace and quietneſſe. Sir Robert Willoughby according to his commiſſion receaued of the Conſtable of the Caſtell, the Erle Edwarde, and hym conueyed to London, where the yongling bozne to perpetuall calamitie was incontynent in the Tower of London put vnder ſafe and ſure cuſtodie. There was beſide him in the ſame Caſtell of Sherphutton the Lady Elizabeth eldeſt daughter to king Edward, whome king Rycharde fooliſhly phantaſiyng and deuiliſhly dotyng did entende to marry as you before haue heard, but the Damoſell did not only diſagree and refuſe that matrimony, but abhorred and deteſted greatly his abhominable deſire. At the which moſt importunate and deteſtable concupiſcence, the common people of the realme ſo much grudged and maligned that they did not onely attribute the fault and cryme to the king, but much more cryed out and blamed hys priuie Counſaylors which did not diſſent, but conſent to ſo pernitious a counſayle, and ſo ſhamefull a concluſion: But God of his onely goodneſſe preſerued the chriſtian minde of that vertuous and good Virgyn, and from that ſhamefull and filthie act, did graciouſly protect and defend her: The which Lady not long after accompanied with a great number as wel of noble men as honorable Matrons, was with good ſpede conueyed to London and brought to her mother.

King Henry entreth into London.

In the meane ſeaſon, the king remoued forward by iorneys towarde London, and euen as he paſſed, the common people on euerye ſide of the wayes aſſembled in great numbers, and with great ioy clapped their hands and ſhowted, cryng king Henry, king Henry. But when he approched nere the Citie, the Maior, the Senate, and the Magiſtrates of the ſame beyng all clothed in Violet, met him at Shordiche, and not onely ſaluted and welcomed hym with one voyce in generall, but euery perſon particularly preaſed and aduaunced himſelfe, gladly to touch and kiſſe that victorious handes which had ouercome ſo monſtruous and cruell a tyraunt, geuing laudes and prayſings to almyghtie God, and rendering immortall thankes to hym, by whoſe meane & induſtrie the cõmon welth of the realme was preſerued from final deſtruction & perpetuall calamitie, & the authors of the miſchiefe rooted vp and plucked away. And with great pompe and triumph he road thorough the Citie to the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule, where he offred hys three Standardes. In the one was the ymage of Saint George, in the ſecond was a red fierie Dragon, beaten vpon whyte and greene Sarcenet, the thirde was of yelowe Tarterne, in the which was paynted a dunne Cowe. After hys prayers ſayde and Te deum ſong, he departed to the Byſhops Palace and there ſoiourned a ſeaſon, during which time, playes, paſtymes and pleaſures, were ſhewed in euery part of the Citie.

When theſe ſolempnities and geuing of thanks were done and paſſed: according as other kings had bene accuſtomed, he congregated together the ſage Counſaylors of hys realme: in which counſayle lyke a Prince of iuſt fayth and true of promiſe, deteſtyng all inteſtine and ciuill hoſtilitie, appointed a daye to ioyne in matrimonye the Ladye Elizabeth heyre of the houſe of Yorke, with his noble perſonage heyre to the lyne of Lancaſter: which thing not onely reioyſed and comforted the hartes of the nobles and gentlemen of the realme, but alſo gayned the fauour and good myndes of all the common people, much extolling and prayſing the kings conſtaunt fidelitie, and his pollitique deuiſe, thinking ſurely that the daye was now come that the ſeede of ſeditious factions, and the fountayne of ciuill diſſention ſhould be ſtopped, banniſhed, and cleerely extinguiſhed.

After thys, he wyth great pompe was conueyed to Weſtminſter, and there there the thirtie daye of October was wyth all ceremonies accustomed, annoynted and crowned kyng by the whole assent as well of the commons as of the Nobilitie, and was named king Henry the seuenth of that name, Frederike the thirde then beyng Emperour of Almayne, Maximilian hys sonne then beyng newely elected king of Romaynes, Charles the eyght reygning ouer the French nation, and James the thirde rulyng the realme of Scotlande. Which kingdome he obteyned and enioyed as a thing by God elected and prouided, & by hys especiall fauour and gracious aspect compassed and achecued. In so much that men commonly repoyted that. 797. yeres passed, it was by a heauenly voyce reuealed to Cadwalader last king of Bryttons that his stock and progeny should reigne in thys land and beare dominyon agayne: Wherevpon most men were perswaded in their awne opinion that by this heauenly voyce he was prouided and ordeyned long before to enioy and obteyne this kingdome, which thing king Henry the first did also shew before, as you haue heard declared. Wherefore he beyng by right and iust tytle of temporall inheritaunce, and by the prouision of diuine purueyaunce thus crowned and proclaymed king: First of all vsyng the antique example of the Athenians, which is to pardon and put out of memorie all crymes and offences before tyme agaynst hym or hys lawes perpetrated or committed, he called hys high court of Parliament at Westmynster the seuenth day of Nouember for the stablyshing of all things as well concerning the preseruation and mayntenaunce of hys royall person, as the admynistration of iustice and preferment of the common welth of thys realme and dominion, in the which he caused to be proclaymed that all men were pardoned acquyted and cleerely discharged of all offences, paynes of deathe and executions, and should be restored to their landes and moueable goodes, which would submit themselues to his clemencie & by othe be bound truely to serue and obey him as their souereigne Lord, & who so would be obstinate and refuse to returne to hys part, should be accepted and taken as a publike enemy to him and his Countrey. By reason of which proclamation, a great number that came out of dyuers Sanctuaries and priuileged places obteyned grace, forgettyng clerely the diuersitie of factions and voyce of partaking. After this he began to remember his especiall friends and fautors, of whom some he aduaunced to honour and dignity, and some he enriched with possessions and goodes, euery man according to his desert and merite. And to begin, Jasper his Uncle Erle of Penbrooke, he created Duke of Bedforde, Thomas Lorde Stanley he promoted to the Erle of Darby, and the Lorde Chandew of Britayne his especiall friend he made Erle of Bathe, Syr Gyles Dawbeny was made Lorde Dawbeny, syr Robert Willoughby was made Lorde Brooke which be in their degree Barons and Peeres of the realme. And Edwarde Stafford eldest sonne to Henry late Duke of Buckyngham, he restored to his name, dignitie and possessions, which king Richard did confiscate and attainted. Beside thys, in this Parliament was this notable act assented to and concluded as followeth.

King Henry the seuenth crowned king

James the thirde king of Scottes.

A parliamẽt holden at Westminster and a general pardõ graunted.

To the pleasure of Almightie God, vvelth, prosperitie and suretie of this Realme of Englande, and to the singuler comfort of all the kings subiectes of the same, in auoyding all ambiguyties and questions: Be it ordeyned, establyshed and enacted by this present Parlyament, that the inheritaunce of the Crovvne of thys realme of Englande, and alſo of Fraunce, vvith all the preheminence and dignity royall to the ſame appertayning, and all other ſeigniories to the king belongyng beyond the ſea, vvyth the appurtenaunces thereto in any vviſe due or ppertayning, ſhall reſt, remayne and abyde in the moſt royall perſon of our novve ſouereigne Lorde king Henry the ſeuenth, and in the heyres of hys body lavvfully commyng, perpetually vvith the grace of God ſo to endure, and in none other.

And beſide this act, all attaynders of this king, enacted by king Edward and king Richarde were adnichilated, and the recorde of the ſame adiudged to be defaced and put out of memory, and all perſons attaynted for his cauſe, and occaſion, were reſtored to their goodes, landes, and poſſeſſions. And in concluſion, diuerſe of the actes made in the time of king Edwarde, and kyng Richarde were adnulled and reuoked and other more expedient for the vtilitie of the common wealth were made and concluded. When all things neceſſary were diſcretly ordered and the parliament for the time diſſolued, the king thought it not neceſſarye to put in obliuion his friendes and hoſtages beyng beyonde the ſea: wherefore with al diligence he redemed the Marques Dorcet, and Sir John Bourchier whome he hadde left as pledges at Paris for money there before borowed. And ſent alſo into Flaunders for John Morton Biſhop of Elye.

Theſe actes perfourmed, he ſtabliſhed in his houſe a graue counſayle of wyſe and pollitique men, by whoſe iudgement, order, and determination, the people might be gouerned according to iuſtice and equitie, and that all cauſes might be finiſhed and ended there, without great bearing or expence in long ſuit. And for hearing and decidyng theſe cauſes iuſtly and ſpedilye, he ſware of his counſaile diuers noble and diſcrete perſons, which for their pollicy, wit, and ſinguler grauitie, were highly eſtemed and renoumed, whoſe names folowe, Jaſpar Duke of Bedforde, John Erle of Orenforde, Thomas Stanley, Erle of Darby, John Biſhop of Ely, Sir William Stanley, Lord chamberleyn of his houſholde, Sir Robert Willoughby, Lord Brooke, Lord Sturarde of his houſholde, Gyles Lorde Dawbeney, John Lorde Dynham after made Treſorer of Englande, Sir Reignold Bray, Sir John Cheiney, Sir Richarde Guildforde, Sir Richard Tunſtall, Sir Richarde Edgecomb, Sir Thomas Louell, Sir Edmond Powonyngs, Sir John Riſley, with diuerſe other wiſe men, which as the time required he called to his counſaile and ſeruice nowe one, and nowe another.

Counſaylors to king Henrie ſ ſeuenth.

Although by this election of wiſe and graue councellers al things ſemed to be brought to a good and perfect concluſion, yet there lacked a weſt to the harpe, to ſet all the ſtringes in a monacorde and tune, which was the matrymoney to be finiſhed betweene the king, and the Lady Elizabeth, daughter to kyng Edwarde, which like a good Prince according to his othe and promiſe, he did both ſolempniſe and conſummat in briefe time after, that is to ſaye, on the .xviij. day of January. By reaſon of which mariage peace was thought to diſcende out of heauen into Englande, conſidering that the lynes of Lancaſter and Yorke, beyng both noble families equiuolent in riches, fame, and honour, were nowe brought into one knot and conuered together, of whoſe two bodies one heyre might ſucede, which after their time ſhoulde peaceably rule and enioye the whole monarchy and realme of Englande.

The mariage of king Henry with the Ladie Elizabeth daughter of king Edward the fourth.

reduced to a good poynt and ſet in a ſure ſtay. Kyng Henry beyng made wiſe and expert with troubles and miſchiefes before paſt, remembred that it was wiſedome to feare and prouide for the crafty wyles and lurkyng traps of hys ſecret enemies, remembryng all men for the moſt part embrued and exerciſed in planting of diuiſion and ſowyng diſſencion, can not lightly leaue their peſtiferous appetite, and ſedicious occupation: Wherefore, for the ſauegarde and preſeruacion of his owne body, he conſtituted and ordayned a certayne number aſwell of good archers as of diuers other perſons beyng hardye, ſtrong and of agilitie to geue dayly attendaunce on his body, whome he named Yomen of the crowne, which preſident men thought that he learned of ỹ frenche kyng when he was in Fraunce: For men remembre not anye king of Englande before that tyme which vſed ſuch a furniture of daylye ſouldiours. Yet foraſmuch as to auoyde and eſchew all doubtfull daungers and perilles vnlooked for, lytle auayleth outwarde warre, except there be a ſure ſtay, and a ſtedfaſt backſtande at home, aſwel for the ſauegarde and ſecuritie, as for the good gouernaunce of ſuch as be left behynde. He therefore ſommoned againe hys great court of parliament, whereto he woulde that there ſhoulde bee elected the moſt prudent and grauous perſons of euery countie, Citie, port, and Borough, and in eſpeciall ſuch as he in al his daungers, calamities, miſeries and tumulteous affaires, vſed, truſted, and fauoured, as partakers, counſelers, and companions both of his wo, and aduerſitie, and alſo of his triumph and glorious victory, whoſe mindes and ſtudies he perfitly knewe to bee fired and ſet in the politique regiment, and prudent gouernaunce of the publique welth of his realme and dominion. Not forgetting, but hauing in freſh memory that he for that cauſe principally was ſo ſore deſired, and inſtantlye called of the Engliſh nacion his naturall countrimen. Eſtemyng it as a chiefe and principall part of hys duetie to ſee his realme, both adourned and beautified wyth good and profitable lawes, and ſtatutes, and alſo to florith in vertuous exerciſes, and good and ciuyll maners, which ſhoulde be an occaſion to cauſe all men to hope, that all thing would continually amend, from euil to good, from good to better, and from better to the beſt. Thys ſure foundacion king Henry layde at the beginning of his raygne, entending theron continually to builde.

The firſt yomen of the crowne now called yomen of the Garde.

A parliament

In this ſame yere a new kynde of ſickneſſe came ſodainely through the whole region, euen after the firſt entring of the kyng into this Ile, which was ſo ſore, ſo paynefull and charp, that the like was neuer heard of, to any mans remembraunce before that tyme. For ſodainely a deadly and bourning ſweate inuaded their bodies and vered their bloud, & wyth a moſt ardent heat infeſted the ſtomacke, and the head greeuouſly: by the tormenting and veracion of which ſickneſſe, men were ſo ſore handled, and ſo painefully pangued, that if they were layed in their bedde, beyng not able to ſuffer the importunate heate, they caſt away the ſheetes and all the clothes lyng on the bed. If they were in their apparell and veſtures, they woulde put of all their garments euen to their ſhirtes. Other were ſo drye that they dranke the colde water to quench their importunate heat & inſatiable thirſt. Other that could or at the leaſt woulde abide the heate and ſtinch (for in deede the ſweate had a great and ſtrong ſauour) cauſed clothes to be layde vpon them aſmuch as they coulde beare, to driue out the ſweate, if it might be. All in maner aſſone as the ſweate tooke them, or within a ſhorte ſpace after yelded vp theyr ghoſt.

ghost. So that of all them that sickned, there was not one amongest an hundreth that escaped: Insomuch, that beside the great number which deceased within the Citie of London, two Maiors, successiuelye dyed of the same disease within eyght dayes and sixe Aldermen. And when any person had fully and completely sweat. xxiiij. houres (for so long did the strength of thys plague holde them) he should be then cleerely delyuered of his disease: Yet not so cleane rid of it, but that he might shortly relaps and fal agayne into the same euill pit, yea againe and twise againe, as many a one in deede did, which after the thirde tyme dyed of the same. At the length by studie of Physitions and experience of the people driuen thereunto by dreadfull necessitie, there was a remedie inuented: For they that survyued, considering the extremitie of the paine in them that diseased, deuised by things mere contrariaunt, to resist and withstand the furious rage of that burnyng furnesse, by luke warme drinke, temperate heat, and measurable clothes. For such persons as relapsed agayne into the flame after the first delyueraunce, obserued diligently and marked such things as did them ease and comfort at their first veration, and vsyng the same for a remedie and Medicine of their payne, adding euer somewhat thereto that was comfortable and wholesome. So that if anye person euer after fell sick agayne, he obseruing the regiment that amongest the people was deuysed could shortly helpe himselfe, and easily temper and auoyde the strength and malice of the sweat. So that after the great losse of many men, they learned a present and a speedie remedie for the same disease and malady, the which is thys: If a man on the day time were plagued with the sweate: then he should straight lye downe with all his clothes and garments, and lye still the whole. xxiiij. houres. If in the night he were taken, then he should not rise out of his bed for the space of. xxiiij. houres, and so cast the clothes that he might in no wise prouoke the sweate, but so lye temperately that the water might distill out softly of the owne accorde, and to abstayne from all meate if he might so long sustayne and suffer hunger, and to take no more drinke neyther hote nor colde, then wyll moderately quench and delay his thirstie appetite. And in this his amending, one point diligently aboue all other is to be obserued and attended, that he neuer put hys hand or foote out of the bed to refreshe or coole himselfe, the which to doe is no lesse payne then short death. So you may playnely see what remedy was by the daylie experience deuised and inuented for thys straunge and vnknowne disease, the which at that time vexed and greeued onely the realme of England in euery towne and Village as it did dyuers tymes after. But lyttere after, it sayled into Flaunders, and after into Germany, where it destroyed people innumerable for lack of knowlege of the English experience.

2 And this yere the great Conduyt in Chepe in London, at the charges and expences of Thomas Ilam Alderman of London, was newlye edified and made. And also this yere the Crosse in Chepe was newly buylded, and towardes the charges thereof, one Thomas Fisher Mercer gaue fiue hundreth Markes.

When all thinges by the king were appeased at London, and that he had set and appointed all his affayres in good order and sure state, as he with him selfe coniectured, he thought it best to make his progresse into the other quarters of his realme, that he might weede, rote out and purge the mindes

of men ſpotted and defiled with the contagious ſmoke of diſſention, and priuie factions, and eſpecially the Countie of Yorke, which were priuie fautors and comforters of the contrary part, and not without a cauſe. For king Richard more loued and regarded the Northrenmen, then any ſubiectes within his whole realme, which thing to king Henry was not vnknowen: Wherfore he the more ſtudyed to kepe them in due obeyſaunce and faythfull obſequie, whome he knewe of long cuſtome to haue borne their heartes and fauourable myndes to his aduerſaries: therefore in the prime time of the yere he tooke his iourney towardes Yorke, and becauſe the feaſt of Eaſter approched, he turned to the Citie of Lincolne, where he tarryed duryng the ſolemnitie of that feaſt: and makyng there his abode, he was certified that the lord Louell, and Humfrey Stafford were departed out of Sanctuary in Colcheſter: but to what place or whether, no man as yet could tell. For which cauſe the king little regardyng the tale, went forth his appoynted iourney to Yorke: And aſſone as he was there receyued and ſetled, it was bruted, and openly ſhewed to the king himſelfe, that Fraunces Lord Louell, was at hand with a ſtrong and mightie power of men, and woulde with all diligence inuade the City: alſo that the forenamed Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas his brother were in Worceſter ſhire, and there had rayſed a great bande of rude and ruſticall people, and had caſt lottes what part ſhoulde aſſault the Gates, what men ſhould ſcale the walles of the Citie of Worceſter, and who ſhould kepe the paſſages for lettyng of reſcues and ayders.

Fraunces Lord Louell.

Humfrey Stafford.
Thomas Stafford.

At the firſt heeryng of this, the king eſtemed it for vaine and vncertain, and therefore was with it but little moued: but after that he was certified by the letters of credence ſent from his friendes, that all was true that was by the common voyce ſpoken & publiſhed, he was afflicted with no ſmall feare. And ſurely not without a cauſe, for he wiſely conſidered that he had neyther a competent armie redie prepared, nor harneſſe, nor weapons, for them that were preſent. And alſo he was nowe in ſuch a doubtfull place, where he neither could nor might conueniently gather an hoſte together, conſideryng that in the ſame Citie, the memorie of king Richard his mortall enemie was yet recent and liuely, and not all forgotten of hys friendes, but becauſe the matter required diligent ſpeede, leaſt that by long tariyng the power of hys aduerſaries by dayly aydes might be encreaſed and multiplied, he commaunded the Duke of Bedford with three thouſand men not ſtrongly armed, to do a great enterpriſe (for their breaſt plates for the moſt part were made of tanned leather) to encounter and ſet vpon them with all haſt and diligence, and made him priuie what he himſelfe entended to do. After this the king gathered together an hoſte in euery place where he might retain them. The Duke ſettyng forward after the faſhion of an eger and fierce Capitaine, came nigh to the Tentes and campe of his enemyes, where he conſulted and communicated his minde with certaine Capitaines and ſage ſouldiours of his companie, by what way he might traine and allure them to peace, without battaile or bloodſheddyng. After which deliberation and aduiſement had, it was decreed that the Heraultes ſhould proclaime openly, that all ſuch ſhould haue grace and pardon that would caſt downe their weapons and harneſſe, and as faythfull Subiectes ſubmit themſelues to their naturall ſouereigne Lorde. The which proclamation auayled and much profited: For the Lord Louell:

Rebellion.

Louell: either for some feare or diffidence that he had in his people and souldiours, or fearyng himselfe on his owne behalfe, fled priuily in a night from his companie, and left them without a head, as a flocke of sheepe without a shepheard, which departure when it was to his armie disclosed, they put off their armure and came directly to the Duke, euery man humbly submittyng himselfe and desiryng pardon for their offences, wholy trustyng in the kings mercie and fauourable goodnesse. So by this politique wisedome and wise meanes of the good Duke, this great rage & fierce route of sturdie and valiant traytors which was prepared agaynst the king & were like to haue bene the slaughter of many a man, were pacified and repressed & brought to good conformitie and obedient subiection. And the Lorde Louell Chiefteine and chiefe leader of this tumult and rebellion, fearyng more perill and daunger, then renoume or fame of chiualrie, neuer tariyng the doubtfull chaunce of battaile, fled in all post haste into Lancashire, and there for a certaine space loytered and lurked with Sir Thomas Broughton knight, which in those quarters bare great swynge, and was there in great aucthoritie. Humfrey Stafford also heeryng of this mischaunce happened to the Lorde Louell, in a great dolor and agonie: and for feare, in like maner fled and tooke Sanctuary in a village called Culnaham, two miles from Abingdon. But because the Sanctuary was not a sufficient defence (as it was proued before the iustices of the kings bench) for traytors, he was taken by force from that place, and brought to the Tower, and from thence conueyed to Tyborne and there put to execution: But his yonger brother Thomas, that was with him, was pardoned and remitted, because he was thought not to haue done it of hys owne will and malicious minde, but thorow the euill counsaile and mischieuous perswasion of his elder brother.

Humfrey Stafforde taken out of of the sanctuarie and executed.

Thomas Stafford pardoned.

After that the king had thus by pollicie of his Counsaile appeased and repressed this tumulteous sedicion which greatly vexed and vnquieted hys spirites, and had reduced to reason and conformitie the rude and bablyng people of the North parties, and in especiall the inhabitaunts of the Countie of Yorke, he returned to London, and shortly after that to Winchester, where Queene Elizabeth his wife was deliuered in the moneth of September, of a fayre Prince named Arthure at his baptisme. Of which name Englishe men no more reioyced then outward nacions and foreyne Princes trembled and quaked, so much was that name to all nations terrible and feareful: And from Winchester he returned backe againe to London.

In this meane tyme, of a small matter and the same altogether beyng false and fayned, there was an open pathe, and an apparant high way made for a greater inconuenience to ensue. The which matter for the subtile inglyng and craftie conueyaunce of the same, no lesse deceptfull, then lidger de meyne in the hand of a Juggler, was to be estemed amongst all wise men at the first a very bolde and ouer presumptuous an act to be attempted: But the tyme well weyed, and considered, it was not so monstruous that it were worthie great wonderyng and admiration, considerying that many persons of late, eyther borne in the wombe of continuall dissention, or nourished with the milke, or suckyng the pappes of ciuill sedicion, could not liue well in rest, and lesse forbeare their vsuall custome of mouyng strife and dayly debate. Among the which vngracious flocke, there was one sir Richarde Simond priest, prieſt, a man of a baſe and obſcure familie, which from his birth delited in fraude and craftie conueiyng, and yet was he well learned, but not ſo well learned as wilye, nor ſo wilye as ingracious. Which Sir Richarde Symond had allected a ſcholer called Lambert Symenell, one of a gentle nature, and pregnaunt wit, to be the organe and conducte by whome he would conuey his falſe feyned enterprice and attempt. The Deuill chiefe maiſter of miſchiefe, put in the wicked minde and venemous brayne of thys moſt pernicious, diſloyall, and trayterous perſon, to commence, and deuiſe howe he might make his childe and Scholer Lambert to bee the right enheritour to the Crowne of Englande, and ſo thereof to make him King, and to promote himſelfe to the chiefe Archebiſhopricke, or ſome highe poteſtate within the realme. The chiefe foundation of his occaſion was (by the which he was the more bolde) that the fame went, and manye men ſurely ſuppoſed King Edwardes children not to be dead, but to be fledde ſecretlye into ſome ſtraunge place, and there to be liuyng, and that Edward Erle of Warwicke ſonne and heyre to the Duke of Clarence, eyther was or ſhoulde be put to death ſhortly. Theſe rumours althoughe they were falſe and vaine, and without all likelihoode of veritie or truth, encouraged this Prieſt much, to thinke and iudge the tyme to bee come that thys Lambert might aſſume and take vppon him the perſonne and name of one of King Edwarde the fourthes Children, and to clayme and make tytle both to the Realme, and Kingdome, hauyng ſure knowlege that neither friendſhip ſhoulde want, nor ayde ſhould lacke: and conſidering that cancard hatred rooted and founded vpon miſchieuous factions and ſeditious deuiſions be ſo perdurable and in maner euerlaſting, that they can neuer be clerely expirpate or digged out of their rotten hartes, but that they will with hande and foote, tooth and naple further if they can their pretenſed enterpriſe. And thys poore prieſt brought into this fooliſhe paradiſe thorough his awne phantaſticall imagination, enformed and taught the childe diligently at Orenforde where he went to Schole, both inſtructing hym wyth princely behauior, cyuile maner and frutefull litterature, declaryng to hym of what high parentage, and of what noble progeny he was lineally diſſended, thus perſwadyng and teachyng hym his leſſon clarkely and craftily for hys purpoſe, that the peop'e hearing the chylde thus rehearſyng hys ſtock ſo ſagely, myght the rather geue credite to hys deceytfull pretence and falſe coulored inuention: Sone after the rumor was blowen abroad that Edward the yong Erle of Warwike was broken out of priſon. And when Syr Symond heard of thys, he now intending thereby to bring his inuented purpoſe to a concluſion, chaunged the childes name of baptiſme, and called him Edward after the name of the yong Erle of Warwike, the which were both of one yeres and of one ſtature, and then he with his pupille ſayled into Irelande, there opening his minde, and declaring his matter to certaine of the Iriſhe nobilitie, whom he knewe by true fame and report to beare but little fauour to king Henry nor his partakers, and hauing othe and promiſe of ayde to hym ſworne and made, he ſhewed them that he had ſaued and preſerued the Duke of Clarence ſonne from death, and had for verie good will brought him into that Countrie and region where he knew that both king Edward and al his ſtock were fauoured and loued aboue all other. This matter was beleued ſtraight of the nobilitie bilitie which so shewed and published this feyned fable and ymagined inggelyng from one to another, tyll at the last it was accompted to be as true as the Gospell without any controuersie. In so much that the Lorde Thomas Gerardyne Chauncelor of all the Countrey defrauded by this illusion vnder the colour of playne truth, receaued him into his Castell, and wyth honor and reuerence him enterteyned as one that descended from the high progeny of the blood royall, and began much to aide and helpe him. First calling together all his friends and louers and such other as were of band or affinity, declaring first to them the comming of thys childe, and after affirming that the crowne and scepter of the realme of right apperteyned to this yong Prince as sole heyre male left of the line of Richard Duke of Yorke: Exhortyng and desiring them both for the childes sake and his awne, as he was true inheritour to the crowne, to helpe and assist hym to obteyne the Garland and possession of the same by hys Grandfather to hym lyneally descended. And so after communicatyng the same matter with other of the nobilitie, euery man promised accordyng to hys power, ayde of money, men and munitions. By thys meanes the same was shortly bruted throughout all Ireland, and euery man was wylling to take his part and submit themselues to him, calling him of all handes king. So that nowe they of thys sect thus compassed and sorted, thought to haue in other places their companions and fortherers of their malicious purpose, and straight forth they sent into England certayne priuie messengers to desire them, whome they knewe to haue bene true and faythfull friendes to king Rychard, now to continue in their accustomed loue and faythfull friendship toward hys Nephewe and to helpe the chylde wyth treasure and substaunce as farre as they conueniently might. And that hys power might be the stronger to ouercome hys enemies and to obteyne hys pretensed purpose, he and his confederates sent messengers into Flaunders to the Ladie Margaret syster to king Edward, and late wife to Charles the Duke of Burgoyne, to further hys purpose wyth all her power and helpe. Thys Duke Charles hauyng no children by thys Lady Margaret, left one sole daughter named Mary behinde hym, begotten of hys first wyfe daughter to the Duke of Burbone, which was maryed to Maximilian sonne to Frederick the Emperour, on which wyfe he had engendered two children, the one Phylip, and the other Margaret. The which two children after the death of the Ladie Marie their mother, this Ladie Margaret late wyfe to Duke Charles so entirely beloued, & so motherly nourished, that she both for her motherly loue toward the yong children, & also for the good administration of iustice in their Countries was highly reputed and esteemed, and bare great authority and swynge through all Flaunders and the lowe Countries thereto adiacent. Thys Ladie Margaret although she knewe the familie and stock of the house of Yorke to be in maner destroyed and vtterly defaced by her brother king Richard, yet not beyng saciate nor content with the long hatred and continuall malice of her parents which subuerted and ouerthrew almost the progeny and linage of king Henry the first, and the house of Lancaster, nor yet remembryng the newe affinitie and strong alyaunce that was lately concluded, by the which the heyres of both the houses and progenies were vnited and conioyned together in lawfull matrimony, lyke one forgettyng both God and charitie, inflamed wyth malice, inuented and practised all mischiefes, miſchiefes, diſpleaſures and dammages that thee could deuiſe agaynſt king Henry the ſeuenth. And farther in her furie and frantike moode (accoꝛding to the ſaiyng of the wiſe man, there is no malice equiualent noꝛ aboue the malice of a woman) ſhe wꝛought all the wayes poſſible how to compaſſe his deſtruction as the pꝛincipall head of her aduerſe part and contrary faction. Therefoꝛe this Ladye knowyng of this tumulteous ſect and conſpiracie, pꝛepared and ſodainly deuiſed againſt king Henry (although ſhe knew it to be but a feyned and paynted matter and not wooꝛth two ſtrawes) yet (hauing ſuch an occaſion to wooꝛke her malice vpon) ſhe pꝛomiſed gladly to the meſſengers not onely to maintaine, ayde, further and ſuccour their purpoſed entent with money and ſubſtaunce, but with all the labour and payne that ſhe might, to encourage, ſtomack and entiſe many other to be ayders, aſſiſters and partakers of the ſame conſpiracie, and ſhoꝛtly to ioyne with the Chieuetaines of the ſayde enterpꝛiſe.

Thomas Gerardine lord Chancellor of Ireland.

When king Henry was certefyed of theſe doyngs by meſſengers ſent into England, no maruayle although he was none otherwiſe then he had occaſion, ſoꝛe vexed and mooued, conſidering that by the diſcepte and fraude of ſuch a dunghill knaue, and vile boꝛne villeyne, ſo great a ſedition ſhould be excited and ſtuꝛred againſt him: Neuertheleſſe, he lyke a circumſpect and pꝛudent Pꝛince, well conſidering and foꝛeſeyng, that if this enterpꝛiſe came to paſſe, that the finall ende would be the bloodie and moꝛtall warre, in the which foꝛ the moſt part, the large campe of all miſchiefe is commonly opened and ſhewed, many innocent men on both partes ſhould periſhe and come to ruine and confuſion without deſert oꝛ offence. Foꝛ which reaſon befoꝛe all things he determined to attempt and pꝛoue, if that he might without any battail oꝛ ſtroke ſtryken (the end wherof is euer doubtfull) to pacifie and reduce theſe rebels to reaſon and due ſubiection, befoꝛe that this euil newly planted weede ſhould ſtray and wander ouer the good herbes of hys whole realme. Therefoꝛe he called his whole counſayle together at the Charterhouſe beſide his royall manner called Richemond, and there conſulted how to pacifie this ſodayne rage ſecretly begon, without any moꝛe diſturbaunce oꝛ open trouble: which mocion of all men was thought meete to be aſſayed and pꝛoſecuted with effect. And that befoꝛe any other thing were attempted and begon, that a generall pardon ſhould be publiſhed to all offendoꝛs that were content to receaue the ſame, and after would be true, louing and obedient to the king their ſouereigne Loꝛde accoꝛding to their bounden duetie and allegeaunce: Thinking that if that pardon were any lenger ſpace delayed oꝛ pꝛolonged, that in the meane ſeaſon (as the pꝛouerbe ſayeth, taryng dꝛaweth perill) Sir Thomas Bꝛoughton knight which had hid and kept the Loꝛde Louell from the king a great ſeaſon, and was at hande with dyuers of hys friendes, in ſo troubleous and perillous a time, vtterly diſpairing of pardon and remiſſion, and as men without hope of any grace, ſetting all on fire and fenen, ſhould ſodainely moue a newe inſurrection agaynſt hym, and vnquiet him in ſome place, where he had leaſt reſiſtaunce: Wheꝛvpon the king gaue a generall pardon thꝛoughout al England (without exception of any offence) yea euen to them that had committed high treaſon agaynſt hys maieſtie and royall perſon. Furthermoꝛe, after long conſultation had and all things well conſidered, it was thought by the whole ſenate foꝛ the time then pꝛeſent most necessarie and conuenient to auoyde that erronious rumour, rumbling and blasting abroade, that the sonne of the Duke of Clarence was in Englande, and that he personally should be shewed abroad in the Citie and other publique places, whereby the vntrue opinion falsely affirming that he was in Irelande might be amongst the commonalty repressed, and accompted as a vayne and imagined fable.

The Ladie Elizabeth wife to king Edward the fourth condemned to forfeyt & lose all her landes because she had submitted herself to king Richard

In thys solempne counsayle dyuers and many thinges of the realme were there debated and concluded: and amongst other, it was determined that the Lady Elizabeth wyfe to king Edward the fourth, shoulde lose and forfeyt all her landes and possessions, because she had voluntarily submitted her selfe and her daughters wholy to the handes of king Rychard, contrary to the promise made to the Lordes and nobles of thys realme in the beginning of the conspiracie imagined agaynst king Richarde, which at her desire and request left all that they had in Englande, and fled to king Henry into Britayne, and there receaued a corporall othe of him to mary her eldest daughter, which offer shee abode not by, but made it frustrate and voyde. through whose double doynges it had like to haue succeded, that neyther the mariage could take place, nor yet the Noble men which at her request tooke king Henryes part, might not returne agayne without ieopardie of lyfe, but liue still in perpetuall banishment and miserable exile. This was a greeuous offence and a heynous cryme: howbeit the sequele thereof well digested, it was thought by some men that she deserued not by equitie or iustice so great a losse and so great a punishment: For surely she did not so great hurt or hinderaunce to king Henry and his confederates by her reconcilation to king Richard, but ten times more she profited and aduaunced their cause. For by her submission made to hym, he neglecting Gods lawes, honest order and christian religion, presuming to heape mischiefe vpon mischief, desyred of her the mariage of her daughter his natural nece, which thing he would not haue thought lykely to haue obteined: The Queene & her daughters still for feare of him continuyng in Sanctuarie. Which vnlawfull desire (considering for that entent he had rid his wyfe out of the worlde) prouoked the yre of God and the sworde of vengeaunce agaynst him, whereby his fynall ruyne and destruction shortly after ensued to his miserable confusion, and to the exaltation of king Henry and auauncement of his whole company.

The death of the Lady Elizabeth wife of king Edwarde the fourth.

By this foly and inconstancie of the Queene, shee incurred the hatred and displeasure of many men, & for that cause liued after in ỹ Abbey of Barmandsey beside Southwarke, a wretched and a miserable life, where not many yeres after she deceased, and is buryed with her husband at Windsore. Such are all worldly chaunces, nowe in prosperitie and aboundaunce, mutable and chaungeable, and full of inconstancie: And in aduersitie often chaunge from euill to good and so to better, to the entent that they that be in welth and flowe in the abundaunce of all thinges, shall not thinke themselues in suretie to tary still in that degree and state: and that they that be in miserie and calamitie shall not despayre and mistrust God, but liue in hope, that a better day of comfort and gaine will once appere and come. And yet although fortune ruleth many things at her will and pleasure, yet one worke that this Queene hath made cannot bee forgotten nor put in obliuion. At what tyme that king Edwarde her husband reigned, she founded and erected a notable a notable College in the vniuersitie of Cambridge, for the findyng of scholers desirous of good lyterature and learnyng, and endued it with sufficient possessions for the long maintenaunce of the same, which at this day is called the Queenes College, a name surely meete for such a place, wherein scholers diligently studiyng in all doctrine and sciences, proue excellent Clerkes, and come to great honoures. The quenes colege in Cambridge.

When all thinges in this counsaile were seriously concluded and agreed to the kings minde, he returned to the Citie of London, geuyng in commaundement that the next Sunday ensuyng, Edward the yong Erle of Warwike should be brought from the Tower through the streetes of London, to the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule. This yong Gentleman (as he was commaunded) shewyng himselfe openly to euery bodie in the Procession time tarved there the highe masse, hauyng communication openly with many noble men, and with them in especially that were suspected, and thought to haue bene partakers of the commocion against the king, to this purpose and effect, that they might perceyue the fonde Irishemen, for a vaine shadowe and vntrue fiction vnaduisedly to procure and moue warre agaynst him and hys realme, without any iust cause or lawfull occasion. Howbeit to euill disposed persones or braineleſſe men, this medicine nothing auayled nor profited. For the Erle of Lyncolne sonne to Iohn de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth sister to king Edward the fourth, thinkyng it not meete to neglect and omit so open an occasion of newe trouble and mischiefe offered, determined to vphold, fortefie, and bolster the entent and purpose of the Irishe men, least that they might be seduced, and caused to desist and leaue off their begon enterprise: And doubtlesse the man beyng of great wit and intelligence, and of no small iudgement, but halfe infected with the venemous skab of the late ciuile battaile, could not with a quiet mynde suffer king Henrie beyng principall head of the contrary faction to reigne in quiet, but consultyng with Sir Thomas Broughton, and certeine other of his trustie friendes, purposed to saile into Flaunders to his Aunt the Lady Margaret Duchesse of Burgoin, late wife to Duke Charles, trustyng by her helpe to make a puyssaunt army of men, and to ioyne with the Companions of the new rayſed sedicion. Therfore, after that the king had dissolued ỹ Parliament, which then was holden: he fled secretly into Flaunders to the Ladie Margaret, where Fraunces Lorde Louell landed certaine dayes before. And there they beyng altogether, euery man accordyng to his minde reasoned, and debated what was best to do. After long communication had, this finall conclusion was agreed vpon, that the Erle of Lyncolne and the Lorde Louell shoulde go to Ireland, and there attende vpon her counterfeyt nephewe, and to honour him as a king, and with power of the Irishemen to bring him into England, and sending for all theyr friendes, should without delay geue battaile vnto king Henry: So if their doynges had good and prosperous successe, then the foresayde Lambert (misnamed the Erle) should by the consent of the Counsayle be deposed, and Edward the true Erle of Warwicke to be deliuered out of prison, and after by the authority and ayde of his friendes of the Nobilitie, should be published, proclaymed, and annoynted king. Edward Erle of Warwike shewed openly thorough the streetes of London. The Erle of Lyncolne son to Iohn de la Poole Duke of Suffolke. Elizabeth sister to king Edward the fourth. Fraunces lord Louell.

But king Henry thinking his Nobles to be well appeased with the sight of Edward the very sonne of the Duke of Clarence, nothing mistrustyng any man to be ſo fooliſhe to inuent, feigne, or counterfeit any thing more of him, or any ſo mad or vndiſcrete (eſpecially of his realme) as to beleue that Lambert was verye Edwarde, onelye myndyng the ſuppreſſyng of the wretched Iriſhe men, ſtudyed how to ſubdue and repreſſe there bolde enterpriſe. And heeryng ſodeinely that the Erle of Lincolne with other were fled, and gone to his aduerſaryes, beyng therewith ſodeinly moued: thought euen wyth ſtrong hand and marciall power to ouercome his enemies and cruell willers, whoſe maliciouſneſſe he could by no counſaile nor pollicie eſchew nor auoide. And beyng thus determined, he commaunded certeine of his Capitaynes to prepare an hoſte of men out of euery part of his Realme, and them to bryng and conduite into one place aſſigned, that when his aduerſaryes ſhould come forwarde, he might with his populous multitude and great power ſodainly ſet on them, and ſo ouercome and vanquiſhe them altogether. And miſtruſtyng that other would folowe the Erle of Lyncolne into Flaunders, he cauſed the Eaſt partes, and all the borders thereaboutes to be diligently kept, that none other might eſcape or geue them ſuccour. And comming to the towne of Saint Edmondes bury, he was certified that the Lorde Thomas Marques Dorcet was comming to excuſe and purge himſelfe before him, for certeine thinges that he was ſuſpected to haue done lightly when he was in Fraunce. To whome the king did ſend the Erle of Oxforde to apprehend him ridyng on his courney, and to conuey him to the Tower of London, to trie his truth, and proue his patience: For if he were his friend, as he was in dede, he ſhould not be miſcontented to ſuffer ſo little a reproch, and rebuke for his Princes pleaſure: If he were not his friend, there to tary in ſafetie that he might do no dammage nor hurt to him. And from thence the king went forth to Norwiche, and ſo to Walſyngham, and ſhortly after he returned to London

In this meane tyme the Erle of Lincolne and the Lorde Louell, had gotten by the ayde of the Lady Margaret, about two thouſande Almaines, wyth Martyne Swarde a noble man in Germany, and in marciall feactes very expert, to be their cheueteyne, and ſo ſayled into Irelande. And at the cytie of Dyuelyn, they cauſed yong Lambert to be proclaymed and named kyng of England, after the moſt ſolempne faſhion, as though he were there of the very heyre of blood royall lyneally borne and diſcended. And ſo wyth a great multitude of beggerly Iriſhmen, all moſt all naked and vnarmed ſauyng ſkaynes and mantelles, of whome the Lorde Thomas Gerardine was capitayne and conductor, they ſayled into Englande with this newe feigned king, and landed for a purpoſe at the pyle of Fowdrey within lytle of Lancaſter, truſtyng there to be ayded with money by Sir Thomas Broughton one of the chiefe companyons of this vnhappy conſpiracy.

Martyn Swarde a Capitaine of the Germanes.

Lambert landeth in Englande with a great power of me.

The kyng not ſleepyng his matters, but miſtruſtyng and ſmellyng the ſtorme that folowed, before the enemies arriued, diſpatched certayne horſemen throughout all the weſt partes of the realme, chiefely to attende the cōmyng and arryuall of his enimies: ſecondarely to wayte for ſuch eſpialles as came out of Irelande, and them to apprehend and compell to ſhewe and declare the ſecretes of their enemies. When he had gathered all his hoſt together, ouer the which, the Duke of Bedforde, and the Erle of Orenforde, were chiefe captaynes, he went to Couentry, where he being, his light horſe-

men accoꝛding to their duety returned & certified hym that the Erle of Lyncoln was landed at Lancaſter with his new king. The which when the kyng vnderſtoode was ſo, he conſulted with his nobilitie and counceilers to knowe if it were foꝛ the beſt to encounter with them out of hande, oꝛ to let them dꝛagge a whileꝛ, foꝛ this matter both required counſaile and alſo ſpede. After they had layed their heades together, and well debated the matter, it was determyned that they ſhoulde ſet vpon them without any further delay, leaſt that their powꝛe by long ſufferaunce, and delayng of tyme, myght bee augmented and greatly multiplied. And ſo after ſuch aduiſement taken, he remoued to Nottyngham, & there by a lytle wood called Bowꝛes, he pitched his fielde: to whome ſhoꝛtly after came the Loꝛde Geoꝛge Talbot Erle of Shꝛewſbury, the Loꝛd Straunge, ſir John Cheynie, valyaunt capitaines, with many other noble, and expert men of warre. Foꝛ the kyng hadde commaunded, and geuen in charge befoꝛe, that all perſons of the counties adioyning that were able and of ſtrength to cary weapon, ſhoulde be readie in an houres warning, in caſe that any neede ſhoulde require. Therefoꝛe pycked fellowes, and hardy perſonages, and ſuch as were lyke men, were choſen in all the haſt, and of this ſoꝛt a great armie was aſſembled and gathered together: So the kinges armie was wonderfully encreaſed, and from tyme to tyme greatly augmented.

In this ſpace, the Erle of Lyncoln beyng entred into Yoꝛkeſhire, paſſed ſoftly on his iourney without the ſpoyling, oꝛ hurtyng of any man, truſtyng thereby to haue ſome company of people reſoꝛt vnto him: but after that he perceaued fewe oꝛ none to folowe him, and that it was to no purpoſe to returne backe, conſideryng his enemies were all ready to ſet vpon him, he determined firmely to trie the foꝛtune of battaile, remembꝛing that the chaunce of warre doth ſtande euer vpon .bj. oꝛ bij. & that king Henry not two yeres befoꝛe with a ſmall powꝛe of men, vanquiſhed kyng Richarde and all his mightie armie. And herevpon putting a ſure confidence vpon his companie, directed his way from Yoꝛke to Newarke vpon Trent, to the entent that there he (as he truſted) augmenting his company myght ſet vpon the king, whome he knewe to be but two dayes iourney from him. Albeit, befoꝛe he came there, king Henry was in his boſome and knewe euery houre what the Erle did, and came the night befoꝛe that hee fought, to Newarke, and there appꝛoched neere his enemyes, ſoner then they loked foꝛ him, and there tarying a litle, went thꝛee myles farther and pitched his fielde & lodged there that night. The Erle of Lincoln certefyed of his comming, was nothing aferde, but kept ſtill on his iourney, and at a lytle village called Stoke nigh to the kyng and his army planted his campe. The next day folowyng, the king deuided his whole number into thꝛee battayles, and after in good array appꝛoched nigh to the towne of Stoke, where was an equal and plain place foꝛ both the parties to darraine the battaile.

When the place was appoynted and oꝛdeyned to trie the vttermoſt by ſtroke of battaile, the Erle ſet fooꝛth his armie, and geuyng a token to his companie, ſet vpon his aduerſaries with a manly courage, deſiryng his ſouldioꝛs that day to remember his honour, and their awne lyues. And ſo both the armies ioyned and fought earneſtly and ſharpely, inſomuch that the Almaines beyng tryed and expert men of warres and martiall feates, were in all things, aswell in strength as pollicie equall and equivolent with the Englishe men: but as for Martin Sward theyr chiefe Capitaine and leader, not many of the Englishe men, both for valiaunt courage of a stoute stomacke and strength, and nymblenesse of bodie was to be compared or resembled with his manhoode. Of the other syde, the Irishe men, although they fought hardily, and stucke to it valiauntly, yet because they were after the maner of theyr Countrie almost naked, without harnesse or armure, they were striken downe and slain lyke dull and brute beastes, whose deathes and distructions was a great discouragyng and abashement to the residue of the companie.

The battaile of Stoke.

Thus they fought for a space so sore and so egerly of both partes, that no man could well iudge to whome the victorye was like to enclyne: but at length, the kinges forewarde beyng full of people and well fortifyed with winges, which onely both began and continued the fight, set vpon the aduersaryes with such a force and violence, that first they oppressed and killed such Capitaynes one by one as resisted their might and puyssaunce, and after that put all the other to fearefull flight, the which were eyther apprehended as captiues and prisoners in their flight runnyng away, or else slain and brought to confusion in a small moment. But when this battaile was finished, and fought out to the extremitie, then it well appered what highe prowesse, and manly stomackes was in the kinges aduersaries. For there their chiefe Capitaines, the Erle of Lyncolne, and the Lord Louell, Sir Thomas Broughton, Martyn Swarde, and the Lord Gerardine Capitaine of the Irish men were slaine and found dead. Howbeit, some affirme that the Lorde Louell toke his horse and would haue fled ouer Trent, but he was not able to recouer the further syde for the highnesse of the banke, and so was drowned in the riuer. There were killed at that battaile with their fiue capitaynes before rehersed, of that partie about foure thousand: Of the kings part there were not halfe of them which fought in the forewarde, and gaue the onset, slaine or hurt: Then was Lambert the ponglyng which was falsely reported to be the Dukes sonne of Clarence, and his maister Sir Richard Simond priest, both taken, but neyther of them put to death, because that Lambert was but an innocent poore soule, a very childe, and was not of age to do any such enterprice of his awne deuice, and the other was a priest, which yet to the entent he might remember that the stone oftentymes falleth on the head of him that casteth it into the ayre, and that many a man maketh a rod for his awne taile when he entendeth it for another, this priest for penaunce was committed to perpetuall prison and miserable captiuitie. But this Lambert in conclusion was made the kinges faulkener, after that he had beene a turne broche, and executed such vile offices in the kings kitchyn and Scullarie for a space. And thus was all the highe enterprice that Ladie Margaret had deuised and set foorth at this tyme, turned to naught and brought to none effect, and to an euill conclusion. Of which chaunce, when shee was aduertised and enformed in the Countrie of Flaunders, she was very sorie at the heart & much lamented and bewayled, that her imagined purpose sorted to such an infortunate ende and effect, incontinently deuisyng, practisyng, and imaginyng some great and more difficile enterprise, by the which she might vere and vnquiet yet once again the king of England & his whole region: Which purpose, euen as she inuented it, so she set it forward, as shall be shewed hereafter plainly.

The Erle of Lincolne and Lord Louell slayne.

After

After that king Henry had thus aſſwaged and appeaſed theſe matters beyng of ſo great a moment and weight, with no great motion, tumult, or trouble, he commaunded that no man ſhould kyl or ſley the Erle of Lyncolne, but that he ſhould be brought to him alyue, to the entent that he might ſhewe and bewray both the fountayne and originall beginning of thys ſeditious conſpiracie. But the fame is, that the ſouldiours would not ſo doe, fearing leaſt paraduenture the ſauyng of his onely life (as it ſhould haue beene in deede) the lyfe of many other ſhould haue bene loſt, or at the leaſt in ieopardie. This battayle was fought on a Saturday being the .xvj. day of June. In the which yere alſo Thomas Burchier Archebyſhop of Cauntorbury dyed, into whoſe rome John Morton late Byſhop of Elye, a man of equall learning, vertue and pollecie with his predeceſſours, whome Alexander of that name the ſixt Byſhop of Rome created Cardinall, and the king preferred him to the office of the high Chauncelour of Englande: Nowe to returne to my purpoſe.

John Morton Biſhop of Ely.

After this victorie, then the king did execution of ſuch rebels and traytours as were taken in the field, eyther at the battayle, or in the chace. And ſhortly after, he went into Yorkeſhire, and there coſted the Countrie, ouerthwart, ſearching by his eſpialles and priuie enquyries, whether his aduerſaries gathered any other army againſt him, entending earneſtly to wede out, and purge his lande of all ſeditious ſeede, and double harted krupte, if it were poſſible, and ſuche as were founde culpable in any one point, were committed to priſon, and eyther puniſhed by fine or extinct by death.

In the midſt of Auguſt he by iorneyng arryued at Newcaſtell vpon Tyne a verie proper towne, ſituate on the hether part of Northumberland, where he taried the remnaunt of the Sommer, and being there, ſent in Ambaſſade into Scotland to king James the thirde, Richarde Fore which not long before was made Byſhop of Exceter, and with hym Syr Richard Edgecombe knight Comptroller of his houſe. The ſummarie of their commiſſion was to conclude a truce for a time, or a long league and amitie. For king Henry eſtemed it both honorable & profitable if he might haue perfite peace and aſſured amitie with Princes adioyning and his nert neighbours. And before all other, king James of Scotlande, to the intent that his ſubiectes hauing knowledge of the amitie and deſpairyng vtterly to haue anye refuge, comfort or ſuccour of the Scottes, or other their neighbours adioyning, contrarie to their olde vſage, might the better be continued in the fayth, duetie and loyaltie towardes their Prince and ſouereigne Lord. The Ambaſſadours when they were come into Scotlande to the king, were of him both gently entertayned, and after the moſt louing faſhion receaued and fully harde. To whome at the firſt he ſhewed the good hart and minde, that he hymſelfe continually bare, and yet did intend to ſhewe towards king Henry, although hys ſubiectes were of a contrarie minde and opinion, playnely proteſtyng and declaryng to them his Vaſſals to be both by nature & wylfull diſpoſition, dyuers and contrarie euer to the Engliſhe nation: thinking ſurely that they for the moſt part would neuer conſent and long agree with the Engliſhe men, accordyng to their olde ſubtile dealing: wherefore leaſt that he ſhould offende or miniſter cauſe of occaſion to them (as in deede all men were not his friendes in Scotland at that time) he deſired the Ambaſſadors to be content with a truce and abstinence of warre for seuen yeres not onely in open audience, but on his honor promised firmely in secret communication, that he for hys part would kepe continuall peace with the king of Englande during their lyues, but apparauntly he promised that or these seuen yeres should be passed and fully fynished, that he woulde renue agayne the truce for other seuen yeres, so that king Henry and he should lyue in peace, and most assured amitie, during their natural lines. And this did king James conclude with king Henry, because that he knewe himselfe, hys actes, yea and hys name to be had in such despite and hatred of the more part of hys disloyall people, that nothing (whatsoeuer he did) was esteemed, regarded, well spoken of or had in any price: Such was the malicious hart burning of the Scottes against their naturall Lorde. The Ambassadors perceauing the hartie minde and faythfull beneuolence of thys king towardes their maister king Henry, accepted and assented to his offer, and ratefyed the same: And returning home shewed the king all the matter in order as it was proponed and concluded. Wyth which tydings, he perceauyng the king of Scots good minde towardes hym, and apparauntly perceauing that as that tempestious and stormie season requyred, it was not to hys small commoditie and profite, reioyced marueilously that his Ambassade came to so good an effect: & shortly reculed backe agayne from Newcastell to Yorke, and so towarde hys Citie of London. And in the way beyng at Leycester, diuers Ambassadors sent from Charles the Frenche king came to hys presence, which declared and shewed to hym that their king Charles had recouered many townes, Cityes and garrisons which before that time were possessed and holden of Maximilian king of Romaines and Archeduke of Austrych, and that he nowe moued battayle agaynst Fraunces Duke of Britayn, because he kept, ayded and succoured in his territorie and dominion dyuers noble princes and high personages of the realme of Fraunce, which were Traytors and rebels agaynst him, hys realme and seigniorie, of the which the chiefe leader was Lewys Duke of Orlyaunce: And therefore he desired hym for the olde friendshyp and familiaritie practised betweene them, that he would eyther ayde, assyst, and helpe hym, or else stande neuter betweene both parties, neyther helping nor hurting any of both partes.

Lewys duke of Orliance.

King Henry well remembring that although he had found much friendshyp at the French kinges hande in his necessitie, and that by him partly and his he obteyned his kingdome, yet for as much as he espied vpon what vnsure grounde thys quarell was begonne agaynst the Britones, with thys message was not well contented nor yet pleased. For he which sawe as farre in the Frenche kings brest as his Physition did in hys bryne, knewe perfectly that he had neyther occasion by any iust tytle to inuade the Duchye of Britayne, nor yet anye displeasure ministred to hym, by reason whereof he might iustly haue any shadow to make a quarrell to the Duke of Britayne, but onely to delate, amplifie and spreade forth his authorie, dominion, and possession. For the Frenche king and his counsaile knewe well that Duke Fraunces was an impotent man, sore diseased and well striken in age, and had neuer any heyre male to inherite and possede his Duchie, wherefore they determined by some meanes easily to compasse that the Duchie of Britayne should shortly come vnder their rule and subiection, and so without grounde

or good cause made open warre agaynst the Duke and his Nacion. King Henry perceiuyng that this new attempted enterprize nothing sounded to his profite, callyng to mynde and considerying, that if the Duchie of Bziteyn and the people of the same which had bene euer friendly and louing to the Englishe Nacion, and was alwayes for their entercourse to his realme both necessary and profitable, should come vnder the thraldome and subiection of the French king, that dammage more then profite were like to ensue and folow, determined with himselfe to ayde and take part with the Duke, perceiuyng well that all his affayres was nowe in perill and set in a broyle and hasard. The occasion that moued him therevnto was, the kindlyng of the fatherly loue and tender affection which the Duke euer shewed him, sith his first arriuall and entryng into Bziteyne, and his fidelitie to him alway apparauntly shewed during the tyme of his there abidyng and residence. On the other part when he remembred the great benefite that he had taken and receiued at the frenche kinges hande by his bountifull and princely liberalitie, thought it both necessary, honest, and consonant to reason, to forget the vnthanketull offence agaynst the Duke of Bziteyn committed, and to perswade and aduise the frenche king to desist from veryng and inuadyng the Duke of Bziteyne, least any scruple or sparke of ingratitude might growe or kyndle betweene them two. Thys matter was so doubtfull and so full of ambiguities, that the king in long consultation lefte no question nor doubt vnasked nor vndiscussed, and yet no aunswere nor no conclusion could satisfie or please his doubtfull minde and gentle hart, loth to offende any of them, of whom he had receyued either benefite or friendship: But in conclusion, he fell to this full determination, that if battail should nedes succede and folow, then he of very dutie was specially bound not to denie nor forsake the Duke of Bziteyne, to whome he was so much beholdyng, but to ayde, assist, and comfort him with all his power, and openly to kepe from him all wronges and iniuries, and to defend and resist all his aduersaryes and enemyes. Yet in the meane season, least he should of the other part make his highe frend his extreme enemie, his aunswere was to the Ambassadors that he would take trauayle and study both to his great paine and cost, that betwene the frenche king theyr souereigne Lorde, and the Duke of Bziteine, both beyng his indifferent frendes some gentle pacification, or friendly accorde might be concluded and taken. And so assone as the kinges Ambassadors were dismissed, he sent on message Christopher Urswike to Charles the frenche king: First to declare in hys behalfe howe ioyous he was of the victorie that he had obteyned vppon Maximilian king of Romaines. Secondarily, what tumult and insurrection was here in England, and howe by mere force and manhood he had banquished and repressed the rebelles and traytors, & either destroyed or brought to subiection the whole rablement and number. Thirdely, offeryng himselfe as a meane and intercessor of peace and amitie betwene the frenche king Charles and the Duke of Bziteyne: geuyng him farther in charge, that if he shou'd perceyue the frenche king to geue open eare to his request, and to encline to his desyre, that then he should without delay resort to the Duke of Bziteyn, and desyre him to be content at his desyre to endeuour himselfe to an honourable peace and concorde, rather then to warre and doubtfull dissention, which peace with Gods grace he little doubted, the Duke beyng willyng.

Christopher Urswike.

lyng, shortly to compasse and bring to conclusion. While Christopher Urswike was trauailyng in this commission, king Henrie returned with great triumph to his Citie and Chamber of London, hauing the victory and ouerhande of his enemyes, and rebellious aduersaries, whereof the Citizens were very glad, & greatly reioyced. And sone after this, the king bountifully and liberally rewarded all such persons, which not onely did hazarde their goods, their possessions, liuyngs, & substance, but also their liues & bodyes in his defence and quarell. And not long after, he deliuered Thomas Marques Dorset out of the Tower of London, acceptyng him to his high fauor & olde familiaritie, because his truth and fidelitie had bene tryed and proued by sundry and diuers arguments and assayes. Duryng this time, the king for the perfite loue and syncere affection that he bare to his Queene and wife Lady Elizabeth, caused her to be crowned & anoynted Queene on saint Katherines day in November with all solemnitie to such a high estate and degree appertenyng. In the meane season Christopher Urswike was come to the french king lyng at Tholouse, and of him after the most louyng & friendly fashion that could be, receyued and enterteyned. And assoone as he had shewed and declared his message, the French king shewed himselfe outwardly, although inwardly he otherwise entended, to be therwith contented and that very well pleased that the king of England should be the meane of peace, and Arbitrer indifferent betwene the Duke and him. Thys aunswere made, the Englishe Ambassadour toke his iourney streyght thence as he was commaunded into Britteyne, and shewed the Duke vpon his maisters behalfe all things geuen him in charge and commission: But the Duke (because himselfe had beene long sicke, and thereby his memory and wyt was decayed and appaired) he appointed to heare the message with other of his Counsellers, Lewys Duke of Orleaunce which was fled thether out of Fraunce. When this Duke had heard the Ambassadors declare their message, perceauing that it touched a peace which he thought founded neyther to hys profite nor pleasure, wherefore he beyng somewhat tickled with the message answered and sayde, that it was more meete and conuenient that king Henry (considering and remembring the great kindnesse and humanitie that he had receyued at the Dukes hande) should withall the power and strength he might, helpe the Duke of Britteyne beyng by the Frenchmen inuaded with yron, fyre, and bloud, then to attempt or procure any fryuelous or vaine composition or concorde. Yea and although he had neyther receaued nor remembred any benefite done to hym by the Duke, yet should he consider that the Countrie of Britayne was in maner a Bulwarke and a strong wall for the Englishe men in defence of the French men, the which if it should come into the hands of the French nation, then were his continuall enemies next to the gate of his realme, which thing he would not suffer if he remembred the prouerbe that sayth, when thy neyghbors house is a fyre, thy staffe standeth next the dore. After that Christopher Urswike had receaued thys aunswere then he returned agayne into Fraunce, and there taried certayne dayes, declaring to king Charles what aunswere was made to hym by the Britteyns, and shortly after returned into Englande agayne.

Whyle these things were thus in doing, the French king besieged with a great puissaunce the strong Citie of Nauntes in Britteyne. And the more

greedier that he was of his purpose, and the more hast he made for gayning his praye, so much the more did he exhort the king of England with letters, writings and fayre wordes, by sundrie and diuers messengers for to treate and conclude a peace, betwixt the Duke of Britteyne and him, fearing least when he had almost runne his race, king Henry would put him beside hys sadell, whome he did halfe suspect to be a back friend of hys, and prone and readie to take the Britons part.

Wherefore he sent in Imbassade Barnarde a Scot borne, called the Lorde Daubeny, in all haste to king Henry, to desire him in anye wise to make some ende whatsoeuer it were of this warre and controuersie. And therevpon the king beyng desirous of the same, which had rather all things might be ended by peace then by dint of sworde, least that he should be driuen to take part with the Brytons agaynst the French nation, elected among all other three Imbassadors. The first was John Saint, Abbot of Abyndon, John Lilye borne in Luke, the Bishop of Romes Collector, and Doctor of lawe, and Richarde Edgecombe knight, a fatherly, wise and a graue personage, which for the renuing of the olde amitie, were commaunded first to repaire to the French king, and after that to the Duke of Britteyne, to whom he gaue a long commission with sufficient instructions. But or euer these Imbassadors proceeded on their iorney, John Lilie fell sick on the gowte, so that he was not able to trauayle in so long a iorney, and so weightie a businesse, for whome was elected and chosen Christopher Urswike, and so they three sayled into Fraunce (as they were commaunded) and when they had commoned a space with the French king, concerning the forme of the peace and concord to be concluded, Rycharde Edgecombe, and Christopher Urswike, departed streight to the Duke of Britteyne, thinking, ye and nothing doubting, but they should knit vp the knot, and finall conclusion of their Imbassade, according to their awne request and desire, but all their hope was vayne, and turned to a vanitie. For the Duke vpon great deliberation, constauntly denyed and refused euery condition by them offered or demaunded. Which things, when they succeeded not according to their expectation, the Imbassadors returned back to the French king agayne, and there to him declared what was their aunswere and finall resolution, and yet making there abode in Fraunce, they declared to the king of England by their letters all their actes and exploit. But or their letters came to the kings handes, Sir Edward Lorde Wooduile Uncle to the Quene, a valyaunt Capitayne, and a Champion, eyther abhorring ease and ydelenesse, or inflamed with ardent loue and affection towarde the Duke of Britteyne, desyred very earnestly of king Henry, that if it were his will and pleasure, that he with a conuenient number of good men of warre might transport himselfe into Britteyne for the aide & defence of Duke Fraunces, the kings assured and proued friend. And lest it should sow or kindle any dissention or ingratitude betwene the French king & him, he saide that he would steale priuily ouer, without any licence or pasport, as though no man should thinke or doubt but he were fled ỹ realme, But the kyng which had a firme confidence, that peace shoulde be made by the pollitique prouision & wyse inuencion of his elected Imbassadors, would in no wyse geue the bridle to his hasty desire, but straightly forbade hym to attempt any such enterprise, thinkyng that it stode not with his honor to offende

fende the French kyng, to whome he would shew as much amitie and humanity as he might. Yet this Lord Wooduile hauing playne repulse and denall of the kyng, could not thus rest, but determined to worke his businesse secretly without any knowlege of the king, & went straight into the Ile of Wight, whereof he was made ruler and captayne, and there gathered a crewe of tall and hardy personages, to the number of foure hundred, and with prosperous wynde and wether, arryued in Britayne, and ioyned himselfe with the Brytons against the French power and nation. The rumor of thys doyng was soone blowen into the court of Fraunce, which made the Ambassadours of Englande not smally abashed, who knowyng perfectly the Frenche hartes to be prone and ready at all tymes to reuenge and doe out rage to such as displeased them, were sodainelye afrayde least the common people coulde not withholde their handes from quarelyng or fraiyng. Albeit the law of armes and the truth it selfe did defende and preserue them from iniury. But whiles the Ambassadors were in this perplexity, and feare of daunger, and whyles the Frenchmen suspected this fact to be done by a cautel of king Henry, there came other new messengers from him to the French kyng, to purge himselfe to his friend of the suspected ingratitude, certifiyng him that the lord Woodvile without his knowledge or consent, was sayled ouer in to Brytaine with so small a number of men, which small handefull, neither becommed a prince to sende or set forwarde, neyther yet coulde doe to the Britaynes, anye great ayde or succour: To the which message and excuse, albeit the French kyng gaue but small credence, yet he somewhat mitigate of his anger, dissimuled the matter (according to the French nature) with a flatterying countenaunce. So the Ambassadours renuyng a league and amitie betweene their kyng and him for .vij. monethes, returned into Englande agayne, and shewed the kyng all such thinges as they had eyther heard or sene there. The kyng of Englande well perceyued by the report of hys newlye returned Ambassadors, that the French kyng wrought all his feates by subtill craft and cloked collusion, treating and motioning peace and concorde, when he desired nothing so much as discorde, and warre, and that purpose he auaunced and set forwarde with sayle and ower, to the vttermust point of his habilitie. Wherfore kyng Henry beyng assured of all the French kinges actes and doynges, determined now with all speede to set forth out of hande all such thinges as here before he had concluded, concerning the warre of Britayne, as you haue heard. Wherefore he called his high court of Parliament, and there first consulted with the peres and communalty of his realme, for the aidyng of the Duke of Briteyn. Then for the maintenance of the warres, diuers summes of money were graunted and geuen, beside certayne decrees and actes made for the profite of the common wealth. And assone as the Parliament was ended, he caused musters to be had in certayne places of his realme, & souldiours meete for the warre to be put in a readinesse. Yet least peraduenture he might seeme willingly to breake the amitie, which was betwene ỹ french king & him, he sent diuers notable Ambassadors into Fraunce, to certifie the French kyng, that of late he had kept a solempne Parliament, in the which it was condiscended and agreed by the Lords temporal and spiritual, & knights of counties, and magistrates of Cities, and boroughes of his realme, not onelye considering the reliefe, comfort, and ayde that he hadde receyued at the Dukes hande, both for the sauegarde of his life, and for the recouering of his enheritaunce and kyngdome, but also remembring that Britayne of auncient tyme was subiect and vassall to the realme of Englande, which countrey also hath bene friendly, and aiders to the English nacion when it was vexed, both with forreyne powers and domesticall sedicion, to ayde, comfort, and assist the British nacion with all their strength, might, and habilitie against all their enemies, friendly admonishing him that he should eyther ceasse from his war in Britaine newly begon, or else not to be grieued if he did agree (as reason woulde) to the iudgement and determination of the Lordes and Prelates of his realme, assuryng him in the worde of a king that his armie shoulde onely discende in the Duchie of Britayne, not to inuade or make war in the French kynges realme or territories, but onely to defende the Duchie of Britaine.

Dukes

With these commaundementes the English Ambassadours departed, and declared to the french kyng all the minde and wil of their king and souereigne Lorde. Which message he dissimuled as litle to regard as the bityng of a flee, as though the Englishmen in the battayle, which he knewe to be at hande, coulde doe no enterprise (as it happened in deede) eyther necessary to be feared, or worthy to be remembred. The cause of his so sayyng was thys he knowyng that his army was puissaunt and strong in Britayne, and that the Britaynes had but a fewe English men with the Lorde Woodville, of whome he passed litle, and seyng that Englande had not yet sent anye armie thether for the Dukes succour, iudged surely that his army woulde doe some great exployt (as they did in deede) before eyther the Duke shoulde be pursueyed or any aide ministred. And as he imagined, so it folowed, for ỹ french men so sore oppressed the countrey of Britayne, and brent and destroyed Cities, and besieged the towne of Fongeres, so that the Duke of Britaine was encouraged by the Duke of Orliaunce, and other rebels of the French king manfully to fight and geue battaile to the French army. And so the .xxv. day of July they set forwarde, and came to a towne which the Frenchmen hadde gotten, called sainct Aulbyne. The Frenchmen were not ignorant of their cõming, but put themselues in a readinesse. Of which army was Capitaines, the Lord Lewys of Treuoyle, viscount of Thonars a Gascoin, Adryan Lord of Mountfalcoysse. On the Britons part were chiefetaynes, Lewys, Duke of Orliaunce, and the Prince of Orenge, which because they and other of the Frenchmen were all on horsebacke, were mistrusted of the Britones, least they woulde at their most neede flye. The battaile of Fongieres in Britayne.

Wherefore they discended on foote, and the Duke and the Prince put themselues in the battaile of the Almanes: The Marshal of Rieux was appoynted to the vauntgard. The middle warde was deliuered to the Lorde Dalebret, and the reregard to the Lorde Chateaw Bryand, and to make the Frenchemen beleue that they had a great number of Englishe men (notwithstandyng there were but foure hundreth with the Lorde Woodville) they apparepled a thousand and seuen hundreth Britons in Cotes with red crosses, after the Englishe fashion, when both the armies were approchyng to the other, the ordinaunce shot so terribly and with suche a violence, that it sore dammaged and encombred both the parties. When the shot was finished, both the vauntgardes ioyned together with such a force, that it was marualle to beholde. The Englishemen shot so fast, that the Frenche men in the fore-ward, were faine to recule to the battayle where their horsemen were. The rerewarde of the French men, seyng this first discomfiture began to flie, but the Capitaynes retired their men together againe, & the horsemen set fiercely on the Britaynes, and slewe the most part of the footemen. When the forewarde of the Britaynes perceyued that their horsmen nor the Almaynes came not forwarde, they prouided for themselues and fled, some here, and some there, where they thought to haue refuge or succor. So that in conclusion the Frenche men obteyned the victorie, and slue all suche as ware red Crosses, supposyng them all to be Englishe men. In this conflict were slaine almost all the Englishe men, and fire thousand Britaynes. Amongest whom were found dead the Lorde Wooduile, and the Lorde James Galeas borne in Naples. And of the Britaynes there were slaine the Lorde of Leon, the Lorde Mountfort, the Lorde Pontlabbe and many noble and notable persons of the British nacion. Of the French nacion were slain. xij. hundred persons. The Prince of Orenge, and the Duke of Orliaunce were taken prisoners, which Duke (although he were next heyre apparaunt to the Crowne of Fraunce) should haue lost his head, if Ladie Jane his wife which was sister to Charles the French king, had not obteyned perdon and remission of his trespasse and offence. Howbeit, he was long after kept prisoner in the great Tower at Bourges in Berry. This infortunate metyng chaunced to the Britaynes on a Monday, beyng the. xxvij. day of July. in the yere of our redemption. 1488. and in the fourth yere of king Henry the seuenth.

An army sent by the king of Englande to ayde the Duke of Britayne.

When these newes were brought into Englande, the king foreseeyng what was like to chaunce, thought it necessary to hasten and set forward the matter before concluded, wherfore with al spede he sent Robert Lord Broke, Sir John Cheyney, Sir John Middleton, Sir Raufe Hilton, Sir Rychard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Laton, and Sir Edmond Cornewall, all lusty and couragious Capitaynes with. viij. thousande men well armed, and warlike furnished to ayde and assist the Britaynes agaynst the Frenche men. These holy men of warre had such prosperous wind that they arrined in Britayn euen as they would wishe or desire. But when the French men knewe of their landyng, whome they knewe by no small experience (and especially so long as they were freshe and lustie) to be of great courage: wherefore at the beginnyng they were all blanke, and for feare kept themselues craftily and politikely within their campe. And after that, they sent forth a small companye of light horsemen, the which to werie and abate the stout stomackes of the Englishe men, made in diuers places of the armie, skirmishes, outcryes, and alaromes. So for a certaine space they vsed this kinde of dalyng with the Englishe men, but euer the losse turned to the Frenche men. But beholde, while this warre was thus set forwarde, Fraunces Duke of Britayne deceased.

Fraunces Duke of Britayn departed out of this life, so that the Englishmen were in a doubtfull Laberinth, and in a great ambiguitie. For the chiefe rulers of the Britaynes, beyng some of them corrupted with money, and some stirred with desyre of deuision and controuersie, fell into deuision among themselues, so that they seemed not to regarde the defence of their naturall Countrie, but rather minded the destruction and vtter confusion of the same. Which diuision the Englishe men perceiuyng, and also consideryng that it was in the middest of Winter, in the which tyme it was not wholesome for men to lie in the frostie and moyst fieldes, they were compelled in maner by necessitie, within fiue monethes that they went forwarde, to returne backe againe into England.

After this Charles the Frenche king hauing thus the vpper hand of the Britaynes, perceiuyng that Maximilian King of Romaines laboured to haue in mariage, Anne sole heyre to Fraunces Duke of Britayne, for her ponger sister was late deade, which he thought was neyther for his profite, nor aduauntage, concluded a peace with the Britaynes. By which treatie he had the Lady deliuered into his possession, and after her deliueraunce, he refusyng the mariage of the Ladie Margaret, daughter to the forsayde king of Romaines, espoused the Ladie Anne Duchesse of Britayn, by which meanes the Duchy of Britain was annexed to the Crowne of Fraunce, as hereafter shall appere when it tooke effect, which was not two yeres after.

It was decreed by the three estates (as you haue heard) before that any souldiours were sent into Britayne, that for the expence of that warre, euery man should be taxed and assessed at the summe of his substaunce, & should pay the tenth peny of his goodes, for the maintenaunce of the warre in Britayn. Which money the most part of them that dwelt in the Bishoprike of Durham and Yorkeshire, refused vtterly to pay, eyther thinking themselues ouercharged with the greatnesse of the same, and therewith greeued, or excited and procured through the euill counsaile and seditious persuasion of certaine persons, which priuily conspired agaynst the king, to put him to newe trouble and businesse. Therefore such as were by the kings commaundement made Collectors and gatherers of the summe taxed, after that they could not get the money according to the extractes to them by the Cõmissioners deliuered, made their complaint priuily to Henry the fourth Erle of Northumberland, chiefe ruler of the North parties. And he immediatly vpon the knowlege thereof, signified to the kings grace by hys letters, that the people greatly grudged and murmured, making open proclamation that they haue beene charged of late yeres with innumerable incommodities and oppressions, wythout any defaut or desert, and that nowe there was a houge some required of them, which neyther they were able to satisfie so great a demaunde, nor yet would once consent to paye any one peny of the sayde summe required. The king commaunded the Erle in any wise by distresse or otherwise according to his discretion, to exact the money of the people, and by compulsion to enforce such to payment as wyned most at it, lest that it might appere that the decrees, actes and statutes, made and confirmed by hym and hys highe Court of Parliament, should by hys rude and rusticall people be contemned and despised. The rude, rashe, and vnaduised people, hearing thys aunswere of the king, by and by, violently set vpon the Erle, by the procurement of a simple felowe called John of Chambre, whome the Erle intreated wyth fayre wordes to come to reason, but they laiyng to hys charge that he was the chiefe author and principall causer of thys taxe and tribute paiyng, both hym and dyuers of hys housholde seruaunts, furiously and shamefully murthered & killed. Diuers affirme that the Northren men bare against this Erle continuall grudge, sithe the death of king Richard, whom they entirely loued and highly fauored, which secret Serpent caused their furie to wade farther then reaſon could retract or reſtrayne. Although thys offence were great and heynous, yet there ſucceeded after a more miſchiefe and a greater inconuenience. For incontinent the Northren men to cloke this murther and manſlaughter, by a vyolence put on their armure and aſſembled in flockes, and elected to them a Capitane called Sir John Egremonde knight, a perſon no leſſe ſeditious then factious, and deſirous of trouble, and ordred themſelues lyke men of warre, and paſſyng by the Countryes, they publyſhed and declared that they would byd battayle to the king, onely for the defence of their common libertie and freedome, which he would pluck, and by hys extreme power take from them. But when their cauſe ſhould be decided with blowes and handſtrokes, their furie was aſſwaged and cooled, their hartes were in their heeles, and their ſtomackes as colde as any ſtone, and euerye one wyſhed that thys tumult were quenched, which was nowe a readie not ſmoking but enflamed: And in concluſion euery man ranne away, ſome this way, and ſome that way, as men amaſed when they lack counſayle. When euery man was returned, the matter was ended as they imagined, but while they diligently laboured to ſaue their lyues by flight, they ſought their owne deſtruction. For the moſt part of them were puniſhed by death or by impriſonment for the ſame offence. For the king heeryng of thys tumulteous buſynelle, ſent foorth Thomas Erle of Surrey, whome not long afore he had deliuered out of the Tower, and receaued to his grace and ſpeciall fauour (as he was both for hys wyt and fidelitie well worthy) with a competent crewe of men into the Northren partes, which ſkirmiſhed with a certayne company and diſcomfited them, and tooke a lyue John a Chambre the firſt beginner of this rebellion. The king himſelfe roade after the Erle into Yorkeſhire, of whoſe comming the ſlaues and ſturdie rebels were ſo abaſhed and afrayde, that they fled more and leſſe, which afterward were apprehended and greeuouſly puniſhed, according to their demerites and deſeruing. Yet the king of his magnificent minde, pardoned the innocent and rurall people, and plagued and executed the inuenters of the miſchiefe, and the furtherers of the ſame. For John a Chamber was hanged at Yorke vpon a gibbet, ſet vpon a ſquare payre of Gallowes, lyke an Archetraytour, and his complices and lewde diſciples were hanged on the lower Gallowes round about their maiſter, to the terrible example of all other. But Sir John Egremond, whome theſe ſeditious perſons preferred to be their Capitayne, fled into Flaunders to the Ladie Margaret Duches of Burgoyne, which euer enuied the proſperitie of king Henry.

Sir John Egremond fled into Flaunders.

When thys fooliſhe enterpriſe was thus quenched, the king gaue commiſſion and charge to Sir Rychard Tunſtall knight, a man of great wit, policie and diſcretion, to gather and receaue the ſubſidie to him due of the people, and he himſelfe returned ſhortly to London, leauyng the Erle of Surrey to rule the Northren partes, perceauing well the Engliſhe men, not ſo much to grudge at the payment of the tare or trybute, as they did grone at the exceſſiue and importable ſumme vpon them aſſeſſed, remembryng the olde prouerbe, loue me little and loue me long.

wyfe the French king, and by her had issue a son called Philip and Margaret which was affied to Charles the seuenth French king & by him repudiate & forsaken was so sore offended & greatly grieued with the Flemings, but most of all with the Gauntoys & Brugians, for kepyng from him perforce his son & heyre duke Philip, which neither by gētle request nor cruel manace would deliuer the son to his naturall father and lawfull parent. Wherfore the king Maximilian assembled a cōpany of Almaines & Duerlanders (for he did not greatly put his cōfidence in the Brabanders nor Hollanders) & made sharpe war on the Flemings, in the which he little preuayled. For the Flemings sent to the French king for aid & succor, which being glad of ẏ request, sent Philip de Creuecure Lord Desquerdes, cōmonly called the Lorde Cordes into the confines of Flaunders with a great armie of men, to ayde and succor the Flemings trusting by that meanes, to obtein both the possession of the yong infant Duke Philip & the whole coūtry of Flaunders. Wherfore Maximilian entendyng to allure the Flemings from the French men, began first to practise with them of Bruges, of which towne the graueſt men, sone cōdiscended and agreed to reason, requiring him to come to their towne, and sent to him with their request, the Scult called Peter Longoll with dyuers other, to aduertise him that at his comming thether, he should find them conformable to his will & request. Upon trust whereof he entred into ẏ towne finally accompanyed, thinking that the lords & Senate would ioyously haue receaued and welcommed him. But the matter turned cleane contrarie, for the light witted persons, to whome peace was treason, taking this occasion to them offered, cryed to harnesse. When they which had brought the king into the towne, saw the tumult of the people, & that no man came to their relief, they left their lord post alone, & fled into corners. The warden of the Smithes was the chiefe of the route, which bade the king to take pacience a whyle, & he should haue a gentle imprisonment, & so conueied him to the house of John Grosse, iudge of the audience. Then the Almaines were al banished the towne, & the lords of Gaunt were sent for, which taried not long. When they had the pray ẏ they expected, first dyuers Citizns which they thought fauorable to Maximilian they beheaded. Mathew Spert, one of his chiefe coūsailors & trusty friends, was sent to Gaunt, & there put to death. Then John Capenoll a busie Marchant, would in all hast haue ridden to induct the French king as their souereigne lord, to whom the most part would in no wise agree nor cōsent, nor yet intended to dishinherit ẏ yong duke Phylip of his grandfathers inheritance.

Mathew Spert.

When execution was done of the wise and sad counsaylers, the newe made rulers caused their Prince king Maximilian to be brought to ẏ towne house, and there they layde to his charge, that he had not obserued the treatie, which they of Gaunt and Bruges had concluded wyth the French king. Secondarily, they alleged that he put high Almaynes in offices and great authoritie, which without their assent would haue chaunged and inhaunced their coyne and money to their great preiudice and detriment. Many other fond and foolishe articles they layde to him, which the eares of euery honest creature knowyng the duetie of the subiect to his prince, would abhorre and detest, to the which he so wisely and boldely answered, that in part he asswaged their malice, and mitigated their rage. Insomuch that he was more gentler intreated then he was before. For if his aunswere had bene to them displeasaunt, pleasaunt, or if he had manaced them but one worde, I thinke in their furie they would haue dispatched him out of his lyfe and lande. The Gauntoys woulde haue delyuered him to the Frenche king, but the Brugians woulde not assent. They of Gaunt desired to haue him in their custodie in Gaunt, but the Citizens of Bruges vtterly denied his deliuerye. Wherefore the Gauntoys in great displeasure departed. After whose departure the Brugians were content to set him at libertie, so that he and diuers of his nobilitye should sweare on the holy Sacrament, not onely to remit, pardon and forgeue all offences perpetrated and committed by them of Flaunders, but also should sweare and promise, neyther to remember nor reuenge the same. Thys othe he sware in the great Church of Bruges, and the Lorde of Rauestō called Philip Mounseur, and the Lorde of Beuers and diuers other sware the same, adding therevnto, that if he did attempt any thing contrary to his othe and promise, then they sware to take part with the good townes of Flaunders agaynst him and his adherents. And vpon this promise he was deliuered, and frankly set at libertie.

Frederick the Emperor

But Fredericke the Emperour coulde not forget the reproch and despite that was shewed to him in his sonne, & the great iniury and wrong that was done to his sonne, partlye to his dishonour, scourged Flaunders wyth sharpe warre and mortall afflictions (Maximilian lyng in quiet, and nothing attemptyng) but Philip Mounseur, Lorde of Rauestō, the which toke his othe with kyng Maximilian, to shew that the warre was renouate without his knowlege and assent, forsooke Maximilian his Lorde, and tooke the townes of Yper & Scleuse with both the Castles of the same Hauen, which he manned, and victeyled, & kept two yeres against the power of Maximilian till he rendred them to Sir Edward Powynynges, sent thether by the kynge of Englande, as you shall hereafter well perceyue. Beside this, the foresayd Philip not only exacted and stirred the Gauntoys, Brugians & other townes of Flaunders, to rebell against their soueraigne Lorde, but also sente to the Lorde Cordes to ayde him to conquere such townes of Flaunders, as were not of their opinion and confederacy. This Lorde Cordes, which vntruelye reuolted from Duke Charles of Burgoyne, beyng his bringer vp and chiefe preferrer to Lewys the French kyng (as you haue hearde before) was glad of this, and so sent to the ayde of the Flemings eight thousande Frenchmen, willyng them to take and conquer such townes, as were in the way betwene Fraunce and Burges, or Calice and Burges. The Captaynes folowyng his deuyse, besieged a litle walled towne, called Dipenew, to whome came foure thousande Flemynges with vittayle and artillery, sent from Philippe Mounseur. They layde siege on the Northside of the towne in a Mary the grounde, then beyng drie, and so deepely ditched their campe, and so highlye trenched it, on which trench they layde their Ordinaunce, that it was in maner impossible to enter into their campe, or to doe them anye displeasure or dammage. The kyng of Englande was dayly aduertised of these doynges, which nothing lesse desired then to haue the Englishe pale and territory enuironed with French fortresses. For he perceaued well that if the Frenchemen gat Dipenewe, they woulde afterwarde assayle Newport and Grauelyng, and consequentlye, what with force, and what with corrupcion of rewardes, their purpose was to haue the possession of Duke Philippe and all

Flaunders,

Flaunders, which ſhould not be to the profit of him nor his ſubiectes. Wherfore ſodainely with great expedition he ſent ouer to the Lorde Dawbeney to Calice, the Lord Morley with a Crew of valiaunt archers and ſouldiours to the number of a thouſand men, wyth priuy inſtructions, what they ſhould do.

When they were landed, they pupbliſhed and ſaide that they came to defende the Engliſh pale, if the Frenchmen or Fleminges woulde attempt any maiſtryes there. But their enterpriſe was all otherwiſe. For on a Tueſday at the ſhuttyng of the gates at night, the Lorde Dawbeney Chiefetayne of the army, the Lorde Morley, Sir James Tirrell, Capitayne of Guyſnes, Sir Henry Willoughby, Sir Gylbert Talbot, Sir Humfrey Talbot, Marſhall of Calice, and diuers other knightes, and Eſquiers, and other of the garriſon of Hammes, Guyſnes and Calice, to the number of two thouſande men, or there about, iſſued priuily out of Calice, and paſſed the water of Graueling in the morning betymes, and left there for a ſtale and to kepe the paſſage, ſir Humfrey Talbot with fiue ſcore Archers, and came to Neweport, where they found the ſoueraigne of Flaunders, with fiue hundred Almaines, and there they commoned, and pauſed that night.

On the next day as they came ſecretly toward Depinew (ſee the chaũce) at a place of execution, neere the high way, was a Gauntoys (which was come out of the army for a ſpie, and apprehended by them of Dipenew) led to hangyng which amongſt the Engliſh men knewe ſir James Tyrrell, and called to him for comfort and ſuccour, promiſing him that if he would ſaue hys lyfe, he would guyde them where they ſhould enter on the Gauntoys, to their honour and aduauntage, and he would be the firſt aſſaylaunt of all the companye. When his promiſe was regarded, after requeſt made to the Borough maiſters and Capitaynes of the towne, he was pardoned but not deliuered. The next day in the morning, after they had ordered their arnie, their guyde conueyed them out at the Southgate of the towne by a high banke ſet with Wyllowes, ſo that the Gauntoys could not well eſpie them, and ſo ſecretly came to the ende of the Campe of their enemies, and there pauſed. The Lorde Dawbeny commaunded all men to ſende their horſes and Wagons back, but the Lorde Morley ſayde he would ryde tyll he came to handſtrokes (but he was deceyued) ſo they paſſed on tyll they came to a lowe banck and no deepe diche, where their Ordinaunce laye, and there the Archers ſhot altogether euery man an arrowe, and ſo fell proſtrate to the grounde, their enemies diſcharged their Ordinaunce all at once, and ouerſhot them, the Archers roſe and ſhot agayne, and bet them from their Ordinaunce. The Almaynes lept ouer the diche with their morish pikes, the Engliſhe men in the forefront waded the diche, and were holpen vp by the Almaynes. and ſet on their enemies, and ſlue and tooke many priſoners. The other Engliſhe men haſted by the cawſey to enter in at the North gate of the Campe, where the Lorde Morley beyng on horſeback in a riche Coate was ſlayne with a Gonne. When hys death was knowne, euery man kylled hys priſoner, and ſlue all ſuch as did withſtand them to the number of eight thouſand men, inſomuch that of two thouſand that came out of Bruges (as the Flemiſhe Chronicle reporteth), there came not home an hundred. There were ſlayne in the ſayde place two chiefe Capitaynes, George Perranet, and Anthony Nyewnhome. On the Engliſhe part was ſlayne the Lorde Morley, ley, and not an hundred mo. The Englishe men tooke their ordinaunce and sent it to Newport with all their spoyle and great horses. And by the waye hearing certayne Frenchmen to be at Ostend, they made thetherward, but the French men fled, and so they burned part of the towne, and came againe to Newport, where the Lorde Dawbeny left all the Englishe men that were hurt or wounded, and carryed with him the dead Corpes of the Lord Morley, and buried it honorably at Calice. This field was profitable to the Englishe men, for they that went forth in cloth, came home in sylke, and they that went out on foote, came home on great horses, such is the chaunce of victory.

The Englishe men had a great victorye.

The Lorde Cordes beyng at Yper with,rr. thousande men was sore discontent with this ouerthrow: wherfore he thinking to be reuenged, came and besieged the towne of Newport strongly (the which Capitaine Monseur de Marwede, before Capitaine of Dipenew, and all the Gentlemen of Westflaunders, and the three principal Cities of Flaunders, and vittayled the French hoste so well, that all thinges was to good cheape) they without shot at the walles, and brake them in many places, and they within sore grieued them without with their artillary. But the Englishe men that were hurt at Dirmewe fielde before, and might eyther stand or drawe Bowe, neuer came from the walles. One day the Frenchmen gaue a great assault to a Tower, and perforce entered it, and set vp the Banner of the Lorde Cordes: But as God would, during the time of the assault there arryued from Calice a Barke with. lxxx. fresh English Archers, which came straight to the Tower. The women of the towne, perceiuyng the English men come, cryed with lamentable and lowde voyces, help Englishmen, help Englishmen, shoote English men, shote Englishmen, so that, what with the helpe of such as before were wounded and hurt men, and of the couragious hartes of the newe come Archers. and the stout stomackes and diligencie of the women, which as fast as the Englishe men strake downe the enemies, the women were redie to cut their throtes, they wanne againe the Tower, and slue the Frenche men, and rent the Banner of the Lord Cordes, and set vp the Penon of saint George. Then the Frenchmen, supposyng a great ayde of Englishmen, to haue beene come to the towne by sea, left the assault. And the night folowyng the couetous Lorde Cordes (which so sore longed for Calice, that he would commonly say, that he would gladly lye seuen yeres in hell, so that Calice were in the possession of the French men) brake vp his siege and shamefully returned to Hesding. And the English men glad of this victory, returned again to Calice.

This yere also, the realme of Scotland suffered an infectious and mortall plague, because the name of James the thirde, king of Scottes was so odious, so hated and disdeyned of the whole Nobilitie of the realme of Scotland, chiefely because they perceyued that he set more by vile borne villaines and light persons, then by the Princes and Nobles of his realme, as I haue declared to you in the historie of king Edwarde the fourth, which mischiefe, and vngrate discommoditie, after they had tollerated and patiently suffred no small tyme to their great grudge and displeasure. They now thought it most expedient for their purpose and welfare, euen by force of armes to recouer their former libertie, and auncient freedome. Therefore makyng priuily a conspiracie together against their Prince and souereigne Lorde, compassed his death and destruction. Yet that it might not be thought that they did entend tend the destruction of their native Countrie, they made the kinges sonne named after his father James, Prince of Rothsay (a childe borne to goodnesse and vertue) their Capitaine, in maner agaynst his will, openly protesting, that they purposed the confusion and deposyng of an euile king, and wretched Prince, and not the subuersion and destruction of their Countrie: by which craftie imagined inuention, they might eyther cloke or put away from them all suspicion, of their purposed vntruth and shamefull disloyaltie. Whereof the king beyng credibly informed, was vered and sore tormented in his minde for this cause in especiall, that he should haue ciuile dissention with his owne subiectes and native Countrimen, yea, and agaynst his owne sonne beyng made Capitaine of that vntrue and peruerse company, whome next to himselfe he loued, fauored, and honored, imaginyng with himselfe that this commotion sounded to none other effect, but that the head should fight and striue with the other members and partes of the naturall bodie: and yet on the other syde, not to resist shortly their newe begon enterprise, might easily encourage and enflame the malicious heartes of his domesticall enemyes, with more boldnesse to attempt farther mischiefe and inconuenience. Therefore to the intent to make a plaister for both these sores to be healed: First to appease and asswage the fury and rumor of the people, being this in a rage, he prepared an armie of men. After that he sent Imbassadours to his sonne and the Nobilitie assembled with him, for a loue, peace, concord, and vnitie to be concluded amongest them. Also he sent letters to the king of Englande and the French king, requiryng them that they would vouchsafe with their good and Godlye counsaile to helpe and assay to mittigate and asswage this furious enormitie of his rude and sauage people, which was practised and begon through the perswasion and procurement of certein pernicious and seditious persons. And besides this, he wrote to the Bishop of Rome Innocent for the same matter, in the which he earnestly desired and prayed him that he would of his goodnesse sende some one Legate to these rebelles of his Nobilitie, to charge and commaund them, that they settyng aside all warre and hostilitie, to embrace quietnesse, rest, and vnitie.

This miserable decrepite and aged king, thinkyng that both delaying and continuance of time, and also the entreatyng and hartie prayers of his friendes and alyes would quenche their inordinate wildenesse and furious rage, and perswade them to sobrietie and good conformitie, had rather with these, and other semblable medicines remedie this yong springyng sore, then he would haue it experimented, & tryed with ciuill battaile, which he thought to be a thing both vngodly and vnnaturall. For all this, no medicine, no counsaile, no wholesome precepts could appease or pacifie the angrie mindes and ragyng wittes of the Scottishe Nobilitie, so much were they addicted and bent to this folly and vnreasonable madnesse. Insomuch, as to the messengers sent from him to them beyng their souereigne Lorde they made thys vnreasonable and vnhonest aunswere, that is: if he woulde resigne the title of his Crowne and Realme, and depose himselfe of his royall dignitie, then they woulde common with him of a peace, or else their eares were stopped from heeryng of any entreatie or perswasion. The same aunswere brought the Imbassadour of England and Fraunce to theyr Princes, which sore lamented the peruerse fortune and mischaunce of their friend the Scottishe king, king, as though they had bene partakers of his affliction: But Adrian the Bishop of Romes Legate, of whom we will speake more hereafter came to late, and as who should say, a day after the faire.

James the thirde king of Scottes shamefully slayne and murdered.

When nothing could moue or pierce the stony harts or frostie mynds of the nobilitie of Scotland: In conclusion they met together in a pitched field, where after great slaughter of many men, the poore sely king fledde into a Mylle for succour, whether he was folowed and prosecuted, and there shamefully murdered, and vnreuerently, (not like a Prince, or a crowned king) left starke naked like a stinkyng carion. Then the Princes of Scotland being saciat and filled with the blood and slaughter of their souereigne Lorde and king (thinkyng that they had well reuenged the olde displeasures to them done and committed by king James the thirde) set vp in the trone and estate royall, the Prince his sonne, & named him James the fourth of that name.

James the fourth king of Scottes consented to the murther of his awne father.

Before this time, as you haue heard, Innocent Bishop of Rome had sent in Legacie Adrian of Castella, a man of Hetruria, borne in the towne of Cornete, called in the old time Newcastell, which should haue gone to Scotland, to haue pacified by his authoritie and commaundement this troublesome businesse, moued and stirred betwene the king and his subiectes. Yet this man, although he made many great iourneyes, when he came to England, was informed of the king, (to whom he had certaine commaundements and messages to say from the Romishe Bishop) that he came to late to accomplishe the commission of his Legacie, assertainyng him that the Scottish king was dead, gently aduisyng him, that he should not moue one foote farther but tary still in England, where he was not past two dayes, but that he was plainly certified by the Bishops of Scotland of the kinges death. This Adrian taried certaine monethes after this in England, and was made much of, and highly commended and lawded to the king by John Morton Bishop of Cauntorbury, which for the good learnyng, vertue, and humanitie, that he sawe and perceyued to be in him, shewed to him all poyntes of humanitie and friendship, that a friend might do to a friend. And vpon his commendation, the king thinking this man worthie to be loked vpon, and mete to do the king pleasure, much phantasied and more fauoured this Legate Adryan, insomuch that he was Orator and solicited his cause, both to Innocent, and also to Alexander the first, Bishops of Rome. And after this, for his diligent seruice, he so loued and fauored him, that he made him Bishop of Herford, and shortly after that resigned and geuen ouer, he promoted him to the Bishoprike of Welles and Bathe. And not long after this Adryan was returned with these honoures to Rome, where he was promoted successiuely by al the degrees of spirituall dignities, into the College and societie of Cardinalles. For Innocent first made him his Collector in England, and also one of the seuen Protho notaries. After this Alexander the first had him as one of his priuie counsaile, and promoted him to the degree of a Cardinall: But who is that I pray you that will marualle at this, which aswell may be geuen to fooles and dizerdes, as to wise and learned men? There is another praise of this Adrian, and the same in maner eternall: The man was of profound learnyng, and knowlege, not vulgare, but straunge, newe, and difficile, and in especiall he was a man of a ripe iudgement, in electyng and choosyng fine termes, and apt and eloquent wordes, which first of our tyme, after that golden worlde of Tullie, moued men with his writyng to immitate and followe the moſt approbate, and allowed aucthours that were of eloquencie, and taught the trade and phraſe to ſpeake fine, pure, frēthe, and cleane latyne, ſo that by his example and document, eloquence flouriſheth at this houre in all places of Chriſtendome, wherefore after my iudgement, ſayth Hall, he is not worthie to be put in oblition: but nowe to my purpoſe.

The Britiſhe affayres in the meane ſeaſon, becauſe that all diſcord was not appeaſed, began again now to flow out and to trouble, and ſet all things in a newe broyle and buſineſſe. For Maximilian king of Romaines beyng without a wife, before this tyme, made ſuyte to Frauncis Duke of Briteyn, to haue in mariage the Ladie Anne his daughter, to the which requeſt the Duke gently condiſcended. And one, which by prorie wooed for him: to the entent that the Ladie ſhould performe that ſhe promiſed on her fayth and honour, he vſed a newe inuention and tricke, after this maner. When the Ladie did take her Chamber, the night after the affiaunce, ſhe was layde naked in the Bride bed, in the preſence of diuers noble Matrones and Princes, called thether as witneſſes. The Procurator or Deputie for the huſband which repreſented his perſon, was layde in the place of her huſband, and put one of his legges into the bed vp to the hard knee, in the ſight and companie of many noble perſonages, as who ſayde that the virgin had bene carnally knowne and ſo the matrimonie perfite and conſummate, and they two as man and wife. But this fonde newe found cerimonie was little regarded, and leſſe eſteemed, of him that onely ſtudied and watched howe to ſurrept and ſteale this Turtle out of her mewe and lodgyng. For Charles the French king (as no man can blame him) was deſyrous and greedy to be coupled in mariage, with ſo great an inheritor, and reputing the marryage made with Maximilian, to be of no validite and effect, the more buſily and inceſſantly he made ſharpe warre, and ſcourged the Briteynes, to the entent he might both haue the Ladie and her Dominions alſo at his will and pleaſure. But he imagined that the king of England would caſt a trumpe in his way, and be an impediment to his purpoſe, by ſendyng into Briteyn a newe armie of Engliſhe men, for he had intelligence by his priuie fautours.

King Henry, and Ferdinando king of Spaine, were fully decreed to ayde, aſſiſt, and defend the Ducheſſe and Duchie of Briteyn, in all ieopardies and aduentures, to the entent that they againſt theyr wil and affection ſhould not be by force compelled to ſubmit themſelues to the ſubiection & grieuous yoke of the French king, for the which cauſe, theſe two Princes were ioyned in league and confederacie, to reſiſt, and to remoue this manifeſt wrong and apparant iniurye. Wherefore he ſent in all poſt haſt the Lorde Frauncis of Lucenborough, Charles Marignane, and Robert Gagine, miniſter of the bone homes of the Trinity, to king Henry for a peace to be confirmed and had, which when they came before the kinges preſence, were accepted and entertayned after the beſt maner. And when they were demaunded of the effect of their meſſage, their requeſt was that king Charles, as chiefe and ſupreme Lorde ouer the ſeignorie and Duchie of Briteyn, might without any ſpot of ingratitude to be imagined or conceyued by king Henry, lawfully order and depoſe at his will and pleaſure, the mariage of Ladie Anne of Briteyne, as his ward and Orphan, without any let and diſturbance of the king of Eng-

lande, or any of his alyes and confederates. King Henry thereto would not condiscend, but still harped on this string, that the virgin, which was lawfully knit in matrimonie with Maximilian king of Romaynes, shoulde not be compelled agaynst her will and promise (beyng contrary to all lawe, right and equitie) to take any other person then him to her spouse and husband, for that it was cleerely repugnant to all veritie and lawe, both of God and man. So when they had lyngred the tyme, and consumed many dayes in vaine argumentes and superfluous reasons, without any of theyr requestes obteyned: after long debating and consultation, they were resolued on this point, least it should be thought that all their Legation had bene in vaine, & brought to no efficacie or purpose, a forme of a league and amitie shoulde be drawne with condicions, clauses and couenauntes. And for the farther furtheraunce of that purpose, it was thought necessary and expedient that the king of England should send Ambassadors to the Frenche king, which in his name, and by his auctoritie might briefely conclude and finishe the league and treatie that was in communication framed and begon. Whereupon king Henrye dismissed the French Ambassadors laden with great and large rewardes into their Countrie, and dispatched and sent straight after them by his commission and auctority, Thomas Erle of Ormond, and Thomas Godston Prior of Christes Church in Cauntorbury his Ambassadours to Charles the Frenche king, instructyng them fully of all thinges that he would haue eyther moued or determined.

Alexander Bishop of Rome.

In thys meane space, Alexander Bychop of Rome the first of that name which succeeded after Innocent, a man full of diligence, and of wit pregnant, sent Lyonell Bychop of Concorde Legate, to the French king for certayne matters, among other thinges, gaue him in charge to conclude a peace and vnitie betwene king Charles and king Henry. When he had declared hys message to the French king fully, and had easily obteyned all things that he required, then he began to moue vnto the French king and his nobles, with a long and prolixe exhortation to make and conclude a perpetuall peace, betwene him and the king of Englande. And when he perceaued the French men to make no great denial of hys request, he determined to attempt and moue king Henry to consent and agree to the same desire and petition: and tooke his iourney towardes England, and at Calice he encountered the Ambassadours both of Englande and of Fraunce, which receyued him into the towne of Calice, with many ceremonies and great reuerence. Where after they had communed the matter a certayne space, as concerning their affayres and busynesse, they departed toward the French king, and the Bychop was transported into England. The king honorably and gently entertayned this Legate Lyonell, and gaue good eare to his pleasaunt and eloquent oration, wherein he perswaded hym with many flattering and glosing wordes, to enter into a league and amitie with king Charles of Fraunce, and the French Nation. To the which request, the king made aunswere that he wouldbe glade and ioyous, if it might be compassed and brought about (after long trouble and pernitious dissention) to liue in peace and mutuall amitie with all christen men. Bychop Lyonell, perceyuing the kings minde and intent went back agayne to Fraunce with all speede and diligence (and as it was meete and decent for the Bishop of Concorde) he determined to extirpate and driue

out of the kings memorie all olde reconynges and iniuries done to him heretofore, and plant if it myght be, in hys hart and minde, the verie goodly and gracious grayne of concorde and vnitie.

The Englishe Ambassadors then beyng with the french king purposed and set foorth articles and conclusions of peace. The french men prudently made aunswere, so that on both parties the matter was pollitiquely and artificially proponed and aunswered. The Englishe Ambassadors, to the entent that they might assent and obtayne a fewe things, which they much desired, required and demaunded many great and diuers things. The french men on the other side, minding to assent to no one demaund, at the ende, did denie and refuse all the Englishe mens desires, and conditions, and were sore angrie and moued with their great requestes and highe demaundes. And in the meane season, trustyng more to their Coffers then to their chiualrie, as the maner of their Countrey is, for to obteyne their purpose, they spared not to disburse and launche out treasure, giftes, and rewardes innumerable, which is the very cause that they conquere more with crownes of Golde, then with speare and shielde, or dynt of sworde in battayle. So that shortly after the french king sent to the noble men of Britteyne great and many rewardes, solicityng and prayeng them all to become hys subiects and vassals. And in especiall he allured and entised the Ladie Anne by such honorable Matrones and Ladyes, as had the gouernaunce and education of her, to confirme her selfe true to him in due obedience and loue, and not disdeyne to be coupled in such a noble mariage, with so high and mightie a Prince, as king Charles was. And least peraduenture the Damosell fearing the rigour of the Ecclesiasticall lawes would not consent to him for offending her conscience and breaking of her promise: To aduoyde that scruple, he caused dyuers to perswade and put in her head and tyttle in her eare, that the mariage made with Maximilian was of no strength and lesse efficacie, considering that it was concluded and made without the consent and wyll of hym, which is the chiefe Lorde and ought to haue the gouernaunce ouer her as his warde, and the whole Duchie of Britteyn, assuring her that she was deluded, and that the mariage with Maximilian was neuer consummate nor perfite. And thys was the very cause that no sure concorde or peace could be concluded and agreed betwene these two Princes. And where as the french king had long kept with him the Ladie Margaret, daughter to Maximilian & her solemply espoused at Amboys, he sayde that that mariage might be lawfully dissolued agayne, because the Lady was of that age, that she coulde neyther be geuen nor yet taken in mariage, for the which cause he might lawfully forsake and honestly put her from him.

By this craft and perswasion they led and entised the fayre mayden, suspecting none euill, and brought her to this poynt, that in conclusion, she beyng proclaymed by diuers, Princes of Britteyne, suborned and corrupted with meede contrary to their duetie and allegeaunce, was content to condiscende and agree to that the French men demaunded, and not onely to submit her selfe to the French king, but also to take him to her make and husbande, by the reason whereof warre might cease, which with violencie and impression of the same, had troubled and afflicted all her whole Countrie. To this mariage agreed all the Nobilitie of Britteyne, which helde of the Frenche part, thinking it verily for the auauncement of the common weale and their eaſe, becauſe to truſt to the power of Maximilian, which was of no puiſſaunce, they thought it vayne and of no efficacie. And when the French king had compaſſed and ordered his matters of thys faſhion, priuily with the Ladye Anne, he haſtened the mariage with all the expedition and diligence that was poſſible: So that the Engliſhe Ambaſſadors returned agayne to their Countrie, and nothing done or agreed vpon their matter.

King Henry, ſtill paciently forbearyng and ſufferyng till ſuch tyme that he perceaued more plainly what way the worlde went: and vnderſtandyng before the returne of his Ambaſſadors, that the Frenchmen meaned none other but playne guyle, and deceipt, determined no more with peaſeable meſſages, but with open warre to finiſh and determine all controuerſies and diſpleaſures betweene him and the French kyng. Wherefore he ſommoned his courte of Parliament, and there declared firſt the cauſe why hee was iuſtlye prouoked to make warre againſt the French kyng: And after deſired them of their benéuolent aide of men and money for the maintenaunce of the ſame. The cauſe of this battail, euery man did allow, and to the ſetting forth of the ſame promiſed all that they could make. The king cõmending them for their true and louyng hartes, to the entent hee might not aggrauate the common people, with paiyng of great taxes, and ſummes of money, whome hys minde was euer to kepe in fauour, woulde firſt exact money by a litle and a litle of the benéuolent minde of the richer ſorte, and this kinde of exaction was firſt practiſed by king Edward the fourth, as it apereth before in his ſtory. Therfore he conſulted with his friendes, to inuent how to gather together a great ſumme of money, and publiſhed abrode that by their open giftes, hee woulde meaſure and ſearch their benéuolent harts and louing minds toward him, ſo that he that gaue moſt ſhould be iudged to be his moſt louing friende, and he that gaue litle, to be eſteemed accordyng to his gift. So by this meanes the king gathered innumerable ſummes of money, with ſome grudge of the people for the extremitie ſhewed by the commiſſioners in diuerſe places.

A benéuolence.

Philip Mounſure.

You haue hearde before howe Philip Mounſure, Lorde of Rauelſtone by the ayde of Bruges and Gaunt had taken the towne, and two Caſtels of Seluce and was become aduerſarie to Maximilian, by reaſon of the three chiefe Cities of Flaunders: Nowe ye ſhall vnderſtande that he did not onelye ſo fortifie as well with munitions as men, both the towne and the two Caſtels, but alſo gat into the Hauen diuerſe ſhippes and Barkes, and by this meanes he ſpoyled and toke priſoners all nations, paſſing eyther by ſea or by lande to the mart at Andwarp, or into Brabant, Zealande, or Friſlande, and was euer plentifully vitteyled out of Fraunce and Picardy to the great dammage of the Engliſhe men, which were ſpoyled daily, and taken priſoners: Which thing Maximilian king of Romaines could not well remedy, nor the kyng of Englande without great coſt and loſſe of men. For to it behoued an armie, both by ſea and lande, for when hee was ſet for by lande, he fled to the ſea: And when he was chaſed on the ſea, he ſought refuge in his two ſtronge Towers, and euer he had ſuccours from Bruges and Gaunt. Newe was a litle towne two myle from Bruges, and a hed ſpring to Seluce. The king of Romanes did oftentymes attempt the apprehending of this towne, to the entent that the Brugians ſhould haue no recourſe to the Hauen of Seluce,

noz the Slupsians shoulde haue no succour out of the towne of Bruges. But there were slayne a great number of gentlemen of Germainy, toz they within made no signe of defence, till all their enemies were in their daunger, and so slewe and destroyed them. There was a great Duke in Almayne, called Duke Albert of the vpper Saxony, a great friend to the king of Romaynes, which made himselfe Neuter, and neuer intermitted with the affayres of Flaunders, a man of no lesse polley, then valiaunt hardinesse. This Duke required of the Lozdes of Bruges, that he might enter peaceably into their towne, accozding to his estate, with a certayne number of men of armes to communicate with them diuers matters of great weyght, and of no smal importaunce, and sent befoze his cariages and herbingers to make pzouision. The estates of Bruges little doubted to admit so small a nũber into so populous a company, ye though the number were double, and especially, because they heard saye that he woulde lodge in the towne all night, wherefoze no man thought of that craftie pollicie that he had inuented. His elected and warlike company entred into the Citie in good ozder, and he folowed, they that went befoze enquired after Innes and lodgings, as though they woulde repose themselues there all night, and so went foozth still in ozder asking foz lodging, till they came to the gate that goeth directly towarde the fozesayde towne of Dam, distant from Bruges a Flemish mile, which is called the Bulwarke of Bruges. The Capitaynes and inhabitantes of the towne of Dam suspectyng no harme to come out of Bruges, thinkyng that their frendes knowyng some sodayne chaunce comming, to haue sent to them aide and succours, and so nothing mistrusting, did let them enter, and take the towne of Damme, and so that towne, which coulde not be wonne by foze of armes, was by a slight and pollicy attrapped and surpzised, to the great detriment, and displeasure of the towne of Bruges, foz now had they no recourse to the Sea, which stop so continuyng, no doubt, but the towne of Bruges muste nedes fall in ruyne and vtter decay.

When Duke Albert of Saxony had gotten Dam, he certefied the kyng of Englande that he woulde besiege Sluyse by lande, if it pleased his maiestie to minister any ayde by the sea. King Henry which was wise, and forecastyng in all his affaires, remembzing that Sluyse was the denne of theues to them that trauerse the seas towarde the East parties, incontinent dispatched sir Edwarde Pownynges, (a valiaunt knight and hardie Captayne) wyth twelue shippes well furnished with bolde souldiours, and strong artillerye. Which sir Edwarde sayled into the hauen, and keyt Philip Mounsure from stertyng by the sea. The Duke of Saxon besieged the one Castell, lyyng in a Church ouer against it, and the English men assaulted the lesse Castel dayly, and issued out of the shippes at the ebbe, and although they stoode in the water to the knees, yet they neuer gaue their enemies one day to rest oz play by the space of .xx. dayes, and euery day slue some of their aduersaries, and on the Englishe part were slaine, Uerre bzother to the Erle of Oxfozd and fiftie mo.

The Lozd Philip of Rauestone, had made a bzidge of Boates betwene both the Castelles, by the which one might succoz the other. Which Bzidge the English men in a night set on fyze. Then he perceiuyng that he must nedes leese his Castelles by foze, and that the Flemynges coulde not ayde him, yelded the Caſtels to Sir Edward Pownyngs, and the towne to the Duke of Saxony, vpon certaine conditions. When the Duke and the Engliſh Capitaine met in the towne, there was betweene them great ſalutations and ſir Edward kept the Caſtelles a while, of whome the Almanes demaunded ſtipend and ſalary, becauſe that the Duke had nothing to pay. Then theſe two Capitaines ſo handled them of Bruges, that they were content not onely to ſubmit themſelues to the Lorde Maximilian, but alſo to pay and diſpatche the Almaynes. And ſo ſir Edward Powninges tarryed there a long ſpace, and returned to the king beſore Boleyn. And ſo they which by reaſonable order, would not be gouerned: by vnreaſonable conditions were brought to conformitie and order.

The.vi.day of Aprill this preſent yere, the king commaunded all the nobilitie of his realme, to aſſemble at the Cathedrall Churche of Saint Paule in London, where after Te Deum ſolempnly ſong, the Archbiſhop of Cauntorbury ſtandyng on the ſteppes beſore the Queere dore, declared to the people, howe the famous Citie of Granado, which many yeres had beene poſſeſſed of the Moores or Mawritane nation, beyng infidels & vnchriſtined people, and nowe of late beſieged by a great tyme by Donfernando and Elizabeth his wife, king and Queene of Spaine, Aragon and Caſtell. And the ſayde infidels, by reaſon of this ſiege brought to great penurie and miſerie, for lacke of vittaile and neceſſary viand, perceiuyng that all ſuccours were clerely ſtopped and kept away from them, and ſo brought into vtter diſpaire of aide or comfort: after long conſultation had amongſt them, rendred themſelues and their Citie, to the ſayd king.

The recouerie of the Citie of Granado from the Turkes.

About this ſeaſon, Maximilian king of Romaynes hauing the vpperhande of the Fleminges, by the ayde of the king of Englande (as you haue heard beſore) entended to reuenge himſelfe of the french king, for that he had forſaken and put away his daughter Lady Margaret, and ſent her home to him, entending as he thought to take to his wife the Lady Anne of Bruteyn. But becauſe he was not of ſufficient habilitie of himſelfe to ſuſteyne and furniſhe the warre, he determined to deſire king Henry to take part with hym. Wherevpon he ſent James Cantibald Ambaſſador, a man of great grauitie, to exhort and require the king of England, to enter his companie and ſocietie in armes, faythfully promiſing on his honour that he would in ſemblable matters of his, take his part with ten thouſand men at the leaſt, for the ſpace of two yeres whenſoeuer he ſhould require him. And becauſe it is his chaunce to trie the fortune of battayle and to moue the warre, he promiſed to certifie king Henry ſire Moneths beſore that he would inuade or occupie the territorie of his enemies. And by thys meſſage Maximilian greatly enflamed and ſet a fyre king Henryes hart to beare with hym. And as he was mynded beſore thys time as you haue heard to ayde and aſſiſt the Britones in the extremitie of their perill, he nowe reconed the time to be come, that he muſt collect an armie to helpe them nowe at a pinche in their moſt perill and daunger, to the intent to reſtore agayne the Britiſhe nation to their auncient libertie, and to expulſe the French nation, which thirſted for the blood and deſtruction of the poore Brytons, and he was the more ardently therevnto encouraged, becauſe he perceaued Maximilian himſelfe ſo earneſtly ſet and bent toward that enterpriſe, and therefore he made hys aunſwere to James

the Ambaſſadour, that he would be aſhamed to be found ſlack or vnprouided at any time of Maximilian hys felow and companion in armes. And ſo theſe matters well brought to effect on both parties, the king diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadour from his preſence.

Thys yere the gate in London called Creplegate, was new buylded at the coſt and charges of Sir Edmond Shaw knight late Maior of London.

Gracious ſtreete Conduyte.

And the ſayde yere was the bewtifull Conduyt in Gracious ſtrete, buylded by the Executors of Syr Thomas Hill knight and Grocer of London, and late Maior of the ſayde Citie, as doth appere by certayne Verſes written vpon the ſame Conduyt.

And this yere in Julie was Henry the kinges ſeconde ſonne borne at Grenewiche beſide London, which ſucceeded his father in the kingdome of Englande by the name of king Henry the eyght.

Charles the French king eſpouſeth Ladie Anne Ducheſſe of Bryteyne.

In this very ſeaſon Charles the french king receaued Ladie Anne as his pupille into his handes, and with great ſolempnitie her eſpouſed, hauing with her for her dower the whole countrey of Bryteyn: and ſo by thys meane the Britons became ſubiect to the french king. Maximilian being certefied of thys, fell into a great rage and agonye, for that he was not content with the forſaking and refuſing of his daughter Lady Margaret, but alſo had taken and rauiſhed awaye from hym his aſſured wyfe Ladie Anne Duches of Bryteyne. And calling vpon God for vengeaunce and punyſhment for ſuche an heynous and execrable fact, cryed out and rayled on him, wyſhing him a thouſand deathes. Yet after that he was pacified, and came to hymſelfe agayne, & had gathered his wyts together, he thought it was moſt expedient to reuenge his honor and dignitie ſo manifeſtly touched with dint of ſworde. And being in this minde, ſent certaine Ambaſſadors to king Henry with his letters, deſiring him with all diligence to prepare an armie, and he himſelfe would doe lykewiſe, to inuade the French kings realmes with fyre, ſworde and blood.

King Henry hearing of this, and putting no diffidence in the promiſe of Maximilian, whome he knewe to haue a deadly hatred and long grudge agaynſt the French king, cauſed a muſter to be made in all the partes of hys realme, and put hys men of warre in a readyneſſe armed and weaponed, according to their feates: beſide thys he rygged, manned and victayled his Nauie readie to ſet forward euery houre, and ſent Currycrs into euery ſhire to haſten the ſouldiours to the ſea ſide.

After the meſſage was declared, there came without any delay an houge armie of men, as well of the low ſort & commonalty, as other noble men, harneſſed and armed to battail, partly glad to helpe their prince & do him ſeruice, and partly to buckle with the French men, with whom the Engliſh men very wyllingly deſyre to cope & fight in open battail. And immediatly, as monition was geuen, euery man with his bande of Souldiours repayred to London.

In armie prouided for the ayde of Maximilian agaynſt the French king.

After that all this armie was arrayed, and euen readie to ſet forwarde, whereof were chiefetaines and leaders, Jaſper Duke of Bedford, & John Erle of Orforde beſide other, the king ſent Chriſtopher Urſwike his Aulmoner, and Syr John Ryſeley knight to Maximilian, to certefie him that the king was all in a redyneſſe, and would ſhortly arryue in the continent lande, aſſone as he were aduertiſed that Maximilian and his men, were readie and prepared to ioyne with him. The Ambaſſadors ſayled into Flaunders, and after their meſſage done, they ſent two letters in all haſt to king Henry, the which not onely ſore vnquieted and vexed him, but alſo cauſed him to take more thought, care and ſtudie on hym then he did before: for they declared that no Prince could be more vnprouided or more deſtitute of men & armure, nor no more lacking all things, appertayning to warre, then was Maximilian, and that he lay lurking in a corner, ſore ſick of the fluxe of the purſſe, ſo that he had neyther men, horſes, munitions, armure nor money, neuertheleſſe his minde and wyll was good, if his power and habilitie had beene correſpondent, and therfore there was no truſt to be put in his ayde or puyſſaunce. Their lettres both diſmayed and made ſorowfull the king of England, which lyke a prudent Prince did well conſider, that it were both ieopardous and coſtly, for him alone to enterpriſe ſo great a warre. And on the other part, if he ſhould deſiſt and leaue of his pretenſed purpoſe, all men might call him coward and recreant Prince. Beſide thys, he thought that his awne nation would not take hys tarying at home in good nor fauourable part, conſidering that ſithe they had geuen ſo large money for the preparation of all things neceſſarie and conuenient for the ſame, they might conceaue in their heades and imagine, that vnder colour and pretence of a diſſimuled warre, he had exacted of them notable ſummes of money, and now the treaſure was once payed, then the warre was done, and his cofers well enriched, and the commons enpouerished. So that at thys time he doubted and caſt perilles on euery ſide and part, and beſide thys, he was not a little ſorie that Maximilian author of this warre did abſent himſelfe, and defraude him of his ſocietie and aſſiſtance. And while he ſtudied and muſed what counſayle he ſhould beſt take in ſuch a doubtfull caſe, he lyke a graue Prince, remembring the ſaiyng of the wiſeman, worke by counſayle, and thou ſhalt not repent thee, aſſembled together al his Lords and other of his priuate counſayle, by whoſe mindes it was concluded and determined, that he ſhould manfully and courageouſly perceauer and proceede in this broched and begonne enterpriſe, recording well with themſelues, and affirming plainely that all chiualrie and martiall proweſſe, the more difficile and heard it is to attayne to, the more renoumed is the glorie, and the fame more immortall of the vanquiſher and obteyner. Therefore by thys counſayle of his friends and Senate, he made proclamation that euery man ſhould ſet forward into Fraunce, and yet openyng how Iudaſly Maximilian had deceaued hym, leaſt that they knowyng the whole fact, ſhould not be ſo courageous to go towarde that battayle and proceede forwarde on their iourney. And therefore to prouide and foreſee all perils and daungers that might enſue, he ſo ſtrengthened and augmented his armie in ſuche number before he tooke ſhip, that he with his awne power might diſcourage and ouercome the whole puyſſaunce of his aduerſaries.

The noble & valiant courage of king Henrie the ſeuenth.

When he had thus gathered and aſſembled his armye, he ſayled to Calice the firſt day of October, and there encamped himſelfe, tarying there a certeyn ſpace to ſee his men harneſſed and apparelled, that neyther weapon nor any engine neceſſary for his iourney ſhould be neglected. At which place all the army had knowlege by the Ambaſſadors, which were newly returned out of Flaunders (for they did not know of it before) that Maximilian could make no preparation for lacke of money, and therefore there was no ſuccor

to be loked for at his hand. At the which report, the Englishe men were nothing abashed nor dismayed, trustyng to their awne puyssaunce & companie.

In the meane season, although the French king was as well with courage replenished, as with men furnished meete to trie a battaile, yet all thys notwithstandyng he made semblaunce, as though he desyred nothyng more then peace, beyng not ignorant that peace to be obteyned was of no small valure and price, and yet he determined to make more expence in gettyng of peace, then in settyng forth of warre, and regarded so much the lesse the treasure to be dispensed for the acquiryng of vnitie and concorde, forasmuch as he was afrayde that he beyng diligent to resist the inuasion of the Englishe men, that the Britons whereof the most part bare the yoke of his subiection contrary to their hartes and mindes, would sodeinly rebell and set themselues at libertie, and plucke their heades out of his Coller, and set vp another Duke & gouernour. And at the same very time he was inuited and desired of Lewys Sforcia Duke of Millain, to warre against Ferdinand king of Naples, at whose desyre he was prest & ioyous, thinkyng that he had that occasion sent to him from God, for the which he long before thirsted & sore wished. The which kingdome he pretended to be due to him by succession, and entended long before to acquire and conquer it by force of armes, as his very right and enheritaunce. For when Reyne Duke of Angeou last king of Scicile, departed without any heyre male of his wife lawfully begotten, he did adopt to his heyre of all his realmes and Dominions, Lewys the .xj. father to the thirde king Charles, to the entent that he should deliuer Queene Margaret his daughter out of the handes of king Edward the fourth, as you haue well before perceyued, wrongfully and without cause disenherityng his Cosyn, Godsonne, and heyre, Rene Duke of Lorayne, and Barre. For the which cause he did the more busily procure and labour for the amitie, fauour, and friendship of his neighbours round about him, that when all thinges were appeased and set in good stay at home, he might the better employ his whole force and puyssaunce on his warre in Italy. Wherefore beyng much desyrous to haue all thinges pacified and set in a perfite concorde and securitie, he sent Philip Creueceur Lorde Cordes his chiefe Counsaylor and diligent officer to entreate and perswade the king of Englande to be reconciled and made againe as a newe friend to the french king. He not forgettyng his message, sent letters to king Henry before he passed the sea, and arriued in the firme lande, by the which he notified to him, that he of his bounden dutie and obseruaunce, which he ought to the king his maister, and to the profite of his realme, would take pain to inuent some meane and way, that his highnesse and king Charles his mayster beyng disseuered in amitie, and made extreme enemyes, onely for the cause of Maximilian newely elected king of Romaynes, should be reducted and brought againe into their pristine estate and accustomed familiaritie, doubtyng not to bring his ship to the port desyred, if it might stand with his pleasure to sende some of his counsaylors to the confines and borders of the Englishe pale, adioynyng to Fraunce, there to here what reasonable offers should be declared and proffered: which condicions of peace should be so reasonable and so ample, that he doubted not, but that he might with his great honour breake vp his campe, and retire his armie backe againe into his awne seignory and dominion.

The French king entreateth the king of England for peace.

The

The king of Englande grauely consideryng that Britayne was clerely lost, and in maner irrecuperable, beyng nowe adioyned to the Crowne of Fraunce by mariage, which Duchie his whole minde was to defende, and that Maximilian what for lacke of money, and what for mistrust that he had in his awne subiectes, lay still lyke a Dormouse nothyng doyng, perceiuyng also that it should be both to his people profitable, and to hym great honour to determine this great warre without losse or bloodshed, appointed for commissioners the Bishop of Exceter, and Gyles Lorde Dawbeney to passe the seas to Calice, to commen with the Lorde Cordes of articles of peace to be agreed vpon and concluded.

When the Commissioners were once met, they so ingeniously and effectuously proceeded in their great affayres, that they agreed that an amitie and peace should be assented to and concluded, so that the condicions of the league should be equall, indifferent, and acceptable to both partes as after shall be declared.

Boleyne besieged.

While the Commissioners were thus consultyng on the Marches of Fraunce, the king of England as you haue heard, was arriued at Calice, where he prepared all thinges necessary for such a iourney. And from thence he remoued in foure battailes, nere to the towne of Boleyn, and there pitched his tentes before the towne, in a place mete and conuenient, and determined to geue a great assault to the towne. In the which fortresse was such a garison of warlike Souldiours, that valiauntly defended the towne, and the same so replenished with artillary and municions of warre, that the losse of the Englishemen assaultyng the towne, shoulde be greater dammage to the realme of England, then the conquerying and gainyng of the same should be gaine or profite. Howbeit the kings dayly shot, rased and defaced the walles of the sayde towne: But when euery man was prest and redie to geue the assault, a sodaine rumor rose in the armie, that a peace was by the commissioners taken and concluded, which brute as it was pleasaunt and delectable to the Frenche men, so it was to the English nation bitter, sowre, and dolorous, because they were prest and redye at all tymes to set on their enemyes, and refused neuer to attempt any enterprice, which might seeme eyther to be for theyr laude or profite: they were in great fumes, angrye, and euill content, railyng and murmuryng amongest themselues, that the occasion of so glorious a victory to them manifestly offred, was by certain conditions to no man, nor yet to the king commodious or profitable, refused, put by and shamefully slacked: But aboue all other, dyuers Lordes and Capitaynes, encouraged with desire of fame and honour, trustyng in this iourney to haue wonne their spurres, which for to set themselues and theyr band the more gorgiously forwarde, had exchaunged and borowed diuers and sundrie summes of money, and for the repayment of the same, had morgaged and layde to gage theyr landes and possessions, sore grudged and lamented at this sodaine peace, and spake largely agaynst the kinges doynges, saiyng and affirmyng, that he as a man fearing & dreadyng the force and puissaunce of his enemies, had concluded an inconuenient peace without cause or reason: But the king as a wise man & most prudent Prince to asswage the indignation & to pacifie the murmour of the people, declared what dammage and detriment, what losse and perdition of many noble Capitaynes and strong Souldiours must of necessitie

ſitie happen and enſue at the aſſault of a towne, and eſpecially when it is ſo well fortified with men and munitions, as the towne of Boleyne at that preſent tyme was: proteſtyng farther, that he might bee iuſtly accuſed and condemned of iniquitie and vntruth, except he did preferre the ſauegarde of theyr lyues, before his awne welth, helth, and aduauntage.

When he had thus prudently quyeted and appeaſed the mindes of hys men of warre, he returned backe againe with his whole armie to the towne of Calice, where he began to ſmell certaine ſecret ſmoke, which was lyke to turne to a great flame, without it were well watched and pollitikely ſene to. For by the craftie inuention and deuiliſh imagination of the Ladie Margaret, Ducheſſe of Burgoyn, a newe pdoll was ſet vp in Flaunders, and called Richard Plantagenet, ſecond ſonne to king Edward the fourth, as though he had bene reſuſcitate from death to life, which ſodeyne newes moze ſtack and fretted in his ſtomacke, then the battaile which nowe was ſet late forward, and moze paine he had (not without great ieopardie of himſelfe) to appeaſe and quenche this newe ſprong conſpiracie, then in makyng peace with the French king his enemie. And ſo he was content to accept and receyue (and not to offer and geue) the honeſt condicions of peace of his enemye profered except hee woulde at one tyme make warre both at home in his awne Countrie, and alſo in foreyne and externe nations. Wherefore king Henry foreſeeyng all theſe thinges concluded with the Frenche king, to the entent that he beyng deliuered of all outwarde enmitie, might the moze quickly prouide for the ciuile and domeſticall commocions, which he perceyued well to bee buddyng out. The concluſion of the peace was thus, that the peace ſhould continue both their lyues, and that the French king ſhould pay to king Henry a certaine ſumme of money in hande, accordyng as the Commiſſioners ſhould appoynt for his charges ſuſtayned in hys iourney: Which (as the king certefyed the Maior of London by his letters the .ix. day of Nouember) amounted to the ſumme of ſeuen hundred. xlv. thouſand ducates, which is in ſterlyng money. The concluſion of the peace.

Alſo in this ſoiourning and beſieging of Boleyne (which we ſpake of before) there was fewe or none killed, ſaupng onely one John Sauage knight, which goyng priuely out of hys pauilion with Sir John Riſely, roade about the walles to viewe & ſee their ſtrength, was ſodaynely trapped and taken of his enemies. And he being inflamed with yre, although he were captiue, of his high courage diſdeyned to be taken of ſuch vileynes, defended his lyfe to the vttermoſt and was manfully (I will not ſay wilfully) ſlaine and oppreſſed, albeit ſir John Riſeley fled from them and eſcaped their daunger.

The king hauing put all things in an order beyond the Seas, did then with ſpeede returne into Englande, and firſt of all things he elected into the ſocietie of ſaint George, commonly called the order of the Garter, Alphonſe Duke of Calabres ſonne, according to his deſire, which Alphonſe was ſonne and heyre to Ferdinand king of Napels, and after king of the ſame realme, tyll he was ouercome by king Charles. And after, the king ſent Chriſtopher Urſewyke, Ambaſſadour with the Garter, Coller, Mantell, and other habiliaments apperteyning to the companions of the ſayde noble order. Which Ambaſſadour arryuing at Naples, delyuered to the Duke the whole habite, with all the ceremonyes and due circumſtaunces therevnto belonging. Which the Duke very reuerently receaued, and with more reuerence reuested himſelfe with the ſame in a ſolempne preſence, thinking that by thys apparell and inueſtiture, he was made a friend and companion in order with the king of Englande, whoſe friendſhyp obteyned, he feared nothyng the aſſaults or inuaſions of his enimies. And thys was the cauſe that he deſired ſo much to be companion of that noble order, firmely beleeuing that the king of Englande ſouereigne of that order, ſhould be ayder and maintayner of hym agaynſt the French king, whome he knew would paſſe the mountaynes and make warre on hym. But this cuſtome of aſſiſtence in orders was, eyther neuer begonne, or before clerely abolished: For in our time there haue bene many noble men of Italy, companions as well of the Golden Fleſe in Burgoyne, as of the order of Saint Mighell in Fraunce, that haue beene baniſhed and driuen away from their naturall Countrey, and yet haue not bene ayded by the ſouereigne nor companions of the ſame order. For ſurely the ſtatutes and ordinaunces of all the ſayde orders doth not binde them to that caſe, but in certayne poynts. After thys the Duke diuiſed the Ambaſſadour, and rewarded him moſt Princely.

But now let vs retorne to the new ſonne of king Edward: And firſt to declare his lignage and beginning you muſt vnderſtand that the Duches of Burgoyn ſo nouriſhed and brought vp in the ſedicious and vnhappie factions of falſe contriuers and founders of diſcorde, coulde neuer ceaſe nor be in quyet, except ſhe ſhoulde trouble and vnquyet the kyng of Englande, for no deſert or diſpleaſure by him to her committed; but onely becauſe he came and deſcended of the houſe of Lancaſtre, euer being aduerſe and enimie to her lyne and linage. For which only cauſe ſhe compaſſed and inuented how to caſt a ſcorpion in his boſome, and to infect his whole realme with peſtiferous diſcorde. To the intent that he being vanquiſhed and brought to confuſion, both the boyling heate of her malicious hart might be fully ſaciated with his innocent bloude, and alſo aduaunce and preferre ſome darling of her faction to his Empire, rule and dignitie. And principally remembring that the Earle of Lincoln, which was by her ſet forth and al his company had ſmall fortune and worſe ſucceſſe in their progreſſion and enterprice, contrarie to her hope and expectation ſhe begaune to deuiſe and ſpinne a new webbe. And as the deuill prouideth venemous ſauce to corrupt banckettes, ſo for her purpoſe ſhe eſpied a certaine young man, of viſage beutifull, of countenaunce demure, of witte ſubtile, craftie and pregnaunt, called Peter Warbecke. And for his baſtard cowardnes of the Engliſhmen, in deriſion called Perkin Warbeck, according to the duche phraiſe, which chaunge the name of Peter to Perkin, to ponglinges of no ſtrength nor courage: Which yong man trauelyng many countreys, coulde ſpeake Engliſh and many other languages, and for his baſeneſſe of ſtocke and birth was knowne of none almoſt, and onely for the gaine of his lyuing from his childhoode was of neceſſitie compelled to trauaile diuerſe realmes and regions. Therefore the Duches thinkyng to haue to haue gotten God by the foote, when ſhe had the deuill by the tayle, and adiudging this yong man to be a meete organe to conuey her purpoſe, and one not vnlike to be the Duke of Yorke, ſonne to her brother king Edward, which was called Richard, kept him a certaine ſpace with her priuily, and him with ſuch diligence inſtructed, both of the ſecretes, and common affayers of the realme of England, and of the lignage, diſſent & order of the houſe of Yorke, that he lyke a good Scholer not forgetting his leſſon coulde tell all that was taught him promptly without any difficulty: & beſides, he kept ſuch a princely countenaunce, and ſo counterfeyte a maieſtie royall, that all men in maner did firmely beleue that he was extracted of the noble houſe and familie of the Dukes of Yorke. For ſuerly it was a gift geuen to that noble progenie as of nature in the roote planted that all the ſequele of that lyne and ſtocke did ſtudy and deuiſe how to be equyualent in honor and fame with their forefathers and noble predeceſſors.

When this Duches had framed her cloth mete for the market, and imagined that all thinges was readye and prepared for the confuſion of king Henrie, ſodeinly ſhe was enformed that the ſayde king of England prepared a puiſſant armie againſt Charles the French king. Then ſhe conſidering the opportunitie of the time, as who woulde ſaye, a time wiſhed and a daye deſyred to achieue and bring to paſſe her malicious inuention. Wherefore ſhe ſent Perkyn Warbeck, her new inuented Mawmet firſt into Portingall, and ſo craftelie into the realme of Irelande, to the entent that he being both wyttie and wylye might moue, inuegle and prouoke the rude and ruſticall Iriſhe nation (being more of nature enclined to rebellion then to reſonable order) to a new conflict & ſedicious commocion. This worſhipfull Perkyn, arriuing in Ireland, whither it were more by his craftie witte, or by the malitious exhortacion of the ſaluage Iriſh gouernors, within ſhort ſpace entred ſo farre into their fauoures, and ſo ſeriouſlye perſwaded and allured them to his purpoſe, that the greateſt Lordes and Princes of the countrie gaue ſuch fayth and credit to his wordes, as that thing had bene true in dede, which he vntruly ſet forth & declared: And as though he had bene the very ſon of king Edward, they honored, and exalted him with all reuerence and due honoure, promiſing vnto him ayde, comfort and aſſiſtaunce of all thinges to the feat of warre, neceſſarie and appertayning.

Perkin Warbeck arriued in Ireland.

In the meane ſeaſon theſe newes were made knowne to Charles the French king, then being in diſpleaſure with king Henry, which without delay ſent for Perkyn into Irelande, to the intent to ſende him againſt the king of England which was inuading Fraūce (as you before haue heard.) This fleming Perkyn was not a litle ioyfull of this meſſage, thinking by this onely requeſt to be exalted into heauen, when he was called to the familiaritie and acquaintaunce of Kinges and Princes: and ſo with all diligence ſayled into Fraunce, with a verie ſmall naule, not ſo ſmall as ſmally furniſhed. And comming to the kings preſence was of him royally accepted, & after a princely faſhion entertained, & had a gard to him aſſigned, whereof was gouernor the lorde Congreſhal. And to him at Paris reſorted Syr George Neuell baſtard, Syr John Tayler, Rouland Robinſon and an hundred Engliſh rebelles. But after that a peace, as before is ſaid was apoynted and concluded betwixt him and the king of England, the ſaid king Charles diſmiſſed the yong man, and would no lenger kepe him. But some men saye which were there attending on him, that he fearing that kyng Charles, woulde deliuer him to the king of Englande, beguiled the Lorde Congreshall, and fled away from Paris by night. But whether he departed without the French kings consent or disassent, he deceiued in his expectacion, and in maner in dispaire, retourned againe to the Lady Margaret his first foolish foundresse.

The Duches thinking euery houre from his departure a whole yere, vntill such time as she heard from him, and effectuously desiring to knowe which way Ladie fortune turned her wheele, hearing him to be reiected out of the French court was in a great agony and much amased: But when shee was asserteyned of his arriuall in Flaunders, shee no lesse reuiued, then he that hath in stead of the sworde of execution, a pardon and restitution of his lyfe. And at his comming to her presence, she receaued him with such gladnesse, and with such a comfort (as in dede she could dissemble alone aboue all other) as though she had neuer seene nor knowne him before, that what in trust to preferre him to the preheminence by her ymagined, and what for the hope that she had to destroy king Henry, shee fell into such an vnmeasurable ioy, that she had almost lost her wyt and senses. And that thys her gladnesse might be notefied and made apparaunt to euery man, she first reioyced of her Nephewes helth and welfare: And secondarily she much thirsted and sore longed, not once, but dyuers and sundrie times in open audience, and in solempne presence to here him declare and shewe by what meanes he was preserued from death and destruction, and in what Countries he had wandered and sought friendship: And finally, by what chaunce of fortune he came to her court and presence. To the entent that by the open declaration of these feyned phantasies, the people might be perswaded to geue credite and beliefe that he was the true begotten sonne of her brother king Edward. And after this ioye alligned him a garde of thirtie persons in Murrey and blewe, and highly honoured him as a great estate, and called hym the whyte Rose, Prince of Englande.

Perkyn was named the Prince of Englande.

By reason whereof the Nobilitie of Flaunders were to hym diligent, and wyth due reuerence did him all the pleasure that laye in their power or offices. And to be short, the more that this poeticall and feyned inuention was shadowed with the pretence of sincere veritie, the more sayth and assured credence, was geuen to it. In so much, that many one thought hym to be preserued, onely by the will and mightie power of almightie God, and to be conueyed at the first daunger by some faythfull friend of king Edward his father into some straunge Countrie, and so escaped the violent tirannie of hys Uncle king Richard. The fame and brute of thys iuggled miracle was almost in one moment blowne ouer all the Countrie of Flaunders, but in England it was blased in euery place soner then a man could thinke or deuise it: In which Countrie more then in other places it was receaued for an vndoubted truth, and that not onely of the common people, but also of diuers noble and worshipfull men, of no small estimation, which sware and affirmed it to be true. After this brute that Richard sonne to king Edwarde was yet liuyng, and had in great honor amongst the Flemynges, there began sedition to spring on euerie side. For not onely they that were in Sanctuaries, for great and heynous offences by them committed, but also manye other that were were fallen into debt, and doubtyng to be brought to captiuitie and bondage, assembled together in companies, and were passed ouer the Sea into Flaunders to their counterfayte Richarde sonne to king Edwarde, otherwise named Perkyn Warbeck. After this many of the noble men conspired together some through rashnesse and hastie credite induced therevnto, some beyng so earnestly perswaded in their awne conceipt, as though they knewe perfitly that thys Perkyn was the vndoubted sonne of king Edward the fourth, solicited, stirred and allured to their opinion all such as were friends and fauorers of the house of Yorke. Other through indignation, emule and auarice, euer grudging and thinking they were not sufficiently rewarded for their paines and partes taken in the kings behalfe and quarrell. Other whome it grieued and vexed to see the worlde stande still in one staye, and all men to lyue in peace and tranquilitie, desirous of some chaunge, ranne headling into that furie, and seditious coniuration.

Thys rumour and vayne fable of this twise borne Duke Rychard, deuided all Englande, and drewe the realme into partakings and seuerall factions, so that the mindes of all men were vexed eyther with hope of gayne and preferment, or with feare of losse and confusion. Albeit the king and his counsayle and other his faythfull friendes, not a little marueyled that any person (beyng in his right wyt) could induce in his minde or finde in his hart falsely to thinke that such a pernitious fable & feyned matter should haue any truth in it. Notwithstanding many of the Noble men (as he well then perceaued) tooke and reputed it to be a thyng true and vnfeyned. So that he then sawe as farre as Lynx with his bright eyes, that thys newe inuented fable would make some broyle and discorde in his realme: Except it were manifestly published and openly declared to be a feyned fable, and a craftie imagined mischiefe. Other persons, to whome warre, sedition, and strife, were as pleasaunt as delicate fare, were very ioyous of these newes, beleuing no fraude nor decepte to be hidden vnder this golden tale, and therefore they determined to send messengers, to the Ladye Margaret to knowe when Richarde Duke of Yorke might come conueniently into Englande, to the intent that they beyng thereof certefied, might be in a redynesse to help and succour him at his first arryuall.

Vaine rumors caused great troubles.

So by the common consent and agreement of the coniured confederats, sir Robert Clifford knight, & sir William Barley were sent into Flaunders, which playnely shewed to the Duches all the secret intents and priuie counsayles of the friendes and fauourers of the newe found Duke. The Duches this message did gladly accept, & louingly imbrace, and of their tydinges was not a little ioyous, easily by hir perswasion inducing to their heades, that all things that were spoken of Duke Richarde were true and vnfeyned. And afterward brought them to the sight of Perkyn, the which counterfeyted the countenaunce and the maner and fashion of Richarde Duke of Yorke, praising his vertues and qualities, with the which he was indued aboue the Mone. The sayde Sir Robert Clifford, when he had sene and well aduised the yong man, beleued surely that he was extracted of the blood royall, and the very sonne of king Edward the fourth, and thereof he wrote a letter of credite and confidence into Englande to his companyons and felowes of his conspiracie, & to put them out of all doubt he affirmed that he knew him to be king Edwardes sonne by his face and other lyniaments of his body. And when these letters came to England, the Chiettaynes of this businesse, to the entent to stirre the people to some new commotion and tumult, & to set foorth some cause of matter apparaunt, caused it openly to be diuulged & published, that it was true and not feyned that was spoken and sayde abroade of the Duke of Yorke: but it was done by such a secret craft, that no man could tell who was the author and founder of that rumour.

When the king perceaued that this vayne fable was not banished out of the mad brepnes of the commen people, he thought it expedient both for the sauegarde of himselfe and also of his Countrey, to prouide some remedie to represse this immynent mischaunce, not a little suspecting, that some conspiracie had bene concluded and agreed, because that Sir Robert Clyfford had late fled priuily into Flaunders. Wherefore he sent certayne knightes that were chosen and picked men of warre, with a band of Souldiours into euerie part to keepe the shores and the Sea costes surely, that no man might passe ouer into anye forepne lande beyonde the Sea, nor repasse into thys realme without search or pasport or sauecondupt by him geuen, & all streytes passages, and bye pathes were kept and searched, so that no man vnapprehended could passe to the Sea coast, nor make any conuenticle or assemble without he were espied and taken. And to the intent that many men, beyng both of England and other places for derie malice by this newe inuention enflamed and indurate, should no farther runne in their madnesse, he secretly sent wise espialles to all the Cities of the lower Fraunce, within the Archedukes dominion, and the confines of the same, to search and prie out of what progeny this misnamed Richarde was dissended and brought forth, promising highly to rewarde and thanke such persons, which would manifest and open the secret doubtes and deuises of the same matter: and beside thys he wrote to his trusty freendes to do the same. So they sailynge into fraunce deuided and seuered themselues euery man into a symite and prouince. And when certayne of them repayred to the towne of Turnay, they were there certefied by the testimony of manye honest persons that this feyned Duke came but of a low stocke, and of a base parentage, and was named there Peter Warbecke. And so shortly after the kinges inquisitors returned in Englande, reportyng to the king what they had knowen and hearde: Of which thing the king was also more plainly certified by his trustie and faythfull friendes, both by letters and trustie messengers.

Wherevpon seyng that now the fraude was openly espyed, he determined to haue it published and declared with all diligent celeritie, both in the realme of England, and also in all partes beyond the sea, in the pronynces of forepn Princes, and straunge Potentates. And for the same cause he sent to Philip Archeduke of Burgoyn, and to his counsaylors (because that he was not yet of full age, apt and conuenient to take the regiment of his Countries and seignories) Sir Edward Powninges, a valiant knight, and Sir William Warram Doctor of the lawes, a man of great modestie and learnyng, that they should openly to them declare, that the yong man beyng with the Ladie Margaret, was discended of a base and obscure parentage, and that he had falsely and vntruly vsurped the name of Richarde Duke of Yorke, which long before was murthered with his brother Edward in the Tower of London, by the commaundement of king Richard theyr Uncle, as many men liuyng can testifie. And to thinke and say otherwyse then this that apertly is knowne, it were the highest poynt and degree of madnesse, forasmuchas it is probable by an inuincible reason, and an argument infallible, that king Richard their naturall vncle, in dispatchyng and destroiyng Prince Edwarde the eldest sonne of king Edwarde his brother, was in no surette of his realme or vsurped dominion, if he had permitted Richard the yonger son to liue and continue: For then might he as next heyre to his brother haue lawfully and by iust title claymed the Scepter and Diademe royall, which was his fathers, and after diuoluted to his elder brother. And therefore they should desyre the Archeduke, and the Princes of his Counsayle, that it would please them to geue no credite, nor themselues suffer any more to be blinded or seduced with such mere impostures and craftie illusions being full of vntruth and apparant falsehed, nor yet to ayde or assist such a craftie marchant, which had falsely fayned his name and stocke, and in especially agaynst him, which in fewe yeres passed, had succoured and relieued Martinilian their Lorde beyng sore oppressed, and almost ouercome, both with the exfort power and puyssaunce of the French king, and also with the cruile discorde, and intestine rebellion of his awne subiectes and Uassals. With these commaundementes the Ambassadours sayled into Flaunders, and were there gently receyued, and louyngly enterteyned of the Archeduke Philip and his Counsaile. And after that they were commaunded to declare the intent of their Legation, Doctor William Warram priest, made before them a pleasaunt and an eloquent oration, shewyng therein discretely the mynde and desyre of the king his mayster: And in the latter ende of his oration, he a little rebuked the Ladie Margaret, and hit her on the thombes, saiyng that shee nowe in her olde age, within fewe yeres had produced and brought forth two detestable monsters, that is to say, Lambert (of whome reherfall was made before) and the other Perkyn Warbeck. And beyng conceyued of these two great babes, was not of them deliuered in eyght or nine monethes as nature doth require, and as all other women commonly do, but in the .C. and. lxxx. monethes, she brought them forth out of her wombe: for both these at the least were fiftene yeres of age before that she woulde bee brought in bed of them and shewe them openly.

And when they were newly crept out of her wombe they were no infantes, nor suckyng children, but lustie ponglynges, and of age sufficient to bid battaile to kinges. Althoughe these tauntes and iestes did anger and trouble the Ladie Margaret, yet Perkin was more vered and encombred with the thinges declared, in this oration, and in especiall because his fraude, and falle feyned iuggelyng was brought to light & opened: yet the Duches beyng therewith more incenced then quenched, nothing refraynyng her olde malice and cancard hatred, but entendyng to cast hote Sulpher to the newe kindled fyre, determined clerely to arme and set forwarde pretie Perkyn agaynst the king of England with speare and shield, might and mayne.

When the Ambassadors had done their message, and the Archedukes Counsaile had long debated whether Perkyn were the true sonne of King Edward the fourth, they aunswered the Ambassadors: that to the entent to haue the loue and fauour of the king of England, assuredly after that tyme, the Archeduke nor they would neyther ayde nor assist Perkyn nor his Complices, in any cause or quarell. Yet notwithstandyng, if the Ladie Margaret persistyng and continuyng in her malice towardes the king, would be to him aidyng and helpyng, it was not in their power to let or withstande it, for because she in the landes assigned to her for her dower, might frankely and freely do and order all things at her owne wyll and pleasure without contradiction of any other gouernor.

1493 9 When this aunswere was geuen to them, they returned againe into England. After that, king Henry lokyng circumspectly to his matters, purposed to pacify the stormes and blastes that he perceyued to be growyng, rather by policie and counsaile, then by doubtfull warre and manslaughter, if his nobilitie would therevnto condiscend. For he well considered that of one busynesse ryseth another, and of one small sparcle commeth a great flame. And therfore streight he sent forth certain espialles into Flaunders, which should feine themselues to haue fled vnto the Duke of Yorke, and by that meanes serche foorth and seeke out the whole entent of theyr coniuration, and after what way they entended to proceede in the same. Other were sent also to allure and entice Sir Robert Cliffords, and William Barlye to returne into England, promisyng to them franke and free pardon of all offences and crymes committed, and promocions and rewardes, for obeiyng to the kinges request. These Sypes so trauayled in their affayres and busynesse, that they brought to passe all thinges to their maisters desyre. For first they had perfite knowlege of the names of certaine conspirators agaynst the king. After they perswaded sir Robert Clifford to leaue off that foolishe opinion, which had no sure ground nor foundation to stay it selfe vpon. Albeit William Barley could not be brought from his begon enterprice, but that he would go forwarde hedlong with the same, which taryed not long in that lewde opinion. For within two yeres after this, he repentyng him of his foly, beyng reclaymed, and hauyng pardon geuen him of the king, repayred home to his native Countrie, detestyng him and his foolishe blindenesse. When the espials had sped their purpose, one after another stale away priuily from the fayned Duke, and returned into Englande, bringyng wyth them the names of certaine, which were chiefe of that conspiracie. Other taryed still behinde to accompanie sir Robert Clifford, when he returned againe into England, whose returne marueylously discomfited and abated the courages, and hartes of the coniurators, for they perceyued dayly that their enterprice more and more fainted, and that they were by a little and little damnified and hurted. And yet they sawe no man whome they might perfitely put diffidence in, nor yet once mistrust.

The chiefe of the conspiracy to haue aduaunced Perkyn Warbeck and to haue deposed king Henry the seuenth.

When the king had knowlege of the chiefe Capitaynes of thys tumult by the ouerture of his spies, which were returned, he caused them all to bee apprehended, and brought to London before his presence. Of the which the chiefe were John Ratcliffe Lorde Fitzwater, sir Simond Mountford, sir Thomas Twhaytz knights, William Dawbney, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Cressenor, and Thomas Astwood. Also certaine priestes and religious men, as sir William Richeford Doctor of diuinitie, and sir Thomas Poynes, both Friers of Saint Dominikes order, Doctor William Sutton, sir William Worsely Deane of Paules, and Robert Leyborne, and sir Richard Lessey.

Other

Other that were guiltie of the same cryme, heeryng that many of theyr company were taken, fled and tooke Sanctuary. And the other that were taken were condempned all of treason, of the which there was behedded, Sir Symound Mountfort, syr Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeney, as aucthours and chiefe Capitaynes of this businesse. The rest were pardoned, Also sir John Ratcliffe Lorde Fitzwater, was pardoned of his lyfe, but after that he came to Calice, and there layd in holde, he was behedded, because he corrupted the kepers with many promises to haue escaped out of the same entendyng as was thought to haue gone to Perkyn.

King Henry of England, partly grieued with the king of Romaynes for breakyng his promise, when he should haue associated him in his iourney agaynst the French king, and partly displeased with the Flemynges, but principally with the Lady Margaret, for kepyng and settyng forwarde Perkyn Warbecke, not onely banished all Flemishe wares, and marchandises, out of his realme and dominions, but also restrained all Englishe marchaunts from their repayre and traffique, into any of the landes and territories of the king of Romaynes, or the Archeduke his sonne, causyng the Marte of Marchandises and commodities of this Realme to be kept at his towne of Calice. wherefore the sayde king and his sonne banished out of their landes and seignories all Englishe clothes, yarne, tynne, leade, and other commodities, vpon great forfeytures and penalties. The restraint made by the king sore grieued and hindred the Marchantes, beyng aduenturers: For they by force of this commaundement had no occupiyng to beare theyr charges and support their continuance and credite. And yet one thing sore nipped their harts, for the Easterlynges which were at libertie, brought into the realme suche wares as they were wont and accustomed to doe, and so serued their customers through out the whole realme: By reason wherof the maisters beyng destitute of sale and traffique, neyther reteyned so many couenaunt seruants and apprentices as they before were accustomed, and in especiall, Mercers, Habardashers, and Clothworkers, nor yet gaue to their seruauntes so great stipend and salarie, as before that restraynt they vsed to do. For which cause the sayde seruauntes entendyng to worke their malice on the Easterlynges, the Tuesday before Saint Edwardes day came to the Stiliard in London, and began to rifle and spoyle such Chambers and Warehouses as they could get into: so that the Easterlynges had much a do to withstand and repulse them out of their gates. And when their gates were shut and made fast, the multitude rushed and beate at the gates with Clubbes and Leuers to haue entred, but the Easterlynges by the helpe of Carpenters, and Smythes, which came to their ayde by water out of the Borough of Southwarke had so strongly shored and fortefyed themselues, that they could not preuail. The Maior of London heeryng of this ryot, assembled the Maiestrates and officers of the Citie together, and so beyng furnished both with men and weapon, set forward toward the Stiliard. Assone as the commyng of the Maior was declared and knowen to the riotous persons, they fled away lyke a flock of sheepe: howbeit he apprehended diuers of the malefactors, and committed them to seuerall prisons. And vpon the inquirie before the kinges Commissioners, there were found guiltie aboue. lxxx. seruauntes & apprentices (and not one housholder) which were confederate together to make this attempt, and swoorne in no wyse to discouer or reuele the same: Whereof, some that were the Chiefteynes and beginners of this mischieuous riot, were sent to the Tower, and there long continued. But in conclusion, because none of their maysters were founde tresspassers of this naughtie act, the king of hys goodnesse pardoned their offence, and restored them to their libertie.

1494 10 Shortly after, syr Robert Clifford, partlye trusting on the kings promise, and partly mistrusting the thing, bicause he knew that diuers that were accused to be partakers of that faction and conspiracie were put in execution: and therfore perceyuing that there couldenot be a more pernicious nor more desperate begonne thing then that deuilishe enterprize, retourne disdeynlye againe into Englande. The kinge beinge certefied before of his comminge, went streight to the Towre of London the morow after the day of Epiphany and there taried till such time that syr Robert Clifford was there presented to his person, which thing he vsed vnder this pretence, that if Syr Robert Clifford had accused any of the Nobilitie to be partakers of this naughtie felowship and deuilish pretence, that then euery such person might be called thether without suspection of any euill, & there straight to be attached & cast in holde.

But before I go any farther I will shew the opinion that at that tyme raune in many mens heddes of this knyghtes going into Flaunders. Some men helde this opinion, that king Henrie for a policye did send him as a spye to Flaunders, or else he woulde not haue so sone receyued him into his grace and fauour agayne: Neuertheleſſe, this is not like to be true by diuers reasons and apparaunt arguments, first after that attempt begon by syr Robert, he was in no small daunger himselfe, and by that he was not a litle noted, and his fame blemished, but also his friendes were suspected and had in a iealosy. Secondarily he was not after that in so great fauour, nor so estemed with the kyng as he had beene in times past, bicause he was blotted and marked with that crime and offence. And therfore he bearing his fauour to the house of Yorke entending in the beginning to administer displeasure to king Henry, sayled to the Lady Margaret, being seduced and brought in beliefe that Perkyn was the verie sonne of king Edwarde. But to my purpose, when syr Robert came to the presence of the king, he kneeling on his knees most humblie, beseched him of grace and pardon, which he shortly obtayned. And after that beyng requyred of the maner and order of the conuiracion, and what was done in Flaunders, he opened euery poynt to his knowlege, & after disclosed the names, as well of the ayders and fautours as of the deuisers and beginners. Amongst whom he accused syr William Stanley, whom the king had made his chiefe chamberlein, and one of his priuie counsaile. When he had so sayde, the king was greatly dismayed and grieued, that he should be partaker in that grieuous offence, considering first that he had the gouernaunce of his chamber, and the charge and comptrolment of all such as were next to his body, and also calling to remembrance the manifolde gentlenesse and friendship, which he had receaued at his hande, but in especiall not forgetting that benefite aboue all other, that only by his aide and succour, he had vanquished and ouerthrowen his mortall enemy king Richard. Wherefore, at the beginnyng he could in no wise be perswaded nor beleue that he was such a priuye conspiratour, or malicious offender, but when the cryme was openly proued and probably affirmed, then the king caused him to be restrayned from his libertie in his awne Chamber within the quadrate Tower. And there appoynted him by his priuie counsaile to be examined. In which examinacion he nothing denyed, but wisely and seriously did consent and agree to all thinges layde to hys charge, if he were in anye of them culpable or blame worthye.

The report is, that this was his offence. When communication was had betwene him, and this sir Robert Clifford, as concernyng Perkyn which falsely usurped the name of king Edwardes sonne, Sir William Stanley sayd and affirmed there, that he would neuer fight nor beare armour agaynst the yong man, if he knew of a truth that he was the vndoubted sonne of king Edward the fourth. This poynt argueth and proueth him at that tyme, beyng moued with melancholye, to beare no great good will to king Henry, whereof suspicion first grewe, and after this ensued the accusation of Sir Robert Clifforde.

Then the king doubtyng what to do with him, did consult and breath with himselfe of this sodaine chaunce. For he feared least that his brother Lord Thomas Stanley, in whome he had found great friendship, woulde take this matter greuously. And if he should remit that fault, that he abusing his lenitie and mercie, woulde be the more bolder to offende, and trespasse more highly. Albeit at the last, seueritie tooke place, and mercy was put back, and so he was arreigned at Westminster, and adiudged to die, and accordyng to that iudgement was brought to the Tower hill the .xvj. day of Febzuary, and there had his head stricken off. What was the occasion and cause why the sincere and faythfull minde that sir William alwayes before bare to king Henry, was turned into cancard hatred and despite, and why the especiall fauour that the king bare towarde him was transmuted into disdeyne and displeasure, dyuers men allege dyuers causes, affirmyng that when king Henry (what other mutuall benefites the one had receyued of the other, I wyll now preterinit and ouerpasse) in that battail in the which he bereft king Richard both of his life and his kingdome, being associate and accompanied but with a small number, and circumuented by king Richardes armie, and in great ieopardie of his life, this Sir William beyng sent from the lord Stanley his brother with a good companye of strong and hardie men (which Lord Stanley was nere the fielde with a great armye) came sodainly and fortunately to the succours of king Henry, and saued him from destruction, and ouerthrewe king Richard as before you haue heard. Surely this was a benefite aboue all benefites to be remembred, by the which king Henry was not only preserued aliue, but also obteyned the Crowne and kingdom, which great benefite, after the kingdome once obteyned, he did neyther forget, nor yet left vnrewarded. For the Lorde Thomas Stanley he inuested with the sword of the countie of Darbie, and beside other great giftes and offices geuen to William Stanley, he made him his chiefe Chamberleyn. This Sir William, although he were in great fauour with the king, and had in great and high estimation, more remembring the benefite done to the king, then the rewardes and gratuities of his liberalitie receyued, thinkyng that the vessell of Dile (accordyng to the Gospell) would ouerflow the brimmes, and as some say, desiryng to be Erle of Chester, and thereof denyed, beganne to grudge and disdeyne the king his highe friende: and one thing encouraged him him much, which was the riches and treasure of king Richard, which he only possessed at the conflict of Bosworth: by reason of which abundaunce of riches, and great power of people, he set naught by the king his souereigne Lorde and Maister. When the king perceyued that his stomake beganne to canker and ware rustie, he was with him not a little displeased, and so when both their hartes were enflamed with melancholy, both lost the fruit of their long continued amitie and fauour. And so it often chaunceth, that when men do not consider nor yet regarde the great benefites to them exhibited, they rendre againe hatred for liberalitie, and for bread geuen, they yelde againe Scorpion. Nowe to returne to the matter.

At this time the king thought it best, yea and very necessary, not only to take hede about him, but also to vse some sharpe punishment and correction of the offences of his subiectes, to the entent that the late begonne sedicion might the soner be represſed, and for this cause specially that some persons voyde of all honest feare and reuerent dread, had taken such courage and audacitie to them, that they feared not to speake euill of their king and souereigne Lorde, with most spitefull and contumelious wordes, as though they neither feared nor would obey him, or his precepts and commaundementes, expectyng dayly and hourely the arriuall and landyng of the fayned Richard Duke of Yorke, nowe lately risen from death to lyfe. But when knowlege of the slaunderous and opprobrious wordes were brought to the kinges eares, he caused diuers persons to suffer condigne punishment for their heynous offences, whereby their complices well perceiuyng that their enterprice had no prosperous successe nor tooke any good effect, and especially such as rashely began to make mastries, and farther seeyng what preparation was made and prouided agaynst their troubleous commocion and frantique enterprice, they of their awne swinge pacified themselues, & began to turne to their king and naturall liege Lorde.

1495 11 After the death of Sir William Stanley, Gyles Lorde Dawbeney, a man of great fidelitie and circumspection, was elected and made the kinges chiefe Chamberleyne. When the king had thus politiquely weeded out the euill and corrupt heartes of his Englishe subiectes, and had pacifyed and brought all his realme to a peaceable and a quiet life. Then he perceyued that it was necessary also to purge and clense his realme of Ireland, to the entent that the venemous seede sowne and planted two yeres past, amongest the wilde and sauage Irishe persons by Perkyn Warbeck might be cleane digged and rooted vp. Wherefore he sent sir Henry Deane, late Abbot of Langtony, a man of great wit and diligence (whome he made Chauncelor of the Ile) and Sir Edward Pownynges knight, with an armie of men into Ireland, to serche and purge all such townes and places where Perkyn was receyued, relieued or fauoured. And if they espyed any of hys affinitie or faction, then he would they should be punished with all extremitie to the terrible example of all other that would encline to that vnfortunate parte. And first, after their arriuall into Ireland, they called in the kinges name the nobilitie of that countrie to a counsaile, where they beyng assembled all together, the Chauncelor with a gentle exhortation required them first to persist in due obedience and fidelitie towardes their king, and to ayde his Capitayne Syr Edward Pownynges with their might, power, and strength, agaynst suche rebelles

rebelles which eyther through blindneſſe and folly, or elſe through deſyre and appetide to do euill, ſuſtayned and ayded Perkyn with harneſſe, men, or money. Euery man promiſed openly to helpe with all their power and might: But they promiſed not ſo quickly, but they performed it as ſlowly, for few or none eyther ayded or aſſiſted him, as who would ſay, that they loued the Engliſhe nation more with their outwarde countenaunce, than in their inwarde hearties and mindes. But when they heard that ſir Edward Powynyngs was come to perſecute all ſuch as were fautors and friendes to Perkin Warbeck, there was no man, although he were but a little defiled with that ſedicious infection, but he fled out of hand into woodes and mariſes for the defence and ſauegarde of themſelues, there conſultyng together, after the maner of their Countrie, in what places they might beſt lye in wayte to hurt and ſkirmiſhe with the Engliſhe men, or elſe if nede ſhoulde ſo requyre to fight with them hande to hande.

In Ireland are two maner of people.

In Irelande there be two kinde of men, one ſoft, gentle, ciuile, and curteous: And to theſe people, as to the moſt richeſt, and beſt nurtered perſons, doth many marchant men of the Countryes adioynyng, daply reſort. But becauſe the moſt reſort thether is of the Engliſhe nation, the Iriſhe men folow and counterfeyt their ciuile maners, and honeſt conditions. And by reaſon of the common trade and entercourſe betweene them, they haue learned the Engliſh tongue, and can both ſpeake and vnderſtand it. And all this kinde of people is vnder the ſubiection and dominion of the king of England. The other kinde is cleane contrary from this, for they be wylde, ruſticall, fooliſhe, fierce, and for their vnmanerly behauior, and rude faſhions, are called wilde and ſauage Iriſhemen. And theſe men haue many gouernours and ſeuerall rulers, which kepe continuall battaile, and daply warre amongeſt themſelues, for the which cauſe they be more fierce, more bolde and hardie then the other Iriſhe men, and they be very deſyrous of newe thinges, & ſtraunge ſights and gaſpyngs, and after robbery, theft, and rapine, & in nothing ſo much delightyng as with tumulteous, ſedition, and continuall ſtrife. And to theſe wilde Coltes, Perkyn ſhewed himſelfe firſt, eaſily perſwadyng them to beleue that he was the ſame very perſon whom he falſly fained & coũterfeited.

Sir Edward Powninges.

Wherefore Sir Edwarde Powynynges accordyng to his Commiſſion, entendyng to puniſhe ſuch as haue bene ayders and aduaunters of Perkins fooliſhe enterprice, with his whole armie, marched forwarde agaynſt thys wylde Iriſhemen, becauſe that all other beyng faultie of that offence, fled and reſorted to them for ſuccor and defence, to the entent that they both together might be able to reſiſt and defye there enemyes: But when he ſawe that his purpoſe ſucceded not as he wiſhed it, both becauſe the Iriſh lords ſent him no ſuccor, accordyng to their promiſes, & alſo conſideryng that his number was not ſufficient to ſet on the wilde people beyng diſperſed amongeſt woodes, mountaynes, and mariſes, was of neceſſitie compelled to recule and returne frettyng and vered in his ſtomack, becauſe he ſuſpected that Geralde Erle of Kyldare beyng then the kinges Deputie, was the cauſe and occaſion that he had no ſuccors nor ayde ſent to him, and ſo he was enformed of ſuch as bare to the Erle no good will. And therefore ſodeinely he cauſed the Erle to bee apprehended, and as a priſoner brought him in his companie into England: Where when he was examined and certaine matters of treaſon layde to hys charge, charge, he auoyded them all, & clerely (such was his wit and innocencie) quit himselfe, and layd the burthen in other mens necks: Whom the king dismissed and sent hym into Ireland agayne, there to be his Deputie and Lieutenaunt as he was before. The king like a pollitique Prince had many great and weighty considerations, which refrained him from vsing of any seuerity or extremitie against this Erle, contrary to the minds & willes of his malicious aduersaryes. One was the great authoritie and swinge that he bare amongest the Irishe nacion: Also the condicion and state of the tyme, wherin he sauoured some sedicion to be in brewyng: and chiefly of all the assured hope and affiaunce that he conceyued in him.

So that nowe the king beyng out of all feare of battaile, did take hys progresse into Lancashire the. xxv. day of June, there to recreate his spirits and solace himselfe with his mother the Ladie Margaret, wife to the Erle of Darby, which then lay at Lathome in that Countrie. While these things were thus done in England, Perkyn Warbeck then beyng in Flaunders, although he had taken great sorowe and care for that his craftie conueyaunce was espyed and openly knowen, and also that king Henry had afflicted and punished diuers of his confederates and alyes, and thereby in dispayre of all the ayde and succor that was to him promised and appointed: yet he determined not to leaue the hope and trust that he had conceyued in his mad head to obteyne the Crowne and realme of England, and so gatheryng a great armie of valiaunt Capitaynes of all nations, some bankeroutes, some false Englishe Sanctuarie men, some theeues, robbers, and vacabondes, which leauyng their bodily labour, desiryng onely to lyue of robbery and rapine, came to be his seruauntes and souldiours. And so beyng furnished with this rablement of knaues, tooke such shippes as his friendes had prouided for him, and departed out of Flaunders, entendyng to arriue in England whersoeuer the winde brought him. And by chaunce of fortune he was driuen vpon the Kentishe coast, where because the sea was calmed, he cast his ancors, and there made his abode, and sent certeine of his retinue to the land to signifie to all the Countrie, that he was so furnished of all thinges meete and conuenient for his enterprise, that their was no doubt but the victory would encline to his part. And by this meanes to make serche and enquirie whether the Kentishe men would take his part and folow him as their Capitain, which before tymes was not timerous nor afrayed of their awne mynde in troublous seasons to moue warre agaynst their Princes. The Kentishmen heering that this feyned Duke was come, and had heard that he was but a painted Image, doubtyng a space what to do, whether to helpe him, or to resist his power, at the last remembryng what euill chaunces their forefathers had, and howe small a profite such as haue rebelled haue gayned, thought it neyther expedient nor profitable for them to ayde and assist him that came rather to spoyle, destroy, and waste the Countrie, then to conquere it for theyr welth and commoditie. And this they firmely coniectured because he had none other with him but Alienes and straunge people, which would take and accompt euery Church, Towne, Chappell, house, and euery priuate man as a pray and a lucre, and not as their natiue Countrie. Wherfore they fearyng the sequell, determined still to abide true to theyr king and prince, and to fall vpon such as were newe come to land out of their shippes. And while they they were assemblyng of themselues together, other should by fayre promises allure and call vnto them the great number out of the ships, and so geue them battaile. And so vsyng this guile, they promised all to folowe him, and to fight vnder his banner: Howbeit the prolongyng of tyme draue Perkyn into a suspicion, which well remembred that a communalty is not accustomed sagely to consult, but sodainly and rashely to run hedling euer into rebellion and new stirred commocion. Wherfore Perkyn determined not once to sette foote out of his ship till he sawe all thing sure without any daunger. And although he mynded not to take land himselfe, yet he suffered certaine of hys Souldiours to go on lande, which persons beyng a prette way from theyr shippes, were sodeinly trapped and compassed by the Kentishemen, and at one stroke banquished and driuen backe to thier shippes, and there were taken prisoners an hundreth, and. lx. persons, wherof foure were named Capitaynes, Mountforde, Corbet, Whitebelt, Quintine or otherwise Geryn. Which rebelles were brought by sir John Pechy Shirife of Kent, to London rayled in ropes like horses drawyng in a Cart. And after vpon their arraignment, confessed their offence, and were executed, some at London, and other in the townes adioinyng to the sea Coast. Wherefore Perkyn failyng of his purpose, fled backe into Flaunders, and there taryed, consultyng with his friendes vntill such tyme as he had better prepared for thinges to come, more prudently then he had done before tyme.

Perkyn sayeth into Flaunders

In this very season departed to God Cicile Duchesse of Yorke, mother to king Edward the fourth & king Richard, at her Castell of Barkamstede, a woman of small stature, but of much honour and high parentage, and was buryed by her husband in the College of Fodringey.

Cicile Duches of Yorke mother to king Edwarde the fourth deceassed.

The king beyng aduertised that his enemyes had made entraunce into his realme, left off his progresse, and purposed to returne to London againe, but beyng certefyed the next day after of the luckie speede and fortunate, chaunce, continued and went foorth of his progresse, sendyng to them Sir Richard Gilforde, both to prayse the fidelitie and manhood of the people, and also to render to them his most hartie thankes for their good seruice to him done, with faythfull promise not to forget them hereafter in theyr suites, requestes, and petitions. Also that they might not haue any successe hereafter into those partes, the king commaunded the watches to be kept all along the Sea coastes, and Bekons to be erected accordyng to the auncient vsage and custome of the Countrie.

Peter and his Capitaynes takyng counsayle together in Flaunders, were of one assent resolued to this poynt, that there was nothing more surer to them, then to proceede quickly with their entended enterprice. And when they perceiued that their was neyther people, towne, nor Countrie in England that would associate them in their phantasticall frenshe, which nothyng was asswaged, least that by delayng of tyme and long space, king Henrye might fortify and make strong all daungerous places, and passages with Souldiours and men of warre, which thing they heard say that he neyther forgate nor forestowed, and beside that he was not a little afearde, that hys long tarieng should discomfort his priuy friendes within the realme of England. Wherefore he gathered together his vngracious companie, and determined first to saile into Irelande, there to augment his number. And from thence thence if it were possible to sayle into the west parts of England. And if there were any let or impediment in that place, then he determined to sayle streight into Scotland, knowyng that seldome or neuer is perfite concorde and amitie betwene the Scottes and the English nation. When this gentle counsail was dissolued, and winde and weather serued, he set vp his sailes, and hauing a prosperous gale after his phantasie, sailed into Ireland, where he reposed himself a space. And remembryng that the hope of victory consisted not whole in the Irishe nation, which beyng naked men without harnesse or armure, were not able to combat with the Englishemen: wherefore when the winde serued him, he departed from Corffe and arryued in Scotland, and comming to the kinges presence, with great solemnitie, framed his tale after the forme and fashion folowing.

The arriuall of Perkyn Warbeck first in Ireland and then in Scotland.

The oration of Perkyn Warbeck made to Iames ỳ Scottishe king.

I thinke it is not vnknowne to you, most noble king and puissant prince into what ruyne the stocke, house, and family of Edward the fourth of that name king of England, is nowe of late brought to, and fallen in, eyther by Gods permission, or by diuine punishement, whose vndoubted sonne (if you knowe not alredie) I am, and by the power of almightie God, preserued aliue to this houre, from the mightie hand of a tyraunt. For my father kyng Edward when he dyed, appoynted his brother Richard Duke of Glouceſter to be our gouernour, protector, and defender, whom the more that he loued, and studied to aduaunce and promote, the better he thought that he woulde loue, fauour, and tender his children. But alas my infortunate chaunce, I may say, howe hath his trust bene turned into treason? and his hope turned into hinderaunce? All men knowe, and I feele. Oure Uncle was not the tutour and preseruer of our stocke and lynage, but the confounder and destroyer of our blood and progenie. For that tyraunt blinded and glutted with the desyre of rulyng and souereinetie, commaunded Edward my brother and me to be slaine, and dispatched out of this mortall lyfe. Wherevpon that person, to whome the weightie and cruell charge was committed and geuen, to oppresse and destroy vs poore innocent infantes, the more that he abhorred this heynous and butcherly offence, the more he feared to commit it. And so wauerying in minde, and doubtfull what to do, at the length, willyng in part to saciate the bloodie thirst of the vnnaturall tyraunt, and in part to abstayne from so mischieuous and detestable homicide, destroyed my brother, and preserued me, like the good priest Iosada which saued little Ioas when all the children of the blood royall, were commaunded by Athalia the Queene to be slaine and vtterly destroyed. And farther, to the entent that my life might be in a suretie, he appointed one to conuey me into some straunge Countrie, where when I was furthest off, and had most nede of comfort, he forsooke me sodainly (I thinke he was so appoynted to do) and left me desolate alone without friend or knowlege of any relefe or refuge. And so king Richarde did obteyne the crowne as a pray mischieuously gotten, by the dispatchyng away of my brother and me. So that I thus escapyng, by reason of my tender infancie, forgat almost my selfe, and knewe not well what I was, but after long wandryng from Countrie to Countrie, and from Citie to Citie, I perceyued and learned a little and little what was my estate and degree, and so in conclusion came to mine awne Aunt the Lady Margaret lyng in Flaū-ders, which was sometyme maryed to Charles Duke of Burgoyne, which

ioyfully receyued and welcommed mee, as the onely type and garland of her noble stirpe and linage, but forasmuch as she beyng onely dowager of the Duchie of Burgoyn, and hauyng nothing but her dower proper vnto her selfe, was not of power to helpe me with men and munimentes of warre as she would gladly haue done for the recouery of my fathers realme and rightfull inheritaunce, I therefore am driuen to seeke farther ayde and succour. And therefore by her counsaile and aduertisement, with this small handfull of men of warre and Souldiours, I am repayred to your presence for succours, of whome (as the publike fame is spred ouer the whole worlde) there was neuer man by wrong or iniury banished or driuen out of his Countrie, region, or inheritaunce, or by extort power and tiranny kept out of the same (as I my selfe from mine infancie haue bene) whose request was frustrate and repulsed at your hande. Therefore by the maiestie of your realme and Countrie, I desyre, and heartily with prayer as I can, I beseech and exhort you to helpe & relieue me now in my extreme necessitie. And if it chaunce me by your ayde and succour to recouer and possesse my fathers realme and dignitie, not onely I, but all the kinges of our linage which hereafter shall obteyne the same, shall be so much bound vnto you, that they must nedes thinke that doyng to you all the pleasure and benefites that they can, yet with all the thankes that can be geuen, your great kindnesse can neuer be recompensed.

The answere of the king of Scottes.

When he had thus sayde, the king bad him be of good comfort, and promysed him that whatsoeuer he were, it should neuer repent him of his comming to him. And after this the king assembled his counsell together, and demaunded of euery man seuerally what they sayde, of these things which Perkyn had both declared and requyred, or whether they would take anye farther deliberation to aduise themselues what to doe in so great and weighty a matter. They that were of greatest experience and of the wysest sorte did proue by many apparant arguments that his sayings were but dreames and phantasies, and of no force nor truth, and therefore they thought it not conuenient to encomber themselues with any lenger consultation. Another sort, which was not verie great, neyther of wyt nor experience, but greater in number, esteemed this matter very profitable to the common wealth, considering it ministred to them occasion to make warre in Englande. And although they had knowlege what good successe Perkyn had enioyed in all his former attemptes, yet they esteemed that now all things should succeede according to their expectation, if hys cause (although it were as light as a fether) were assumed and taken in hande to be defended, considering that when the warre was once open and begon, and if Perkyn did preuayle, he would denie nothing conuenient to his friendes and helpers. Or else at the least they doubted not but king Henry would make to them large and ample offers and conditions of peace, rather then king Iames shoulde take part with his aduersary and mortall enemie.

When thys counsayle was geuen by the more number, it was well accepted, and the Scottishe king, whether he were blynded by errour, or else did dissimule the matter, began to haue Perkyn in great honour, and caused him openly to be called Duke of Yorke. Also, that this might be more apparaunt to the people that he was so in deede, he caused Ladye Katheryn daughter to Alexander Erle of Huntley, hys nigh kinsman and of a highe linage in Scotland, to be eſpouſed to him. And this affinitie he cauſed to be made for thys ende and purpoſe, partly that he might extenuate the euil wil and malice which was lyke to ſucceede of this matter, for that it might be notoriouſly blaſted and knowne abroad, that he had peace and amitie with the king of Englande, and partly leaſt he might be accuſed of to much light credence, if Perkyn were founde and prooued to be another man then hee was reported.

When all things were prepared for the warre: Thys Perkyn ſwelling with hope that he after his awne phantaſie had made the Scottes to be hys partakers. And to the intent that they ſhould put no diffidence in the ſequele of his enterpriſe, and to encourage them the more, he pronounced ſurely that he ſhould haue great ſuccour and ayde of his friends in Englande, ſent euen from the farthеſt part thereof, aſſoone as euer the Trumpet of warre was blowen. The Scottes although they had but little confidence and leſſe truſt in his wordes, yet putting their hope more in the gayne of ſpoyle then in the gayning of the victorie by battail, armed themſelues in all the haſt, and marched toward the confines and borders of England. Albeit the Scottiſh king minding not to be to raſhe, miſtruſted the Engliſhe men knowing Perkyn to be arryued in Scotlande, had layde ſome armie for the defence of the Frontyers, ſent out certaine light horſemen to eſpie and ſearche if the huſbandmen of the Countrie were aſſembled in armure to defende their enemies. The horſemen ranging ouer the fieldes and playnes belonging to their enemies, ſeing all things quiet returned to their king, and certified him that now was the time moſt apt and conuenient to inuade the realme and ſet on the Engliſhe nation. Then the Scottiſhe king marchyng toward Englande with all his puyſſaunce, firſt proclaymed openly, that all ſuch ſhould onely be pardoned that would take part and ſubmit themſelues to Richarde Duke of Yorke, and fight in his cauſe and quarell. And to the entent to diſcourage and daunt the hartes of the poore commons, ſo that for very feare they ſhould be enforced and compelled to ſubmit themſelues to thys newe founde Mawmet, they made ſo cruell and deadly warre and that not lyke men, whoſe nature is to be ſatiſfied with the ſlaughter of men, and to be merciſull to the impotent and ſick perſons, brent townes, ſpoyled houſes and killed men and children, and delighted with the ſweteneſſe of ſpoyle and prayes, waſted all the Countrie of Northumberlande, and had gone fourth farther. but that they perceaued no ayde or ſuccour to come out of England to attend vpon thys newe Duke. And the ſouldiours being fully laden with blood and ſpoyle, refuſed to go one foote farther at that tyme, and the Countrie roſe on euery part, which made the king ſuſpect ſome armie to approche. Wherfore he determined rather to returne with his aſſured gaine, then to tarrie the newe named Dukes vnſure and vncertaine victorie, and ſo he returned agayne into Scotland.

The Scottiſhe king wyth an armie apeeth Perkyn and entreth into England.

It is a worlde to remember in this place of a certaine kynde of fonde mercie and fooliſhe compaſſion, by the which Perkyn was ſo ſore mooued that it ſeemed him to regarde nothing more then the commoditie of another man. For whyle the Scottiſhe king thus vexed and harryed the poore inhabitaunts of the borders of Northumberland, ſo that nothing was heard but roring, weeping and lamenting. This new inuented Duke beyng returned into

into Scotland, euen lyke himself, which wrought all thing with fraude and deceit, perceauing that no concourse nor resort of Englishmen shewed themselues in open apparaunce, to minister to him any ayde or succour, and fearyng not a little that the bore of hys craftie dealing, and bagge of his secret counterfeyting should be disclosed and set in an open glasse, by reason wherof he should be hated and had in contempt and disdeyne of the Scottish people, as though he had bene therunto prouoked by a naturall inclination and pittie (to the intent to hide and cloke his subtill suborneation) cried out openly, Oh, my stony and hard frosen hart which art not once moued nor yet afflicted with the losse and slaughter of thyne owne naturall subiectes and vassales. And at that glorious sighing, he beseeched the Scottishe king that from thence forth he would not afflict and plague his people, nor deforme and deface his naturall realme and countrie with such terrible fyre, flame and hauock. As who would say, that he beyng ouercome with the perfite loue of his native Region, began now to haue compassion and to lament the cruell destruction of the same. The Scottishe king which began to perceaue which waye the winde blewe, aunswered him agayne, Sir mee thinketh you take much paine, and very much imagine howe to preserue the realme of another prince which is not youres (but I thinke you would gladly haue it) but my mind giueth me that you be as farre from the obteyning of the same, as you be nere the soyle and sight of the Countrey, considering that you call England your land and realme, and the inhabitaunts thereof your people, and subiectes, and yet not one man, neyther gentleman nor yoman will once shew himselfe to ayde or assist you in the warre begon for your cause, and in your name within your realme, to the which you be both (as you say) inheritour, and by your people desired and called vnto. And so the king reprooued the lightnesse of this yong fond foundling, and euery day more and more neglected and lesse phantasied and gaue credite to him, noting well and wisely that neyther his wordes, with his deedes, nor the sequele of factes with his promises were neyther agreeable nor consonant.

The Nobles inhabiting in the Northe partes, hearing the clamour of the common people, and perceauing that they fled to auoyde the crueltie of the Scottes, were sodainely abashed, and fortefied their holdes, and manned their fortresses readie to defend their enimies, layyng embushements in the wayes, where they imagined that their enimies would resort. And without delay certified the king, of the Scottes inuasion and enterprise. The king was not a little abashed at this sodayne chaunce, and troubled also with his awne businesse at home, not onely fearing his outwarde enemies but also his awne nobles and naturall subiectes least anye of them would slep from him to the other part, and put him to farther trouble and veration. Wherefore assone as he heard these newes, considering the matter to be of no small importaunce and meete to be foreseene, with all diligence prepared remedies to resist and withstande the first brunt of so great a sourge newely begon. But the sodayne retreyte of the Scottes agayne asswaged all the Englishmens swift and speedy prouisions: For when they were once laden with prayes and spoyles, they returned home againe or the Englishe men could assemble together.

When the king was truly certified that the Scottishe king was retur- 1496 18

ned, he geuing praise to his capitaines and other inhabiting on the borderes of his realme, which had duly and truly serued him at that time, did staye to ouertake, and to be reuenged for the malicious inuasions of the Scottishe king. And yet fearing least his enimies should be encouraged with this great gaine of spoyles and praye, he determined by dent of swoorde and mortall warre to reuenge and reforme the manifest iniurie and apparant wrong to him by king James and his people done and committed. Wherefore he assembling his court of parliament, declared the cause of the instant warre, and what remedie he himselfe had inuented and deuised, perswading with manye strong arguments and reasons, that it should be for the profite and benifite of the publique & common welth to prosecute & follow the warre by his mortall enemies begon & attempted. To this opinion all his nobilitie (which were no lesse offended with this prowde brag of the Scottish nation then he himselfe) did willingly agree and gladly assent. And to the maintenaunce of the warre and toward the charges of the same, a certaine subsedy and tax of monie was with one assent by the whole parliament liberally & freely geuen and graunted: Which payment although it was but easy and small, yet many of the common people which euer abhorre suche taxes and exactions, grudged sore to pay the same.

A mutine of the people for a small tax.

It this parliament also and conuocation, ther was such certaine lawes, actes and statutes confirmed and made, as were thought most necessarie and expedient for the publique weale of the realme. And thus the king dissoluing his court of parliament, and prepared for warre out of hand. In this meane season the king of Scots not sleping his matters bicause he perceaued well that the Englishmen would shortly reuenge their losse & harme, with no lesse diligence gathered an host and puyssant army, that either he might withstand and resist the English powre inuading his realme & coūtry, or else of fresh enter vpon the borderers: and going forth to spoyle, rob & make hauoke againe. And so these two valiaunt Princes minded nothing more then the one to hurt and preiudice the other. But the king of Englande sore pricked and wounded with the iniurie to him committed, was so sore moued against the Scottysh King, that he would not respite nor deferre one houre tyll he were reuenged. And so prepared a puissaunt and strong armie to inuade Scotland, and therof ordayned for chiefetaine Gyles Lorde Dawbeney his chiefe chamberlaine, a man of no lesse wytt then pollycy and of no lesse pollicie then hardinesse.

When the Lorde Dawbeney had his army assembled together and was in his iorney forward into Scotland, he sodainly was stayed and reuoked againe, by reason of a new sedicion and tumult begon within the realme of Englande for the subsedie which was graunted at the last parliament for the defence of the Scottes, which of the most part was truly satisfied and payde. But the Cornish men inhabiting in the least part of the realme, and the same part also barreyn and wythout all pleasantnesse, complayned and grudged greatly, affirming that they were not hable to pay such a great somme as was of them demaunded. And so what with angre, and what with sorrowe, forgetting their due obeysaunce, began rashly to speake of the king himselfe. And after leauing the matter, lamenting, yelling and crying, malitiously said that the kings counsayle was the cause of this pollyng and shauyng. And so being in this rage manaced to death the aucthoures (as they imagined) of this this mischiefe and sorrow, whome they threatned shortlye to dispatche out of this worlde. And so being in a roare two of the same affinitie, the one called Thomas Flamock gentelmã, learned in the lawes of the realme, & the other Mighell Joseph a smith, men of high courages and stoute stomackes, tooke vpon them to be capitaines of this vngracious flocke and seditious company. Who cryed out that it was a shame (for a finalle commocion made of the Scots, which was asswaged and ended in a moment) they should be exacted and polled, and such great exactions layde vpon their necks, and especially on the Cornishmen, which they affirmed to be but poore men, and being in a barrein and vnfruitefull countrye gate their liuing hardly by mynyng and digging tynne and mettall oute of the grounde both daye and night with great turmoyle and labour: And therefore they had rather dye and suffer extreme punishment, then liue in such calamitie and wretchednesse. And they layde the faulte and cause of this exaction to Jhon Morton Archebishop of Cantorburie, and to sir Reignold Bray, because they were chiefe of the kinges preuie counsayle. Such rewards haue they that be in great authoritie with kings and princes. For if any thing proceede well accordyng to the minde and pleasure of the communaltie, that is euer referred and gratefied to the king or gouernour. But contrariwise, if any thing be done, eyther by chaunce or by counsell that soundeth not well in their eares, or is contrarie to their opinion or phantasie, they will laye it straight to the counsell saiyng that they haue perswaded him to doe this and that.

Thomas Flamock. Mighell Joseph.

John Morton Archebishop of Cantorburie. Sir Reignold Bray.

These Capitaynes exhorted the common people to put on harnesse, and not to be afearde to folowe them in this quarell, promising them that they should doe no dammage to any creature, but onely to see punishment and correction done to such persons which were the authours and causers that the people were molested and vexed with such vnreasonable exactions and demaunds. And if they perceyued any person (as they espied many in deede) which did impugne and reproue their mad, vnreasonable and seditious counsell, affirming that it was the highest point of madnesse for a man to put his life in hazard for that thing, which he ought meekely and humbly to require and desire of his Prince and souereigne Lorde. Then they called them dastardes, fooles, and cowardes, and taunted and rebuked them with most shamefull reproches. So these vnhappie Capitaynes nothing more desired then to bring their flock and themselues to finall perdition and vtter confusion. With these bragges and motions a great part of the people were eleuate and encouraged, and condiscended to doe as the Capitaynes and the most of the multitude would agree and appoynt. Then the Capitaynes praysing much the hardynesse of the people, when all things were prepared meete for their vnfortunate iourney, set forwarde with their armie, and came to Taunton, where they slue the Prouost of Peryn which was one of the Commissioners of the subsidie, and from thence came to Welles, and so entended to go to London where the king then soiourned.

When the king was aduertised by his Collectors and officers of al these doings and attemptes, he was marueilously astonnyed, & especially because at that one time he was enuyroned with double warre, both externe and intestyne. And because perill did depende on both, he was in great doubt which of both he should most regarde. And as he was musing of this matter he was asserteyned that James Twichet Lorde Awdeley and diuers other of the Nobilitie were associate with the Cornishemen, and were in great haste and no good speede marchyng toward London. The king perceauing the ciuile warre to approche and drawe neerer and neerer, almost to his verye Gates, determined with all hys whole powre to resist and represse the same. And after that tumult appeased and suppressed he would with all expedition set vpon Scotlande. Wherefore he reuoked agayne the Lorde Dawbeney, which as you haue heard, was with a puyssaunt armie goyng into Scotlande, whose armie he increased and multiplyed with many picked and freshe warryers, that he might the better, and with lesse labor ouercome these rebels. Also mistrusting that the Scottes might now (hauing good opportunitie seyng him troubled with this ciuile discorde) inuade the realme agayne, and so spoyle and destroy the borderers, he appointed the Lorde Thomas Haward Erle of Surrey, a puyssaunt and politique Capitayne (which was taken prisoner at the ouerthrow of king Richarde as you haue heard, and after set at libertie, and within two yeres next after was made high Treasurer of England, after the death of John Lord Dynham) to gather a bande of men in the Countye Palantine of Durham, and they with the ayde and helpe of the inhabitaunts adioyning and the borderers, to drive out and expell the Scottes from of the borders, if they should fortune againe to inuade, vntill such time that the Cornishmen were subdued and pacified (which he thought easie to be done) he might sende to them the foresayde Lorde Dawbeny agayne with all his power and armie. When the Nobles of the realme heard of this tumulteous businesse and commocion, they came to London, euery man with as many men of warre as they could put in a readynesse to ayde the king if neede should be: In the which company, there was the Erle of Esser, the Lorde Mongey with diuers other.

At this time and season, Charles the French king returning from the warres that he had at Naples, sent Ambassadors to enforme the king of the prosperous successe and victorie that he had obteyned in Italie, and gaue to them in charge to desyre of the king of England nothing so much as the contynuaunce of his amitie and fauour towarde their maister and souereigne Lorde. For the French king sore desired to continue in perfite peace and amitie with the king of Englande. And not without a cause, for he had sore vered and combred himselfe and his people with suche Italian snares and craftie engines, out of the which at this day his successors can not cleane be ryd, and delyuered.

When the king was informed that king Charles Ambassadors were come to Calice, he sent certaine of his Nobilitie, honourably to receyue them, and so to conuey them to Douer, and there for a pollicie to make their abode till the rebellion were extinct and suppressed, and not one worde thereof to be sounded in the eares of the Ambassadours: Which commaundement was circumspectly kept and obserued.

And nowe the Cornishe men departyng from Welles (where they receyued theyr chiefe Capitaine, James Lorde Audeley) went to Salisbury and from thence to Winchester, and so to Kent, where they looked for helpe, but they were deceaued: for the Erle of Kent, George Lorde of Burgany, John Brooke Lorde Cobham, Sir Edward Pownynges, Sir Richarde Gui de-

Guildeford, Sir Thomas Burchier, John Peche, William Scot, and a great number of people were not onely prest and redie to defende the Countrie from all mischiefe and destruction, but also bent and determined to fight and combate with such as would not be obedient to their naturall soueraigne Lord, and to his lawes and preceptes. Also the Kentishe men themselues, partly remembring that other commocions haue bene to their dammage and great hinderance, and partly beyng vnder the defence of their nobilitie, as vnder the Erle and other, would not so much as come nere to the rebelles, nor yet eyther make countenaunce or once speake to any of them, to the entent that the king should in no wise conceyue any poynt of vntruth or treason in the poorest of them. Which thing so daunted and dismayed the heartes and courages of many of the brute and rurall Cornishemen (which seeyng themselues deceyued and defrauded of their chiefe hope and succours, and fearing the euill chaunce that might happen to them) that they to saue themselues fled priuily in the night from their owne companie and Companions. The Capitaynes of the rebelles perceiuyng that they coulde haue no ayde of the Kentishe people, puttyng their onely hope to theyr owne power and fortitude (for surely they were men of great strength, and of no lesse force than valiaunt courage) brought them to blacke heath foure myles from London, and there in a plaine vpon the toppe of an hill they ordered their battailes, eyther redie to fight with the king if he would assaile them, or else to assault and beat the Citie of London: For they thought verily that the king was so affrayed of theyr puyssaunce, that he minded nothing lesse then to encounter with their armie. And therefore beyng enflamed with arrogancie, nothyng mistrustyng, but firmely beleuyng that the victory was sure in their handes, they determined to enter into the Citie of London and to assault the Tower, wherein the king (as they thought) had priuily enclosed himselfe. But king Henry wrought cleane contrary to their minde, for he neuer thought to geue them battaile till he had them farre from their dwellynges and Countrie, so that they should be out of all hope, of ayde and comfort. And when they were with their long and tedious iourney wery ed and tyred, and that their furye were somewhat asswaged and fell to repentaunce of their mad commotion, and frantike progression, then he would in some place conuenient for his purpose compasse and enclose them to his aduauntage and their destruction as he did in dede afterward. In the meane season there was great feare thorough the Citie, and cryes were made, euerie man to harnesse, to harnesse, some ranne to the gates, other mounted on the walles, so that no part was vndefended, and continuall watch was kept by the Maiestrates of the City, least the rebelles beyng poore and nedie would discende from their campe, and inuade the Citie, and spoyle and robbe the ryches and substaunce of the Marchauntes. But the king deliuered and purged their hartes out of this feare, for after that he perceyued that the Cornish men were al the day readie to fight and that vpon the hill, he sent straight John Erle of Orforde, Henry Burchier Erle of Eſſex, Edmond de la Poole Erle of Suffolke, and Sir Ryes ap Thomas, and sir Humfrey Stanley noble warriours, with a great company of archers and horsemen to compasse the hill on the right syde & on the left, to the entent that all by wayes beyng stopped and forclosed, all hope of flight should be taken from them: and incontinent, he beyng as well encouraged couraged with manly stomacke and desyre to fight, as furnished with a populous armie, and store of artillary, set forward out of the Citie and encamped him in Saint Georges fielde, where he the fryday at night then lodged.

On the Saterday in the morning, he sent the Lorde Dawbeney with a great companie to set on them earlye in the morning, which first gat the bridge at Detford Strande which was manfully defended by certeyne Archers of the rebelles, whose arowes as is reported were in length a full yeard. While the Erles set on them on euery syde, the Lorde Dawbeney came into the field with his companie, and without long fighting the Cornishe men were ouercome, but first they tooke the Lorde Dawbeney prisoner, and whether it were for feare or for hope of fauour, they let him go at libertie without any hurt or detriment. There were slaine of the rebelles which fought and resisted two thousande men and mo, and taken prisoners an infinite number, and amongest them the blacke Smith and chiefe Capitaynes which shortly after were put to death. This Myghell Joseph, surnamed the blacke Smith one of the Capitaynes of this donghill, and drasse sacked ruffians, was of such stowte stomacke and haute courage, that at the same time that he was drawen on the Hardle towarde his death, he sayd (as men do report) for that mischieuous and vngracious act, he should haue a name perpetuall, and a fame permanent and immortall. So (you may perceyue) that desyre of vaine glory and fame, enflameth, and encourageth aswel poore and meane persons, as the heartes of great Lordes and puyssaunt Princes to trauayle and aspire to the same. Some affirme that the king appoynted to fight with the rebelles on the Monday, and preuentyng the tyme by pollicie, set on them vpon the Saterday before, beyng vnprouided and in no array of battaile, and so by that pollicy obteyned the field and victory.

Myghel Joseph the blacke smith taken & executed.

When this battaile was ended, the king wanted but three hundred of al his companie that were slaine at that present conflict. Also the Capitaynes apprehended and taken he pardoned, sauyng the chiefe Capitaynes and first aucthours of that mischiefe, to whome he woulde neyther shewe mercie nor lenitye. For he caused the Lorde Audeley to be drawen from Newgate to the Tower hill in a Cote of his awne armes painted vpon paper, reuersed and all to torne, and there to be behedded, the. xxbiij. day of June. And Thomas Flamock, and Myghell Joseph he commaunded after the fashion of traytors to be drawen, hanged, and quartered, and their quarters to be pitched on stakes and set vp in diuers places of Cornewall, that their sore punishments and terrible executions for their trayterous attempts and foolishe hardie enterprises, might be a warnyng for other hereafter to abstayne from committyng lyke cryme and offence. But because he was certifyed that their Countrimen beyng at home in Cornewall were by this scourge little mollified or quieted, and were redie to moue againe and begynne newe commocions and conspiracies, if any vngracious or euill minded person woulde eyther moue or pricke them forwarde, he turned his purpose, and caused them to be set vp in London and other places, least that by such meanes he should wrap himselfe in more trouble at that tyme when he went about with all his wit and counsaile to represse and asswage all domesticall and ciuill sedecion, to the entent that he might the more seriously and intentiuely set forwarde a puyssant army agaynst the braggyng and vnfaythfull Scottes, beyng content at

Thomas Flamock and Myghell Joseph hanged drawen and quartered.

that

While this businesse was thus handled in England, the king of Scottes beyng certified of it by his espialles, that there was none armie rayſed in England, eyther to withstand his power or destroy his Countrie, and hering also that king Henrie and his Nobles were vered and sore troubled with the commocion of the Cornishe men, and in a ciuile discorde and dissention amongest themselues: Wherefore he thought it necessarye to anticipate the warre before hande. For well he knew, that assoone as king Henry had subdued and ouerturned his aduersaryes, that he would with his whole puyssaunce inuade his Realme and dominions: And therefore he inuaded the frontiers of the realme of Englande, wastyng the Countrye, burnyng the townes and murtheryng the people, sparyng neyther place nor person. And while his light horsemen were ridyng to forage, and destroy the Bishoprike of Durham, and there burned all about, he with another companie went aboutto assault the Castel of Norham standyng on the riuer of Twede, which deuideth England and Scotland. The Bishop of Durham which at that tyme was Richard Fore, had well furnished it both with men & munitions, wisely foresseing and imagining, that the Scottish king (as sone as he knew that there was ciuile discord and vnnaturall warre moued within the realme of Englande) would with all his power inuade and harry the borders and countries adioinyng to his land. This Richard Fore was before called Bishop of Exceter, and for his singuler vertues and great grauitie was after that made Bishop of Bath and Welles, and last of all, promoted and exalted to the Bishoprike of Durham.

The Bishop from tyme to tyme aduertised the king of all thinges that there chaunced (which then was at London) and sent in all post hast to the Erle of Surrey to come to rescue, which was then in Yorkeshire and had collected a great army and a warlike company. When the Erle heard of these newes, he perceiuyng that all thinges were not voyde of ieopardie, made no long tarying, but with all diligence marched forward, and after him folowed other noble men out of all quarters of the North, euery one bringyng as many as they could gather for the defence of their naturall Countrye and Region. with many other well proued and warlike men, which although in degree they were not egall with these great Lordes and knightes, yet in manhood and and pollecies of warre and valiaunt courage, they were to them in all feates equiualent. The number was little lesse then twentie thousande men, beside the Nauie whereof the Lorde Brooke was Admyrall.

When the Scottes had dyuers dayes assauted and beaten the Castell of Norham, to the no lytle detriment and dammage therof, and could make no batrie to enter into the same, they determined of their awne minde to reise their siege and returne, and that so much the soner because they heard saye that the Erle of Surrey was within two dayes iourney of them with a great puyssaunce. Wherfore king Iamy thought it to small purpose to tarie any lenger in besieging the Castell, raysed his siege and returned into hys awne realme: When the Erle knewe of the kinges returne, he folowed after wyth all haste possible, trustyng surely to ouertake hym and to geue hym battayle.

When the Erle was entred into Scotland, he ouerthrewe and defaced the Castell of Cawdrestenes, the towre of Hetenhall, the towre of Edington, the Towre of Fulden: and he sent Norrey king at armes to the Capitayne of Hayton Castell, which was one of the strongest places betweene Berwyke and Edenborough to delyuer him the Castell, which he denied to doe, affirming that he was sure of speedie succours and swift aide. The Erle perceauing the denial, layde his ordinaunce to the Castell, and continually bet it from two of the clock in the morning till fiue at night, in such wise that they within rendered vp the fortresse, their lyues onely saued. And when the Erle had receyued the Scottes, he with his miners rased and ouerthrewe the Castell to the playne grounde. The Scottishe king was within a myle of the siege, and both knewe it and sawe the smoke, and yet would not once set a foote forwarde to saue or rescue his Castell. And while the Erle laye at Hayton, the king of Scottes sent to him Marchemount, and another Heraulde, desyring him at his choyse eyther to fight with whole puissaunce against puyssaunce, or else they two to fight person to person, and hande to hande, requiring that if the victorie should fall to the Scottishe king, that then the Erle should delyuer for his raunsome the towne of Berwyke, with the Fyshegarthes of the same. The Erle ioyously, lyke a couragious Capytayne receyued this message and made aunswere, that he was readie in the playne fielde to abide the battayle with his whole armye, prayeng him to come forward with hys puyssaunce, and after that he thanked him hartily of the honour that he offered him, for surely he thought himselfe much honored that so Noble a Prince would vouchsafe to admit so poore an Erle to fight with him body to body, alleteyning him farther that the towne of Berwike was the king his maisters and not his, ℔ which he neither ought nor would laye to pledge nor gage without the kings assent, but he would put his body in pledge which was more precious to him then all the townes of the world, promising on his honour, that if he tooke the king prisoner in the singuler Combate, that he would release to him all his part of his fine and raunsome, and if it chaunced the king to vanquishe and apprehende him, he would pay gladly such a raunsome as was meete and conuenient for the degree of an Erle. And when he had rewarded and dismissed the Heraulds, he set his armie in a readynesse, abidyng the comming of the king of Scots, and so stood all daye. But the Scottishe king not regarding his offers, nor performing his great crabes and boastes, beyng afrayde to cope with the Englishe nation, shamefully and sodeynly fled in the night season with all his power and company. When the Erle knewe that the king was returned, and had bene in Scotland fire or seuen dayes, beyng daylie and nightly vered with continuall winde and vnmeasurable rayne, could not cause his people to continue in that tempestious and vnfertyle and barrein region, with good aduise retreated agayne with his whole armie to the towne of Berwike, and there dispersed his armie euery man into hys Countrie, tarying there himselfe till he knewe the pleasure of the king in furthering or protracting the warres of Scotlande: But in the meane season one Peter Hyalas a man of no lesse learning then prudent wyt and pregnant policie, was sent Ambassadour from Ferdinand king of Spayne, vnto the king of Scottes, to moue and entreate a peace and an vnitie to be had betwene him and the king of Englande. For of king Ferdinand and Elizabeth his wife (to which woman none other was comparable in her time) there was nothing more desyred nor wished then by the coniunction of mariage betweene Arthure Prince of wales heyre apparaunt to king Henry, and Lady Katheryn the daughter of king Ferdynand and Quene Elizabeth a new affinity and alyaunce might be knyt and begon betwene the realme of England & the Countrie of Spaine. And also he fauoured somewhat the king of Scottes, for which cause he offered himselfe as a meane and mediatour of a peace betweene both the princes, their territories and dominions.

Peter Hialas an Imbassadour from Ferdinand king of Spaine sent to intreate a peace betwen England and Scotland

This Peter Hyalas solicited and moued by all honest meanes and deuices kyng James to assent to a vnitie and concorde: and when with long soliciting he conceaued some good hope to growe in this waightie busynesse hee wrote vnto the king of Englande, that it woulde please him to sende one of his Nobilitie or counsell to be associat with him in concluding with the Scottish king. The king of England which euer (so it were not to his dishonour, hurt or detriment) was not only a louer of peace, but also a norisher, and a furtherer of amitie and quietnesse, and especially at this time when he was vered with the ciuile sedition of his owne proper sheepe and flock, committed the charge of this weyghty matter to Richarde Fore Bishop of Durham, which laye on the Englishe borders in his castell of Norham. The Bishop according to the kinges apoyntement went honorablye into Scotland, where he and Peter Hyalas at the towne of Jedwoorth reasoned with the Scottish commissioners as concerning this peace to be had. Sire hundred conditions were purposed on the one part & the other, but after long protracting of time & much debating and arguing, not one was accepted nor alowed, and one thing aboue all other dashed the whole treatie: For king Henrie instantly required to haue Perkyn Warbecke the fountaine and chiefe cause of all this tumulte and vnquietnesse, the perturber of hym and his whole realme: But the king of Scottes fyrmelye denied to consent to any article that might sounde to his reproch or dishonour: And also now he beganne to smell and sauour the iuggeling and false counterfeyting of his new gest Perkyn Warbeck: Yet because that Perkin was alied to him by matrimony, he thought it both vnhonest, vnreasonable and vnnaturall to betray his allie, and deliuer him to death and confusion. Wherefore when they had reasoned the matter and diuers other vrgent and weyghtie causes by diuers dayes of meeting, and that for the contrarietie of opinyons, no firme peace coulde be concluded. In stede of peace a truce was concluded for certayne yeres vpon condicion that James king of Scottes should conuey Perkyn Warbeck out of hys realme, seigniories and dominions.

While these things were reasoned and at the last concluded in the confines of England and Scotlande, king Henry caused the Ambassadours of the French king, to be brought to his presence, and he them receiued with all benignitie, which as it is shewed before were stopped at Douer of their iourney vntyll such time as the insurrection of the Cornishmen were suppressed and extinguished. And with lyke entertaynement he embraced at the same very season the Lorde of Camphire & other Ambassadors of Philip Archeduke of Austrich and Duke of Burgoyne, comming to hym for the conclusion and continuaunce of an amitie, and to haue the English marchants to resorte to their countrie agayne, which from thence before were prohibited and forbidden. Whych request being verye agreable to the quyetnesse and tranquility of his realme, and especially at that time, he did fauourably graunt and beningly assent vnto. And so being confederate & alyed by treaty & league with all his neighbors marchyng on euerie side of his realmes and regions, he gratified with his most hartie thanks kyng Ferdynand and the Queene his wife, for they were the mediators, organes & instruments by the which the truce was concluded betwene the Scottish kyng and hym, and rewarded Peter the ambassadour liberally and bountifully.

A peace and treatie of the entercourse concluded betweene the house of Austrich and Burgoyne with king Henry the seuenth for the free trafique into the lowe Countries.

So the Englishmen resorted againe into the Archedukes Dominions and were receyued into Andwarp wyth generall procession, so glad was the Towne of their returning, which was by theyr absence sore hyndered and impouerished, at the time that this vnitie and concord was made, which was the yeare of oure Lorde a thousand foure hundred. xcvij. and the. xiij. yeare of kyng Henries reigne.

The Englishe Marchaunts receyued into Andwarp with generall procession.

James king of Scottes perceauing now that he was by Perkyn manifestly deluded, according as he had faythfully promised, so he now duly performed it. For he calling to his presence the foresayde Perkyn Warbecke, declaring to him what benifites & commodities he had receiued of his princely liberalitie and gentilnesse, gentlye required him to depart out of the realme into some other countrie where he might make his abode more surelye and more quyetly, vntill such time as fortune woulde prouide a more prosperous wind to set forward the sayles of his purpose and desyre, declaryng vnto him that he compelled in maner by necessitie had concluded a league and concord with the king of England, and by the treatie, the refuge that he shoulde haue had of hym and hys countrye, was not onely to hym prohibited and forbydden, but also it was agreed and condiscended that neither the king of Scottes, nor any by his procurement or in his name shoulde make warre on the kyng of England, which warre he gladly tooke in hand for Perkyns sake, hauing sure confidence and perfite trust to haue bene ayded and assisted with Perkyns friendes in England. But when he perceyued that all was in vayne, and that all his words were but wynd, he exhorted him not to be displeased to depart, least his tarying might be to hym a detriment and a breakyng of the treatie betwene hym and kyng Henrie lately concluded: wherefore with many fayre

wordes he desired him to depart. This Perkyn knowyng the kings pleasure was very sore amased, seing there was no helpe to be looked for hereafter in Scotlande. Albeit remembring the great benifytes which he had receaued heretofore of the Scottishe kyng, which he thought him selfe neuer able to requyte and deserue, that he might not seme to hym ingrate or not willing to follow hys desire, he was content at his intercession to depart. And shortly after sayled into Irelande wyth hys wyfe and familie, there determining with him selfe eyther to saple into Flaunders to the Duches of Burgoyne, or to ioyne and take part with the Cornishmen. But how so euer it was, while he laye in Ireland doubtyng what to do, he had intelligence by certayne messengers that the Cornishmen for all their discomfiture and plague not to be appeased, but sore to grudge and murmure against king Henry, and that they were pryone and ready to renew the warre agaynst the king and the Prince: where he not entendyng to forsake so fayre an occasion so manifestly offered, he hauing with hym foure small shippes and not aboue syr score men, sayled into Cornewalle and there landed in the moneth of September and came to a towne called Bodman, and their did so solicit, prouoke, & styre the mutable and wauering people, what with fayre wordes and large promises, that he gathered to hym aboue three thousand persons, which immediatly called him their Capitayne, and sayde that they would take his part and follow hym to the death, and in all things obey his preceptes and commaundements.

Perkin sayleth into Cornewall.

Then Perkin was well encoraged and made proclamations in the name of kyng Richard the fourth as sonne to kyng Edwarde that last dyed. And by the aduise of his three councellers, John Heron mercer a banquerupt, Richard Scelton a Tailer and John Asteley a Skreuener, men of more dishonestly then of honest estimation, determyned first of all to assault and beate all walled & strong townes and fortresses, & them to receiue into his possession and seigniorye for his farther securitie and defence: And that enterprize atchieued, then he would augment hys hoste and marche forwarde against all persons that durst once offer themselues to withstand hym.

The Cornishe men againe rebell and haue Perkyn for their Capitaine.

When he & his imprudent counsaile were fully resolued on this point and conclusion, they in good order went straight to Excester, which was the nexte City that he could approch to, and besieged it, & because he lacked ordinaunce to make a battery to rase & deface the walles, he studied all the waies possible how to breake and infringe the gates, and what with casting of stones, heauing with pron barres & kyndling of fire vnder the gates, he omitted nothing that could be deuised for the furtheraunce of his vngratious purpose. The Citizens perceauing their towne to be inuironned with enemies & like to be enflamed, began at the first to be sore abashed, and let certaine messengers by cordes downe ouer the wall which should certefie the kyng of all their necessitie and trouble. But after that, taking to them lusty hartes and manly courages they determined to repulse fyre by fire, & caused faggots to be brought to the inwarde part of the portes and posterns and set them all on fire, to the entent that the fire being enflamed on both the sydes of the gates, might aswell exclude their enimies from entering, as include the Citezens from running or flying out, and that they in the meane season might make trenches and rampyres to defend their enemies in stede of gates and Bulwarkes. Thus all the doings and attempts of the rebellious people had euill successe in their first enterprise: and thus by fire the Citie was preserued from flame and burning. Then Perkyn being of necessitie compelled to leaue the gates, assaulted the Towne in diuers weake and vnfortefied places, and set vp ladders, attempting to clyme ouer the walles and to take the Citie, thynkyng suerly to compell the Citezens eyther by feare or for lack of succour to render themselues and yeeld the towne. But the Citezens being nothing so mynded, so couragiously lyke valyaunt champions defended the walles, that they slue aboue two hundred of his seditious souldiours at this assault.

One tyme hath victorie ouer thorough another tyme.

Assone as the messengers of Excester came to the kyngs presence and shewed their instructions, he hasted with his host toward Excester with as much hast as the grauitie of the cause did require. And sent the Lorde Dawbeney with light horsemen before to certefie all men of hys comming at hand. But in the meane season Lord Edward Courteney Earle of Deuonshire and Lorde William his sonne, a man of great force and valiauntnesse, accompanied with syr Edmond Carew, syr Thomas Trenchard, syr William Courtney, syr Thomas Fulford, syr John Halewell, syr John Croker, Water Courteney, Peter Egecombe, William Sentuaure, with all spede came into the Citie of Excester and holpe the Citezens, and at the last assault the Earle was hurt in the arme with an arowe, and so were many of hys company, but verye fewe slayne.

Perkyn flyeth from Exceter.

When Perkyn with his lewde cayptaynes saw that the Citie of Excester was so well fortfied both with men and munitions, and that in maner impregnable, fearing the sequell of this matter, departed from Excester with his lowsie armie to the next great towne called Tawnton, and there the twentye daye of September he mustered his men as though he were readie to fight: but his number were sore minished. For when the poore and needye people saw the great defence which was made at Excester, and that no man of honour nor yet of honestie drew to hym, contrarie to the promyse and assuraunce, made by hym and hys counsaylers to them at the begynnyng, they withdrew themselues by sundry secrete companies from hym, in prouiding their owne sauegard. Which thing when Perkyn perceaued, he put small trust & lesse confidence in the remnant of his army, as afterward it did apere because the most part of hys souldiers were harnisled on the right arme and naked all the body and neuer exercised in warre nor marciall feates but only with the spade and shouell.

Perkyn besieged Tawnton.

When the king heard he was gone to Tawnton, he hastened after him with all spede. Thether came to the king, Edward Duke of Buckingham, a yong Prince of a great courage & of a singuler good wit, and him followed a great companie of noble men, knightes, and Esquiers, prepared and redie with all thinges necessary for the fielde and battaile. Amongest which number was Sir Alexander Baynam, Sir Mawrice Barkeley, Sir Robert Tame, Sir John Guise, Sir Robert Poyntz, Sir Henry Vernon, Sir John Mortimer, Sir Thomas Tremayle, Sir Edward Sutton, Sir Amise Pawlet, Sir John Bickenell, Sir John Sapcotes, Sir Hugh Lutterell, Sir Fraunces Cheyney, and many other knightes, Esquiers and valiaunt personages. When the king approched nere the towne of Tawnton, whether he would not deferre and put off the battaile, or whether he doubtyng the turne of fortunes whele, sent before him Robert Lord Brooke lord

Steward

Steward of his house, Gyles Lorde Dawbeney his chiefe Chamberleyn, and sir Rice ap Thomas, to set on his enemies, and begin the battaile, and he with his power folowed, to the entent that when the armyes coped and ioyned together, he eyther should with newe succours refreshe his owne army, or else set on the backe of his enemies or they could espie him. Albeit the king had no great neede to vse such pollicie if he had knowen what sequele had ensued. For assoone as Perkyn was enformed that his enemyes were redie to geue him battaile, he that nothing lesse minded then to fight in open field with the kinges puyssaunce, dissimuled all the day tyme with his companie, as though nothing could make him afeard, and about midnight beyng accompanyed with. lx. horsemen, departed from Tawnton in poste to a Sanctuary towne beside Southhampton called Bewdeley, and there hee and John Heron, and other registred themselues as persons priuileged. But whether Perkyn did this for feare, least his men should forsake him, or for the cowardnesse of his owne timerous courage, it is as much vncertaine, as it is probable and sure, that the king tooke by his flight great commoditie and quietnesse, by reason that he was not enforced to fight with the Cornish men, whose heartes and courages were so encreased and enflamed by deadly desperation that they earnestly determined and were stedfastly bent either to winne victorie and ouercome their enemies, or else not one of them all to liue any day or houre longer.

Perkin flieth and taketh Sanctuary at Bewdley.

When king Henry knewe that Perkyn was fled and departed, he sent after him the Lorde Dawbeney, with fiue hundred horsemen towarde the sea syde to stay him before he should come there. But Perkyn whome the matter touched at the quick, made such hast with the swiftnesse of his horse, and sharpenesse of his spurres, that he was so farre passed on his way before, that no person coulde tell tidynges of him, before he registred and disclosed himselfe in the Sanctuarie. But his chiefe Capitaynes which fled, could not so craftily escape, for the most part of them were apprehended, and as captiues and wretches miserably presented to the king. When the residue of the common people could neyther see Perkyn nor yet the Standards nor guidehomes of their Capitaynes, not knowing where he was become, doubtyng whether he were fraudulently slaine, or fearefully fled, wist not what counsell to aske or what way was most surest to follow and take. But when they were assertayned of his most shamefull flight, euerye person oppressed wyth this common mischiefe, common feare, and common perill, caslyng awaye their armure, submitted themselues to the king, holdyng vp their handes in asking mercy, offryng and promisyng him, fayth, loyaltie and obeysaunce. To whome the king of most gentle heart and lenitie, not onely graunted pardon but receyued them to his fauour. And so the king beyng a conquerour without manslaughter or effusion of christian blood, roade triumphantly into the Citie of Ercester, and there not onely lauded and praysed the Citizens of Ercester, but also rendered to them his most hartie thankes, as well for their dueties done, as for their valiauntnesse. And there also he afflicted and put in execution diuerse Cornish men which were the authours and stirrers vp of this newe insurrection and false conspiracie.

The horsemen that were sent, without any stop or stay, in short space came to Saint Righelles mount, and there (as chaunce was) found Lady

Katheryn Gozden wyfe to Perkyn, and brought her straycht lyke a bonde woman and captiue to the king. And the king wonderyng at her beauty and amiable countenaunce, thought her a pray moze mete foz the chiefe capitaine then foz the meane Souldiozs, began then a little to phantasie her person, and sent her incontinently, accompanied with a goodly sozt of sad matrones and gentlewomen (because she was but a yong woman) to London to the Queene as a true and vndoubted token of his triumph and victozye. And while he reposed himselfe at Excester, he iudged that he had nothing wonne, noz yet plucked vp by the roote of this seditious rebellion, except he coulde get into his possession the chiefe hed and type of thys pestiferous faction and businesse. Wherefoze he enuironed the Sanctuarye which Perkyn was in, rounde about with two companies of light hozsemen, wise and discrete persons, to the entent to bereue and plucke from Perkyn all hope of slight and escapyng away. And after that, he attempted thys yong fondlyng by trustye and pollitique messengers, if he hauyng pardon and remission of all mischieuous and heynous offences by him done agaynst the king and his Realme, would gladly submit himselfe to the king, and be to him faythfull true and obedient. Perkyn beyng nowe destitute of all hope, faylyng of his dwellyng place, and lackyng comfozt, ayde, and refuge, considerynge that he was now brought to the very poynt and pzicke of extremitie, that he wist not how noz whether to flie into any Countrie foz succour, and also he was in vtter dispayze to haue hereafter any pzosperous chaunce, oz foztunate successe in his enterpzice, because he had so often attempted, and so manye tymes had bene foyled and vanquished, wherfoze he hauyng his pardon to him offered, and trusting to the open pzomise of men, of his awne will frankly and freely departed out of Sanctuary and committed himselfe to the kinges pleasure, and so by this meanes this great heate was quenched and appeased.

Perkyn submitted himselfe to the King.

Then was the king very glad that this warre was ended, and tooke his iourney immediately toward London, not without a great concourse of people meetyng him out of euery quarter to see this Perkyn as he were a Mõster, because he beyng an alyen of no abilitie by his pooze parentes (although it was otherwise talked and dissimuled) durst once inuade so noble a realme, and it to infect with such lyes and leasynges, and chiefely of all that he by hys craftie suboznations had perswaded diuers aswell noble as ignoble (not without the confusion and vndoyng of many of them) to beleue and say that he was the very same person that he feyned and paynted himselfe to be. But when the king was come to London, he appoynted certaine kepers to attend on him which should not (the bzedth of a nayle) go from his person, to the entent that he might neyther conuey himselfe out of the lande, noz flie any whether, noz yet pzouoked and pzocured by other, should be able to sowe againe no newe sedition noz seditious tumult within his realme and countries.

Kepers were appointed to looke to Perkyn.

When these tydings came to the Ladye Margaret in Flaunders that Perkyn her deere darling had no good luck but losse, both of his enterpzise and her great studious furtheraunce, and was brought into captiuitie, shee was not well pleased with them, but wept and lamented hys vnluckie spede, and cursed her infoztunate chaunce.

When these things were brought to passe according to the kings minde, he did not forget that there was not a moze delectable and pleasaunt thing, noz nor a larger reyne of mischiefe geuen to the vulgare people, then to haue a sure hope and trust that they may offende without any punishment or correction: Wherefore to the intent hereafter to obserue his people in due obeysaunce and subiection, he shortlye caused inquyries to be made of dyuers offences. Wherupon diuers persons as well in Sommersetshire as Deuonshire were accused and presented that they had ayded both wyth men and money the Cornish Traytors, not only after their discomfiture in returning homeward, but also in their marching forward, entending to make battayle against the king being their souereigne and liege Lord. All which offenders he determined to plague and scourge according to the quantity of their crime and offence, with great fines and sore assesments. And therefore he committed this charge to Thomas Lorde Darcie, to Amis Paulet knight, and Robert Sherborne Deane of Paules, after Bishop of Chichester.

Commissioners Thomas Lorde Darcy Amis Paulet knight. Robert Sherborne Deane of Paules.

These Commissioners lyke a whirlewinde tossed and pierced the Cofers and substaunce of all the inhabitaunts of both the Countries, to the intent that no person being embrued or spotted with the ynke of that abhominable crime, should escape the payne which he worthily had deserued: but they were gentle and remisse to a great number, and specially to such as offended by coheercion and feare, rather then of malicious heart or enuious minde. Yet were they to none so fauourable but they were thought for their defaultes worthy of some punishment, so that equitie therein was very well and iustly executed.

In this yere a sodeyne chaunce, ye a thing of no moment nor worthy to be regarded had almost so kindled agayne the olde displeasure and grudge betweene king Henry and king James of Scotlande, that they could scarce kepe their hands, and bridle their courages from warre and fighting. The first motion of this displeasure was thus: Certayne yong men of the Scots came armed vnto Norham Castell, and beheld it wonderous circumspectly, as though they had beene desirous to knowe what was done there within: But when the kepers of the Castell could not perceiue any hostilitie or dammage towardes them or theirs, and seyng them depart of their awne accord, determined it not conuenient to moue any question to them nor once to stirre out. But when they came agayne the next daye and viewed it likewise, the kepers of the sayde Castell suspecting some fraude to lurck in their looking, demaunded of them what was their intent, & why they viewed and aduised so the Castell. The Scottes euen lyke themselues, aunswered them proudly and rustically with many disdeynfull wordes. Insomuch that after their blustering and blowyng aunswers made, the Englishe men beyng vered and moued therewithall, replyed to them with hard and manly strokes, and after many a sore blowe geuen and taken on both partes, and diuers Scottes wounded and some slayne, the Scottes oppressed with the multitude of the Englishe people, fled as fast as their horses would carie them. When they came home and certefied the king of the same, he was therewith sore moued and angry, and swore by sweete Saint Ninyan there was nothing to him more inconstant and vnstedfast then the obseruyng of the league by the king of Englande, and sent worde thereof to king Henry in all haste by Marchmount his Herauld.

The king of England which nothing more embraced and desyred then

quyet tranquilitie and perfite loue and amitie with all Pzinces beyng hys neyghbours and bozderers, to the intent that he myght lyue in his latter dayes in an honeſt and quyet lyfe after ſo many labours and vexations euen from his infancie drawen and exerciſed in, made him aunſwere that it was not done through his default, neither by his counſell noz knowledge, but rather by the raſhe folly of the keepers of the Caſtell, requiring him foz that cauſe not to thinke the league infringed, pzomiſing in the wozde of a king to enquire of the truth, and who were the malefactours. And if the offence were founde to be begon on the partie of the keepers of the Caſtell, he aſſured him that they ſhould foz no meede oz fauour eſcape paine and puniſhement. This aunſwere although it were moze then reaſonable, could not mitigate oz aſſwage the Scots anger and outrageouſneſſe, foz the which cauſe Rycharde Byſhop of Durham, which was moze heauie then all other becauſe that this diſcozde was renued agayne betweene theſe two Pzinces by occaſion of Caſtell kepers, he therefoze thought it beſt firſt to aſſwage and coole the furious rage of the Scottiſhe king, and wzote manye letters to hym, requiring him of peace and vnitie. The king perceauing both the good will and conſtant grauitie of the Biſhop, appeaſed his furie and aunſwered gently to the Byſhops letters by wzyting agayne to him, ſayyng, that becauſe he had many ſecret and pziuy things in his mind which he would cõmunicate onely with him touching the cauſe nowe in varyaunce, he therfoze required him to take paine to come into his Countrie, truſting that he ſhould thinke his labour well beſtowed. The Byſhop was very glad and ſent wozde to the king his maiſter, of king Iames deſire, who eſteemed the requeſt and cauſe both iuſt and reaſonable, and therfoze willed him to accompliſh the Scottiſh kings honeſt deſire.

Richard Biſhop of Durham.

When he came into Scotland, he was receyued with all humanitie that could be thought of the king himſelf at an Abbey called Melroſe. And there, after that the king foz a countenaunce had complayned muche of the cruelty and ſlaughter that was vſed towardes his men late at Nozham, he eaſily remitted the offence and pardoned it, and began ſecretly to common wythout any witneſſes oz arbitrers nere hande with the Byſhop alone. And firſt declared to him what olde and iuſt cauſes haue moued him befoze this, to ſeeke alyaunce and amitie with king Henry, which nowe he deſired much moze to haue confirmed and cozrobozate foz the farther maintenaunce of loue and increaſe of friendſhip, which thing he doubted not, but ſhould fozte to a foztunate effect and good concluſion, if the king of England would vouchſafe to geue to him in matrimony his firſt begotten daughter the Lady Margaret, vpon which point he determined not long agone to ſende hys Ambaſſadozs into England, which thing he would the ſoner doe if he knew this Byſhops minde and intent readie to further his louing purpoſe. The Biſhop aunſwered but fewe wozdes, ſayyng that when he were returned to the king hys maiſter, he would doe the beſt in the matter that laye in his power. Which wozds animated much the king, and put him in good hope to ſende his Imbaſſadours to the king of Englande to ſue foz the ſayde matrimonie to bee concluded.

Ladie Margaret eldeſt daughter to king Henry the ſeuenth.

When the Biſhop had taken his leaue, and was come to the king, he declared to him in ozder all the communication betwene king Iames and him.

Thys

This request pleased the king very much, to whom peace was euer a soue-reigne medicine, and determined surely to minister occasion of warre to no man, nor would haue any Prince to prouoke him to the same.

Now began the fatall daye of the death of Perkyn Warbeck, and Edward Erle of Warwicke to approche: For after this fact done and committed, one fierce and strong waue deuoured and swalowed both their lyues not long a sunder, as you shall heare by the continuation of this storie. Perkyn, whether it grieued him to be kept in warde, or else that he was instigated and entised by some of his olde friendes to sturre more coles, and begin some newe seditious faction, or at the least, because he would wilfully waste and cast away himselfe, studied how to escape and flie away, hauyng perfite hope that he should finde occasion to bring all things well to passe, if he could conuey himselfe once out of the English mens hands. And although he were not ignoraunt, that he neither could doe nor imagine any thing, but the king would both heare of it and know it: Yet he seduced with hope of euasion and scaping, which was the chiefe comfort of his captiuitie, had liefer put all things in a proofe and hazarde, rather then lenger to suffer the present calamitie and daylie miserie. And so decepuing his keepers tooke him to hys heeles, by the which he brought himselfe into a straighter custodie and prison, and wrapped himselfe into tortures and punishmentes: For when he came to the Sea costes, and had gone but a little forward on his iourney, when the rumour of his flight was spreade abroade, euery bye way and lane was set abroade with the kings garde, which had the custodie of hys body. Wherfore he beyng sore abashed with the clamour of them that searched and made inquirie for him, and beyng in a maner destitute of wyt and counsaile, altered of necessitie from his pretensed iourney, and came to the house of Bethlem, called the Priorie of Shene beside Richemond in Southrey, and committed himselfe to the Prior of the Monasterie, requiring him for Gods sake to aske and desire his lyfe and pardon of the kings maiestie. The Prior which for his verteous qualities was had in great estimation, moued with the calamitie and infortunate state of this man, came to the king and shewed him of this Perkyn, whose pardon he humblye craued, and frankely obteyned it. Incontinent after this, Perkyn was brought to the Court againe to Westminster with many a curse and reproche, and was one daye set fettered in a payre of stockes, before the doore of Westminster hall, and there stoode one whole day, not without innumerable reproches, mockes and scornings. And the next day was carped thorough London, and set vpon a lyke Scaffolde in Chepe by the Standard, with lyke gynnes and stockes as he occupied the daye before, and there stood all daye and red openly his awne confession written with hys awne hande, the verie Copie whereof hereafter ensueth.

Perkin Warbeck.
Edward erle of Warwicke.

First it is to be knowne, that I was borne in the towne of Turney in Flaunders, and my fathers name is John Osbeck, which sayde John Osbeck, was Comptroller of the said towne of Turney, and my mothers name is Katheryn de Faro. And one of my Graundsires vpon my fathers side was named Diryck Osbeck which dyed, after whose death my Graundmother was maryed vnto Peter Flamme, that was receiuer of the forenamed towne of Turney, and Deane of the Botemen that rowe vpon the water or ryuer,

ryuer, called Leschelde. And my Graundsire vpon my mothers side was Peter de Faro, which had in his keeping the keyes of the gate of S. Johns within the same Towne of Turney. Also I had an Uncle called maister John Stalyn, dwelling in the parishe of Saint Pyas within the same towne, which had maried my fathers sister, whose name was Jone or Jane, with whome I dwelled a certayne season. And after I was led by my mother to Andwerp for to learne Flemmishe, in a house of a Cousyn of mine, an officer of the sayde towne, called John Stienbeck, with whome I was the space of halfe a yere. And after that I returned agayne to Turney, by reason of the warres that were in Flaunders. And within a yere followyng I was sent with a Marchaunt of the sayde towne of Turney named Berlo, to the marte of Andwarpe where I fell sick, which sicknesse continued vpon fiue Moneths. And the said Barlo set me to borde in a Skinners house, that dwelled beside the house of the Englishe nation. And by him I was from thence caryed to Barowe marte, and I lodged at the signe of the olde man, where I abode the space of two Moneths. And after this the sayd Barlo set me with a Marchant of Middelborough to seruice, for to learne ỹ language whose name was John Strewe, wyth whom I dwelled from Christmas til Easter, and then I went into Portyngale, in the companie of Sir Edward Bramptones wyfe, in a ship which was called the Quenes ship. And when I was come thether, then I was put in seruice to a knight that dwelled in Lushborne, whiche was called Peter Vacz de Cogna, wyth whome I dwelled an whole yere, which sayde knight had but one eye. And because I desyred to see other Countries, I toke licence of him, & then I put my selfe in seruice with a Briton, called Pregent Meno, the which brought me with him into Irelande, and when we were there arriued in the towne of Corke, they of the towne, because I was arayed with some clothes of Silke of my sayde maisters, came vnto me and threaped vpon mee that I should be the Duke of Clarence sonne, that was before time at Deuelin. And forasmuch as I denied it, there was brought vnto me the holy Euangelists and the crosse by the Maior of the towne, which was called John le Wellen, and there in the presence of him and other I tooke my othe as the truth was, that I was not the foresayde Dukes sonne, nor none of his blood. And after this came vnto me an Englishe man, whose name was Stephen Poytron, with one John Water, and layde to me in swearyng great othes, that they knew well that I was king Richardes Bastard sonne: To whome I answered with like othes, that I was not. And then they aduised me not to be afearde, but that I should take it vpon me boldly, and if I would so do, they would ayde and assist me with all their power agaynst the king of England, and not onely they, but they were assured well that the Erles of Desmond, and Kildare, should do the same. For they forced not what parte they tooke, so that they might be reuenged vpon the king of England, and so agaynst my will made me to learne Englishe, and taught me what I should do and say. And after this they called me Duke of Yorke, second sonne of king Edward the fourth, because king Richards bastard sonne was in the handes of the king of England. And vpon this the sayde John Water, Stephen Poytron, John Tiler, Hughbert Burgh, with many other, as the foresayde Erles, entred into this false quarell. And within short time after, the French king sent an Imbas-

sadoz into Ireland, whose name was Loyte Lucas, and mayster Stephyn Fryam, to aduertise me to come into Fraunce. And thence I went into Fraunce, and from thence into Flaunders, and from Flaunders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, and so into England.

When night of the same day, which was the .xv. day of June was come (partly because the king had pardoned him his life, and partly because hee should no moze ronne awaye, & put the king in doubt of any mistrust oz misfortune to come) he was committed to the Tower of London, where hys wickednesse boilyng so hote within his cankard stomacke, woulde not suffer him to escape the punishement and vengeaunce of God, but shortly after was most iustly and worthily put to death, as hereafter shall be shewed.

Edward Plantagenet Erle of Warwike, of whome ye haue heard bezore, being kept in the Tower almost from his tender age, that is to say, from the first yere of the king to this .xv. yere, out of all company of men and sight of beastes, in so much that he could not decerne a Goose from a Capon. And where as he by cõmon reason and open apparaunce, coulde not by his awne doynges seeke his death and destruction, yet by the drift and offence of another man, he was brought to his end and confusion. For a Frier Augustin on the border of Suffolke called Patricke, to the entent to bring this Erle into disdaine and hatred, had a certaine scholer called Rauffe Wilford, whome he greatly fauoured, and in whose hed he euer distilled and enfused this foolish and phantasticall conceyte, that if he would folowe his counsaile and aduise, he would easily conuey him to the kingdome of England. The scholer lyke a good disciple, did not denie to folow his maisters discipline and counsaile, but more and more desired and put his Mayster in remembraunce to performe and accomplishe with all speede, that thing which of his awne liberalitie, he before had to him both promised and assured, saiyng, what Wecocke oz dastard is so sore afeard of transgressing the law, oz dreadeth punishment, the which to obteyne a kingdome will not attempt to do, and suffer all things that is possible to be assayed and tasted? So that when they betweene themselues secretly had taken a craftie deliberation and counsaile of their enterprise, and had deuised in their foolishe wittes, howe it should be brought to passe, they went both together into Kent (which Countrie in auncient tyme hath not beene dull in setting foozth of newe phantasticall phantasyes) and there begon this yong Mawmet to tell priuily to many that he was the very Erle of Warwicke, and lately gotten out of the Tower, by the helpe of thys Frier Patricke. To the which saiyngs when the Frier perceyued hope to be geuen, he declared it openly in the Pulpet, and desired all men of helpe.

But the head of this sedicion was Sommer topped, that it could haue no time to spring any higher, the maister and the scholer beyng both apprehended and cast into prison, and attainted. Of the which two, the scholer was hanged on Shrouetuesday, at Saint Thomas of Watering, and the Frier was condemned to perpetuall prison and captiuitie. For at that tyme here in England, so much reuerence was attributed to the holy ozders, that a priest, although he had committed high treason against his souereigne Lozd and to all other, offenders in murder, rape oz theft, which had receyued any of the three higher holy ozders, the lyfe was geuen, & the punishment of death released. The chiefe cause of this fauour was this, because Bishops of a long

tyme and season did not take knowlege, nor intermit themselues with ꝑ serch and punishement of such heynous and detestable offences, by reason whereof they did not disgrade and depriue from the holy orders such malefactors, and wicked persons, which without ꝑ ceremony, by the canonicall law could not be put to death. Furthermore, what should a man say, it was also vsed that he that could but only read (yea although he vnderstode not what he read) how heynous or detestable a cryme so euer he had cõmitted (treason onely except) should likewise as affines and alyes to the holy orders be saued, & committed to the Bishops prison. And to the entent that if they should escape, & be again taken, cõmitting like offence, that their liues should be no more to them pardoned, it was ordayned that murderers should be brent on the brawne of the left hande with an hote yron signed with this letter M, and theeues in the same place with this letter T, so that if they, which were once signed with anye of these markes or tokens, did againe commit like cryme and offence, should suffer the paynes and punishmentes, which they had both merited and deserued. Which deuice was enacted and established in the Parliament kept in the seconde yere of this kinges reigne, and taken as I coniecture of the French nation, which are wont if they take any such offender, to cut off one of his eares, as a sure token and marke hereafter of his euill doyng. And the charge of keping such offenders, that be only imprisoned by their offences, because it soundeth to spirituall religion, is committed to the Bishops and rulers of the spiritualtie, with a penaltie set vpon them, if any such prisoner doe afterwarde escape. The which act and priuilege did nourishe and encrease aboundauntly the sect and swarme of theeues and murderers, for after that time there were an hundreth waies practised and inuented, how at one time or another, to deliuer or conuey them out of prison and captiuitie, by making their purgation (by what sleight and meanes they care not) of such offences as before they were conuinced and found guiltie, if no man be present to lay exceptions to the same. For if the partie offended and hurt be absent at the day of the purgation making, the theefe or murderer truely found guilty from the begynning, shall be both excused and set at libertie. And oftentimes the sooner, because the Bishop would not leese so great a summe as an hundred pounde, for the escape of a poore knaue, scant worth a Dandiprat: But now to returne to our matter againe.

Perkyn (of whome rehersall was made before) beyng now in hold, could not leaue with the destruction of hym selfe, and confusion of other that had associate themselues with hym, but began nowe to studye which way to flye and escape. For he by false perswasions and liberall promises, corrupted Strangweyes, Blewet, Astwood and long Rogier hys kepers, being seruauntes to syr John Dygby Lieutenaunt. Insomuch that they (as it was at their areinement openly proued) entended to haue slayne the sayd Maister, and to haue set Perkyn and the Erle of Warwicke at large, whiche Erle was by them made priuie of this enterprice, and therevnto (as all naturall creatures loue libertie) to his distruction assented. But this craftie deuice and subtill imagination, being opened & disclosed, sorted to none effect, and so he being repulsed and put backe from all hope and good lucke wyth all his complices and confederates, and John Atwater, sometyme Maior of Corke in Irelande, one of his founders, and hys sonne, were the sixtene day of Nouember

Strangweys Blewet, Astwood and long Rogier kepers of Perkin were corrupted.

uember arained and condemned at Weſtminſter. And on the thyee and twentye daye of the ſame moneth, Perkyn and John Awater were drawne to Tiborne, and there Perkyn ſtandyng on a litle ſkaffolde, read his confeſſion, which before you haue heard, and toke it on his death to be true, & ſo he and John Awater aſked the kyng forgeueneſſe and dyed paciently. This was the rewarde of the pernicious Alye of Perkyn Warbeck, which in his life wyth falſe perſwaſions and vntrue ſurmiſes had brought many noble perſonages to death and vtter perdicion, ſo at his death he brought with him other of the ſame ſorte to their not vndeſerued punyſhment. And amongeſt other Edward Earle of Warwicke, which as the fame went, conſented to breake pryſon, & to depart out of the Realme wyth Perkyn (which in priſoners is high treaſon) was the .xrj. daye of the ſayde moneth arreyned at Weſtmynſter before the Earle of Oxforde, then high Counſtable of England, of the ſayd treaſon, which whether it were by the enticement of other or of his awne free will (many mē doubt becauſe of hys innocency) confeſſed the fact & ſubmitted hymſelfe to the kyngs mercy. And vpon his confeſſion he had his iudgement, and accordyng therevnto, the .xrviij. day of Nouember. M.cccc. xcix. was brought to the ſkaffold on the Towre hyll, and there beheadded. The fame after hys death ſprang abroad, that Ferdinand kyng of Spayne would neuer make full concluſion of the matrymony to be had betwene Prince Arthur & the Lady Katheryn hys daughter, nor ſend her into England as long as this Erle lyued. For he imagined that as long as any Erle of Warwicke lyued, that England ſhould neuer be clenſed nor purged of cyuill warre and preuy ſedycion, ſo muche was the name of Warwicke in other Regions, had in feare and geloſye.

Perkyn and John Awater drawen to Tyborne and executed.

Edwarde Erle of Warwick beheaded.

A great death.

The nert yere after there was a great plague, wherof men dyed in many places very ſore, but eſpecially & moſt of all in the City of London, where dyed in that yere thirty thouſand. Alſo in this yere was burned a place of the kings called the maner of Shene, ſituate and lyng nigh the Thamys ſide, which he after buylded agayne ſumptuouſlye and coſtely, and chaunged the name of Shene, and called it Richemond, becauſe his father and he were Erles of Richemond.

The maner of Shene brent.

The kyng perceyuing this plague and contagyous diſeaſe, rather to encreaſe then decreaſe, whether it was to auoyd the occaſion of the ſickneſſe, or to allure the Archduke of Burgoyn to common with him, he perſonally toke his ſhip at Douer, in the beginnig of May, & ſailed to Calice, to the entent to prouide and ſee the watches, which haue bene accuſtomed to be diligently kept and mayntayned againſt the incurſions of his aduerſaries, and there he made politique ordinaunces and ſtrayght lawes. While the kyng laye thus at Calice, the Archeduke Philyp ſent to him diuers notable perſonages, not alonelye to gratify and welcome him into thoſe partes, but alſo to declare that the ſayde Archeduke offred to repayre perſonally to hys preſence, wyth ſuche a number as the kyng ſhould appoynt, ſo that it were within no walled towne or fortreſſe. For he had before diuers tymes made denyall to the French kyng to enter into any of his walled townes, and if he ſhould, as he gladly would come to the towne of Calice, it might be a preſident to ỹ French kyng to deſyre like metyng, what chaunce there of might fall, euery man could not iudge. The kyng gently entertayned the Ambaſſadors, but more thankfully fully accepted the Archedukes offer, and ſo appoynted the place at Saint Peters Church without Calice. Upon the Tueſday in Pentecoſt weeke, the Archeduke came thether with a conuenient companie. The King and the Queene with many a luſtie Lorde and Lady rode thether to welcome him. And when the king approched, the Duke at his lightyng offred to holde hys ſtirrop, which the king in no wiſe woulde ſuffer to be done. When the king was diſſended from his horſe, he and the Archeduke embraced eche other with moſt princely familiaritie, and then the Queene and all the Nobles ſaluted him. What banquettyng, what mirth, and what paſtyme there was, I ouerpaſſe. But to conclude there was communication of mariages, treating of farther corroberation of leagues, requeſtes, of tolles in Flaunders to be miniſhed, with many other thinges, touchyng the entercourſe and traffique of both their realmes. And when all thinges were ſet in an order, the two Princes louyngly tooke their leaue and departed, the king to Calice, and the Archeduke to Saint Omers.

After this departyng, the French king Lewys the twelue, ſent to viſite the king, the Lord Gronthouſe gouernour of Picardie, and the Lord Berneiliers, Bayly of Amyas, which declared to the king the gettyng of Mullayn, and takyng of the Duke, which Lordes were highly feaſted, and wyth great rewardes departed.

1500 16 Soone after when this plague was ſlaked, the king returned againe to England, about the ende of June: And beyng come into Englande, ſoone after there came to him one Gaſper Pous, a Spaniard (both for learnyng and good behauiour very excellent) ſent from Alexander Biſhop of Rome, which ſhould ſhew the Engliſhe men the right way to heauen. Therefore that yere was called the yere of Jubile, which was the yere of our Lorde a thouſand fiue hundred. And to the entent that the people of farre Countries might be eaſed of their labour and trauaile in commyng thether, the charitable father ſent his Legates into euery Countrie to deſtribute the heauenly grace (as he called it) to all Chriſten people, which eyther letted by warre, enemies, infirmitie, weakeneſſe, or tediouſneſſe of ỹ long iourney, were not able to performe their iourney to the holy Citie of Rome. But this beneuolent liberality was not franche & freely geuen: For the holy Biſhop Alexander, with helpyng and loking to the helth of mens ſoules, thought ſomewhat to doe for hys awne priuate commoditie and ſinguler welth, and therefore he limitted and ſet a certaine price of this his grace and pardon: and to the ende that the king ſhould not hynder nor let his purpoſe, he offered part of this his gaine vnto the king. And that the people might the ſooner miniſhe their purſes, and enriche his Cheſtes, he promiſed that he would in the beginnyng of the yere make warre in all the haſte againſt the great Turke. By this meanes and pollicie, this Alexander gat and heaped vp a great ſumme of money, and yet no battaile begonne againſt the Turke, which in the meane ſeaſon had taken, conquered, and deſtroyed many regions, Cities, & townes belongyng to Chriſten men.

About this time died three Biſhops in England, John Morton Biſhop of Caumtorbury, Thomas Langton Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Thomas Rotheram Biſhop of Yorke. After him ſucceded Thomas Sauage Biſhop of London, in whoſe place ſucceded Doctor William Warham of whom we made made mencion before. And Henry Deane Bishop of Sarisburie was made Archebishop of Cauntorbury. Also Richard Fore Bishop of Durham, was preferred to the Bishoprike of Winchester. Also this yere two notable mariages were concluded and agreed vpon, but neyther solemnised nowe, nor consummate as you shall heare afterwarde. For king Henry graunted hys daughter Ladie Margaret to James the fourth king of Scottes. And Ferdinand king of Spaine gaue his daughter Ladie Katherin to Arthur prince of Wales, sonne and heyre apparaunt to the king of England. And it is to be considered ỳ king Henry did not ioyne this affinitie with the king of Scottes without cause: For he desiryng nothing more, then to passe ouer the remnãt of his lyfe in peace, rest, and tranquilitie, imagined in himselfe that by thys coniunction and couplement of matrimonie, no warre or hostilitie hereafter should be attempted eyther agaynst him or his Dominions by the Scottishe king or his nation, hauyng sure trust that none other of his enemies or of his rebelles should hereafter be receyued or mainteyned in the Dominions and territories of his sonne in lawe. And amongest all other articles this was concluded and appoynted, that no English man should enter into Scotland, without letters commendatory of theyr awne souereigne Lorde, or safeconduyte of his Wardein of the Marches, and that prohibition was in lyke maner geuen to the Scottes.

The Ladie Katheryn affied to Arthur Prince of Wales.

You haue heard before, howe that the mariage was agreed betweene Prince Arthure of England, and the Ladie Katheryn of Spaine, and howe the king her father promised to send her with great honour into England: He now this yere accordyng to his promise conueyed her with a puyssaunt nauy toward England, where she arriued in the porte of Plymmouth the seconde day of October, then beyng Saterday. When the king was certified of her arryuall, incontinent he sent both for Prince Arthur his sonne into Wales to repayre to London, and sent diuers great Lords and knightes to conuey her with tryumph toward her spouse and husband. And vpon the .xij. day of Nouember, she was conueyed from Lambeth through London with all triumph and honour that could be deuised or imagined, to the Bishops palace, by the cathedrall Church of Saint Paules. And because I will not be tedious to you, I passe ouer the wise deuises, and the prudent speeches, set foorth in seuen goodly Pageauntes, erected and set vp in diuers places of the Citie. I leaue also the sweete harmonie, which sounded with heauenly noyse on euery syde of the streete. I omit farther, the costly apparell both of Goldesmithes woorke and embraudery, the riche Jewelles, the massie Charnes, the stirryng horses, the beautifull bardes, and the glitteryng trappers, both with belles and spangles of golde. I will not molest you with rehersyng the riche arras, the costly tapestrie, the fyne clothes both of golde and siluer, the pleasaunt silkes, which did hang in euery streete where she passed, the wine that ranne continually out of the Conduytes. But to resort vnto the history.

The receyuing into Lõdon of ỳ Lady Katheryn who afterward maryed with Prince Arthur the kinges eldest sonne.

While this princesse soiourned for her recreation in the Bishops palace of London, not without visitation of the king, the Queene and the kinges mother, there was erected in the bodye of Saint Paules Church, a long bridge made of timber, extending from the West doze of the Church, to the step at the entering into the Quere, which was fire foote from the ground. On the sayd bridge or stage, euen directly before the consistorie of the church was eleuate a place lyke a mount, for eyght persons to stand vpon, compassed rounde about with steps to assend and dissend, which was couered wyth fyne red worsted, and in lykewise were all the rayles of the sayde stage. On the Northside of this mount was a place furnished for the king and Queene and such other as they appointed. On the Southside of the same mount stood the Maior & the Magistrates of London. When all preparation was made, and all things set in an order. Upon the day of Saint Erkenwalde, then beyng Sunday, the sayde Lady was led to the same mount, and there prince Arthur openly espoused her, both beyng clad in whyte, both lustie and amorous, he of the age of fiftene and more, and she of the age of .xviij. or thereabouts. After the matrimonie celebrate, the prince and hys wyfe went vp into the Quere, and there heard a solempne masse, song by the Archebyshop of Cauntorbury, associate with .xix. Prelates mytred. And after the masse fynished, the Bride was led homewarde to the Byshops palace, by Henry Duke of Yorke, beyng then a goodly yong prince, & the Legate of Spaine. Next after folowed the Ladie Cicile sister to the Queene, supportyng the trayne of the spouse. After whome folowed aboue an hundred Ladies and Gentlewomen gorgeously appareyled and richely adourned. There was kept that day a sumpteous feast, but when night was come, this lustie prince and his bewtifull Bride were brought and ioyned together in one bed, and there did that act, which to the performaunce and full consummation of matrimonie was most requysite and expedient. In so muche that his familier seruitours, which had then neyther cause nor reward to lye or fayne, declared openly that in the morning he called for drinke, which he before times was not accustomed to doe. At which thing one of his Chamberlaynes marnayling, required the cause of his drouth. To whome he aunswered merily saiyng, I haue this night bene in the middest of Spaine, which is a hote region, and that iourney maketh me so drie, and if thou hadst bene vnder that hote clymate, thou wouldest haue bene drier then I. Then shortly after the king and the Queene with the new wedded spouses, went from Baynardes Castell by water to Westminster, on whome the Maior and Communaltie of London, in Barges garnished with standardes, streamers, and penons of their deuise, gaue their attendaunce. And there in the palace were suche martiall feates, and valiant iustes, as before that tyme was of no man had in remembraunce. Of this royall triumph Lord Edward Duke of Buckyngham was chiefe chalenger, and the Lorde Thomas Grey Marques Dorset was chiefe defendour, which with their aydes and companions, bare themselues so valyauntly that they obteyned great laude and honour, both of the Spanyardes and of their Countrimen.

The mariage of prince Arthur with the Ladye Katheryn.

This after his father was king Henry the eyght.

During the time of these iustes and triumph, were receaued into London, an Erle, a Byshop, and dyuers noble personages, sent from the king of Scottes into England, for the conclusion of the mariage betwene the Lady Margaret the kings daughter and hym. Which Erle by proxie in the name of king Iames his maister, affied and contracted the sayd fayre Lady. Which assuraunce was published at Paules Crosse, the day of the conuersion of S. Paule, in reioysing wherof Te deum was song, & great fires made thorough the Citie of London. Which things as you haue heard, beyng fully fynished and accomplished the Ambassadours as well of Spaine as of Scotlande, tooke their leaue of the king, and not without great rewardes departed into their Countries.

When the Imbassadors were departed, the king entending to auaunce the honor and reputation of the prince his sonne, furnished him with men and money largely, and sent him agayne into Wales, where he was before, to keepe liberall hospitalitie, and to minister to the rude Welchemen indifferent iustice. And least by reason of lack of experience he might erre, he appointed to him wise and expert counsaylers, as syr Rychard Poole his kinsman, which was his chiefe Chamberlayne, with whome were associate syr Henry Vernon, Sir Rychard Croftes, Sir Dauy Philip, Sir Wylliam Vdale, Syr Thomas Englefelde, Sir Peter Newton knightes, John Walston, Henry Watyon, & Doctor Wylliam Smyth who was President of his Counsayle, and Doctor Charles, both were with him associate, the one was afterwarde Bishop of Lyncolne, and the other Bysshop of Herford. But as of one Fountayne commeth often both ioye and sorrowe, so I leaue here to speake more of ioye of thys mariage, considering the chaunce that shortly after succeeded.

A few Moneths before the mariage of Prince Arthur, Edmond Poole Erle of Suffolke, sonne to John Duke of Suffolke, and Lady Elizabeth sister to king Edward the fourth, beyng stoute and bolde of courage, and of wyt rashe and headie, was endited of homicide and murther, for sleayng of a meane person in his rage and furie: And although the king pardoned hym whome he might iustly haue condempned for that offence, yet because he was brought to the kings Benche barre and arreyned (which fact he reputed to be a great mayme and blemishe to his honor) tooke it seriously, and shortly after for this displeasure, fled into Flaunders, without any licence or safeconduyte geuen him of the kyng, to the Ladye Margaret his Awnt on the mothers side. Neuertheless, whether he was sturred by hys priuie friendes therunto mooued by the king, or whether he trusting on hys innocencie and truth feared no daunger nor penaltie, he returned agayne, and excused himselfe so to the king that he was thought to be guiltlesse and inculpable in any cryme that could be obiected to him, and therefore he was permitted to go frankely at his libertie and pleasure.

But when this mariage of prince Arthur was kept at London wyth great pompe and solempnitie, and that all the nobilitie were set on pleasure and solace, and the king himselfe was principally geuen to ioy and reioysing. Thys Edmonde, eyther for that he had bene at great and excessyue charges at the same tryumph and solempnitie, and by reason therof sore charged with debt. Eyther sollicited, allured & prouoked by that olde venemous Serpent the Duches of Burgoyn, euer beyng the sower of sedition, and beginner of rebellion agaynst the king of Englande, or else prouoked and pricked wyth enuy, which could not patiently with open eyes see and beholde king Henry, beyng of the aduerse lyne to his lignage, so long to reigne in wealth and felicitie, in conclusion with his brother Rychard fled agayne into Flaunders. This sad chaunce (I thinke) happened among the great ioyes and solaces of king Henry, least that he might not by ouermuch gladnesse sodeynly forget himselfe: Which displeasure at an other time before to haue chaunced, it is manifest and well knowne to you.

When the king vnderſtoode certaynly that this Erle was departed and returned agayne, he was not a litle vexed and vnquieted, miſtruſting that ſome newe tumulteous buſyneſſe ſhould be begonne againe, and chiefly therfore blamed hymſelfe of foolish follie that he had giuen hym his pardon for hys offence, lately committed. Although it was manifeſt ynough that he dyd it for thys purpoſe, that he myght diſſemble and wynke at the matter ſo long vntill ſuch time, he had ſome ſure token and perfite knowledge of his conuration, the which he perceyued now to be ſurely attempted and begon. Aſſone as Edmond de la Poole Erle of Suffolke was fled agayne into Flaunders, Syr Robert Curſon, whome the kyng had promoted to the order of knighthoode, and made capitayne of Hammes Caſtle, a valiaunt and a circumſpect man, diſſimuling hymſelfe to be one of that conſpiracye went into Flaunders, doubtleſſe to eſpy what was done there by the Lady Margaret againſt kyng Henrye. This opinion was ſetteled in euery mannes head at the firſt brochyng of the matter, and ſo yet continueth, groundyng vpon this principle, that he neyther vexed nor moleſted wyth any poynt of diſpleaſure or iniurie by his Prince or anye other fled to the kings enimies. And after all thinges were knowne, pacefied & ſuppreſſed, he willingly returned and was receiued into high fauour with the kyng his mayſter and ſouereigne Lord. Howbeit, the king like a wiſe Prince, knowing the faithfull intent of thys Syr Robert, & entending to put him out of al iealowſie and ſuſpicion with the Ladye Margaret, and Edmond de la Poole, cauſed the ſaid Erle and the ſaid Sir Robert Corſon, and fiue perſons more to be accurſed at Paules croſſe the firſt Sundaye of Nouember, as enimies and rebels to him and his realme. But howſoeuer it chaunced, whether it were for the eaſing of his hart, or for ſome priuye pollicye, the king after the mariage of his ſonne Prince Arthur, was ſo vigilant, and ſo intentiue, that he eſpied and tryed out ſuch as he knew, partly to bee the inuentours of miſchiefe againſt him, and partly to beare no good wyll towarde his perſon, that he couldе redily name and reherſe their names and ſurnames, whereof a great part were within few dayes after apprehended and taken. And among them, Lord William Courtney, ſonne to Edward Erle of Deuonſhire, a man of great nobilitie, eſtimacion and vertue, which maryed Lady Katheryn, daughter to king Edward, Lorde William brother to Edmond, Erle of Southfolke, Syr James Tyrrell, Sir John Windham. Both theſe Williams before reherſed were rather taken of ſuſpicion and ielowſie, becauſe they were nere of blood to the cõiurators, then for any proued offence or crime. Wherefore the Lorde William ſonne to the Erle of Deuonſhire, after the death of king Henry the ſeuenth, was deliuered and ſet abroad at libertie, by the noble and famous Prince kyng Henry the eyght, ſonne to the ſayd kyng, with whome after he was in great fauour and eſtimacion: but ſhortelye after, when he beganne to exerciſe him ſelfe in marciall feates and warlike ſtudy he ſickened of a diſeaſe, called Pluresis, of which malady becauſe it was ſtraunge & rare to the Phiſicians of England, he at the kinges Manour of Grenewich deceſſed, leauing one ſonne behinde him, to continue hys ſtirpe and familie. The Lorde William, brother to Edmond the Erle of Southfolke had alſo greater fauour ſhewed in priſon, then hee had before. And Syr James Tyrrell, and John Windham, becauſe they were Traytors and ſo attaynted the firſt daye of Maye, they were on the Towre hyll beheaded.

hedded. But when the Erle of Southfolk hard that some of his friends were put to execuciō, and some other committed to perpetuall prypson and captiuity, he was in a great agony and feare of himselfe. And so being clerely desperat to haue any tortunate successe in his pretensed enterprice, wandered about all Germanye and Fraunce for ayde and succour, prouing if he coulde finde any ayde or succour at their handes. But when he perceyued no stedfast ground to catch anchor holde vpon he submitted him selfe vnder the obeysaunce and defence of Philip Archeduke of Austrich and Burgoyne and Erle of Flaunders: But Richard his brother being an expert and politique man, so craftilye conueyed, and so wisely ordered himselfe in this stormy tempest, that he was not attrapped eyther with net or snare. The king, not yet being out of doubt of all domesticall and seditious ciuill discord, studied busily how to restrein & kepe in a streyte closure diuers malefactors, which being partakers of this conspiracy fled to sundry sanctuaries, tarying there til a faire day came to auaunce forward their enterprise. Wherupon he deuised to kepe the gates of all sanctuaries & places priuileged, shut & well locked, so that none should issue out from thence to perturbe and vnquiet him, his realme or people. And for that entent he both wrote and sent Ambassadours to Alexander then Bishop of Rome, desiring him by his authority to iudge and decerne all Englishmen, being fledde to Sanctuarye or other places for treason, as enemies to Christes faith, and scismatiques to Christen religion, & as cōmon perturbers of the quyet people, and Cappytaines and prouokers of trayterous rufflings inhibiting & prohibiting the refuge & priuilege of Sanctuary to all such persons as once had enioyed the immunity & libertie of the same, & after had fled out, & eftsones returned again. Which thing after ỳ the bishop had graunted, it was greatly to the quietnesse and comfort of king Henry, & many through the feare of that reproch, conuerted themselues to goodnesse & due subiection of their Prince: Other also that were in securitie, & out of all perill & daūger, durst not hasard themselues for feare of galtroppes or slypping into the fyre.

When the kyng by his high pollicie had compassed and framed his affaires thus to his purpose, sodeinly happened a lamentable chaunce & losse to the king, Queene, and all the people. For that noble Prince Arthure, the kinges first begotten sonne, after that he had bene maryed to the Ladie Katherin his wyfe fiue moneths, departed out of this transitorie lyfe, in his Castell of Ludlowe, and with a great funerall obsequie was buryed in the cathedrall Church of Worcester. After whose death the name of Prince belonged to his brother the Duke of Yorke, for ỳ his brother dyed without issue, and so without any creation ought to be called, except some cause apparaunt were the let and obstacle of the same. Howbeit the sayde duke vpon suspicion of his brothers wife to be with childe, and that doubtfully thought by the expert and sage men of the Princes counsaile, was by a moneth and more delayed from his title, name, and preheminence, in the which season the truth might to women: easily appere. It is reported that this Ladie Katheryn thought and feared such dolorous chaunce to come: For when she had embraced her father, and taken her leaue of her noble and prudent mother, and sayled towardes England, she was continually so tossed and tumbled hether and thether, wyth boysterous wyndes, that what for the rage of the water, and contrarietie of the windes, her ship was prohibited diuers tymes to ap-

The next yere after Queene Elizabeth, liyng within the Tower of London, was brought abed of a fayre daughter on Candlemasse day, which was there christened and named Katheryn, and the .xj. day of the same Moneth, the sayde most vertuous Princes and gracious Queene there deceassed, and was with all funerall pompe caryed through the Citie of London to Westminster, and there buried, whose daughter also taryed but a small season after her mother.

Sir Reignolde Bray dead.

After the death of this noble Princes, which for her great vertue was commonly called good Queene Elizabeth, departed Sir Reignolde Bray knight of the Garter, a very father of his Countrie, a sage and a graue person, and a feruent louer of iustice. In so muche that if any thing had beene done agaynst good lawe or equitie, he would after an humble fashion plainly reprehende the king, and geue him good aduertisement how to reforme that offence, & to be more circumspect in another lyke case. Of the same vertue and honest plainenesse was John Morton Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which Bishop dyed as (it is shewed aboue) two yeres before. So these two persons were euer restrayners and refrayners of the kinges wilfull scope and vnbrideled libertie, where as the rude and ignorannt people say and affirme, that their counsaile infected and corrupted the kinges cleane and immaculate conscience, contrary to his princely disposition & naturall inclination. Such is euer the error of the cõmon people: but surely as long as the king would heere and obey such as warned him of his office royall and kingly dutie, he coulde in no wise erre or swarue aside.

About this tyme also dyed Henrye Archebishop of Cauntorbury, whose rowme Doctor William Warram Bishop of London supplyed. And to the Bishoprycke of London was elected William Barnes, after whose death succeded Richard Fitziames. In which yere the .xviij. day of Februarye, the king at his Palace of Westminster, wyth all solemnitie created his onely sonne Henry Prince of Wales, Erle of Chester. &c. which noble yongling succeded his father, not onely in the inheritaunce and regalitie, but also was to him equall in honour, fame, learnyng and pollicie.

Maximilian the Emperour, hearing that Queene Elizabeth was deceased, sent into England a solempne Ambassade of the which Lorde Cazimire, Marques of Bradenburgh his Cosyn, accompanied with a Bysshop, an Erle, and a great number of gentlemen well appareled, was principall Ambassadour, which were triumphantly receaued into London, and was lodged at Crosbyes place. This Ambassade was sent for three causes, one to visite and comfort the king, beyng sorowfull and sadde for the death of so good a Queene and spouse. The second for the renouation of the old league and amitie. The thirde which was not apparaunt, was to moue the king to marry the Emperours daughter the Ladye Margaret, Duches dowagar of Sauoye. The first two tooke effect, for the king vpon Passion Sunday, roade to Paules in great triumph, the sayde Marques ryding on his left hande. And there the Bysshop made to the King an excellent and comfortable Oration, concerning the death of the Queene. And there also the king openly swore to keepe the new renouate league and amitie, during their two liues. But the thirde request, whether the let was on the mans part or womans mans side, neuer sorted to any effect or conclusion. And so these things done, the Ambassadours returned sumptuously and honorably rewarded.

All this Wynter was preparation made for the conueyaunce of the Ladye Margaret, affied to the king of Scottes into Scotland. And when all things were readie and prest, the king remoued the last day of June from Rychemond, hauing in his company his sayde daughter, and came to Colyweston, where the Countesse of Richmond his mother then lay. And after certayne dayes of solace ended, the king gaue her his blessing with a fatherly exhortation, and committed the conueyaunce of her to the king her husbandes presence to the Erle of Surrey: and the Erle of Northumberlande was appointed as Wardeyn of the Marches to delyuer her at the Confines of both the Marches. Thus this fayre Ladie was conueyed with a great company of Lordes, Ladies, Knightes, Esquires and Gentlemen, till shee came to Berwike, and from thence to a Village called Lambreton Kyrke in Scotlande, where the king with the floure of Scotlande was readie to receaue her, to whom the Erle of Northumberland, according to his commission delyuered her. The Scottes that day, I assure you were not behind the Englishemen, but farre aboue, both in apparell and riche Jewels and massy Chaynes: But aboue other the Erle of Northumberland, what for the ryches of his Cote, beyng Goldsmithes worke, garnished with pearle and stone, and what for the costly apparell of the Henxmen and galaunt trappers of their horses, besides foure hundred tall men, well horsed and apparelled in his colours, that he was esteemed both of the Scottes and English men, more lyke a prince then a subiect. Then was this Ladie conueyed to the towne of Edenborough, and there the day after, king James the fourth, in the presence of all his nobilitie espoused the sayde fayre princesse, and feasted the Englishe Lordes, and shewed to them Justes and other pastimes, very honorably, after the fashion of his rude Countrey. When all thinges were done and finished according to their commission, the Erle of Surrey with all the Englishe Lords and Ladyes returned into their Countrie, geuyng more prayse to the manhood, then to the good maner and nurture of Scotlande.

The Ladie Margaret eldest daughter vnto the King, affied vnto the king of Scottes was cõueyed into Scotlande.

In this yere began the newe worke of the kings Chapell at Westminster, which is one of the most excellent peeces of worke, wrought in stone, that is in Christendome.

In this yere the king kept his high Court of Parliament, in the which diuers actes were concluded, which were thought necessarie and expedient for the preseruation of the publique weale. And among other thinges, it was determined that theeues and murderers duely conuicted by the lawe to dye, should be burned in the hande, and committed to the Bishops custodie as I haue before declared. After this certaine money was graunted to the king, by the whole Parliament, and the goodes of men outlawed were forfeyted and confiscated. There was also called (as the maner is) a congregation of the Clergie, to the intent, that they with their Treasure and Money might auaunce and preferre the common welth of the realme.

A parliament.

Hetherto we haue shewed you rough and sharpe battailes, pernitious and seditious strife, tumult, and the death of many noble and meane persons: Now therefore let vs here rehearse, the contention of familier things, the gnawyng gnawyng at the hartes, and the fretting of mindes and of bowes, promises and requestes made of diuers persons.

King Henry, now drawing to age, and before this time euer vexed and prouoked with the scrupulous stinges of sedicion and ciuill commocion, insomuch that he more detested and abhorred intestine and priuat warre, then death or any thing more terrible. Wherfore he determined so politiquelye to prouide that all the causes of such vnquyetnesse and mischiefe to come, should be rooted out and banished: which imaginacion and purpose he doubted not to compasse and bring to effect, if he made lowe and abated the courage of his subiects and vassalles, and especially of the richest sortes, remembring the olde prouerbe, that men through aboundaunce of riches waxe more insolent and hedstrong, and that nothing is more to them acceptable or desirous, then aboundaunce of treasure and plentie of money, which people eyther for feare of losing, or hope of gayning of worldly ryches desyre eyther peace or warre. But to the intent that men might not thinke nor report that he which is their king instituted of God to reuenge all iniuries to them done and committed, should oppresse and wrongfully polle and exact money of his subiects, he deuised with him selfe by what honest meane he might performe it. And thus deuising with himself, it came into his hed that the Englishmen did little passe vpon the obseruation and keping of penall lawes and statutes, made and ordeyned for the preseruation of the common vtillitie and welth. And therefore, if inquisition were had of suche penall statutes, there should be fewe noble men, Merchaunts, Farmers, Husbandmen, Graziers nor Occupiers, but they would be found transgressours and violatours of the same statutes. After that he had taken this councell, he sought oute the penall lawes, and put them in execution, and they that were found offenders, were easily at the beginning fined and scourged. After that he appoynted two Maisters and surueyers of his forfaytes, the one syr Richard Empson, and the other Edmond Dudley, both learned in the lawes of the Realme. And these two personnes contended, which of them by most bringing in might most please and satisfie his maisters desyre and appetite. Wherfore in the beginning, they armed wyth a company of accusers (commonly called Promoters) which brought to them the names of the offendors, estemed and regarded so much the gayne of money, that they clerely forgate and banished out of their remembrance their duetie present, the perill that might ensue, and the thanke and good will that they might haue obtayned, and yet they had warning of diuers sage persons to close theyr hands from such vncharitable doings and cruell extremytie, according to the Adage, the extremitie of iustice is extreme iniurie.

The King, after he had gotten a large and ample sum of money, hauing pitie of the people, which cryed to God daylie for an ende of their pilfering, of his clemencie and gracious goodnesse towarde his ende thought it best, and thus determined, that these two extreme officers should be depriued of that office, and the monie from whome it was vniustly exacted and extorted to be wholy restored and deliuered againe: Which being preuented with death, commaunded it by his last will & testament to be duely and truly performed, but in the meane season many mens coffers were emptied.
